5. Christ can do it. Paul, after he had asked the question, 'O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?' answers by saying, 'Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.' 1 Cor. xv. 55, 57. We are told that Christ took upon him human form, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. Heb. ii. 14, 15.

But how can Christ do this? By extracting the sting of death which is sin. 1 Cor. xv. 56. God promises to forgive the sins of those who love the Savior, and give themselves away to him. If our sins are forgiven, we need not fear death. You will all acknowledge in your hearts, that it is the fear of judgment after death that makes people afraid to die. If now our fear of judgment is removed by the forgiveness of our sins, then we have no reason to be unwilling to die. Those whose sins are pardoned will go to live with God in heaven, when they die, and ought they to be afraid of that?—No, my young friends; sin makes you afraid of death; and when God, for Jesus' sake, forgives your sin, then you will feel ready to go to dwell with him forever. How delightful the thought of being always with the Savior! How pleasant to die, when such are the happy consequences! Are you ready? Have you ever been to the Savior and asked his forgiveness for your guilt? Do I hear you say, No? and is it so? Then go at once,—tell him of your wickedness, and of your folly in not having loved him, and upon your knees, pray that he will accept of you and make you his dear child forever. Now, children, now is the time; to-morrow where will you be? God alone can tell.—Such is the advice of

UNCLE WILLIAM.

THE BIBLE.

TO BE THE SOLE STANDARD IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

There is one thing belonging to Sunday schools, which has always been delightful to my mind; the deference paid to the Holy Scriptures. I hope that the teachers before me teach the children the whole Scriptures, and the all-sufficiency of Scripture as a rule of faith and practice; that they do not teach them any formulary or creed as a standard by which the Bible is to be judged, but the Bible is the standard by which every formulary, creed, catechism, and hymn is to be judged, and to be received or rejected accordingly. I trust, that, as they value the souls of the children, they will teach them to trace all their notions of the truth to the Scriptures themselves: that they will not teach them any notion first, by which to interpret the Scriptures, which might lead to misrepresentation and perversion, so that they would put the rites of Christianity in the place of Christianity itself, and thus be supplied with a false religion, a fatal barrier to the operations of truth through their future days. I exhort them to dread the thought of mixing the chaff with the wheat. Let the Word of God have its due elevation in all our schools. I think it the happiest sign of the times, that, in orthodox sects, the Bible is becoming elevated to that point to which the final appeal is now to be made. I know there were many persons who thought it a very obscure book, very hard to be understood, very likely to do a great deal of injury, unless it were accompanied with some formulary, some safeguard to keep it from doing harm. Very respectable men, gentlemen, educated men, declared to me solemnly that such was their conviction, that it was a very dangerous thing to put the Bible into the hands of all classes, especially of young children. I hold the notion to be an absurdity; a libel both on the Author of the Book and on the human mind. I believe that there is no book in the whole world easier to be understood in all its essential parts; one more universally adapted to man in all the capacities and all the diversified situations of human life. Its truths can enter into the minds of the humblest as well as the highest orders, and under all the disadvantages of the want of literature; like the element of water, which, while it fills the bed of the ocean, can insinuate itself into the smallest crevice; or like the element of light, which, while it gladdens the monarch in his palace, can cheer the peasant in his cot. I believe that the Scriptures can make every class wise unto salvation: I believe that they can, through the blessing of God, make young children wise unto salvation; that they can understand its histories, precepts, and doctrines, so far as is necessary to their salvation. I wish that those objectors had heard me examine some Sunday-school children on the Parables. They were not told before hand what questions they would be asked, but were left to the answers which might be prompted by their own minds. The parable of the Sower was one: "Who are meant by the stony-ground hearers?" "People with hard hearts."—"Who are meant by the way-side hearers?" "People who do not attend to what they hear." "Who are meant by thorny-ground hearers?" "People who are choked by the cares of life." "And what are the cares of this life?" "If you please, it is worrying themselves." I wish they could have heard me examine a little Irish boy on the conversation of our Lord with Nicodemus on the new birth. "What is the meaning of Verily?" "Indeed." "What is a miracle?" "A wonder." "What is the new birth?" "A great change." "What is the kingdom of heaven?" "Och, your honor! it is something here (pointing to his breast,) and something up yonder." Oh! but they cannot understand the Bible! It is very clear that those objectors do not understand it; and that, from the want of giving their attention to it, and thinking about it. There are multitudes of minds which never had a noble thought, and multitudes of persons who have a mind which they never use; they suppose that nobody else ought to think. It is like a blind man finding fault with other people for opening their eyes; and telling them, that, as it was only a little light they could see, there would be great danger of its leading them wrong. I hope that you will hear no more of the danger of the little knowledge only which can be given at first: the sure tendency of that little is, to make them thirst for more. As to little children not understanding the Scriptures, I believe that there are many persons in business, and many members of churches, cannot stand an examination with Sabbath-scholars. There are many such children who would put older persons to the blush, by the readiness of their answers, and their familiar acquaintance with the sacred Scriptures.—Rev. Dr. Litchfield, at Sund. Sch. Un. Anniv.

DARK PROVIDENCES.—Dark Providences are often the ground-work of some excellent piece God is about to discover to the world. His methods are like a plated picture, which on the one side represents a negro, on the other a beauty. He lets Sarah's womb be dead, and then brings out the root of a numerous progeny. He makes Jacob a cripple, and then a prince to prevail with God; he gives him a wound, and then a blessing. He sends not the gospel till reason was nonplussed; and that the world, in the highest wisdom it had at that time attained unto, was not able to arrive at the knowledge of God.—"After that the world by wisdom knew not God it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." (1 Cor. i. 21.)—Charnock.

From the New York Observer.

SOWING IN HOPE.—In one of the reports read at the last public meeting of the Board of the New York City Tract Society, the following encouraging incident was mentioned.

A pious lady having engaged as a Tract Visiter, felt the importance of her work, and performed it with commendable zeal and holy affection: warning the wicked, expostulating and praying with them, and persuading them to attend the house of God. Yet it does not appear that she was much encouraged by seeing the results of her labors. It was her's to believe and to be encouraged in her work by precious promises and then to die in faith, not having seen their fulfilment. But now they are being accomplished. Before she was called hence, she induced a family of four persons, who were opposed to religion, to attend Divine worship: yet not without difficulty; for the mother was apprehensive that her daughter might imbibe principles that would deprive her of all her pleasures. Oh, how fallacious are the estimates formed by the unregenerate! That daughter became a partaker of Divine grace, and then found far more happiness in renouncing the pleasures of sin than she had ever derived from their indulgence. The other members of the family also were made partakers of the like invaluable blessing, and all four are now rejoicing in the love of God, united to the same evangelical church, and walking worthily in the profession they have made; while the daughter partakes of new and holy pleasures, endeavoring as a Tract Visiter, to fill up the place vacated by the removal from earth to heaven, of her through whose instrumentality she was brought to the knowledge of the Savior.

O.

UNION WITH CHRIST.—O! that such as have for many years together sat under the ministry of the Gospel of Christ, and to this day are altogether strangers to this blessed union with Christ, would now, with all seriousness, apply themselves to know it experimentally; oh that they would, with holy Paul, "account all things loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ;" Phil. iii. 1; even this, that they may be "found in him," ver. 6.—to know him with interest, to know him in this mysterious and beatificial union, Christ in them, and they in Christ.—Alas! this is the undoing mistake of thousands who are called Christians; they know somewhat of the history of Christ; they have some notions of a Christ in their heads, but this is the precipice upon which they ruin themselves, they think to be saved by a Christ without them; they hang upon the outside of the ark, they live upon bare notions; the Son of God took our nature upon him, died for our sins, rose again, and is gone up into heaven, and sits at God's right hand: and therefore conclude they shall be saved. Oh but what a fallacy do they put upon their own souls: James i. 23. Christ is the hope of salvation, it is true, but it is not simply Christ in our nature, not simply Christ on the cross, not Christ in the grave, no, not alone Christ on the throne, but, saith the apostle, "Christ in you the hope of glory;" Col. 27. It were an easy thing to be saved, if a Christ without us were all; and I know no reason why reprobate men and devils might not get to heaven on such terms.

A FOOL OR A LIAR.—"Amid these scenes"—the wonders of the Alpine Mountains in Europe—"surrounded by the sublimest demonstrations of the eternal power and Godhead of the Almighty, a wretch has had the hardihood to avow and record his Atheism, having written over against his name in the Album, at Montanvert, 'An Atheist.' It seems as if some emotion of shame touched him at the time, for it was written in Greek. It caught the eye of a divine who succeeded him, and he very properly wrote underneath, in the same language, 'If an Atheist, a fool,—if not, a liar.'"—Raffles.

NEOLOGY.—"If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." New terms imperceptibly make way for new doctrines; nor has any subtlety of the enemy of souls succeeded better in corrupting the mind from the simplicity there is in Christ, than modernizing the language of divinity.—When men are shy of the "words the Holy Ghost teacheth," we are always afraid they are beginning to be ashamed of the things.—Jay.

TRUTH.—Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose upon the earth, so truth be among them we need not fear. Let her and falsehood grapple, who ever knew her to be put to the worst, in a free and open encounter.—Milton.

THE FULNESS OF CHRIST.—Lord, the condemnation was thine, that justification might be mine; the agony thine, that the victory might be mine; the pain was thine, and the ease is mine; the stripes thine, and and the healing balm issuing from them mine; the vinegar and gall were thine, that the honey and sweet might be mine; the curse was thine, that the blessing might be mine; the crown of thorns was thine, that the crown of glory might be mine; the life purchased by it mine: thou paidst the price, that I might enjoy the inheritance.—Flavel's Fountain of Life.

Those that are active for God in their generation, must expect to pass through evil report and good report; and it is wisdom, as much as may be, to keep out of the hearing of both; lest by the one, they be exalted, and by the other, depressed above measure.—Rutherford

LIVING IN SIN.—He who lives in sin, and expects happiness hereafter, is like him that soweth cockle, and thinks to fill his barn with wheat.—John Bunyan.

"ANA-BAPTIST VERSION OF THE BIBLE."

The following resolution (says an exchange paper,) was recently adopted at an annual Association of the Ana-baptist denomination in one of the states, and a correspondent of the Churchman says that "He has reason to believe that it has also been adopted by similar bodies throughout the country:"

"Resolved, That we recommend to the American and Foreign Bible Society to take suitable steps to procure a revised version of the sacred Scriptures in the English language, so that the whole truth may be given to our own, as well as to other nations without concealment, leaving no word untranslated capable of being translated into good English; recommending, however, the utmost precaution in said revising."

That the Baptists have resolved to take "suitable steps" to procure a faithful translation of the sacred Scriptures, to place the whole truth before our own and other nations, is indeed true; and when the whole circumstances are taken into consideration, we are inclined to think they deserve the gratitude of mankind, rather than the censure of any portion of the church of God. Their labors to preserve the purity of the Scriptures and the ordinances of God's House, are good evidence of their sincerity. A work so stupendous in its nature, so difficult in its accomplishment, and, withal, so unpopular in a large portion of the visible church of Christ, would hardly be undertaken by a community indifferent to the interests of religion. If it could be proved that the Baptists are wrong in their views of Gospel baptism, and in some instances over-zealous in propagating those views, this would by no means effect their character so far as righteousness of purpose is concerned. But in whatever light the subject is candidly viewed; evidences of the correctness of their theory, as well as of good intention, are multiplied. In most if not all the controversies respecting the ordinance in question, they are the gainers in the popular esteem. Opposition to their policy has done much already, and continues to do much to commend their views to the favorable consideration of earnest enquirers after truth.

The providence of God has also been manifestly displayed thus far in their behalf, and appears to be now leading them onward to enlarge and extend their course of benevolence. Their efforts will be successful so long as they are characterized by singleness of aim to glorify God. Would it not be better for the cause of truth, and more conducive to the spread of the light of salvation, for Christians to dispense with the use of ridiculous epithets in reference to each other, (such as stands at the head of this article,) and an acrimonious spirit; and unite as far as possible to promulgate the truth "without concealment?" Respecting the above measure, as well as all other enterprizes where human agency is employed, it may be said in truth, "If this work or counsel be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it." Originally, we thought this an unnecessary step, but now we look for the translation to be consummated through the labors and contributions of Baptists. When it appears if it contains errors, they can be pointed out. There are minds and means adequate to the undertaking. Let the subject be discussed till the truth is made so plain that "he may run that readeth it." Let the same zealous care be cherished by christians to preserve the purity of all the institutions of the Scriptures; let them do battle against every species of error, every infraction or perversion of the Divine law, and the interests of the church will be promoted, and the redemption of our species will advance speedily.

THE MONTHLY CONCERT.

This measure which has been repeatedly recommended by different denominations, and by our own especially, and which has been the means of spiritual quickening to so many christians in different places, still fails to interest the attention and feelings of too great a portion of the professing community. Perhaps nothing has been introduced in modern times which bears a more striking resemblance to the usages of the church in its primitive state, when Christians united in prayer for certain great objects "with one accord," than the monthly concert. Christians did not anciently expect to see prosperity without effort—great and united effort, and the blessing of God on those efforts; and their labors of love were contemplated, determined on, and performed in the spirit of prayer. It was no less necessary then, than now, to seek the divine aid in reference to any important enterprize. When that aid was sought, it was imparted, the church was comforted, and God was glorified. The church at the present day has assumed great and important responsibilities. To accomplish what she has undertaken, she must be united, and what will tend more to union of feeling and to promote health and strength in any body of Christians, than frequently to unite in prayer to God for the same great object? The amount of interest evinced by any community in the Monthly Concert, may be regarded not only as evidential of the state of piety among them, but as affording a correct clue to the result of the enterprize in which they are engaged. If they are destined to succeed, a sure token of that success will appear in the humility, faith, and courage with which they plead the promises of God.

If God will employ their instrumentality to accomplish His work, He will touch their spirits and move their hearts towards the great work they are called to perform; and their feelings, their prayers, and their alms will be blended together in reference to it. If this is a just criterion of success in the objects proposed by our own denomination, What do the signs of the times betoken? Do our brethren recognize the voice of the Great Head of the church calling them to the discharge of duty? or do they yield assent only to what others have proposed? Does the interest they feel in what the denomination has undertaken, lead them to prayer, and their prayers to liberality in giving? or do some profess to feel interested in those objects, and still neglect prayer, or to pray without giving, or to give without prayer? Dear Brethren, we entreat you not to sunder what God has joined together. Be consistent. Consider well what you ought to do. Pray, that you may know your duty, and when it is known, never, oh! never neglect it. Resolve, as individuals, to meet your brethren at all suitable opportunities, and especially at the Monthly Concert. There mingle your hearts and voices in prayer, for direction and success in all your labors. Send your prayers in advance of the Missionary of the Cross. Embrace in your petitions, those who are perishing for lack of vision. Agonize for the conversion of the heathen! Wrestle for the restoration of Israel! Bear up before the throne of grace, those who consecrate themselves to the arduous work of the ministry, and never relax your efforts till your prayers are answered, and the world is regenerated.

THE METHODISTS

This large, and influential church, whose ministry have acted to a considerable extent as pioneers in propagating the christian religion in this and other countries, appears to be experiencing a share of those trials to which the whole church of Christ is incident. In many respects the policy of that church seems well adapted to secure to itself unanimity in sentiment, increase of numbers, and general prosperity in temporal, as well as spiritual things. And thus far, their increase in numbers and influence has been very rapid. Yet their history, as well as the experience of all past time, proves that no system ever yet introduced into the world, however well framed, has been able to sustain its claims to universal support. Mr. Wesley, the venerable founder of this sect, lived to see the flock he had labored night and day to collect, divided and scattered to some extent, both in England and America; and this branch of the church has been no stranger to dissensions and divisions from that time to the present. Until within a few years past, we believe the principal source of dissatisfaction and division among them, has been the form of church government, (many ministers as well as members disliking Episcopacy.) But recently, the question of slavery has to a great extent agitated this, as well as most of the large churches in this country. It is generally known that Mr. Wesley was the uncompromising enemy to this system, and a great portion of the church at every period has cherished the same views. Previous to the late session of the General Conference, it appeared to us that the denomination would divide on this point; but though we were disappointed in this respect, yet the action of that body has failed to give general satisfaction to the ministry and membership, perhaps we might with propriety say it has increased the dissatisfaction which previously existed. As an evidence of this, we see there have been numerous secessions from the church within a short time past; and when we reflect on the bearing of the above named objections, it is impossible to divine what the results will be.

The Methodist Protestant, and Reformed Methodist denominations, holding the same doctrines and usages, excepting only Episcopacy and slavery, are already numerous and respectable, and are fast increasing as well by the accession of dissenters from M. E. Church, as by persons brought in by the labors of an industrious and efficient ministry. To say nothing of the views of these brethren in separating from each other, we are impressed that it will be productive of ultimate good to the parties, and to community at large. The parties respectively, while laboring in their various spheres will learn the exercise of forbearance and a more fervent charity; while each branch of the church can labor in its own way to build up the Kingdom of Christ.

Those who hold Methodist sentiments, and who are nevertheless opposed to slavery and Episcopacy, can find a home in one of the other branches of the family, while those who choose to retain or commence membership in the Episcopal church, can do so without the annoyance resulting from conflicting opinions. Another benefit promised by the separation, is the profitable exercise of gifts among the dissenters, which might have been otherwise unemployed, and consequently, the enlightening and conversion of many souls to whom the Gospel might not have had access. It will also afford an opportunity for the exercise of a more enlarged benevolence. The various resources of the whole church may thus be laid open, and a healthy action be induced and perpetuated. Finally, every branch of the household of faith may learn while witnessing the changes to which some portions of Zion are subjected—to conform their doctrine, ordinances and discipline to the most obvious import of the sacred Scriptures—to practice justice, mercy and charity in the church of the living God—to be kind and lenient to dissenters—benevolent and useful to the whole family of man—and to aspire after the rewards of peace-makers in the Kingdom of Heaven.

LADIES' COMPANION.—The [illegible] number of this work is before us, which is equal, we believe, to any of its predecessors in richness and variety. Among its contents are "The Chain of Gold, a Tale of Truth," "The Widow's Consolation," by Samuel Woodworth. "Charity," by S. S. [illegible] by Ann S. Stephens. "[illegible]"—translated from the German [illegible] Tale of the Heart." "What [illegible] Life." "Repentance, Conversion, [illegible] Regeneration." "To the Rev. [illegible] Woodworth," by S. Woodworth. "Sketches in the West," by the author of '[illegible]' 'Capt. Kidd,' &c. "My Boyhood's happy Home,"—Clarendon. "Life—a Garden," by J. N. McJilton." "The sacred Minstrel," by Lydia H. Sigourney. "Literary Review." "Editor's Table."

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

Proceedings of the Executive Committee of the Jewish Missionary Society, at a meeting called by the President, and held at the house of Br. Randolph Dunham, Plainfield, N. J., Oct. 10th, 1840.

The meeting opened with prayer by Br. W. B. Maxson, when, after due deliberation and in pursuance of the resolution of the society at its general session, vigorously to prosecute the work in which they had commenced, it was Resolved, That we communicate with Br. George B. Utter, relative to his becoming prepared for, and laboring as a missionary under the direction of this society.

Resolved, That we communicate with Br. Alexander Campbell and ascertain if he can be obtained to labor as a missionary to the Jews, and in case of failure with him, that we apply next to Br. Eli S. Bailey, and next to Br. Joel Greene, in order to secure a missionary for the society.

The following brethren were then appointed agents of the society, to present its claims to the churches, and the friends of the mission in the specified sections assigned them respectively, and collect funds to liquidate its present debt and meet the expenses of our future operations.

Br. Edwin Stillman, in Western New York.

Br. Eli S. Bailey, in the Central Association.

Br. Wm. Satterlee, in Berlin and Petersburgh.

Br. Walter B. Gillett, in New Jersey.

Br. Lucius Crandall, in Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Resolved, That we request our Secretary to correspond with the churches and the agents of the society, as he thinks it may subserve the interests of the cause.

We shall make no written appeal to the denomination at this time, in hope of making a more agreeable and a more effective one by the voice of our agents, and that speedily.

It will be remembered that Brethren A. Campbell and J. Cochran were presented by the general Board to our committee as a nomination for the Mission, but we can not hope that Br. Cochran's services can be obtained in the work, knowing that he has an appointment for a year under the direction of our General Missionary Society, and therefore we have omitted to communicate with him on the subject.

By order of the Executive Board,

THOS. S. ALBERTI, Sec'y. protem.

REVIVAL RECORD.

Revivals.—At a protracted meeting with the church at Deep Run, Va. forty-five professed to obtain a hope in Christ.

The Baptist church at Rahway, New Jersey, have recently received several additions by baptism.

Several of the Baptist churches near Richmond, Va. are enjoying precious revivals.

At Stamping Ground, Ky. between forty and fifty have been added to the church.

Several churches in Barren and Allen Counties Ky., have received additions.

At Geveral and Covington, Tenn. refreshing revivals have recently been enjoyed.—Cross and Journal.

Revivals.—The Virginia Religious Herald seems to present a greater number of revivals at the south than we read of elsewhere. On the 27th September, (Lord's day,) the editor states, "Br. J. B. Taylor, pastor of the Third Baptist church in Richmond, immersed twenty-two candidates, Br. Magoon, pastor of the Second, immersed thirteen, and Br. J. B. Jeter, pastor of the First, immersed four." He further states, that Br. P. P. Smith has baptized since June, 213. "Of this number one hundred and twenty-four have been added to the Fork church, Fluvanna Co., seventy-five to Buckingham church, and fourteen to Liberty church, Buckingham Co."—N. Y. Bap. Register.

INTELLIGENCE.

SUMMARY.

Elections.—Full returns of the late elections have been received from Maryland and Delaware, which shows that the opponents of the Administration have succeeded by greatly increased majorities. In Maryland, the House of Delegates will stand, 60 [illegible] Administration. Senate 15 Whigs [illegible] Administration. There are [illegible] which the entire Administration [illegible] prevailed. The same ticket [illegible] Baltimore city.

In Delaware, the election was for inspectors. The Whigs carried every county in the state by a large majority.

Pennsylvania.—Few returns have been received from this state. In Philadelphia, Ingersoll, Adm. is elected to Congress in the district where the election of 1838 was contested between Ingersoll and Naylor.

A new Baptist church has recently been formed in Providence, R. I. Rev. C. W. Denison is the pastor.—Cross and Journal.

Longevity.—The Post Ampt Gazette, of Frankfort, says there is now living at Moscow, the widow of a dealer in skins, who has attained her 157th year. When 123 she married her fifth husband. All her alliances have been prosperous and happy. She is still in the possession of all her mental faculties.

Indian Troubles.—The Liberty (Missouri,) Star, of Sept. 26th, says that difficulties have arisen between the Ottowa and Iowa tribes of Indians, growing out of some aggressions committed by the former on the territories of the latter. Two hundred regular troops, under the command of Col. Kearney have been despatched to the theatre of action.—Eve. Post.

Another large Day's Work.—There appeared in a late number of the Argus, an account of a large day's work performed by John P. Russ; the following outstrips even that:

Mr. James Sickles (who is in the employ of Joel Rathbone, Esq.) on the 6th inst., made twelve hundred and two pounds of English iron stove pipe, in the unprecedented short time of thirteen hours and forty-five minutes.—Albany Argus.

Governor Porter has signed the death warrant of Robert M'Conarchy, who for the sake of a few dollars, murdered the whole of the Browne family, six in number. He is to be executed on the 6th of November.

From Florida.—By the steamboat Gen. Clinch, Capt. Brooks, arrived yesterday from Black Creek, we have received the following intelligence:

A short time since, Lt. Saunders, 2d Dragoons, U. S. Army being on a scout, captured an Indian warrior on We Kiwa river. After hearing his story and placing no confidence in it, ordered him to be shot, which was done, and hung up as a terror and warning to his party. He had about him a portion of the dresses and trinkets of Forbes' theatricals and catridges which were taken from Col. Harney's command, who were, a short time since shot at the same place.—Savannah Georgian of October 3d.

Whaling.—The enterprising citizens of Provincetown fitted out three brigs last spring for whaling. One of them (says the Barnstable Patriot,) arrived home last week, after an absence of six months, with a cargo of 700 barrels of sperm oil. She reported the other two, which she left filling up, one of them having over 500, and the other 400, with a large whale alongside. Here is a cargo, taken at sea in six months, worth twenty thousand dollars.

The other two brigs have subsequently arrived; one with 580 and the other with 570 barrels of sperm oil.

The value of the oil taken by the three vessels, is at least $50,000, and they will probably pay their owners near 200 per cent on the property invested.

From the New York Baptist Register.

The great decline of the Drama in London, is particularly noticed by a correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, "Theatres," he says, "are everywhere closing, their managers daily becoming bankrupts, and the unfortunate beings who have figured on the stage are plunged into the very depths of misery and privation.' It would be a happy thing could we say the same of them on this side the water. Instead of declining, they have been flourishing with superior vigor in our principal cities. There has been a great change however, in the taste of the patrons. The consideration of the great efforts of the head, as those of Shakspeare, Rowe, and Young, has been entirely excluded, and the only thing worthy of admiration is now found in the heels. Shakspeare has become a mere dolt beside the fascinating female who can dance with the dexterity of the daughter of Herodias, and astonishing with her wanton attitudes, and shameful exposure of the person.

The play-going communities have been for months infatuated with the demoralizing exhibitions of that Dutch girl, Madame Ellsler; and the common appellations given her have been that of "the divine Fanny," "the angelic Fanny." The theatres have been crowded to overflowing, wherever she has performed, and large sums have been given extra for tickets. In one of the chief cities, the madness of her admirers was such, the horses were taken from the carriage in which she was riding, and they so degraded themselvs as to take the places of the beasts, and draw her to her lodgings. Six hundred dollars a night has been paid her for her caperings and it was indeed a great privilege to secure her services for that. She will return home, after a six months' tour in this country, with an aggregate of receits of fifty thousnd dollars.

Madam Celeste and Augusta, before her, enjoyed likewise a high degree of admiration, and obtained immense sums of money. These women, whose only merit is in their heels, bounding with dexterity in the Italian opera, with the most indelicate exposure of their persons—and this, by the way, is the highest part of the charm—are greeted and caressed in some of the first families in the land; and all classes, of both sexes, night after night, gather in multitudes to behold their voluptuous attitudes, and money goes as free as water. A virtuous female must labor for years, night and day, to secure what one of these creatures obtains in a single week.

We have read with surprise of the overpowering influence of a female dancer on Herod; but when reading of the absolute derangement produced on the minds of thousands by Madam Ellsler's exhibition, we do not know what sacrifice would be withheld from her by those under her enchantment, where they had the power to grant it. Indeed, they would seem to be not only ready to surrender such a man as John the Baptist, who might raise his voice against them, but to put their own necks under her feet, if she required it. With such spectacles, little can be said about the decline of theatres in this country. And in regard to Europe, we are inclined to think, notwithstanding the statement of this correspondent, matters are not much better as respects these kind of performances. We have recently read an extract from Blackwood, which tells as lamentable a story as anything in the journals of New York or Philadelphia. It relates to Madame Taglioni, which our readers must have noticed in our summary of last week. It was there stated that she received for her services weekly, nearly $1,500, and her father, brother, &c. $10,000 more—making in the aggregate almost $30,000! and wherever she goes she receives the caresses of nobles and princes. The most distinguished patriot would not be more highly honored.

Now let us ask, How do the expenditures and devotion of Christians, in the cause of the Redeemer, compare with this? And what are they doing to diffuse the knowl- of that gospel that shall rescue their fellow-beings from such awful infatuation and wickedness, and prostrate the theatre in good earnest? Of all theatrical performances, those of the female dancers are allowed, even by the unconverted, to be the most demoralizing. The common exhibitions are terribly destructive to the ordinary comedy and tragedy entirely in the back ground, in the overthrow of purity, and the rapid spread of licentiousness.

Irish Presbyteries.—A formal union has been effected between the Synod of Ulster and the Secession Synod, numbering together 700,000 Presbyterians. The ceremony took place on Friday last, in Rosemary-street Church, Belfast. The Rev. Dr. Reid read the articles of the Acts of Union. The designation of the united body is "the Presbyterian Church in Ireland," and the annual meeting is to be denominated "the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland." When the question was put, "Does this act pass?" all the members simultaneously rose, and with one voice said, "Pass." The Rev. Dr. Hanna having been chosen first Moderator, on taking the chair, constituted the meeting in the name of the Lord Jesus, the great King and head of the Church." A deputation from the Church of Scotland was introduced, headed by Dr. McFarlan of Greenock, who entered on a sketch of the present position of the Church of Scotland, in reference especially to non-intrusion question. There were 3,000 persons present. "By this vast assembly," says the Belfast Chronicle, "the utmost enthusiasm was manifested in favor of the Church of Scotland in her present struggle, and in resistance to the bill of Lord Aberdeen, now before the House of Lords."—London Spectator.

Effects of the Gale.—But few items are to be added to those given on Sunday. The damage done to the shipping is greater in the aggregate than on any former occasion, although not attended with loss of life.

One of the vessels omitted on Saturday was the schooner Wyandot, which has suffered considerably, having her bow and bulwarks all destroyed and her rigging much injured. The same may be said of almost every vessel in port. The spars of but few escaped injury.

From the West we hear of a few accidents. A Port Ontario topsail schooner, with red painted stern, is beached at Conneaut. The S. B. Chatauque is at Dunkirk, with her wheels, guards and false sides carried awaw. At Erie, a wood scow belonging to Capt. Miles, containing four men, was blown out in the lake, and supposed to be lost. The scow was passed by the Cleaveland, when one of the persons attempted to swim to her, but missed a rope which was thrown to him and perished.

So great a number of vessels were never in our harbor before. There were 113 craft, independent of steamboats.—Buffalo Commercial of Monday, 12th inst.

Bunker Hill Monument.—It is truly afflicting to hear that this magnificent monument now being erected to the memory of the heroes of the revolution, who fell on Bunker Hill is exposed to pollution by the offering of Fanny Ellsler. She has proposed to the committee at Boston to contribute towards it a thousand dollars, or to give the avails of a night's performance. What a bribe to wink at her corruption! The proposition was accepted, and she has bestowed, or will bestow the night's performance!—What would the Pilgrim fathers say to this, were they alive? or the patriots who have sacrificed their lives in defense of freedom? But there is hope that this pollution may yet be avoided. Many of the people are aroused and indignant against it; and some of the presses have uttered their protest loudly against this outrage on the character of men identified with the sublimest annals of the nation. The virtuous females of Boston have spoken, too, and pledged themselves to make up more than the offering of this foreign dancer, if the committee revoke the acceptance and return the money. What American could look at this monument, after the appropriation of such a gift, without deep mortification?

It is proposed by one of the Boston editors, with most appropriate satire, that if this offer be accepted, the monument be surmounted by the statute of Fanny Ellsler, to perpetuate the fame of her benefaction.—One thing is certain; if it is not returned, this dancer has secured the transmission of her name so long as the massive pile shall endure; for the mortifying obtrusion of it will be inseperable from the contemplation of the spectacle. It can not, it will not, be tolerated by the sons of the pilgrims.—N. Y. Bap. Register.

London, Sept. 18, 1840.

Catholicism is rapidly progressing throughout the country. In various places Catholic Institutes are rising up, chapels are being erected, convents in the city of London have been established, the ceremony of taking the veil is publicly announced by advertisement, and now preparations are making for the erection of a superb Catholic Cathedral for the English metropolis. I was yesterday passing by that truly magnificent building, Bethelem, in St. George's Fields, Lambeth, and in which the Pot Boy Oxford is incarcerated, when I observed a large plot of ground, until recently covered over with the vehicular tenements of gypsies, wandering showmen, and itinerate personages, being under the operation of enclosure. The ground is immediately opposite the Lunatic Asylum to which I have alluded, and presents a splendid sight for the erection of a large edifice. On the west it is bounded by some handsome houses, and on the east by an extensive and beautiful building for the shelter and support of the indigent blind. On inquiring of the superintendent of the workmen, I was informed that the Catholics had selected this very desirable locality for their Cathedral; that it would speedily be commenced, and that it was to cost in building £80,000. Its architecture is to be of a pure gothic, and its material, stone. No tower is to adorn the edifice, though originally intended, on account of the great additional expense which it would have entailed, it having been estimated at about £15,000 extra. The foundation stone, I was also informed, is contemplated to be laid with great pomp and ceremony, and the organ is to be the finest in tone and workmanship that money can procure. This proposed Metropolitan Church for the English Catholics and their hierarchy, is a perfect and significant sign of the times. Had such an enterprise been attempted in the reign of George the Third, riots would have occurred, and the very masons been murdered at their work.

The Archimedes steamer which is propelled by a screw, is likely to visit your good city of Gotham. The patentee and proprietor of the screw-propeller is very desirous of having an opportunity of crossing the Atlantic, if he can get his vessel chartered for the voyage. This gentleman, Mr. E. P. Smith, in reply to a paragraph which insinuated that the last voyage the Archimides took to Holland had affected her works, writes to a morning paper of the 14th:—"The Archimides has run 5,000 miles without the slightest derangemet of her machinery, or any kind of material repairs; and she is perfectly ready to start for New York to-morrow morning, should any person want to engage her for such an excursion." Mr. Smith has offered to run her for 5000 miles at sea, against any paddle steamer, for £1000. The Caledonia, sister steam-ship to the Acadia, and the bearer of this communication, shows her great powers in reaching Liverpool from Greenock in sixteen and a half hours. The Columbia, the fourth and last of the Boston, Halifax and Liverpool Line, was launched on the morning of the Caledonia's sailing from Greenock. She is described as a beautiful model.

Lord Brougham has been very seriously ill, but I am happy to state that he is rapidly recovering. His lordship has not got over the severe calamity which he encountered in the loss of his only child—a daughter.

Caution to Smokers.—The Ninawah Gazette, published at Peru, Illinois, relates a singular and fatal accident which happened to Mr. Michael Shannon in that village.—He was looking around in a store room, with a pipe in his mouth; and in his search turned over an empty barrel which stood bottom up. Under the barrel was a keg of powder with the head out. A spark fell into the powder, and Mr. Shannon was so injured that he died during the day.—N. Y. Eve. Tattler.

Death of the Oldest Methodist Preacher in the World.—Died, at Kingswood circuit, the Rev. James Wood, Wesleyan minister, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He entered upon the iteneracy in 1773; and was, at the time of his death, the oldest Methodist preacher in the world. Having traveled fifty-three years, fourteen years ago (reckoning from next conference) he become a supernumerary. He continued to preach as long as his strength would allow, and only desisted when the infirmities of advanced age had entirely disabled him. —English Wesleyan Magazine.

WAR BY STEAM.

While America is yet sleeping, France as well as England has awakened to the necessity of organizing a Steam Navy.—Louis Phillippe has sanctioned an ordinance appropriating nearly six millions of dollars for steam packets from Havre to New York; from Bordeaux and Marseilles to Havanna; from St. Nazaire to Rio Janeiro, and three secondary lines to Mexico, Central America and Buenos Ayres.—The arrangements comprise 14 ships of 450 horse power each, and 4 of 220.

All these steamships are to be men-of-war. England too, assigns her naval officers to the command of her mercantile steamers. Alexander of Russia is also aroused to the importance of this subject. All the great European powers are aware that when the next great war takes place, that nation which can bring into action the most powerful steamships will be mistress of the seas. The steam frigate, by the facilities which it possesses of selecting the most favorable position for attack, and changing it at pleasure; of advancing and retreating at will; of turning to its own benefit the circumstances of wind and tide which embarrass its adversary; and applying its superfluous power to the most destructive of all weapons, steam cannon, can annihilate a fleet of vesels which depend on the caprices of the elements. Nations which aspire to rank as first powers, must be constantly increasing their steamers to keep pace with their rivals; and perhaps the final effect may be that the means of warlike destruction will become so overwhelming, that the nations of the world conscious that a single defeat would be utter ruin, will refrain from playing so hazardous a game; and thus, paradoxical as it may seem, the increase of the destructive powers of war, may preserve universal peace.—New Yorker.

FROM TEXAS.

By the arrival of schooners Arab and Henry Clay, from Galveston, we have papers to the 19th. They contain little intelligence of interest. The pilot schooner Santa Anna on her voyage from New Orleans to Texas was struck by lightning for the second time. A Frenchman, a passenger, whose name was unknown, was killed.

The equinoctial storm in Galveston, on the night of the 17th, continued without abatement during the succeeding day.

The elections are going on in Texas.—Little or no political excitement appears to exist. The papers give partial returns.

President Lamar has been very ill, but is now convalescent. The Houston Telegraph has suffered a temporary suspension for want of paper.

We learn by the Austin Sentinel that a gentleman in the vicinity of Bastrop has found three young leopards which he is endeavoring to raise. Two gentleman from San Antonio, recently saw a hyena on the banks of the Cibolo. A great many skins of animals, to us unknown, and not described in works on natural history, were taken from the Camanches in the recent engagement. When further discoveries are made in this country, a most interesting field of enquiry will be open to the zoologist.

The Sentinel of the 5th inst., says that a report reached that city through Metamoras, that the whole state of New Mexico has declared for Texas. A portion of that state is within the boundary claimed by this government, and we have heard it stated that the inhabitants of that country are well disposed towards this government.—N. O. Bee.

The North Eastern Boundary.—A few days since we met with a gentleman from the State of Maine, who informed us that on the 5th ult. a party of Surveyors under Capt. A. Talcott, United States commissioner, left Canaan, Vt. for the head waters of Connecticut river, for the purpose of tracing the sources of that river, and also the sources of the Magalloway river. A branch of the party to which our informant belonged, proceeded through Bury, and are now examining the sources of Arnold river, at the head of Megantic Lake, where they expect to meet their companions from the head of the Connecticut. The party are then to proceed along the dividing highlands to the Kennebec road. Another party under Professor Renwick, have proceeded to the Restigouche Bay, from whence they are to trace the highlands agreeably to the Treaty, and expect to meet the first party in the vicinity of the Kennebec road.—A third party, under Major Graham, is employed in running the meridian line from Mars' Hill.—Sherbrooke, (L. C.) Journal.

School Teaching in Egypt.—Lane, in his account of the modern Egyptians, describes the mode in which the operations of the schools are conducted. But little capital is invested in the furniture. The schoolmaster and his pupils sit upon the ground, and each boy has his tablet in his hands, or a copy of the Koran, or of one of its thirty sections, on a little kind of desk of palmsticks. All who are learning to read, recite their lessons aloud, at the same time, rocking their heads and bodies incessantly backwards and forwards; which practice is observed by almost all persons in reading the Koran; being thought to assist the memory. The noise may be imagined. The motion of the body and the noise are not confined to Egypt; but are frequently practiced in this country.—Phila. Repository.

A New Grotto.—Letters from Naples announce the discovery on the southeast slope of the hill of Pausilippo, of a new grotto, apparently of great depth, which is filled two-thirds of its height (of forty-five feet) with earth, fine sand and rubbish. The sides of the interior are composed partly of sandstone and partly of walls raised by the hand of man; and here and there on the latter are traces of ornamental sculpture.—About four hundred paces from the entrance are twelve colossal marble statues, buried to the shoulders in the rubbish; the heads of which are mutilated to such an extent as to make it impossible to determine what the figures were intended to represent. Among the rubbish have also been found some Greek and Roman coins in copper and silver. This grotto can be entered only when it has been swept by the sea breeze blowing in that direction, the air at other times, being so highly rarified as to make respiration difficult, and extinguish light. The Minister of the Interior intends to propose to the King that it shall be cleaned out at the expense of the government.—English paper.

A Noble Cow.—Mr. Sanby, of Woodside Delaware, gives, in the Delaware Journal, a statement of the performance of his cow 'Blossom,' in the way of milk giving. It almost exceeds belief. 'Blossom,' is a thorough-bred, short-horned Durham, five years old. The statement gives her produce of milk for one week, commencing on the 13th of June last. She was milked three times each day. The first day, she yielded 34 1-2 quarts; the second 34 1-2; the third 35; the fourth 36; the fifth 35; the sixth 36 1-2; the seventh 36;—total, 247 1-2 quarts in seven days,—averaging 35 quarts each day.—Boston Post.

The Rope Walk at the United States Navy Yard in Charlestown is said to be the most perfect establishment of the kind in the world. It is 1000 feet long, with granite walls, slate roof, and iron window shutters. The work is done with an enormous steam engine, by which the hatchelling dressing, spinning, and almost every other operation in making a rope or cable, is done. About one hundred of the spinning, hatcheling and dressing machines are in one room, in operation by steam. By the spinning of hemp in a machine, a more even thread, and consequently more perfect rigging and cables are formed. At this ropewalk, we understand, the principal rigging for our navy, is, or can be made.

Temperance Pledge.—We understand that on Sunday last, the Rev. Mr. Curry, pastor of the Catholic church in this city, administered the temperance pledge to three hundred and sixty of the Irish who attend that church. Mr. Curry has been unwearied in his exertions in the cause of temperance, among that class, and we are happy to hear that his labors are likely to be rewarded with abundant success. We understand that they pledge themselves against drinking any kind of ardent spirits, wine or ale, and are not to visit any place where these articles are sold.—Providence Journal.

Small Offerings.—The Foreign Missionary Chronicle says, "Let us not overlook small offerings. If we mistake not, the larger part of the receipts of several prominent British Societies is made up of penny-a-week subscriptions. The Roman Catholic L'Oeuvre de la Propagation de la Foi or the Institution for the Propagation of the Faith, whose members are now found in several of the Continental States and in Great Britain, has collected a very large sum by snbscriptions of only one half penny a week from each member with an Ava Maria prayer daily!" We suspect that the prayer to the Virgin did not greatly benefit the subscription. But we approve highly of the plan of the frequent and regular payment of small subscriptions. They promote two excellent purposes; they establish habits of benevolence, and they employ for useful purposes those small sums which are otherwise apt to be wasted.—Baptist Advocate.

Church of England and American Episcopacy.—Many of our readers are familiar with the fact, that a law has for many years existed in Great Britain, prohibiting the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country from officiating in any of the churches or chapels of the Anglican Establishment. By the Archbishop of Canterbury, the restriction thus imposed has been removed. Such a measure may eventually result in a stricter union and a greater assimilation of American with English Episcopacy.—Ib.

New York Legislature.—Two important laws were enacted at the late session, in compliance with the petitions of abolitionists, highly beneficial to people of color. The first secures the right of trial by jury to persons claimed as slaves, and the other protects the free citizens from being kidnapped or reduced to slavery. The Governor is authorized to employ an agent, at the expense of the State to effect the restoration of any free citizen of this State who may be kidnapped or held in slavery in any of the states or territories of the United States.—Anti-Slavery Reporter.

As an evidence of the mildness of the weather at this season, a gentleman brought us from Dorchester, this morning, several branches of an apple tree, thickly studded with blossoms'—Boston Journal of October 9.

Pirates.—A warrant was issued by one of the magistrates of Newburg, on Friday, and placed in the hands of officer Middleditch, one of the officers of that place, who succeed in arresting one of those boat pirates who infest our city. There are other pirates concerned and among those least suspected.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE PHILADELPHIA MIRROR, A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND NEWS.

The subjects of this periodical will consist of original and selected tales, sketches, biography, essays, poetry, &c. &c. together, with a general synopsis of foreign and domestic news upon the cover.

SOMETHING TO BE CONSIDERED.—It is presumed that most persons who have subscribed to any of our large weekly newspapers are aware that it is next to impossible to preserve them in an unmutilated state, consequently we have adopted the present plan, by which we secure all the advantages of a newspaper, and still retain the conveniences of a periodical.

The body of this work will consist of what is termed literary matter, correctly arranged, and with the last number of each volume we shall publish an index of contents and title-page—issued in a convenient form for binding. The cover will consist of foreign and domestic news, notices of marriages, deaths, &c., and all subjects that generally comprise the news departments of weekly papers.

The proprietor has effected such arrangements as shall enable him to furnish choice productions from the prolific pens of most of our prominent writers.

TERMS.

The MIRROR is published every Saturday; each number will contain eight large quarto pages, enveloped in a finely printed cover, at the very low price of Two dollars and fifty cents per annum, payable in advance. No subscription received for a less period than one year. Postmasters and others who procure two subscribers, and remit Five Dollars to the proprietor, shall receive the Third copy gratis.

As two dollars and fifty cents, in many instances, is an inconvenient sum to remit by mail, therefore, if any person will send us two dollars, they will be credited that amount, and receive the work accordingly.

All orders addressed to the publisher, WM. B. ROGERS, No. 49 Chesnut street, Philadelphia, (post paid,) will receive immediate attention.

Editors of newspapers, by copying this prospectus, and sending a paper of the same to the office, shall receive the Mirror for one year.

Any money current in the respective states in which the subscribers may reside, will be received in payment for subscription at par.

POETRY.

AWAY FROM THE REVEL.

Away from the revel, the night star is up;
Away, come away, there is strife in the cup!
There is shouting of song, there is wine in the bowl,
But listen and drink, they will madden thy soul.

The foam of the goblet is sparkling and bright,
Rising like gems in torches' red light;
But the glance of thine eye if it lingers there,
Will change its mild beam for the maniac's glare!

The pearl-studded chalice, displaying in pride,
May challenge thy lip to the purple draught's tide;
But the pearl of the dew-drop, the voice of the breeze,
Are dearer, and calmer, more blessed than these.

Oh! come, it is twilight; the night star is up;
Its ray is more bright than the silver-brimm'd cup;
The boat gently dances, the snowy sail fills,
We'll glide o'er the waters, or rove on the hills.

We'll kneel on the mountain, beneath the dark pine,
Our heart's prayer the incense, and nature the shrine,
Back on the festal we'll look from the wave,
As the eye of the free on the chains of the slave.

Oh! come, it is twilight; the moon is awake;
The breath of the vesper chime rides o'er the lake;
There is peace all around us, and health in the breeze,
And what can be dearer, more blessed than these!

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE HOLY LAND—A NEW DRAMA OPENING THERE.

Beyroot, on the coast of Syria, promises to be the point of attraction for all Europe. Here are the fleets of the great powers, including our own; also the captured Turkish fleet from Egypt, various diplomatic agents, &c., all eagerly awaiting the result of the expected battle between the 40,000 Egyptian troops (many of them Albians) inside, and the daring and fierce Druses of the Lebanon mountains that covered the plains and menaced the very gates of the city.—It is very clear that the motley army of Ibrahim have some qualms about grappling with the desperate Druses, whose implacable hatred for those who have bitterly persecuted them as Christians, rouses them to heroic courage. The Albian soldiers, too, are insolent within the city, and while M. Theirs, at Paris, is deploring the quadruple treaty, by which France can no longer aid the cormorant appetite of her dear Egyptian ally, French gentlemen are insulted in the streets of Beyroot and their people murdered; and to appeals for the retribution of such crimes, the arrogant Pachas turn a deaf ear, saying that a revolt would follow the execution of one Turkish soldier for killing a Christian. In whatever point of veiw these interesting scenes now evolving into a new drama, are regarded, we can not but be impressed with the belief that the Holy Land of all Christians is once more to be redeemed from the grasp of the Saracens, by another crusade. The exciting cause to which we are to impute the extraordinary march of science within our time—in fact to our own Fulton, whose invention has unbarred and unbolted the iron partitions by which mankind have been separated and their prejudices thus nurtured—the desire, sprung up too, as all great revolutions on earth have done, from commerical enterprise—the genius and daring courage of merchants—to have a speedy steam overland route through Syria and Persia, from England to India—has unquestionably opened the door to the second grand drama which seems now about to be enacted on that sacred territory which has been for near 2000 years struck out of the Christian world, but is now, perhaps, under other Cœur de Lions, destined to see implanted the red cross standards on those plains where Darius and Xerxes, and Alexander, and Semiramis triumphed, and where the harp of David was heard, and the scenes of Calvary, and of Jerusalem, and of Titus, passed. Connected with these events in future may be another greater and farther east; that of the meditated conquest and Christianizing schemes of England on China. But the subject is too full of thought and new developements to be pursued in these columns.—N. Y. Times & Star

Steam Gun.—Perkins' Steam Gun is about to be exhibited publicly in Philadelphia. The Sentinal says that the gun and generator are the production of Mr. A. M. Perkins of London, who has invented an entirely new method of generating steam, which has been successfully applied to steam engines, and is at once so simple, safe in its operations, and economical, as to leave little doubt that with its aid, the steam gun will ere long rank among the first instruments of warfare. The instrument is capable of throwing at the rate of 158 balls a minute, and with such tremendous force that they are flattened thinner than a wafer on striking the iron target.

A gun of a similar construction was exhibited several years ago in London in the presence of the Duke of Wellington and other distinguished officers of the ordnance department, by which balls of an ounce weight were propelled at the distance of 35 yards through an iron plate one-fourth of an inch in thickness; also through eleven hard deal boards one inch in thickness, placed at the distance of an inch from each other. Continuous showers of balls were also projected with such rapidity, that when the barrel of the gun was slowly swept round in a horizontal direction, a plank, twelve feet in length, was so completely perforated that the line of shot holes nearly resembled a cut from one of its ends to the other.—Amer.

The Effect of Habit on the Infant Mind.—I trust every thing to habit; habit, upon which, in all ages, the law-giver, as well as the school-master, has mainly placed his reliance; habit which makes every thing easy, and casts all difficulties upon the deviation from the wonted course.—Make sobriety a habit, and intemperance will be hateful and hard; make prudence a habit, and reckless profligacy will be as contrary to the nature of the child grown an adult, as the most atrocious crimes are to any of your lordships. Give a child the habit of sacredly regarding the truth—of carefully respecting the property of others—of scrupulously abstaining from all acts of improvidence which can involve in distress, and he will just as likely think of rushing into the element in which he cannot breathe, as lying, or cheating, or stealing.—Lord Brougham.

Varieties.—It has been said that woman must possess either beauty or knowledge to ensure the favorable notice of others. The former let them remember, is the rare gift of nature, while the latter may be acquired by every one. John Wilkes who was as famous for his ugly face as for being universally popular in society, used to say that it took him but five minutes to talk away his ugly face.

"Want of perseverance," says Madam Necker, "is the great fault of woman in every thing—in knowledge, morals, attention to health, friendship, &c." I doubt the position in the fullness which she gives it. But if of any reader it is true, may not the kowledge of the evil, be the first step to its remedy?

"Doing as others do," says Cecil "is the present principle and evil of female character. This, so far as it prevails either with man or woman, is the ruin, the death, the grave of all that is noble, and virtuous, and praiseworthy." True independence of character equally removed from wilfulness and obstinacy on the one hand, and timidity and weakness on the other, is the source of many virtues.

The wife of John Hancock was remarkable to the close of her life for her apparel. "I will never forgive," said she, "a young female, who does not dress to please, or who seems pleased with her dress."

The beau ideal of a desirable companion, of either sex, combines quick feelings with a serene and self-possessed temper.

The Lost Bible Found.—Most of our readers have seen historical notices of the misfortunes of the family of the Rev. Mr. Caldwell, of New Jersey, in the revolutionary war. Mr. C. was pastor of the Presbyterian church at Elizabethtown, and like most of the clergy of that time, was a zealous whig. His activity against the British made him a mark for their vengeance, and in one of their frequent incursions into that neighborhood, when he was from home, a company of soldiers surrounded his dwelling and one of them deliberately levelled his musket at Mrs. Caldwell, while on her knees at prayer, and fired, killing her instantly. The party then retreated, carrying off several articles of plunder, and among them Mr. Caldwell's family Bible. Not long ago, and more than sixty years after the event we have been recording, an old woman living on Long Island, called on one of the grandchildren of Mr. Caldwell, at Morristown, N. J., and presented this identical Bible, containing the family record as made by Mr. C. in his own hand writing—then the record as made by the soldier who stole it; and various memoranda by subsequent possesors.—Sentinel.

Wolf Scalps.—A Speculation.—The Nashville Banner says, "By an old law in this state a premium of three and a half dollars is paid out of the state treasury for every wolf scalp taken over a certain age, say six months. The Hamilton Gazette relates an anecdote under the caption of "Tennessee Yankeeism," of a man in the upper end of that county, who, wishing to do the state some service, caught a couple of old wolves, took them home, and in the course of a year has reared a brood of law offenders, which he executes from time to time, as they reach the proper age, receiving for their scalps the premium in such cases made and provided! We agree with our brother of the Gazette, that this fellow "is all sorts of a Yankee," and may be safely matched against the shrewdest nutmeg-venders in all Connecticut."

A Woman Worth Having.—In Mr. Morrison's centennial sermon at Peterborough, N. H., he says: "Early in our history, the hand card, the little spinning wheel, and the loom with the hand shuttle, were almost the only instruments of manufacture in this place. The grand-mother of General Miller paid for four hundred acres of land in fine linen, made entirely (except getting out the flax) by her own hands." The Gen. Miller here spoken of, is the hero of the Battle of Niagara or Lundy's Lane, in the last war; and should war again threaten our borders, or our institutions be placed in danger from causes without, it will be the children of such mothers, the free, uncorrupted, hardy sons of the country, that will prove its safegurad.—From the feeble, enervated chil'ren of luxurious idleness, men cannot be reasonably expected.

Eloquence.—Different styles of eloquence, each producing the desired effect:

"Contribute liberally, my Brethren, give such a sum as you would not be ashamed to place on the altar of Heaven in presence of an assembled universe."—Bishop Griswold's Charity Sermon.

"Give generously my Friends, not fourpence-half-pennies, but run your hands into your pocket up to the elbow, and bring out a handful, as a sailor would do if you needed his assistance."—Rev. Mr. Taylor, before the Bristol Seaman's Friend Society.

Wet Feet.—How often do we see people tramping about in the mud, with leather soaked through, and how often do we see such people, when they return home, sit down by the fire-side, and permit their feet to dry, without changing either stockings or shoes. Can we then wonder at the coughing and hacking and rheumatism and inflammation, which enable the doctors to ride in their carriages? Wet feet most commonly produce affections of the throat and lungs; and when such diseases have once taken place "the house is on fire,"—danger is not far off, therefore let us entreat our reader, no matter how healthy, to guard against wet feet.—Medical Advertiser.

Bonaparte on the Cowardice of Suicide.—"Suicide is a crime the most revolting to my feelings; nor does any reason present itself to my understanding by which it can be justified. It certainly originates in that species of fear which we denominate cowardice. For what claim can a man have to courage who trembles at the frowns of fortune? True heroism consists in becoming superior to the ills of life, in whatever shape they may challenge him to the combat." On another occasion, when talking on the same subject, Bonaparte observed, "If Marius had slain himself on the Marshes of Minturnae, he never would have stood the seventh time for Consul."—Anatomy of Suicide.

FOR THE FARMER.

LARGE AND SMALL FARMS.

We have heretofore alluded to the mania which seems to be cherished by the farmers in this country for large farms—for cultivating many acres of land. This subject is well handled in the following article from the Farmers' Cabinet.

"I wish my brother farmers would think very seriously on the advantages to be derived from the system of cultivating no more land than can be well manured. The desire for more land has been the ruin of thousands, who would at this time have been well off, if their friends had deprived them of one half the number of acres which they at one time possessed; while the extra labor and anxiety consequent upon a business so spread abroad, are all that many have ever gained, and all they had a right to expect to obtain. And it would appear to be a fatality to which persons of this sort are subject for they would surely be able to see the nose in the middle of the face—for one is not more plain than the other. If ten acres of land can be made to yield as much as one hundred, merely by concentrating upon the means of improvement, the labor and care necessary for the cultivation of one hundred acres, the result must be profit of mind, body and substance, absolutely astonishing! Now only for a moment calculate the difference in labor, in hauling the manure over one hundred acres instead of ten, and after that the spreading it abroad! then comes ten times the ploughing, harrowing, sowing with ten times the quantity of seed, hoe-harrowing, mowing or reaping, and binding and raking over one hundred acres instead of ten, and extra carrying crops; and after all this, ten times the rent to pay—I declare it appears to be a species of insanity, this desire for more land.

I have lately seen a farm where all these evils are embodied—of excellent natural fertility, fields large and lying on an easy declivity, with every facility for permanent improvement, marl of the richest quality in the middle of the estate, and within three feet of surface. Now, if the owner of this fine farm of about two hundred acres, would confine his labors to ten acres of land adjoining his house, and giving all the rest to the stock upon the farm, only mowing the weeds to prevent them from seeding his and his neighbor's land, I believe he would then profit, while at present he must make a loss.

I was told yesterday of a farmer who cultivated one acre of land adjoining a field of thirty acres—both were planted with rye; and at harvest a bet was made that the yield of the one acre was equal to that of thirty acres; this was, however, lost, for the crop of the thirty acres measured exactly three quarters of a bushel more than the one acre—these fields I have seen this day: and I have also seen another field, where the owner offered to dispose of the crop of rye for a dollar an acre, but could get no purchaser at that price!

Now, is it not much better to double the crop than to double the number of acres? But I have land lying before me, which would yield five hundred per cent. more than it now does, by extra management.

An Old Farmer.

There is not a more independent being in existence than the farmer. The real farmer, he who attends strictly to the duties of his profession, who keeps every thing about him snug and tidy, and who seeks every opportunity to introduce such improvements of the day as will tend to add beauty and worth to his farm. Such a farmer is always happy and he lives, as it were, in a little world of his own, with nothing to trouble him save the cares of his farm, which, by the way, are considered rather as pleasures than otherwise. His mind is always at ease, and the duties of his calling are performed with a good degree of pleasure.—When the toils of the day are o'er, and the "night cometh," he takes his seat at the domestic fireside, and whiles away the evening in sweet converse with his little family circle. The toils of the day have been perhaps rather arduous; but what of that? They are drowned and forgotten in the pleasures of the evening. And then he feels a sincere pleasure on reflection, that while he rests from his labors his business continues to flourish. His crops are growing and preparing for harvest; his cattle, &c., are fattening ready for the market, and every thing prospers. With such thoughts as these, he can calmly resign himself to the night's repose, and rise on the morrow with the returning sun, refreshed and prepared for the duties of another day.—Mo. Adv.

TAKE NOTICE.

THE subscriber offers his Farm, on which he now resides, for sale, consisting of one hundred and fifty acres, one hundred of which is under improvement, and is considered by good judges as an excellent stock or dairy farm. A just proportion of the farm is suitable for ploughing, and has not been reduced by bad husbandry. The timber land is the best in this vicinity, having never been used for any purpose. There is on the premises the best of fencing materials, both wood and stone. The buildings consist of a two story dwelling house, nearly new, two barns, and two small hay barns, corn house, &c. There is a well of water in the shed a few feet from the kitchen door. There is about two hundred bearing apple trees, besides pears and plumbs.—Eighty of the apple trees are ingrafted, and are of the best quality of fruit for summer, fall or winter. The farm is well watered with a small brook and several never failing springs, and is situated in a good and peaceable neighborhood of wealthy farmers, one mile west of the local center of the town of Preston, Chenango county, N. Y. It lies on the west side of the road leading from Pharsalia to the village of Oxford, which is about 4 1-2 miles distance to the south east. The road leading from Macdonough village to Norwich, the county town, runs from west to east through the center of the farm. It is about six miles to Norwich. The farm is situated about eighty rods north of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, and two miles west of the Congregational meeting-house two and a half miles east of the Free-will Baptist & Universalist meeting-house, and two and a half south west of the new Baptist meeting-house. The District School house adjoins the premises. For pleasantness of situation, religious, social and political privileges, we presume it cannot hardly be surpassed in the western country. One quarter, or even one third of the purchase money may remain on bond and mortgage for years.

FAIR WEATHER WORSHIPERS.

Judging from the comparative numbers that meet for the public worship of God on pleasant and stormy Sabbaths, we might incline to the opinion that the majority of church-going people are fair-weather worshipers. But this may be an uncharitable judgment. Perhaps other causes besides the storm, detain the absent at home. Sickness in the family, their own ill health, their fears of ill health from exposure, and other reasons may lie in the way and satisfy them that it is right to neglect the sanctuary. Such excuses may be good. Of this, every one must be his own judge.

But we fear that very many are quite too ready at finding an excuse, and too quick at inventing one, when none is to be found. It will serve a valuable purpose for those who are in doubt as to their duty, to enquire when an unpleasant Sabbath comes, would the weather this day compel me to break an engagement with a friend? Had I made an appointment of business, even of small moment, would I, upon a week day, neglect that appointment and suffer loss rather than be exposed to the unpleasantness of the weather. We have made an engagement to meet a friend in the sanctuary, an engagement not of small but of infinitely important consequence and we shall suffer serious loss if we break it.

Many Christians comfort themselves in the neglect of duty on the Sabbath, by the reflection that they may improve their time at home so profitably that absence from the house of God will work them no serious injury. We doubt the possibility of any Christian improving his time profitably while in the violation of a known obligation or the neglect of a known duty. We have met with some of the most eminent instances of piety in those who were always absent from church. But they were afflicted saints whom the Providence of God had laid upon beds of languishing, and into whose souls the rich consolations of the gospel were constantly poured. There they lay, longing like the pious Psalmist in the wilderness for the courts of the Lord, and finding in their sweet experience that God was not confined to places or times in the dispensation of his grace. But we never knew an eminent saint who for slight reasons was absent from the sanctuary on the Sabbath. The desire for the public ordinances of the gospel will grow with the growth of grace in the heart. And as their neglect uniformly arises from a want of spirituality, the professor at home has as little inclination for seeking after near and holy communion with God as he had for going abroad. The less devout he seeks to be, the more quiet is his conscience that might reproach him, if he thought seriously in his closet.

It has often been said that ministers preach their best sermons on rainy days. If this be not correct, it is nevertheless a fact that Christians who have practised some self-denial in order to hear the sermon, enjoy it more than they would, had the weather been so pleasant as to have invited them out. It has cost them something to hear that discourse and it is not strange that they relish it well. But it is not a good plan for pastors always to lay aside their intended discourse when they find a thin house. It is not in man to direct his steps. Perhaps the truth may be more pointed and powerful when addressed to a few, and thus achieve more good than if it had been shared among many.

Nor is it well to rebuke those who are present because others are not there. But it is not an uncommon thing for ministers to take occasion to speak of the duty of attending public worship, the criminality of those who stay away, and the importance of greater punctuality, when those who stay away, and the importance of greater punctuality, when those who need the reproof are sure not to hear it, and those only are rebuked who are never censurable. It would be more wise to improve some opportunity when the whole congregation is gathered to remind the negligent of their duty, and to exhort them not to forsake the assembling of themselves together as the manner of some is. The punctuality of a people depends much on the pastor. By judicious, timely, kind and faithful counsel and discipline, he may bring his flock into habits of regularity and fidelity in attending upon the means of grace. The habit must be formed. When that point is gained, the pastor knows that his people will be in the house of God to be fed "with the finest of the wheat" that he may prepare. He will not have the mortification and discouragement after having consumed a week in careful preparation for the pulpit, to find when the Sabbath comes that those whose spiritual interest he desired to promote, were enjoying their indolent repose at home in preference to the banqueting house of the Lord.

THE REIGN OF CHRIST.—In his resurrection from the dead, the King immortal conquered death, and him that had the power of death, that is, the Prince of darkness. And, after ascending on high, he sat down at the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool; and until he become, according to his rights, the God of the whole earth. Nothing can be more desirable to man—to man if alone in the universe; to man in his domestic and social capacity; to man as an animal or as a spiritual being—than the Reign of Christ. In its sufferings under the reign of sin, "all creation travails, groans, and bids him come." Who that knows the blessedness of the salvation that is in Christ Jesus—the worth of the immortal soul, but feels every other subject of anxiety swallowed up in this—Let thy kingdom come! If thus desirable, the universal dominion of the Savior, it is a cheering consideration, that there is nothing in the state of man, nothing in the nature of this kingdom, according to the descriptions of the Bible, which forbids us to expect that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, who shall reign for ever and ever. It is the progress of light, and the darkness flies before it. It is a kingdom of happiness, and all nations will flow unto it, and "call Him blessed."—Wm. Ward.

THE SPIRIT OF DEATH.

Oh! there's a deep and chilling tone
That comes the heart to freeze;
As cold as winter winds that moan
Low through the leafless trees!

And black as midnight's awful gloom
It shrouds the joyous hearth;
And treads with giant strides along
The hall of reckless mirth.

It comes—the Simoom's desert blast—
And breathes its curse around;
And brightest flowers of life and hope
Lie withered on the ground.

It smiles to see before it fall
To earth the proud and strong;
Throwing a blight o'er all our joys,
As, dark, it sweeps along!

Oh Death! thy terrors fearful are
To the benighted soul
Who standing on the verge of life
Doth yield to thy control!

But thou thyself in time shalt feel
Destruction's gripe at last,
And from thy throne of centuries
Be to thy caverns cast!

Aye, proudly though thou bear'st thyself,
Old Time shall lay thee low;
And o'er thy dark and turbid form
The light of heaven shall glow.

EDWARD BRACKET.

In benevolent natures, the impulse to pity is so sudden, that, like instruments of music which obey the touch, the objects which are fitted to excite such impressions, work so instantaneous an effect, that you would think the will was scarce concerned, and that the mind was altogether passive in the sympathy which her own goodness has excited. The truth is, the soul is, generally, in such cases as busily taken up, and wholly engrossed by the object of pity, that she does not attend to her own operations, or take leisure to examine the principles upon which she acts.—Stern's Sermons.

Think not that if you were in such a family, under such a ministry, or out of such a particular temptation, the devil would not assault you as he doth; for while Satan's old friend (corruption) is alive within, he will be knocking at the door without.

FOR THE MINISTER.

THE LAW WITH THE GOSPEL.

One may preach with plainness and firmness the obligations of man, the commandments of the law, the precepts of the Gospel, and the entire condemnation of the sinner, and the necessity of universal repentance; he may exhibit a deep seriousness in his ministry, an earnest solicitude for the fruits of righteousness; never hesitating at the strongest representations of the wrath of God and the sinner's peril, nor ever sparing the most urgent appeals to conscience, and exhortations to obedience; and yet he may come far short of the important work of his ministry, and fail almost wholly of the conversion and sanctification of his people. While thus dwelling faithfully on the side of the law, perhaps with occasional glimpses of the Gospel, while thus confined so much to duty and danger, though perhaps with occasional views of grace and glory, he may not understand that one great lesson which a minister should make his habitual study—how to exhibit the union and the mutual relations of the law and the Gospel; how to preach the Gospel under the solemn sanctions of the law; the law under the gracious encouragements of the Gospel; the one to convince of sin, the other to take away its condemnation; the former to furnish the rule, the latter the grace of holy obedience. The preacher may be very clear upon the sinner's ruin, but very dark and indefinite upon the nature and means of his remedy. He may succeed in convincing one of the insufficiency of his own righteousness to make him acceptable to God, but fail grievously in showing the all-sufficiency of the righteousness by faith.—So fully does he teach the holy will of God, as reaching to the thoughts and intents of the heart, that the hearer is brought to feel his entire inability through inherent corruptions to do it. But at this step of preparation for all the gracious disclosures of the Gospel, his light goes out. The preacher fails importunately to direct him to the grace of God in Christ, as that which "worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure." "One thing is needful"—that grand argument of the Gospel, which, after the failure of all others, has gained in all ages and places such wonderful victories over the hearts of the ungodly—the simple holding forth of "Christ crucified" in his amazing love and abounding grace; his tenderness to pity; his freeness to receive; his power to save the uttermost; the fulness of his merits to remove the condemnation, and of his Spirit to sanctify the heart of the chief of sinners."

"Such a preacher, as I have endeavored to describe, was in a great measure exemplified in the early ministry of the now Evangelical Chalmers. His labor was fruitless: it remained so, till (to use his own words) he became impressed by the utter alienation of his heart in all its affections and desires from God. It was not till reconciliation to him became the distinct and prominent object of his ministerial exertions; it was not till he took the scriptural way of laying the method of reconciliation before his people; it was not till the free offer of forgiveness through the blood of Christ was urged upon their acceptance, and the Holy Spirit given through Christ's Mediatorship to all who ask it, was set before them as the unceasing object of their dependance and prayers; it was not, in one word, till the contemplation of his people was turned to these great and essential elements in the business of the soul providing for its interests with God and the concerns of its eternity, that he ever heard of those changes of character and life, which before he had earnestly and zealously sought after.—Bishop McIlvaine's charge to the Clergy of Ohio.

HOW TO MANAGE A CONTROVERSY.

On the spirit in which a controversy ought to be conducted, we have seen nothing better than the following, which we extract from Mr. Wesley's preface to his sermons, for our own benefit and for that of others.

"Are you persuaded you see more clearly than me? It is not unlikely that you may. Then treat me as you would desire to be treated yourself upon a change of circumstances. Point me out a better way than I have yet known. Show me it is so, by plain proof of Scripture. And if I linger in the path I have been accustomed to tread, and am therefore unwilling to leave it, labor with me a little; take me by the hand, and lead me as I am able to bear.—But be not displeased if I entreat you not to beat me down in order to quicken my pace: I can go but feebly and slowly at best; then I should not be able to go at all. May I not request of you, farther, not to give me hard names in order to bring me into the right way. Suppose I were ever so much in the wrong, I doubt this would not set me right. Rather, it would make me run so much the farther from you, and so get more and more out of the way.

"Nay, perhaps, if you are angry, so shall I be too; and then there will be small hopes of finding the truth. If once anger arise, eute kapnos [like smoke,] (as Homer somewhere expresses it,) this smoke will so dim the eyes of my soul, will so dim the eyes of my soul, that I shall be able to see nothing clearly. For God's sake, if it be possible to avoid it, let us not provoke one another to wrath. Let us not kindle in each other this fire of hell; much less blow it up into a flame. If we could discern truth by that dreadful light, would it not be loss rather than gain? For, how far is love, even with many wrong opinions, to be preferred before truth itself, without love! We may die without the knowledge of many truths, and yet be carried into Abraham's bosom. But if we die without love, what will knowledge avail? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels!

"The God of love forbid we should ever make the trial! May he prepare us for the knowledge of all truth, by filling our hearts with all his love, and with all joy and peace in believing!"

LABORIOUS MINISTERS.

Luther preached almost daily; he lectured constantly as a professor; he was burdened with the care of all the churches; his correspondence, even as now extant, fills many volumes; he was perpetually harrassed with controversies with the enemies of the truth, and was one of the most voluminous writers of his day. The same, even more, might be said of Calvin. While in Strasburg he preached or lectured every day. In a letter to Farel, dated from that city, he said that on one day he had revised twenty sheets of one of his works, lectured, preached, written four letters, reconciled several parties who were at variance, and answered more than ten persons who came to him for advice. In Geneva he was pastor, professor, and almost magistrate. He lectured every other day; on alternate weeks he preached daily; he was overwhelmed with letters from all parts of Europe; and was the author of works (amounting to nine volumes folio) which any man of our generation would think more than enough to occupy his whole time. And this amid perpetual infirmity, headache, catarrh, stranguary, gravel, stone, gout. Baxter says of himself, that before the wars, he preached twice every Sabbath, and once in the week, besides occasional sermons, and several regular evening religious meetings. Two days in the week he catechised the people from house to house, spending an hour with each family. Besides all this, he was forced by the necessity of the people to practice physic, and as he never took a penny from any one, he was crowded with patients. In the midst of all these duties, though afflicted with almost all the diseases which man is heir too, he wrote more books than most of us can find time to read. All these men were poor. We find Luther begging the elector for a new coat, and thanking him for a piece of meat; Calvin selling his books to pay his rent; and, Baxter was a curate with sixty pounds a year. It may be said that these were extraordinary men, raised up for extraordinary times. This is all true. And if we had such men now, we should have extraordinary times again.—Such men form the times as much as the times form them. Though we must look up to such laborers as these with wonder and admiration, the distance between us and them need not be so deplorably great as it actually is. We may not be called to write numerous folios in the intervals of labor, but we have each his humble sphere in which if each were to labor with assiduity and singleness of purpose, we should soon see a new era in the condition of our Church.—Princeton Review.

CONTROVERSY.

There is no learned man but will confess he hath much profited by reading controversies, his senses awakened, his judgment sharpened, and the truth which he holds more firmly established. If then it be profitable for him to read, why should it not at least be tolerable and free for his adversary to write? In logic, they teach that contraries laid together more evidently appear: it follows then, that all controversy being permitted, falsehood will appear more false, and truth the more true; which must needs conduce much to the general confirmation of an implicit truth.—Milton.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO WEAK CHRISTIANS.

The pious Richard Baxter thus encouraged his own heart to trust in God and rejoice in Jesus Christ:

"And now, O weak and faithless soul! why shouldst thou draw back, as if the matter was doubtful? Is not thy foundation firm? Is not thy way of life through the valley of death, made safe by him that conquereth death? Art thou not yet delivered from the bondage of thy fears? Hast thou not long ago found in thee the emotions and operations of his Spirit? And is he still not residing in thee as the agent and witness of Christ? If not, whence are thy groanings after thy God, thy desires to be nearer to his glory, to know him or to love him more? Whence came all the pleasure thou hast had in his sacred truth, and ways and service? Who subdued for thee thy folly, pride and vain desires? Who made it thy choice to sit at the feet of Jesus, and hear his word, as the better part, and count the honors and preferments of the world but dung and dross? Who breathed in all these requests thou hast sent up to God? Overvalue not corrupt nature, it brings forth no such fruits as these. Remember what thou wast in the hour of temptation, how small a matter has drawn thee to sin. Forget not the days of thy youthful vanity. Overlook not the case of thy sinful neighbors, who, in the midst of light, still live in darkness and hear not the loudest calls of God. It is no work of Christ's Spirit, that has made thee to differ. Thou hast nothing to boast of, and much to humble and also to be thankful for. The holy desires are, alas! too weak; but they are holy. Thy love has been too cold; but it is the most holy God whom thou hast loved. Thy hopes have been to low; but thou hast hoped in God, and for his heavenly glory. Thy prayers have been too dull and interrupted; but thou hast prayed for holiness and heaven. Thy labors have been too slothful, but thou hast labored for God and Christ, and the good of mankind. Though thy motion was too weak and slow; it has been God-ward, and therefore it is from God.—O bless the Lord, not only for giving thee his word, and sealing it with uncontroled miracles, but also for frequently and remarkably fulfiling his promises, in the answer to thy prayers, and in great deliverance of thyself and of many others; and that he has by regeneration been preparing thee for the light of glory! And wilt thou yet doubt and fear, against all this evidence, experience and foretaste?"

IF WE LOVE ONE ANOTHER, GOD DWELLETH IN US.—For God to dwell in man, is to fulfil the stipulation of the New Covenant, which is of the following tenor: "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. I will dwell in them and walk with them: I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Does the reader inquire, if God dwells in him? Let him answer another question: Do you love your fellow men? Christian men, with a love of complacency? all men with a love of benevolence? To this test is the question brought by the beloved disciple in the sentence above quoted. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us. Why? Because if we have sincere affection, practical mutual love, we know that something supernatural has been wrought within us. A divine agency has been operating on our hearts. Something natural to us has been overcome or removed; the malevolent tendencies of our nature have been arrested and their power weakened. Something holy and of heavenly origin has been communicated. The tyrant and exclusive passion of selfishness has been dethroned—driven from its strong hold of the heart, "by the expulsive power of a new affection."

But in applying this test, let us not deceive ourselves. Let it be considered whether our love for Christians and for all mankind has encountered any decisive trial. There is often a latent malignity and misanthropy within us, which we do not suspect, because the emergencies have not arisen, which are suited to develop it. Has it been tried by provocation, by opposition, by injuries done to our reputation, our families, or our interest? And has it survived this trial, not only undiminished, but with an augmentation of strength and fervor? If so, it is of the right kind: it resembles that of our divine Master for us. God commendeth his love to us, in that while we were enemies Christ died for us.—Christian Mirror.

STUDY PROVIDENCE.—It is a part of atheism not to think the acts of God in the world worth our serious thoughts. And if you would know the meaning of his administrations, grow up in the fear of God: The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. Ps. xxv. 14. God is highly angry with those that mind him not: Because they regard not the operations of his hands, he shall destroy them and not build them up. Ps xxviii. 5. He shall utterly root them out.—Charnock.

FOR THE SAILOR.

RELIGION ON SHIP BOARD.

The following interesting account is furnished by Mr. J. Ball, of Boston:

Agreeably to your request, I give you a sketch of what I witnessed on the morning of the first of May last, on board a ship in the harbor, ready to sail in a few hours for Europe.

Just before breakfast, the whole crew were summoned around the capstan, when the master, standing by the same, called the roll; after which he said, "The rules of this ship are these;

"No profane language will be allowed.

"No ardent spirits shall be on board, or used by any one, either officers or crew.

"Every man shall be required to do his duty promptly, and when all hands are suddenly called, day or night, let no one tarry, as many lives are lost by a little delay.

"Public worship will be held on every Sabbath, and every day a portion of Scripture will be read, and prayers offered, and every one on board will be required to attend, unless detained by sickness, or on duty.

"And now my friends," said he, "we are engaged to be together, and go this voyage at least. I beg of you, therefore, to live in harmony with each other, trying to do each other good, and studying that which will promote each other's happiness. Never call any one except by his own proper name. As we have begun this voyage together, let us think upon what may be its dangers, its hourly perils, the liability to be [illegible] or run down in the night, and remember, that of all the [illegible] the ocean are the most liable to a sudden death. We know that the old must die, and the young are liable to death.

"My friends, are ye prepared [illegible]? If not, I beseech you to read your Bible. Seek God, in prayer, and strive earnestly for the salvation of your souls. Seek an interest in Jesus Christ, [illegible] Saviour, so that if you [illegible] his disciples, you will always be prepared for death and [illegible] eternity."

He said much more, and a more pungent exhortation I have seldom heard. After his address, he leaned over the capstan, the top of which was covered with the star-spangled banner, and offered a fervent prayer, imploring God for his blessing on the officers and crew, and for wisdom and discretion; and that all on board might become the disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ."

FOR THE INFIDEL.

From the New York [illegible]

THE INFIDEL.

It is a fearful commentary upon the doctrines of infidelity, that its most strenuous supporters have either miserably falsified their sentiments in the moments of trial, or still more miserably terminated their earthly existence in utter wretchedness. The gifted author of the "Age of Reason," passed the last year of his life in a manner which the meanest slave that ever trembled beneath the lash, could have no cause to envy. Rosseau might indeed, in some respects, be regarded as an exception to the general remark; but it is well known that this enthusiastic philosopher was a miserable and disappointed man. He met death, it is true, with something like calmness.—But he had no pure, and beautiful, and God-like hopes, fixed on things beyond this world. He loved the works of God for their exceeding beauty, and not for their manifestation of an over-ruling intelligence. Life had become a burden to him; but his spirit recoiled at the dampness and silence of the sepulchre—the cold unbroken sleep—the wasting away of mortality. He perished, the worshiper of that beauty which but faintly shadows forth the glory of the creator, but without hope in the Creator himself. At the closing hour of day, when the broad West was glowing like the gate of Paradise, and the vine-clad hills of his own beautiful land, were bathed in the rich light of sunset, the philosopher departed. The last glance of his glazing eye was to him an everlasting farewell to existence, the last homage of a godlike intellect to a glory and beauty he should behold no more. The blackness of darkness was before him. The valley of the shadow of death was to him unescapable and eternal. The better land beyond it was shrouded from his vision. He had no hope—no prospect for the future—for all that endless future which faith might have gilded with glory and surrounded with blessedness to his soul. He died like the brute,—his utmost hope and expectation like the brute, to perish! O! infidelity, if this is thine end, let me never be thy disciple! X.

BENEFIT OF READING.—By the bye, I have a curious and not uninteresting anecdote to tell you about Leland's "Advantage and Necessity of Revelation." Mr. T. H. Horne was the relator of it to me. In the year 1800, "I was very young," said he, "I unhappily had access to a circulating library, stored with German novels and other [illegible] publications. The consequence was, that I became a thorough-paced unbeliever, still however continuing diligent in business, and to the utmost of my powers, supporting by my exertions as a scrivener, and [illegible] literary drudge, a family of younger [illegible] brothers and sisters of mine. Forced prematurely, to break off my school studies at Christ Hospital, [illegible] for myself [illegible], I [illegible], when I could, for classical reading, and one day I met, and took up Leland on the Advantage and Necessity of the Christian religion.—My object in doing so was anything but religion. I wished, in fact, merely to read the Latin and Greek quotations scattered through the [illegible]. Some passages, however, from one of the fathers, struck my eye. I [illegible] and [illegible] asked myself, what if Christianity were after all to prove true? Ay, what would then become of me?—I was thus led to examine the book, and by the blessing of God, as I had read myself into infidelity, so I was enabled to read myself out of it. I then at intervals stolen from sleep and labor, went through a long course of Biblical study."—Bishop Jebb.

THOUGHTS FROM CECIL.—The joy of glory is this, that we shall be ever with the Lord. The joy of grace is this, when the Lord is ever with us.

One of two things ever follows sin, repentance or punishment.

The wrath of man is the rage of man, but the wrath of God is the reason of God. [illegible] full of anger—the [illegible]

The man [illegible] not utter prayer, [illegible]

The life of a man does not consist in what he has, [illegible] and hopes to be.

[illegible] God who is unchangeable in nature.

A DEATH-BED.—A deathbed is a wonderful [illegible] hath [illegible] without a word, who [illegible] have defied [illegible] the consolations [illegible] as long as the [illegible] and the puppet show of life goes on; but when its rapid representation draws to a close, and every hope of [illegible] will appear as [illegible]. Thanks to God, I [illegible] say, that that great awful moment was [illegible] by the dread of repentance, as by the gloom of despair.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

[illegible]

Two little boys, [illegible], the eldest appearing about 13 and the younger 11, called at the lodging-house for vagrants in Warrington, for a night's lodging; the keeper of the house very humanely took them in, [illegible] to be examined, and [illegible]. It appeared that two weeks had elapsed since the poor little wanderers had parted with their parents in London. The typhus fever [illegible] carried off both father and mother, leaving the orphans alone in the world, without home, and without friends. Immediately after the [illegible] parents' memory, they [illegible] to Liverpool, poor and [illegible], they resolved to go [illegible] upon the protection [illegible]. Tired [illegible] and faint, they arrived in Warrington on their way. Two [illegible] contained their all. In the younger boy's pocket was found, neatly covered and carefully preserved, a Bible. The keeper of the lodging-house, addressing the little boy, said, 'You have neither money nor meat, will you sell me this Bible? I will give you 5s for it.' 'No,' exclaimed he (the tears rolling down his youthful cheeks) 'I'll starve first.' To try him still further, 6s. were offered for the Bible; 'No,' said he, 'for it has been my support all the way from London. Hungry and weary, often have I sat down by the wayside to read my Bible, and have found refreshment from it.' He then was asked, 'What will you do when you get to Liverpool, should your uncle refuse to take you in?' The reply may excite a blush in many young Christians. 'My Bible tells me,' said he, 'when my father and mother forsake me the Lord will take me up.' The next morning these refreshed little wanderers rose early, dressed themselves, and set out for the town of Liverpool.—Preston Pilot.

Haughtiness is a sure indication of a weak mind and an unfeeling heart.

The Believer's Map.—Men that intend to travel into foreign kingdoms, with any advantage to their parts, or improvement of their experience, do beforehand season and prepare themselves with the language, with some topographical observations of the country, with some general notions of the manners, forms, civilities, and entertainments of the natives there; and do delight to converse with those men who are best learned in these or the like particulars. Surely, as we all profess a journey to heaven, a pilgrimage in this present world, we should have our conversation now where we look to have our everlasting abode with the Lord hereafter. Now, in the gospel of Christ we have, as it were, a map, a topographical delineation of those glorious mansions which are there prepared for the Church; we have a taste and description of the manners of that people; we have some rudiments of the language: in one word, we have abundantly enough, not only to prepare us for it, but to influence all the desires of our soul into it, even as exiles or captives desire to return to their native country. Now, then, if we no way desire to study it, or acquaint ourselves with it; if we seem to desire that the sight of Christ in heaven, and when we may every day have a blessed view of his face in the glass of his gospel, turn away our eyes and regard it not, we do as good as proclaim to all the world, that either our hopes of heaven are very slender, or our care thereof little or none at all.—Bishop Reynolds.

From the Morning Star.

A word upon the general subject of Missions.—Jesus Christ with an eye of supreme benevolence looked out upon the world—a vast field of ungathered grain—all ripe and ready for the harvest; but he saw no laborers save here and there a feeble one gathering a handful and fitting it for the garner. He therefore directs his disciples to pray for more faithful laborers, and in due time sends them to engage in this important work. With the spirit of their master, they toiled faithfully in his service, and with great success. Paul caught the same spirit, and hastened to publish the gospel among the perishing Gentiles. The church has been more or less awake to the spiritual wants of a dying world. Emissaries of the cross have "run to and fro" and knowledge has increased. But, notwithstanding the latter day glory now and then throws a cheering beam across the horizon, portentive of its approach, there is much to be done. The wailing of a sinking world come still pouring into the ears of the church, and souls ready to perish cry for the bread of life. We rejoice that this complaint has reached not only the ears but the heart of our churches, and that they have come to the rescue, and entered into missionary labors.

J. F.

"I will look for Him."—This is a peculiar language. It is the language of none in heaven. There, all have found him, and are forever with the Lord. It is the language of none in hell. There they are only concerned to escape from his hand and to elude his eye. It is not the language of any in the world. There they are active and eager enough, but they rise up early and sit up late, and eat the bread of sorrow, to gain some temporal advantage, honor or pleasure; but none saith, "Where is God, my Maker, who giveth songs in the night." It is not the language of all in the church. There are some happy souls who know the joyful sound, and walk in the light of God's countenance; in his name they rejoice all the day, and in his righteousness they are exalted. But there are others, whose desire is to his name, and to the remembrance of him whose wish is, "O that I were as in months past, when the candle of the Lord shined upon my soul, and the Almighty was yet with me." These, these, are the persons saying, and they cannot do better than say, "I will look for him."—Jay.

Joys of the Spirit.—Never expect much of the joy of the Holy Ghost if your heart and mind be occupied in the enjoyment of sense. The joy of the Spirit is a delicate, sacred deposit, and must be kept in a pure casket. An unholy breath will dim its lustre and fade its freshness. The joys of sense, even the most lawful of them, are agitating, tumultuous, and unsatisfactory. The joys of the Spirit is calming, modest, strengthening, elevating, and satisfying. The joys of sense, at the best, enervate, lower, and impoverish the soul. The joys of the Spirit ennoble and enrich it.—Cecil.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

THE PUNISHMENT OF THE UNGODLY.

Man is not, like angels or devils, altogether spirit; nor, like the beasts that perish, altogether body; but he has a material frame and immaterial soul; and as they have been companions upon earth, they shall be companions in the unseen world after the day of the resurrection. What is meant by a "glorified body" we know not, but it is still "a body;" it is therefore not immaterial; though in what the material portion of its happiness will consist, we are not told, except by negatives; it will not hunger, thirst, or be subject to any pain or privation; by which we may understand positively that it will be filled with whatever of felicity is congeial to it as "a glorified body."

But it is chiefly to delights of a spiritual character, that Scripture directs our attention. To be "for ever with the Lord" is the Apostle Paul's summing up of heavenly enjoyment; and the descriptions in the book of the Revelation speak of love, joy, adoration and praise, as the peculiar characteristics of heaven; combined with the joyous exercises of enlarged as well as refined intellectual powers; for we shall see and know as we are seen and known. But all these are connected, and spring out of, the regenerated character; for heaven would not be heaven, to one who wished to be there only as an escape from hell.

And so, of the world of condemnation. Scripture addresses us not only as possessed of an immaterial spirit, but as corporeal beings capable of enduring corporeal suffering; and as the body is the slave of the corrupt soul, so it will be its companion in punishment. The plain declarations of the inspired word lead us to this conclusion; which has always been regarded by the universal church as a portion of revealed truth, not to be overlooked, but to be enforced in the few awfully emphatic words of Holy Writ, in order that knowing the terrors of the Lord we may persuade men.

But there is great danger of appealing merely to physical alarms, instead of to the fearful punishment which awaits the soul—I use the word discriminatingly—in the future world of righteous retribution. Our Lord, I think, intended to teach us their lesson, when, in reply to the rich man's entreaty to be allowed to warn his ungodly relatives of the punishment he was enduring, lest they should go to that place of torment, he tells us that Abraham answered, "They have Moses and the Prophets; if they believe not them, neither would they believe though one rose from the dead." It is "with the heart" that "man believeth unto righteousness," and though the terror of physical agony may alarm the transgressor, it has no power to change the heart.

O! that men would consider these things! When Adam fell away from God, the retribution was not merely that he "brought death into the world and all our wo," as men ordinarily define those expressions; but, far worse, that he brought spiritual wo; and also the "second death," with its immeasurable woes. Hell upon earth began in the conscience of our first parents, as they attempted to conceal themselves amidst the trees of the garden from the presence of Him in whom they lived and moved and had their being, and their communion with whom had been the exalted delight of Paradise. The service of sin is often a foretaste of hell here; but what will be its wages hereafter? If wickedness causes such intense misery upon earth, where it is so much restrained in its effects by divine interposition and mercy, what must be its results where it revels and riots unchecked; where all that is base; and barbarous, and polluted, and revengeful, and blasphemous, and horrible, and fiend-like, swelters forever in its own bloated malignity? God is not there, except in the inflictions of righteous retribution; and where he is absent there is hell. It is not enough, that we tremble at the thought of penal visitation, we must be renewed in the spirit of our mind; Christ must be formed in our heart the hope of glory, while upon earth; we must be preparing for the enjoyment of heaven, as by following our fallen propensities we are ripening ourselves for hell. What is "physical" is not to be overlooked in exhorting men to repentance, but the Bible is the guide of the christian minister; and most important is it to lead the sinner to perceive that "to flee from the wrath to come" implies infinitely more than mere alarm, unaccompanied by faith, or love, or hatred to sin, or renovation of spirit, or holiness of life.—London Christian Observer.

Thorns.—It is usual with God, that men of the greatest parts and gifts should be exercised with some or other inordinate affection to be mortified, and some strong temptations, to have some thorn in the flesh, or some other messenger of Satan, (as the apostle had) buffet them. Else they would be exalted above measure, to the slighting, contemning and condemning of their brethren.

It is the privilege of the experimental Christian to enjoy God in all things; and all things in God.

If God be with us, every thing that is impossible, becomes possible."—Greek Prov.

FOR THE LADIES.

WHAT A SISTER MAY DO.

"A young lady in Paris—and I request of my female friends to listen to this story—a young lady, having read the New Testament, and heard the preaching of the Gospel of salvation, was, by the power of the Spirit of God, converted to Christianity: and then she felt it her duty to proclaim that Gospel to the members of her family. She belonged to a very respectable house in Paris: and she had a brother, whose religious opinions were what we call, in France, Voltarian opinions [Deism.] The sister sometimes read to him some of the passages of the New Testament; but he could not—he would not—receive the truths which were contained in it. It happened, one day, that that young man, walking in the streets of Paris, fell down, and a carriage passed over him and broke his leg. He was carried home; and a medical man was sent for; who came and said it was necessary to perform an operation—the amputation of the leg. This young man now began to be seriously troubled in his conscience; he feared to die; he did not know what to do. He asked for his sister; and he said to her, 'My sister what shall I do?' His sister replied, 'My brother, if you cannot save your body, save your soul: believe in the Lord Jesus Christ; yield your heart to Him, and He will save you.' And so he did.—The operation was performed, and succeeded; and the whole night that young man was praying to the Lord Jesus Christ for the influence of his Holy Spirit, that he might be able to believe in Jesus as his Savior and his God:—and in the morning when his sister came to inquire after his health, he immediately reached out his hand to her and said, in French, 'Sister, weep not for me; I have lost my limb, but I have found my Savior!'"—Charleston Observer.

DEATH OF BROTHER CAMPBELL.

Brother Orson Campbell is no more! His earthly career closed in Scott on the 19th instant. The disease which terminated his life was a bronchial affection, which had rendered preaching, at times, very difficult for him for several years past. His last illness was very protracted, having rendered him unable to perform any pulpit exercises since the latter part of June last. Yet he experienced, comparatively, little pain. He wasted so gradually that hopes were entertained by himself and many of his friends, until within a few weeks of his death, that he might recover. But he was found prepared for death when it finally arrived. His release from a world of affliction and sorrow was waited for generally with the calmness of resignation, though occasionally so bright were his views of the glorious rest before him, that he expressed an ardent desire for the arrival of the summons to depart and rest in the embraces of the Savior. The closing scene was tranquil and blessed.

Brother Campbell was brought to a saving acquaintance with God when about 17 years old, and united with the Congregational church in Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., and remained an acceptable member of that church till the autumn of 1823, when he became convinced that the seventh-day of the week was the only day divinely appointed for weekly rest, and that immersion was the true and proper mode of baptism, and believers the only proper subjects.—The struggle which ensued between affection for his covenant brethren and his convictions of duty, was painful; but he was enabled to comply with the latter without diminution of the former, for he cherished, notwithstanding his change of views and practice, an ardent love for his brethren with whom he first united till the day of his death. He connected himself with the Seventh-day Baptist church in the vicinity, and in 1824 he was called by that church to preach the gospel of reconciliation to dying men. He undertook the work the more readily as the judgment of the church fully accorded with his long-cherished convictions of duty.

The first year of his ministerial life was spent in laboring with the De Ruyter church, which then embraced the geographical limits of the present churches in De Ruyter and Lincklaen. Owing to the low and discouraged state of the church—the great amount of labor necessary to be performed—his own feeble health and inexperience, this was a year of great trial to brother Campbell. Yet his trust in God was so firm—his efforts to acquire useful knowledge so unremitting—and his zeal in the cause of religion so strong that his labors were highly acceptable in the church as well as among other societies.

He was ordained in the fall of 1825; after which he labored about one year as a missionary in Western New-York. In the latter part of the next year, he accepted a call to labor with the Seventh-day Baptist church in Petersburgh, Rensselaer co., N. Y. He continued with this church about two years, and then removed to Berlin, the adjoining town, where he labored, in connection with Rev. William Satterlee, until the autumn of 1836, when he accepted a call from the church in Scott, and removed his family there. In this church he labored for three years to very general acceptance.

In February last he removed to De Ruyter, and engaged as an associate Editor of the Register. His health, however, proved too feeble to endure the labors and cares of that station, and in June he relinquished those labors in hope that his health might improve; and also that he might, if possible, complete and prepare for the press a work which had occupied much of his attention for several years, and which he desired to spread before the public. But he was soon obliged to abandon this also.—He then cherished the hope that traveling might be beneficial in restoring him to health, and determined on taking a long journey so soon as he might recruit a little from an attack of his old complaint which had very much prostrated him. But his strength continued to decline, and neither the skill of physicians, nor the unwearied efforts of his friends could arrest the progress of the disease which had undermined his constitution, and which was advancing to a fatal termination much more rapidly than was anticipated by himself or others. He went to visit his friends in Scott, and never returned!

Brother Campbell possessed a good English education; and being fond of books he acquired a respectable amount of general information; but as he cherished an inclination to devote himself to the ministry while very young, his studies were principally directed to Theological subjects. As a preacher he was sound and instructive rather than fascinating. He labored mostly to give his sermons a practical turn, and to benefit rather than amuse his hearers.—As a Christian he was mild, unobtrusive and charitable—sparing in conversation—in piety even, constant and devoted. As a husband and parent he was tender, indulgent and affectionate. In the social walks of life he was universally respected. In the various congregations where he labored he will long be held in affectionate remembrance. The ministry in the denomination, and particularly in the Central Seventh-day Baptist Association, will sensibly feel his loss. The Missionary Society, over which he presided for several years, has lost in him a warm friend and an efficient supporter. To his family his loss will be irreparable; but we trust that the God to whom they were so devoutly commended by him will be their supporter and portion.

To the ministers and members of this denomination, particularly, this dispensation is fraught with important instruction. It affords another solemn illustration of the oft-repeated truth that vigilance and faithfulness are necessary that the greatest amount of good may be done, and the approbation of the Judge of all secured. Soon, and perhaps suddenly, must we all give account of ourselves to God. May we labor to be "also ready" for our change.

His funeral was attended on the 21st by a large and deeply affected assembly, who were addressed by one of the Editors of this paper from John—"Thy brother shall rise again;" after which his remains were deposited in the burial ground contiguous to the Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-house, there to rest in hope till the morning of the resurrection. "He being dead yet speaketh."

THE COMING ELECTION.

It appears to us that the present political canvass is among the fiercest, if not the very fiercest which has occurred in the United States since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The public mind has been every where moved, and the most strenuous efforts have been made by all parties to secure or retain the political ascendancy. A few days more and the storm will have spent its fury, and the troubled elements of society will again rest in their usual quiet and repose. It will doubtless be found in the season of reflection and examination that will succeed the political turmoil, that the interests of piety have, to some extent, suffered, though perhaps not necessarily; for if our form of government is best adapted to promote the interests of religion, as well as to secure general and individual happiness, than to participate in selecting the public servants, may be regarded no less a duty than a privilege. In exercising the elective franchise, Christians are bound to aim at the glory of God, as well as the good of the state—to discharge a solemn duty at the polls, a duty to God, themselves, and posterity. To our brethren, therefore, we say, go to the polls and assert your rights as freemen, and at the same time perform your duty as Christians. When you have done this, leave all to the disposal of Him who rules in the affairs of men, and who elevates or depresses according to his own pleasure. This will give consolation in defeat, and lead to the exercise of a proper magnanimity in success.

The Friend of Man, published at Utica, N. Y., for the New York State Anti-Slavery Society, and edited by William Goodell, has been enlarged to an imperial size, and otherwise improved. The mechanical execution and general appearance are excellent. In addition to the usual amount and variety of Anti-Slavery matter, the Friend contains much miscellaneous reading and the news of the day. From the present aspect of things it is reasonable to conclude, that when the present political struggle shall have passed by, the views and efforts of the friends of immediate emancipation will be more generally united, and directed more immediately and effectually to the diffusion of their doctrines and the overthrow of the system of Slavery. There is manifested on the part of the State Society a determination to persevere in the work they have undertaken, and the present appearance of their paper is indicative of their resolution and general success. Mr. Goodell is eminently qualified by talents, and a long editorial experience, to conduct such a paper. Price, $2,50 if paid within one year from the time of subscribing. $2,00 in advance.

By a letter from J. Jeffrey, Post Master at Lewisport, Va., we are informed that M. B. Dolebeare, Editor of the Clarksburg Virginian, was stabbed a few days since in a political quarrel. The particulars are not given. Mr. J. says "the strife of politics is very high" in that quarter. The above is sufficient evidence of it.

CHOCTAW INDIANS.

Mr. Jared Olmsted, an assistant missionary among the Choctaws, spent the first day of the present week in my congregation. In the afternoon he made some interesting statements respecting the mission among those Indians. The Choctaw nation now number about 18,000. Twenty-two years since, in 1818, when the missionaries of the American Board commenced their labors among the Choctaws, heathenism shrouded that people. The females suffered that degradation which they always suffer where the gospel is unknown. Now, besides the Methodist mission, and one Baptist church, there are 5 churches under the care of the American Board; the aggregate of the 5 churches, about 300 members, the largest church having 90.

The nation has prohibited the traffic in intoxicating drinks. In many families family religion is most beautifully exemplified, and great regard is paid to the Sabbath.

Mr. Olmsted related the following anecdote to illustrate the Sabbath attachment of the converts:—A pious Indian was one Sabbath on his way to public worship, accompanied by one of the missionaries.—They met a man on his way to Texas, who wished to purchase some potatoes of the Indian. The missionary, who could speak the Choctaw language, consented to interpret to the Indian the traveler's request, for he well understood the safety of the sequel, and was not unwilling to afford his red brother an opportunity to express the feelings of his heart respecting the Sabbath. The substance of the Indian's reply through the missionary as his interpreter, was—a kind and plain reproof to the stranger for presuming to transgress the command of God by journeying on the Sabbath, and a decided refusal to sell him potatoes on that day.

Mr. O. closed with an affecting appeal in behalf of all the Indian tribes.

A word more before I lay down my pen: Such conscientious regard to Christian obligations, manifested by these recent converts from heathenism, reproves us who are remiss in duty. They are an example to us in temperance, family religion, and Sabbath-keeping!

Have those Indians accepted of Christ? What will become of sinners among us who reject him? He that knew his Lord's will, and did it not, was beaten with many stripes.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the New York Express—Extra.

Highly Important from Europe.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT AND ACADIA.

The British in China, the Forts on the Bocca Tigris demolished. The bombardment and evacuation of Beyrout in Syria—France yet threatening War. The Consuls General have left Alexandria. Mehemet Ali as obstinate as ever. Reported probable Abdication of the King of Holland.

SIXTEEN DAYS LATER

The Acadia reached Boston, Saturday, in 12 days and 17 hours from Liverpool, having left there in the afternoon of Oct. 4. She was 31 hours from Halifax, stopping there 10 hours. She brought 92 Passengers to Halifax, and 72 to Boston.

The President, Capt Keene, also arrived here this morning, with 140 passengers, and a considerable amount of dry goods as freight. Her day of leaving was on the 1st inst.

Seldom of late years has a Foreign Packet brought such interesting intelligence. War seems to be fearfully threatened in all quarters, but we trust the storm will blow over.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Augusta Sophia died at Clarence House, St. James' Palace, at twenty minutes after 9 o'clock, on Tuesday morning, Sept. 22d.

It was rumored that Admiral Codrington was to be appointed to command the English squadron in the Mediterranean.

Fire at Davenport.—A fire broke out on board the Talavera, line-of-battle-ship, in the North Dock, on the 28th ult. which was entirely destroyed. The fire also communicated with several buildings connected with the Royal Naval Arsenal, and was extinguished only after having destroyed the Talavera, Imogen, frigate, and property amounting to £800,000. It is not known how it occurred.

Slaver Captured.—The British sloop of War, Lily, arrived at Mauritius the 21st of June, from Mozambique, with 268 slaves on board, captured from the Portuguese brig Jose, the 17th ult. off Quilimane.

The new steam ship India, of 1200 tons, was about to sail from the Thames, for Calcutta, via Cape of Good Hope.

The Steamship President, Capt. Keene, left Liverpool on the 1st for New York, with 140 passengers, 2000 packages, and 500 tons of goods. Capt. Fayrer has been dismissed by the directors of the company, on account of the great disappointment at the result of the voyage out and home of the President. The letter of dismissal says:

"From whatever cause this arises, the result to the proprietors is most disastrous, and sufficient to condemn the vessel and all connected with her. The draft of water she left New York upon, and the weather she had on the passage, were quite sufficient to ensure her a fourteen days' run at the outside; and the directors consider that her not making the passage at that time reflects anything but credit on the way in which she had been sailed."

The steam packet Sirus arrived at the London Docks from St. Petersburg, on Saturday, the 26th ult. She left Cronstadt on the morning of Wednesday. She brings accounts that 12,000 men were to embark at first, and in the event of Ibrahim's marching on Constantinople, a second expedition would be sent.

The Treasury minute has been issued, directed to the Commissioner of Customs, ordering that the two men, Lancaster and Roche, the gunner and carpenter of the British Queen steamship, who were lately convicted of smuggling large quantities of tobacco, should not be liberated until they had been in prison six months from the date of their conviction at the Thames Police Court. This severe example has been considered necessary in consequence of the extensive contraband trade carried on in the article of tobacco by the crew and stokers of the vessels.

The foundation-stone of the Nelson Memorial was laid on Wednesday, on the site in Trafalgar Square, presented to the Committee by her Majesty's Government. The proceedings were conducted in a private manner, owing to the absence from town of noblemen and gentlemen comprising the Committee. The stone was laid that the work might not be delayed. Mr. C. P. Scott, the Honorary Secretary of the Committee, officiating on the occasion. The foundation-stone was a block of Dartmoor granite, weighing fourteen tons.

FRANCE.

Convocation of the French Chambers.—It was reported in Paris that the Chambers would be convoked for the middle of November.

The Paris Moniteur of the 19th inst., announces that by a Royal ordinance of the 21st of September, an additional credit has been opened for the Minister of War of 51,674,000 francs, to provide for urgent expenses resulting from the increase of the effective and materiel of the army. The sanction of the Chambers for this extraordinary credit will be applied for at the approaching session.

An Arab force had been defeated, on the 16th ult. near the Oued Boudanou.

The trial of Prince Louis Napoleon was going on. The whole of Thursday (Oct. 1.) was occupied by the speeches of the counsel for the defense.

The French papers publish a transcript taken from the Belgian journals, of a note addressed on the 31st of August last, to H. L. Bulwer, British Minister at Paris, in the absence of Lord Granville, the object of which is to prove, that it was France that voluntarily separated from the Four Powers, and not the Four Powers from France.

New Resistance and Bloodshed at Algiers.—The following is a despatch from Marshal in Valee, dated Sept. 21st:—I ordered Gen. Changarnier to attack the camp belonging to the Kalifa Ben Salem on the Oued Boudouaou. The enemy has been completely defeated. One hundred and twenty-nine native dead fell into our power. We made 17 prisoners, captured 40 horses, 200 muskets, and several mules.—We had one killed and six wounded.

There was a report that Admiral Lalande was about to return and proceed with the squadron of reserve to the Straits of Gibraltar.

Marshal Macdonald, duke of Tarentum, one of the most illustrious of the French Marshals, died at his chateau, near Gier, at the age of 75.

Pontifical States.—A Toulon correspondent of the Courier Francais, in mentioning the reported disturbances in the Papal States, says that the Pontificial government has demanded the intervention of Austria.

A letter from Florence of the 17th of September, announces that Conat Anatole Demidoff will be married at the end of the month to the Princess Matilda Buonaparte, daughter of Jerome Buonaparte. This young lady is niece both to the Emperor Napoleon, and to the reigning King of Wurtemburg, and also cousin to the Emperor of Russia.

A letter from Paris says that the intelligence of the destruction of Beyrout, by Commander Napier, produced a complete panic in this city, and Consuls have fallen nearly 1 1-4 per cent, viz., from 87 7-8 to 86 3-4. 100,000 Consuls were offered at 86 and no takers. Purchasers were however shortly afterwards obtained at that price.

AFFAIRS IN ALEXANDRIA.

Accounts from Alexandria to the 7th of Sept., and from Constantinople to the same date, have been received. On the morning of the 5th, the second ten days having expired, the Consuls of the Four Powers waited on the Pacha at his palace, but his Highness refused to see them on account of indisposition. They were, however, received by his Prime Minister, Boghos Bey, and his Private Secretary, Simi Bey, who told them that the Viceroy had no other communication to make to them than what he had made on the 28th of August, namely, that he would accept the Pachalics of Syria and Acre for life, and deliver up to the Sultan, Candia, Adana, the Holy Cities, and the fleet; and furthermore, that he had forwarded to Constantinople a respectful memorial to the Sultan, by Count Walewski, praying that these terms might be accepted by his Imperial Master. The Minister of the Viceroy added, that his minister had nothing to do with the Four Powers, and would yield nothing to them; but that in the event of hostilities, all foreigners remaining in Alexandria and other parts of his dominions, might depend upon enjoying his protection. On the 7th, Col. Hodges, the British Consul General at Alexandria, struck his flag, and went on board the Clycops.

His example was followed by the Consuls-General of Russia, Austria and Prussia, who embarked in the British and Austrian vessels of war in the harbor. The movement of the diplomatic body greatly alarmed the merchants, of whom the majority were preparing to take shelter in Malta, Greece and the Ionian islands, till the threatened storm shall have blown over.—The French Consul General remained, and such of the British merchants as had resolved to abide the worst, were about to put themselves under the protection of the Pacha who had offered to guarantee their safety. Admiral Stopford landed at Alexandria on the 1st ult., where he remained till the four Consuls had received the final answer of the Pacha. Mehemet Ali received him most graciously, and invited him to dine with him, but his Highness was obliged to countermand the invitation, in consequence of his sufferings from Nile-boils—a distemper common to persons of every rank, at certain seasons in Egypt.—When the final answer of the Viceroy was given, the Admiral sailed for Beyrout with Princess Charlotte and the Bellerophon, to join the squadron of Commodore Napier, leaving the Asia and Implacable to protect the British interests at Alexandria.

The news of Mehemet Ali's rejection of the first ultimatum of the four powers was received at Constantinople with great delight, as the Divan would rejoice to see the Pacha stripped of all his dominions. A grand council was held at Constantinople, and Mehemet was declared to be dispossessed of the government of Syria. Appointments to the various Pachalics and government were made.

FROM CHINA.

The latest news from China appears to be contained in the following extract of a letter from Bombay, July 23, at nine in the evening, received by the Mediterranean packet:

The steamer is already under weigh and dropping down, but I try to catch her with three lines, to say that a private express from Calcutta had arrived, which states that intelligence had been received there from China by the steamer Enterprise, of the arrival of part of the expedition in the Canton river, and of the total destruction of the forts of the Bocca Tigris. We shall know the truth of it in a day or two; it is doubted by none.

Important from China.—A correspondent of the London Standard gives the following additional particulars:

"After the vessels had destroyed the forts of the Bogue, at the entrance of the Bocca Tigris, some troops and seamen were sent on shore to put them in a state of defense against the Chinese. The expedition then proceeded towards Whampoa, having pressed two Chinese pilots; but on reaching Second Bar, the passage for large vessels was impeded by the Chinese having taken the precaution to sink some large junks; however, the smaller vessels and steamers will almost immediately proceed with a strong military force to raze Canton to the ground."

S U M M A R Y.

The Rev. Dr. Kirkland, describing his visit to the Holy Land, gives the population of the principal places as follows—Jerusalem, 15 to 20,000; Nazareth, 4000, all but 500 Turks of the Christian persuasion; Bethlehem, 1000; Ramlah, 30,000; Jaffa, 3000, Turks and Arabs, including 500 Christians.

The vote on the question of the retrocession of the town and county of Alexandria to the state of Virginia was taken on Tuesday, and was largely in favor of that measure.

An Important Claim.—A person who represents himself as an heir to the original owner, has come forward and claimed the ground on which the Philadelphia county prison has been erected. Inquiries are making for the purpose of instituting legal proceedings for a recovery of its possession. —Olive Leaf.

There will be six eclipses next year—four of the sun, invisible, and two of the moon, both total and invisible in this country. One takes place on the 5th of February—the other on the 2d of August.

A Valuable Subscriber.—The Lowell Courier tells of a man who subscribed for two copies of a newspaper, 'just to patronize the establishment,' and never paid for either of them!

Amos Choate, Esq., of Salem, has placed at the disposal of the School Committee of that city, $120 annually, for three years, to be awarded as prizes to the most deserving scholars in the Latin and English High Schools in that city.

A whole Town Converted.—All the adult inhabitants of the town of Granby, Vt., with three exceptions, are professors of religion—most of them members of the Congregational church! The church is destitute of a pastor, yet there is scarcely a place where preaching is more regularly employed. The peculiar character of the people secures for them the frequent visits of ministers.

Our Methodist brethren have a Mission among the Sioux Indians on the upper waters of the Mississippi, 239 miles from St. Peters. Its prospects are encouraging.—Several Indian children have recently been received into their schools, some of whom are sons of chiefs. The Indians are favorably disposed, and some of them manifest much interest in the mission. We pray that all the efforts which are being made for the civilization and salvation of the aborigines of this country may be crowned with success.

From Tobasco.—The brig Star, Capt. Mitchell, 37 days from Tobasco, brings information that a Federal man-of-war and two schooners were cruising off that port on the 29th of August. The Federal troops commanded the frontier of the province, and intended, after receiving reinforcements to attack Tobasco. The Centralists were making preparations to defend the town.

Letters may be sent to England from Boston by the Cunard line without any charge, except such as may be incurred by conveyances through our own post offices. They should be in Boston by the 1st and 15th of every month.

The number of white males in New Orleans exceeds the number of white females 10,292. The number of colored females exceeds the number of colored males 6,222.

The Western Waters.—The Ohio, contrary to expectation a few days since, is again falling at this point. At Louisville, on the 6th, there were three feet nine inches of water in the channel. The Cumberland, on the 2nd, was up to 7 feet on Harpeth Shoals.—Cincinnati Gazette, Oct. 8th.

Rev. Mr. Smith who renounced Universalism some time since at the East, and was afterwards said to have returned to his idols again, is now reported by the Hartford Observer, to be in that city and to have preached for the Rev. Dr. Hawes. It appears that he is now settled in his conviction that Universalism is a delusion, and in his determination to preach hereafter the truth as it is in Jesus. We hope his mind may find a resting place before long in some faith from which he will not for trifling reasons waver.—N. Y. Observer.

Laconic Advice.—Mr. Hillyard, who for 21 years has been the president of the Northamptonshire Farming and Grazing Society, the annual meeting of which was held on Wednesday, in presenting a prize cup to Mr. J. Elliot, gave him the following laconic piece of advice: "Now, young man, take this cup, and remember always to plough deep and drink shallow."—English Paper.

Recognition of Texas.—The New York Courier says: "We learn from an authentic source that advices were received by the Great Western, to the effect that the Governments of Holland and Belgium, had authorized their Ministers in London to treat with General Hamilton for the conclusion of a treaty of recognition, amity, and commerce, with the new republic of Texas; and that General Hamilton, the diplomatic plenipotentiary of Texas, was about to repair to London for that purpose."

Sickness of the South.—The South Western Christian Advocate, (Nashville, Tenn.) of Sept. 19th, says—We are sorry to learn from different quarters, that the present season is uncommonly sickly in almost every part of the state. Many valuable citizens, and not a few members of the several churches have been called to realize a change of worlds.

Post Office at Washington.—The General Post Office is a marble structure 200 feet long, with two wings, and is to be three stories high. It is designed, when completed, to accommodate the Postmaster General and about 100 clerks. It will be it is said, the handsomest edifice in the Union. It is paid for, we believe, partly in Treasury Notes.

British Post Office.—Letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight may be sent through the kingdom for one penny, and in the same proportion for greater weight. The rates are double if the postage is not paid in advance.

Letters to and from the United States, if sent by the packet, twelve times, and if by private ship, eight times the above rates. This applies to Cunard's line, and includes the inland postage.

Letters from foreign parts for the Continent (except France) must be post paid in England or they will be opened and returned.

Newspapers from foreign places by packets of private ships, pay 2d. each, and for this are sent to any part of England.

British newspapers pass through the mails free.

English Taxation.—We are told by Bulwer in his work on England, that the Taxes in that country amount to just about one-third of the earnings of labor. A skilful mechanic, who earns £60 sterling, a year, or nearly $300, pays to the government £20, nearly $100.

Steam on the Canals.—Mr. Melon Battell an intelligent mechanic of Albany, has prepared a model of a steam-tug, to be used on the canals in towing boats, the practicability and efficiency of which are highly spoken of. The application of the motive power, by a combination of the common wheel and the steamboat paddle, is the peculiar novelty in this invention of Mr. Battell's.

Bible Societies.—An article in the Cheltenham, (Eng.) Free Press, states that in 1804, there was no society in existence which had for its object the distribution of the word of God. In contrast with this passive state of Christianity, the number of Bible Societies at the present time, is in England and Wales 2541, Ireland 641, Scotland 132, on the Continent 1268, America 2800, West Indies 876. In France, where the Bible was a few years since proscribed as a fable by an Act of the Legislature, and tied to an ass and carried to one of the public squares and burned, there are now 236 Bible Societies, 121 pedlars employed in distributing the word of God, and the circulation of copies last year was 9,200.

A Scene in America—At Pottsville, Pennsylvania, from 1500 to 2000 of the poor laborers in the mines have joined the temperance societies. Verily the work goes on—Chronicle.

A Confirmed Thief.—The Richmond Star mentions the case of a young man, very respectably connected, who successfully entered the two Baptist churches in that city and stole the Bibles, which he afterwards sold. He was committed to prison, and was scarcely in there an hour, before he stole 37 1-2 cents from a fellow prisoner.

The following account of an attempt, made during the Revolutionary War, to blow up the British vessels of war in New York harbor, may be of interest to most of our readers. It is copied from a New York paper of November, 1821, and is an obituary notice of the gallant soldier who made the daring attempt:—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Died.—At Lyme, (Conn.) on the 29th ult. Captain Ezra Lee, aged 72, a revolutionary officer. When the British fleet lay in the North River, opposite to the city of New York, and while General Washington had possession of the city, he was very desirous to be rid of such neighbors. A Mr. Bushnell, of Saybrook, (Conn.) who had the genius of a Fulton, constructed such a marine machine, of a conic form, bound together with iron bands, within which one person might sit, and with cranks and skulls, could navigate to any depth under water. In the upper part was affixed a vertical screw for the purpose of penetrating ship's bottoms, and to this was attached a magazine of powder, within which was a clock, which, on being set to run any given time, would, when run down, spring a gun lock, and an explosion would follow. This Marine Turtle, so called, was examined by Gen. Washington, and approved to preserve secrecy, it was experimented within an inclosed yard, over twenty to thirty feet water, and kept during day-light locked up in a vessel's hold. The brother of the inventor was to be the person to navigate the machine into action, but on sinking it the first time, he declined the service.

Gen. Washington, unwilling to relinquish the object, requested Major General Parsons to select a person in whom he could confide, voluntarily, to engage in the enterprise; the latter being well acquainted with the heroic spirit, the patriotism, and the firm and steady courage of the deceased above mentioned, immediately communicated the plan and the offer, which he accepted, observing that his life was at General Washington's service. After practising the machine, until he understood its powers of balancing and moving under water, a night was fixed upon for the attempt. General Washington and his associates in the secret, took their stations upon the roof of a house in Broadway, anxiously awaiting the result. Morning came and no intelligence could be had of the intrepid sub-marine navigator, nor could the boat which attended him, give account of him after parting with him the first part of the night.

While these anxious spectators were about to give him up as lost, several barges were seen to start suddenly from Governor's Island, (then in possession of the British) and proceed towards some object near the Asia ship of the line—as suddenly they were seen to put about and steer for the Island with springing oars. In two or three minutes an explosion took place from the surface of the water, resembling a water-spout, which aroused the whole city and region; the enemy's ships took the alarm—signals were rapidly given—the ships cut their cables and proceeded to the Hook with all possible despatch, sweeping their bottoms with chains, and with difficulty prevented their affrighted crews from leaping overboard.

During this scene of consternation, the deceased came to the surface, opened the brass head of his aquatic machine; rose and gave a signal for the boat to come to him, but they could not reach him until he again descended under water, to avoid the enemy's shot from the Island, who had discovered him and commenced firing in his wake. Having forced himself against a strong current under water until without the reach of shot, he was taken in tow and landed at the Battery amidst a great crowd, and reported himself to General Washington, who expressed his entire satisfaction, that the object was affected, without the loss of lives. The deceased was under the Asia's bottom more than two hours, endeavoring to penetrate her copper but in vain. He frequently came up under her stern galleries searching for exposed plank, and could hear the sentinels cry. Once he was discovered by the watch on deck, and heard them speculate upon him, but concluded a drifted log had paid them a visit—he returned to her bottom and examined it fore and aft, and then proceeded to some other ships; but the impossibility of penetrating their copper, for want of a resisting power, saved the lives of hundreds. The longest space of time he could remain under water was two hours. For a particular description of this sub-marine armor curiosity, see Silliman's Journal of Arts and Sciences.—Com. Adv.

Important Arrest.—An Englishman by the name of William Wallace, was arrested last night, at his residence in Second street below Federal, by officers L. H. Smith and Maginnis, charged with being concerned in obtaining letters from the Post Offices in Boston and Providence, containing drafts and notes to a large amount.—Three or four others were connected with him, two of whom have been arrested. The last attempt was made in Providence, on the 26th of Sept., when they obtained a letter containing a note for $287 50—which was found upon one of the gang calling himself John J. Hanna, alias Wm. Redman. The one arrested, Hanna, in New York, by the name of Bernard, gave information of Wallace, when Jacob C. Gould, police officer of Providence came on to this city and succeeded in finding him out. They employed boys to get the letters from the Post Office.

It is supposed that near $20,000 in drafts and notes, most of which they sold, have been purloined by them—one for $393 drawn in favor of Otis, Newcross & Co. of New York, on Mr. Benson of this city, was accepted and paid, the endorsement of Otis, Newcross & Co. being forged. Wallace is well known to the police. From information given to one of the Banks in New York, there is strong reason to suspect that several merchant's clerks, and some of the clerks in the post offices, were cognizant of these transactions. Wallace was committed as a fugitive from justice, to await the requisition of the Governor of Rhode Island.—Phila. Gaz.

The Mother of Gen. Greene.—Among the many ladies who distinguished themselves for their patriotism, charity and other good qualities, in our Revolution, there is one whose name ought not to be forgotten, and who, in my opinion, is equal in merit to any that flourished in our country, and there were many at that time. About the commencement of our Revolution and as soon as it was ascertained that Nathaniel Greene, (afterwards General Greene) intended to join our army in defense of his country, a deputation of Friends, (commonly called Quakers, and to whose society he then belonged,) by order of their meeting, waited on him to endeavor to dissuade him from it, and after listening to all their arguments on the subject, he informed them that he felt an irresistible propensity, not to be got over, for joining his brethren in arms. He thanked them for the interest they had taken in his welfare; but he could not comply with their request. When the deputation took an affectionate leave and left him, his mother who had been listening with all the anxiety of a fond parent, used her best endeavors to prevail on him to stay at home, when he told her it was impossible. After a pause she burst into a flood of tears, with this remarkable observation—"Well, Nathaniel, if thee must go, it is possible that I may hear of thy death, and if it be God's will that it shall so happen, I hope I shall not have the mortification to hear of thee being wounded in the back." Comment is needless—a Spartan mother could not have said more: but Mrs. Greene stands preeminently superior to the mothers of antiquity, as her education was so different—she was bred a Christian.

From Central America.—We have Belize papers of the 19th and 27th of September. The latter rejoicingly announces the arrival of the British man-of-war Comus, the precursor of a squadron ordered to the coast of Central America, to protect British interests and demand compensation for losses sustained by British subjects in the late civil wars. The English editor advises the Central Americans to pay up before trouble comes. A company of English capitalists have undertaken the culture of silk on a large scale in Guatemala. A convention of delegates from the several States was about to assemble at the city of Guatemala to adjust the affairs of the Republic. General, Morazan, when last heard from, was reported to be raising troops for an attack on New Grenada.

THE PHILADELPHIA MIRROR, A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND NEWS.

The subjects of this periodical will consist of original and selected tales, sketches, biography, essays, poetry, &c. &c. together with a general synopsis of foreign and domestic news upon the cover.

Something to be considered.—It is presumed that most persons who have subscribed to any of our large weekly newspapers are aware that it is next to impossible to preserve them in an unmutilated state; consequently we have adopted the present plan, by which we secure all the advantages of a newspaper, and still retain the conveniences of a periodical.

The body of this work will consist of what is termed literary matter, correctly arranged, and with the last number of each volume we shall publish an index of contents and title-page—issued in a convenient form for binding. The cover will consist of foreign and domestic news, notices of marriages, deaths, &c., and all subjects that generally comprise the news department of weekly papers.

The proprietor has effected such arrangements as shall enable him to furnish choice productions from the prolific pens of most of our prominent writers.

TERMS.

The MIRROR is published every Saturday, each number will contain eight large quarto pages, enveloped in a finely printed cover, at the very low price of Two dollars and fifty cents per annum, payable in advance. No subscription received for a less period than one year. Postmasters and others who procure two subscribers, and remit Five Dollars to the proprietor, shall receive the Third copy gratis.

As two dollars and fifty cents, is in many instances, an inconvenient sum to remit by mail, therefore, if any person will send us two dollars, they will be credited that amount, and receive the work accordingly.

All orders addressed to the publisher, Wm. B. Rogers, No. 49 Chesnut street, Philadelphia, (post paid,) will receive immediate attention.

Editors of newspapers, by copying this prospectus, and sending a paper of the same to the office, shall receive the Mirror for one year.

Any money current in the respective states in which the subscribers may reside, will be received in payment for subscription at par.

POETRY.

From the Southern Literary Messenger.

TO THE CONSTELLATION LYRA.

BY WILLIAM WALLACE.

Harp of the Heavens!—thy glittering strings
Ten thousand thousand years have told,
Since o'er thy frame the mystic wings
Of Time unwearied rolled;
And still from that mysterious throne,
Thy song, magnificent and lone,
Pearls nightly, as of old,
When Chaldea's Shepherd bent her ear
To catch the music of each sphere.

How fondly gazed that old man round
The dread magnificence above,
Wooed by the anthem's mellow sound,
Breathing of seraph love;
Whose brooding wings shed deathless bliss
O'er pensile orb and starred abyss,
Like Heaven's own holy dove—
For he, on those high rocks, had caught
Beams from the Spirit-land of thought;

And heard thy music, mighty Lyre,
Struck by the giant hand of Time,
Rolling amid yon worlds of fire,
Their choral march sublime.
How leaped his heart—how swelled his soul—
To hear those awful numbers roll
In one eternal chime;
And dream that, freed from Earth's dark sod,
Already he communed with God!

Bard of the Stars!—thou led'st the dance
Of thrice ten thousand thousand spheres,
Wheeling in their delirious trance,
Through the unnumbered years.
Unmoved alike 'mid life or death—
The storm's career—the tempest's breath,
Or folly—crime and tears—
Still—still behind those cloudy bars,
Glitters the Poet of the Stars!

Thou art alone! at twilight dim,
And in the night's transparent noon,
Solemnly weaving thy wild hymn
And solitary tune—
Like some sad hermit, whose high heart
Would from all earthly splendors part,
Lured by their glare too soon,
And 'mid the desert's silent gloom
Wait uncomplainingly its doom.

Alone! oh, sacred ONE, dost thou
From that star-cinctured hall behold
Sorrows which scathe the human brow,
And griefs that burn untold,
Save to the night-winds trooping by—
Like mourners journeying from the sky—
Coldly and dark unrolled?
Vainly we ask, or bow, or loud,
Bright Minstrel of the star and cloud!

Sound on, oh mighty Harp!—thy strain
Comes floating sadly on the night—
For we may ne'er behold again
Thy pure and sacred light;
But, in the cold, insensate tomb,
Rest all unknowing of our doom;
While thou, intensely bright,
Shalt pour thy glorious music still,
Alike unscathed by death or ill.

Sound on! But those sweet harps of earth,
Whose strings lie shattered, cold and lone,
Shall yet, restored by godlike worth,
Resume their godlike tone;
While thou must be, oh! ancient lyre,
Destroyed in Nature's funeral pyre,
And broken on thy throne—
Whence they, undimmed by earth born jars,
May lead, like thee, the dance of stars!

Oh, glorious hope! Oh, thought divine!
Soul! fired by the promised bliss,
Kneel at thy God's eternal shrine,
And breathe thy thanks for this!
Harp! lift once more thy joyous song—
Bear its—oh, bear its notes along,
O'er earth and far abyss!
Hail with a smile Death's gloomy frown—
Spirit! he brings thy brightest crown!

FELICIA HEMANS.

BY HORACE GREELY.

Fate and death have solemn voices. Within the brief quarter of century which bounds my remembrance, I have listened, and not without emotion, to the freshly-sped tidings that the earthly career had closed of Napoleon, the world's idol or terror, and almost its conqueror; of Byron, the mighty master of passion and song; of Adams and Jefferson, the patriarchs of American liberty; of Carroll, the last signer of the Declaration of Independence; of Goethe, the creator of an intellectual universe; of the great, the good, the wise, in every position of life, to say nothing of the herd of popes, and kings, and chieftains, who have followed each other, in noisy pomp and darish mockery, to the chill chambers of the dead. And yet no one of these evidences of man's mortality, affecting, though it might, the destinies of a continent, ever moved me so deeply as the simple announcement that, on the 16th of May, 1835, FELICIA HEMANS had ceased to live. Those were tidings of sadness indeed, not to a few attached hearts, but to millions.

Yet why to millions? No dazzling crown had thereby been cast among a crowd of eager and reckless pretenders; no empire exposed by the struggle of a disputed succession to anarchy, rapine, and slaughter. The very name of the deceased one was scarcely known within the frigid atmosphere of courts, or camps, or cabinets; it was seldom and carelessly lisped in the circles of folly, insanity and dissipation, which, as if in bitter irony, misname themselves 'the world.' In a stranger city, separated from most of the few who adored her, as well as the many who loved and admired,—in an apartment hers only by that strong affection which was but a nobler charity,—the stricken one had laid her down to die. Her origin, her career, her fate, had none of the vulgar elements of greatness. Born in barely comfortable circumstances, of parentage which fashion will but condescend to call respectable, her years of childhood had quietly passed alternately in the routine of ordinary studies, and the dreamy, fantastic musings of an ardent imagination and unburdened heart. Married at an early age to an officer of the British army, she too soon found that she had fatally mistaken a romantic and passionate admiration of the feats of that army and the cause which it had heroically, triumphantly maintained in the long war against Napoleon, for sympathy of mind and congeniality of spirit with him who had wooed and speedily won her inexperienced heart. A wedded life, not of happiness, thus commenced, was terminated six years thereafter, by the deliberate and unregretted withdrawal of the husband to a distant clime, whence, during the remaining years of her lifetime, he never returned. Thus left a more than widow, with children to maintain and to educate, this peerless woman commenced that patient struggle with adversity, the fruits of which have rendered her name immortal. Her misfortunes, in the wise providence of God, were doubtless the source of blessings to millions; but for them, she would never have been induced to enter the arena of authorship. She might have written much and passably well, as, indeed, she had already done; but she could never have been the author of 'Records of Woman.' But adversity became her portion; and her wrung spirit emulated those plants which only when bruised exhale their fragrant odors. Henceforth her career was one of stern effort and of glorious triumph, heightening and swelling to the last. Speaking seldom and vaguely of her own sorrows, the many admired her productions without dreaming that the writer could be other than a child of fortune as well as genius; and were surprised and shocked to learn that the idol of their admiration had found a welcome refuge from overtasking cares and afflictions—that an early grave had closed over her wasted form, her scard affections and broken heart.

I remember, as of yesterday, the gradual unfolding of the exceeding truthfulness and beauty, the profound heart-knowledge, (to coin a Germanism,) which characterizes Mrs. Heman's poems, upon my own immature, unfolding mind. 'Casabianca,' 'Things that Change,' 'The Voice of Spring,' 'The Traveler at the Source of the Nile,' 'The Wreck,' and many other poems of kindred nature, are enshrined in countless hearts—especially of those whose intellectual existence dates its commencement between 1820 and 1830—as gems of priceless value; as spirit-wands, by whose electric touch they were first made conscious of the diviner aspirations, the loftier, holier energies within them. These are poems which can never die, except through a mighty change in the intellectual condition of the world—a mighty change, indeed, since few things have been written better calculated to defy the assaults of Time and Revolution.

Perhaps nothing has ever been written which exemplified more clearly the simplicity, the truthfulness, and the universality of genuine poetry than 'The Traveler at the Source of the Nile.' The vanity of human desires and attainments, the nothingness of all we strive for, and emptiness of even the loftiest triumphs, are depicted in a few brief lines, with entire simplicity, but with intense reality and power. The 'rapture of a conqueror's mood' in the first moment of exulting consciousness of success, so speedily, effectually quelled as Night came silently, dimly on, with its chill solitude and saddening gloom—its loneliness, deepened rather than broken by the almost spiritual presence of the far-off, inscrutable stars—all ending in that withering inquiry of the now unnerved and sinking heart, "And is this all?"

"No more than this? what seemed it now
First by that spring to stand?
A thousand streams of lovelier flow
Bathed his own mountain land.
Whence, far o'er waste and ocean track,
Their wild, sweet voices called him back.

"They called him back to many a glade,
His childhood's haunt of play,
Where, brightly through the beechen shade,
Their waters glanced away.
They called him with their sounding waves
Back to his father's hills and graves.

* * * * *

"He wept! The stars of Afric's heaven
Beheld his bursting tears,
E'en on that spot where Fate had given
The meed of toiling years.
O Happiness! how far we flee
Thy own sweet paths in search of thee!"

Home and Heaven are the two sole, sufficient sources of Mrs. Hemans's inspiration; she needed not and avoided all the rightfully obsolete machinery of the schools, the wretched mummery of Parnassus, Helicon and the Muses. The mighty love of the mother for her children; the fond, confiding, unselfish affection of these for each other: the unbidding of the closest bonds, as they one by one go forth into the world to wrestle with fortune, perchance to triumph, but certainly to lie low at last; the struggle of faith and love and woman's fortitude with the oversweeping tide of misfortune, bereavement, and agony; above all, the keen conflicts, the sharp, convulsive pang of the mother's, or the betrothed maiden's, breast, when the current of her deep, devoted affection is first encountered by the stern tide of patriotism, or some other form of paramount duty—when, at the trumpet's rousing call, she is constrained to gird the sword on the form of cherished son or lover, and bid him go forth to the battle bravely, and, if need be, to fall, in defence of his country, sustained though all by a fervent trust in Heaven;—these are the themes and the incitements on which the peerless woman of our age loved to pour forth her seraph in bursts of undying song.

"O blue deep!
Thou that no trace of human hearts dost keep,
Never to thee did love, with silvery chain,
Draw my soul's dream, which through all nature sought
What waves deny—some bower of steadfast bliss,
A home to twine with fancy, feeling, thought,
As with sweet flowers: But chasened hope for this
Now turns from earth's green valleys, as from thee,
To that sole changeless world where 'there is no more sea.'"

EXECUTION OF ALGERNON SYDNEY.—About ten o'clock in the morning he was conducted by the sheriff, on foot, from the Tower to the place of execution on Tower Hill. He was attended by two of his brother's servants, and he ascended the scaffold with a firm, undaunted mien—worth, says Bishop Burnet, of the man who set up Marcus Brutus as his model. He remarked that "he had made his peace with God, and had nothing more to say to men, and handed to the sheriff a paper cotaining a vindication of his innocence of the charges alleged against him—but declined to either read it himself or have it read to the multitude. Were it not received he offered to tear it up. When he had pulled off his coat, hat, and doublet, he observed, "that he was ready to die, and would give them no farther trouble." Then he handed the executioner three guineas: the fellow grumbled as if the sum was not sufficient; he then told his servant to give him more. Kneeling down, after a pause of a few minutes, he calmly laid his head upon the block. The executioner asked if he should rise again? "Not till the general resurrection—strike on," was the reply of Sydney. His head was severed at a blow. His remains were given to his friends, who buried them at Penhurst in the tomb of his ancestors. A nation soon cried out against the infamy of the deed which murdered the man who was among the first to defend the maxim that the only true basis of government is THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE.

DESTRUCTION OF LIFE IN ANCIENT WARS.—Accustomed as we are to the effects of war in civilized times, when the most bloody contests are followed by an increase in the numbers of the people, it is difficult to form a conception of the desolation which it produced in barbarous ages, when the void produced by the sword is not supplied by the impulse of subsequent hostility. A few facts will show its prodigious influence in former ages. It is ascertained by an exact computation, that when the three great capitals of Khorassan were destroyed by Timour, 4,347,000 persons were put to the sword. At the same time, 700,000 people were slain in the city of Monsul, which had risen in the neighborhood of the ancient Ninevah: and the desolation produced a century and a half before by the sack of Genguiskhan, had been at least as great. Such were the ravages of this mighty conqueror, and his Mogul followers, in the country between the Caspian and the Indus, that they almost exterminated the inhabitants; and five subsequent centuries have been unable to repair the ravages of four years. An army of 500,000 Moguls, under the sons of Ginghis, so completely laid waste the provinces to the north of the Danube, that they have never since regained their former numbers; and in the famine consequent upon the irruption of the same barbarians into the Chinese empire, thirteen are computed to have perished. During the great invasion of Timour, twelve of the most flourishing cities of Asia, including Delhi, Ispahan, Bagdad and Damascus, were utterly destroyed; and pyramids of human heads, one of which contained 90,000 skulls, erected on their ruins.—Alison's Population.

ABORIGINAL CHARACTER.—As an Indian was straying through a village on the Kennobec, he passed a gentleman standing at his store-door and begged a piece of tobacco. The person stepped back and selected a generous piece, for which he received a gruff 'tank you,' and thought no more of the affair. Three or four months afterward, he was surprised at an Indian coming into the store, and presenting him with a beautiful miniature birch canoe, painted, and furnished with paddles to correspond. On asking the meaning of it, he was told—'Indian no forget; you give me tobacco—me make this for you.' This man's gratitude for a trifling favor, had led him to bestow more labor on his present than would have purchased him many pounds of his favorite fumigatory.—Boston Parler.

FRIENDS.—There are a few persons in the world, who are so poor, that they have no friend to share their sorrows and partake of their joys. But while we are blest with kind friends, it should be the warm desire of our hearts to promote their interest. They "should live in our hearts by the emotion which subsists there—in our memory, by our fragrant remembrance of them—in our voice, by our eulogiums—in our conduct, by our imitations of their virtues."

NEVER BROOD OVER MISFORTUNE.—The person who sits down to brood over his misfortunes, or his deficiency of talents, is sure to be miserable. But he who improves what little his Maker has given, him is sure of gaining double, and of accomplishing more in the end, than many who were naturally endowed with better abilities, but misimproved them.

GOOD.—A publisher of a paper, who hangs out his sign upon a pine tree in the western woods, advertises for apprentices. So far very good—but gooder still, he says that 'boys from the country would be preferred.'

TAKE NOTICE.

THE subscriber offers his Farm, on which he now resides, for sale, consisting of one hundred and fifty acres, one hundred of which is under improvement, and is considered by good judges as an excellent stock or dairy farm. A just proportion of the farm is suitable for ploughing, and has not been reduced by bad husbandry. The timber land is the best in this vicinity, having never been used for any purpose. There is on the premises the best of fencing materials, both wood and stone. The buildings consist of a two story dwelling house, nearly new, two barns, and two small hay barns, corn house, &c. There is a well of water in the shed a few feet from the kitchen door. There is about two hundred bearing apple trees, besides pears and plumbs.—Eighty of the apple trees are ingrafted, and are of the best quality of fruit for summer, fall or winter. The farm is well watered with a small brook and several never failing springs, and is situated in a good and peaceable neighborhood of wealthy farmers, one mile west of the local center of the town of Preston, Chenango county, N. Y. It lies on the west side of the road leading from Pharsalia to the village of Oxford, which is about 4 1-2 miles distance to the south east. The road leading from Macdonough village to Norwich, the county town, runs from west to east through the center of the farm. It is about six miles to Norwich. The farm is situated about eighty rods north of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, and two miles west of the Congregational meeting-house two and a half miles east of the Free-will Baptist & Universalist meeting-house, and two and a half south west of the new Baptist meeting-house. The District School House adjoins the premises. For pleasantness of situation, religious, social and political privileges, we presume it cannot hardly be surpassed in the western country. One quarter, or even one third of the purchase money may remain on bond and mortgage for years.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS. DEVOTED TO RELIGION, LITERATURE, AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE. PUBLISHED BY GREENE, BAILEY, AND BURDICK.

VOLUME 1. DE RUYTER, MADISON COUNTY, N. Y., THIRD-DAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1840. NUMBER 35.

ORIGINAL.

DE RUYTER, Thursday morn., }
22d Oct. 1840. }

To the Editors of the Register:

DEAR BRETHREN—The readers of your valuable paper will recollect, that some months since you published an article from my pen, on Camp-Meetings. I did not assail any denomination of Christians, but I simply expressed my opinion concerning Camp-Meetings, and stated some reasons for entertaining that opinion, and requested, or petitioned that if such meetings must yet be sustained, those who conduct them would determine that they should not be held on the Sabbath. In thus availing myself of the liberty of the press to express my views before the community, and in thus humbly exercising the right of petition, I supposed that I was doing precisely what was proper for me to do "in the land of Washington." At the close of the article I pledged myself to reply to any candid strictures upon it, if accompanied with the real name of the writer; no communication complying with both, as fully as I could desire, of these conditions, has yet met my eye.

But I am happy to notice that our Methodist brethren, who I am persuaded, are well qualified to do the subject justice, are beginning to frankly discuss the present utility of Camp-Meetings in this section of the country, and in New England.

As an illustration of this remark, permit me to solicit your attention to an article on Camp-Meetings, recently published in the "American Wesleyan Observer." I meet with it, copied without note or comment, in another Methodist paper, "Zion's Watchman," of August 15, 1840. The writer and myself coincide in our views, and I thank that honest-hearted "Travelling Preacher" for his testimony. Under his second division he uses an expression which deserves special attention; it is this, viz:—"other unnameable transactions." I shall feel grateful to you, if you can find space for that article in the Register.

Yours truly,

J. R. JOHNSON.

From the American Wesleyan Observer.

CAMP-MEETINGS.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—The time for holding Camp-Meetings in New England is fast approaching, and doubtless many who are peculiarly attached to these extraordinary means of grace, are looking forward to the day when they shall repair to "Millennial Grove," or some other consecrated spot, with mingled emotions and high anticipations. This class of persons are Christians, and attend camp-meetings actuated by the purest of motives, and for the holiest of purposes; but we should bear in mind that other classes—and they are numerous—constantly attend these meetings, having other objects in view than the glory of God, the purification of the church, and the salvation of sinners.

That camp-meeting have been of great utility in New England and other parts of our country, it would be hazardous to deny; and that they are of essential benefit to the church in some sections of the land, perhaps is true in point of fact; but that they now as well subserve the interests of the cause of Christ in many parts of our work, particularly in Massachusetts, as in by-gone days, I think cannot be safely affirmed.

We shall see by examining the subject,

1. The necessity which once existed for holding these meetings within the bounds of the New England and Providence Conferences, does not now exist. Look and see. Formerly the Methodists were a small community, and by no means compact in their location. Their churches were small—their ministers few in number—and their meeting-houses and other convenient places of worship, existed as one, where they have fifteen or twenty now.

These circumstances, and a host of others that might be mentioned in this connection, show us the propriety and necessity of resorting to such expedients, to increase religious interest and influence in the community, as holding camp-meetings. But these circumstances, with us, no longer exist; hence they cannot become a reason for leaving our large and convenient churches, and resorting in bands of hundreds and thousands to the tented grove. Nor, as already remarked, is it at all necessary—no, not for the convenience or benefit of the church, or salvation of sinners. We are now numerous: our houses of worship have multiplied in an astonishing manner for the last half century, and are still increasing; our ministry too, is strong, numerically considered, and, under God, we are every way able to do a great work in the use of the ordinary means of grace; or, if we must have extraordinary means put in operation, we can hold protracted or four days' meetings; and in this way bring about the very same results we aim at in holding camp-meetings.

2. Such are the circumstances of the times—of the church and community, that almost of necessity the character of camp-meetings are essentially changed; and instead of being religious meetings, conducted on principles of sacrifice and self-denial, they have degenerated to such a degree, that, in many instances, they become places of pleasurable and fashionable resort—of feasting, bodily, and worldly enjoyment!—Certainly, the institution better be given up, that sustain such a character in any instance! So it seems to me.

Add to this, camp-meetings are made the occasion for repeated flagitious and public violations of the law of God! No sooner is it announced in the prints that a camp-meeting is to be held in a given place, than loafers, pedlers, and SWINDLERS of different classes begin to make due preparations to attend—not in tens and scores, but in many instances, hundreds, and perhaps THOUSANDS—especially, if the meeting is held in the vicinity of our large towns and cities! Who that has ever been to a camp-meeting, does not shudder, when he calls to mind the profanity, obscenity, fighting, gambling, drinking, and, it may be, other unnameable transactions which he has witnessed some half or three-quarters of a mile from the camp-ground? And these things are unavoidable. We cannot hold a meeting of this character, but "Satan," in this outrageous manner, "will come also."

3. The expense of these meetings is another occasion why they should be given up. Our people have pecuniary burdens enough to bear in building their meeting-houses, supporting their ministers, and contributing to the benevolent enterprizes of the day, without adding four or five more dollars in getting themselves and families to and from camp-meeting. Look for instance, at the meeting held in Millennial Grove, where thousands are expended every year! Far better would it be in my opinion, to stay at home and labor for the salvation of souls in our own neighborhoods on the "personal effort" plan, and lay out these large sums of money to help on the missionary, temperance, tract, or Bible cause! I know it is said in reply, that the church is quickened, and that many souls are converted as a gospel remuneration for all our trouble and expense; but this reply is rendered wholly nugatory by the fact that as much good might be done, and as many sinners converted at home, were professed Christians as diligent, watchful, prayerful and faithful there, as when in the tented grove; and why should they not be? Let the same zeal be manifested at home among our brethren and sisters which they manifest at camp-meetings, and they would keep the land blazing with reformation all the time! And ought not this to be done? Are not the motives of death, judgment and eternity, heaven and hell, as important, solemn, and powerful at home, in the private walks of life, as in public, and on great occasions? Why then should they not operate as powerfully upon us there as in other places, and under other circumstances?

4. Camp-meetings—and so, in a measure, with all other extraordinary meetings—tend to bring into disrepute the ordinary established means of grace. The disposition to make revivals periodical, is by far too prevalent—but is not this disposition fostered by a continuation of camp-meetings? Are there not very many in almost all our churches who exhibit greater devotion to God, greater concern for the salvation of sinners, and greater zeal in prayer and religious efforts at these meetings than at any other period during the year? I think this fact cannot be denied; neither can it be remedied, until by an abandonment of these uncalled for extra exertions, these mistaken brethren are thrown upon the ordinary privileges and resources of the gospel to enlist their energies and call forth their songs and prayers in the cause of the great Head of the Church. That piety cannot be very deep or saving which is dependent on extraneous circumstances to keep it alive or in vigorous operation; and certainly, it must be of a questional character when it is only aided into exercise by the novel and peculiar circumstances connected with a camp-meeting. Let the closet be faithfully visited—the family altar kept in good repair; let the Bible be faithfully studied—the prayer meetings, class meetings, and preaching meetings be faithfully attended; with firm and humble reliance on God for His blessing on our efforts, and we shall soon find that

> "That they need not go abroad for joy,
> Who have a feast at home."

Many other things might be mentioned, but it would swell this communication to too great a length. I have spoken the sentiments of my mind with freedom and plainness—not with the wanton desire of assailing an institution which has proved so necessary to the advancement of the cause of Christ, but of stating a few objections to certain means of grace, (so they are esteemed) which may or may not, be used as circumstances may require.

I would not injure the cause of religion, or lay a stumbling-block in the way of Christians by writing a word against camp-meetings, if, indeed, they are indispensable to the prosperity of the church—no not for my right hand: but this, it appears to me, remains yet to be proved. If I am in error on this subject, there are many who can set me right, and I sincerely and cordially invite them to do it.

GOD'S DWELLING PLACE.

For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.—Isaiah lvii. 15.

Thou'rt throned above the stars, O God! the sky
Whose lustrous glories wake our awe and praise,
Is but the pavement of thy home on high,
The faint reflection of those fires that blaze,
Circling thy presence, and whose rays inweave,
Splendors which mortal thought can ne'er conceive.

Archangels winged speed at thy least command,
Heaven's armies wait thy bidding to fulfil,
In dazzling phalanx round thy throne they stand,
Or march obedient to thy sovereign will;
Harp strings of seraphs with thy praises ring,
While angel legions hail thee for their King.

And for thy footstool see this earth outspread—
This beauteous earth! with garniture of flowers—
And grass-clad valley—and the mountain head
Wreathed with eternal snows—where summer hours
Pass by and leave no fragrance, nor let fall
One blossom on the icy coronal.

The foaming torrent which has thundering roar'd
On through the lapse of ages still the same,
Its mighty waters by thy hand are pour'd
From cliff to cliff—its rainbows bear thy name
Within their seven-fold beauty—on its high-top'd spray
Is written GOD—in characters of day.

And all the mass of forest trees which bend
Before the whirlwind in its awful wrath,
And all the world of flowers whose beauties blend
Brightly luxuriant round our daily path,
The birds, the blessed birds that high up spring,
Are thine, O Lord, and thine the praise they sing.

The dark deep ocean with its secrets strange,
Its hoard of untold treasures, and its power
Which shadows thine, where we can trace no change,
Ever mysterious as at that first hour
When thou didst stay its heavings, all its waves are thine,
And fires which on its darkened bosom shine.

And these, all these, what are they but a part
Of thy works, mightiest!—Omnipotent art thou!
And canst thou dwell within the lowly heart?
Canst stoop from heaven to where thy creatures bow
In self-abasement, and the hearts revive
Of lowly contrite ones, and bid them live!

Thou canst—where'er our humble servant pines
For the clear waters of his better home,
Longs for those mansions where thy presence shines,
Prays that thy Spirit in his heart may come,
And loves thee, Lord, and fears all sinful thrall,
There wilt thou dwell, Maker and God of all.

And as the parched and thirsty earth grows green
Where fall the rain-drops, and the languid flowers
Bloom brighter, where thy dews of grace have been,
Beauty and sweetness light the darkest hours;
And softened glories of thy heaven we trace,
Where thou hast made the lowly heart thy dwelling-place.

WILL SAINTS IN HEAVEN KNOW EACH OTHER.

The question has often been asked, not only in a spirit of speculative curiosity, but with all the imploring earnestness of a heart bleeding with the anguish of recent bereavement, and eagerly grasping the hope of re-union with the loved and lamented dead. The inquiry, at all times a natural and inviting one, possesses under such circumstances, an intense and absorbing interest. Without professing to be "wise above that which is written" in the Scriptures of truth, we would venture to suggest a few considerations, which to our mind, seem sufficient to show, that the hope of mutual recognition in heaven is, to say the least, neither unscriptural or irrational.

We always think of heaven as a state of perfection; not, indeed, of infinite knowledge and unlimited power; that would be a state of deification: but of moral and social perfection,—the perfection of finite and dependent creatures. It would be superfluous to show that the scriptures sanction such a view. Must we not then suppose, that all which is truly excellent and valuable in our present condition, will be renewed, refined and perpetuated in that higher and better state? We might, perhaps, be unable to decide, whether the resurrection of the body, and its re-union with the redeemed spirit, would contribute to the perfection of our future bliss; yet revelation has taught us that such will be the effect, and has gladdened us with the assured hope, that "this corruptible must put on incorruption." But can any one doubt, that the revival of the social affections, and the renewal of social intercouse, would tend to enrich, and heighten and multiply the joys of Heaven? It may be that the devoted Christian, whose heart yearns, and pants and struggles for the closest communion with his God and Savior, would rejoice in the anticipation of that communion, even though it were to be unshared and solitary. Were he to be an eternal recluse, and heaven an everlasting hermitage, his habitation would not be dark, nor desolate, nor cheerless, if the glory of God did illume it, and the Lamb was the light thereof. But while the Christian might rejoice in such a hope, would not his heart throb with warmer gratitude, and leap with a livelier joy, if he were to be assured that a multitude which no man can number, out of every kindred and tongue, and nation, and people, should mingle their sympathies and songs with his, in a mighty chorus of united praise? Would not the prospect of such society and assistance in the worship of God be even more delightful, than that of the resurrection of the body; if the latter could be expected without implying the former? Put the question to the most mature and spiritual Christian, and he will tell you, that in the season of his sweetest communion with God on earth, the spontaneous impulse of heart prompts him to share his blessedness with others of his kind, and the almost involuntary language of his lips is, "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together." And surely this strong social impulse cannot be gratified in a future world, without a knowledge of those with whom we are to mingle in duty and in devotion—without personal acquaintance and mutual recognition. Is it not then, a reasonable and a probable inference, that the occupations and enjoyments of the heavenly world will be sweetened by the pleasure of mutual recognition, and the allowed joys of holy friendship?

Is not this delightful idea implied in the very notion of a personal and conscious immortality? We need not stop to prove that the "immortality brought to light by the gospel" is a personal and conscious immortality. An immortal existence without this—without the recognition of myself, and the remembrance of my previous existence and acts—instead of being the blessed boon which the gospel offers, would be a poor and pitiful gift, scarcely preferable to absolute annihilation, and hardly deserving a thankful acceptance. But if each one is to know himself, cannot each one make himself known to others? Surely he can do so, if there be any society, any communion of soul with soul. And if the power exists, we must suppose it will be gladly exercised; and that the exercise of it will constitute no unimportant ingredient in the happiness of heaven.

Is there anything in the Bible which contradicts these cheering conjectures? If there is, we must relinquish and reject them, however fondly our hearts may have clung to and cherished them. If there is not, we may at least harbor the hope that they are founded in truth, and destined to be confirmed by a blissful and everlasting experience. We think there is nothing in the word of God which forbids or even discourages such a hope. When the Sadducees came to our Savior, to perplex him with their cunning questions concerning the resurrection, he might have avoided the whole difficulty at once, by telling them that in the resurrection they neither love or recognize each other; but he only says, "in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage." May we not say that he tacitly admitted the doctrine of recognition, by neglecting so appropriate an opportunity of teaching the contrary doctrine?

But our faith and hope need not lean upon so slender and slippery a hope as this: for there are various doctrines and declarations of Scripture, which manifestly favor, if they do not imply the truth of the sentiment in question. The Bible not only asserts that God, "will render to every man according to his works," but it also teaches us, that he will vindicate the righteousness and impartiality of this retribution, by a formal, general, and public judgment. But if they who are to be thus publicly tried, and condemned or acquitted, are to be unacquainted with each other, will not the very design of the judgment be defeated? That design must be of a public, and, if we may use such an expression, of a governmental character; for the searcher of hearts cannot himself need either evidence or confession. But such a design can be accomplished only by a public process, in which character shall be unmasked and exhibited. Such an exhibition must lead to mutual recognition, even if that recognition does not take place till then; and it is not to be supposed that the mutual knowledge of each other which the saints will thus gain, will be subsequently annihilated or forgotten.

For the scriptures represent heaven as pre-eminently a state of knowledge. Where Paul informs us that "knowledge shall vanish away," he evidently refers to those miraculous gifts of knowledge, with which the primitive Christians were endowed for a temporary purpose, and which have already "vanished away." He expressly tells us that our future state will be one of such enlarged and accurate knowledge, as shall make our present imperfect and limited perceptions, seem in comparison, like looking through a dim and dusky glass. Shall we not then enjoy a much more intimate acquaintance, and a much more direct communication with each other, than we have ever experienced or imagined in our present state?

Even now, the circumstances, not only of the church at large, but of individual christians, are well known and deeply interesting to the angelic inhabitants of heaven.—Do they not rejoice over one sinner that repenteth? "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Surely they who know us now, will both know and be known hereafter. And can it be thought, that the knowledge of each other which will be granted to different orders of beings, will be denied to different individuals of the same order? No, the Savior has assured us, that we shall be "as the angels of God in Heaven."

We may add, that there are various passages of Scripture which seem to convey something more than a mere intimation, that they who on earth have known and loved each other as the disciples of Christ, shall not be utter and everlasting strangers in the world to come. Our Savior represents Lazarus as being carried by angels to Abraham's bosom. This is a parable to be sure: but may we not fairly infer from that expression, that all "who walk in the steps of the faith of Abraham" shall hereafter know this father of the faithful, and friend of God? And if they know him must they not also know each other? Does it not seem that David cherished this belief, when he said of his departed child, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me?" The apostle exhorts his brethren at Thessalonica not to "sorrow, concerning them which are asleep, even as others which have no hope;" reminding them that those who sleep in Jesus shall be raised at his coming, and those who are alive shall be caught up together with them in the clouds that both may be forever with the Lord.—"Wherefore," he concludes "comfort one another with these words." Perhaps this is the most direct and decisive of all the Scriptures that relate to this subject. The apostle seems here to give us a specific warrant for comforting bereaved saints with the assurance of a joyful re-union with the pious dead. In the same epistle, too, he thus addresses himself to those who had been converted under his ministry: "what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?—For ye are our glory and joy." Could this be said with truth, unless the Apostle were to recognize his converts at the coming of Christ? The entire church, comprehending believers in all ages, is often spoken of as one body, united to a common Lord, and related to each other by intimate and endearing ties. And, to refer to only one more passage, the redeemed are represented in the Apocalypse as uniting in a song of praise to their Redeemer, and saying, "Thou art worthy—for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests." This passage certainly implies a recollection on the part of the redeemed, of the circumstances of their previous existence; and it no less implies their union in acts of associated devotion—a union which seems almost necessarily to involve the idea of personal acquaintance. It would be easy to multiply citations, in which this truth seems either to be intimated, or else presupposed. But we think quite enough has been said to verify the assertion, that a belief of this consoling doctrine is neither contrary to reason, nor at variance with Scripture.

We cannot forbear to refer briefly to one practical benefit of this pleasing belief—the definite and lively character which it gives to our hope of heaven. It should undoubtedly be the chief cause of the Christian's exultation in the prospect of "the glory that it is to be revealed," that he shall be brought into nearer communion and closer conformity with his God and his Savior. But there is a mysterious uncertainty in regard to the mode of that communion; and the thought of the awful majesty of Jehovah, chastens and solemnizes, if it does not sometimes almost rebuke his desire to enter into the rest that remaineth for the people of God. In his Savior, it is true, he contemplates the Divine Majesty tempered and softened by its union with a nature like his own; but still it is the Divine Majesty, and the overwhelming sense of immeasurable inferiority, though it may enhance his gratitude, will yet unavoidably repress the delightful familiarity of personal intercourse. In the society of angels, he may indeed find companions that are less removed from the level of his rank; but he cannot think of them as possessing the peculiar sympathies and associations of his own human nature. But when he thinks of meeting in heaven those whom he has loved on earth, and of associating forever with them and with all the saints of old, with whom he has already held a sort of communion in their history and their writings; when he thinks of Abraham and David, of Paul and John, of Luther and Howard, as his everlasting companions; at once his hope assumes a more definite form; it is removed from the realm of the awful, the mysterious, and the supernatural, and made the object of distinct vivid thought. With these he can feel an unrestrained sympathy, and hold an unreserved intercourse. The future now presents itself to his anticipations, clothed in the familiar garb of nature, reality, and experience. As one after another of his pious friends go before him to share the joys of the blessed above, he feels that his future home is gaining additional attractions, that the ties which bind it to his heart are multiplying and strengthening; and that he is already a citizen of that holy and happy community, only waiting a few days for his passports to admit him to a full participation of their unspeakable joys.

This distinct and lively hope gives him additional energy of soul for the great work of preparation for heaven, and thus mightily aids him in becoming meet to join "the spirits of the just made perfect." Reader, hast thou such a hope? If thou hast not, will not this attractive aspect of heaven allure thee to seek salvation? If thou hast, will it not fill thy heart with grateful rapture, and lead thee to redouble thy diligence in purifying thyself from sin, and becoming meet for the inheritance of the saints in light?

HIDINGS OF GOD'S FACE.

God hides himself even from the souls of his people. You could not have anticipated this; for are not his chosen, the people of his love, said to dwell in the secret place of the Most High? "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Intimate is their communion with God, clearer than that of others their understanding of his will and purposes; dwelling in the inner shrine of the temple, they have nearer visions, closer audience, more divine and dazzling revelations; and yet oftentimes, their sun goes down when it is yet day,—a sudden cloud covers them, a strangeness comes over them, and the singular spectacle is exhibited of children groping in darkness after a father who has withdrawn himself, and who is the same kind father still! To whom on earth would God reveal himself, if not to the members of Christ's mystical body? Where would light fall, if not in the Goshen of his chosen ones? And yet oft o'er that fair and blessed land came an alienation and a darkness when the cloud of the pillar, radiant with light and love, was eagerly expected. Yes! sometimes when God's own saints have risen at break of day, and got up on their high places, and reared their votive altars, and placed them in the attitude of receiving the first beams of the Son of Righteousness, the morning hath not broken, the stars hath disappeared, and the sun not risen, or risen begirt with the clouds and haloes of wrath! To describe the fearful estrangement consequent on the temporary withdrawal of God's countenance, is what we may not attempt. Perhaps you, yourselves, have seen instances of such an alienation. You have seen a soul under its father's frown, losing all sense of peace, all hope of glory, all feeling of divine love, forgetting all its past sweet communings and aspirations after immortal life, esteeming its conversion a delusion, its bygone deliverances a dream, remembering nought but its sense of sin and dread of sin.

"You have heard the strong cry of such a soul's agony; you have seen the bitter tears wherewith such a God-forsaken spirit has moistened its midnight pillow; you may have heard of a mighty poet, of whom the world was not worthy, and who had known God before, as his true children only know him, and who yet for long years awoke each morning to think of God as an enemy, and lay down each night to dream visions of eternal fire! And oh! when we think of such cases,—and they occur every day,—how forcibly are the words impressed upon us, "Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself even from thine own people, though thou art their God and their Savior."—[illegible]

EXPERIMENTAL.

A LITTLE GIRL AND AN INFIDEL SHOEMAKER.

There was a bright, intelligent little girl—said the Rev. Mr. Kirk, in a sermon to youth—who resided near by an infidel shoemaker. This shoemaker was a man of extensive information, but he was an infidel. He won the affections of this little girl, by the many stories with which he used to entertain her. It was her greatest delight to go and sit upon his knee and hear his pretty stories.

At length this little child became hopefully pious. She was praying for a new heart, and the Savior she hoped, answered her prayer and gave her a heart to love him. The first thing she thought of after joy broke into her mind, was to go right to the shoemaker and tell him what happiness she had found. She knew not that he was an infidel—she only knew that he was her friend, and she supposed that he would be glad to hear how happy she had become. She went to him and told him all about her conversion—how she found out that she had a wicked heart—and how happy she felt now she had got a new one.

The infidel had long withstood the most powerful arguments and the most impressive appeals of the wise and the learned: but the unaffected story of this little child he could not withstand. It reached his heart and he began to think. The more he thought of what he heard from his little friend, the more anxious he became about himself, till he was finally led, a broken hearted, penitent sinner to the foot of the cross. Thus the weak things of the world are often chosen to confound the mighty.

A THOUGHT OF BUNYAN.—The most holy place was dark. It had no windows. Things were only seen by the light of the fire of the Altar: to show that God is altogether invisible but to faith. The holiest was built to show us how different our state in heaven will be, from our state on earth. We walk here by one light, the Word: but that place will shine more bright than if all the light of the world were put together. Even on the veil of the Temple were figures of cherubim, to show that as the angels wait on us here, so they will wait for us at the door of their heavens.—Bunyan.

TRUTH'S CHANNEL.—"The intellect is the channel by which truth enters into and dwells in the heart. It is when the intellect is calm and enlightened by the Spirit of God, that conviction is deep. Convictions must, if smothered, rise again. They are buried alive, and will and must have a resurrection. True conviction drives to Christ, and gives the sinner no rest till the peace of God is established in the conscience. There is no grave for sin but in the bosom of Immanuel: there it dies eternally."—Hewels.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

"HE THAT WINNETH SOULS IS WISE."

The great object of our life, as Christians, being the conversion of fellow men, we should seek earnestly for the most successful means of accomplishing this great purpose. No little wisdom is required on the part of the believer, in order that he may meet the opposition and overcome the prejudice against the gospel, excited in the hearts of his fellow men. It is not every moment that you can obtain access to them, and that time is to be chosen when pride is the most silent, and of course, conscience the most active. There is much, also, in the manner; so far from producing a good impression in favor of Christianity, upon the irreligious, some professors, by their stern, unfeeling manner of address, and uninviting appearance, rather add to the contempt with which religion is regarded.

The best subject for the Christian to introduce at such times, is his own personal experience. If you attack the prejudices of opinions of a man openly, he may worst you in argument, and strengthen his own infidelity; but if you speak of that, which relates to your own consciousness; of the practical results of the gospel upon yourself; of your present enjoyment, and positive assurance of future bliss, he cannot call your statements into question, but must allow, in your case at least, the efficacy of religion. We have seen the infidel weep at the simple relation of a Christian's triumphant death, who would have scorned religion in the abstract.

Much may be learned from the following incident, in the life of that exemplary, missionary, Henry Martyn. It would be well for all Christians to imitate his manner of overcoming prejudice; their influence upon their unconverted friends would be the more increased.

By taking an interest in the worldly affairs of the irreligious, we may, oftentimes win their attention to their eternal destinies; by always rebuking sin, yet doing it in private, and with so much meekness, as that it cannot be restrained, we obtain an advantage over them, that they can but acknowledge, and by affability and Christian deportment, we shall eventually overcome the most bitter prejudices, and obtain the confidence of those, who before despised the gospel and its supporters.

"Not long since, Mr. G., riding in a coach in England, fell in with a British officer, who had spent many years in the East Indies, where, in the course of conversation, the name of Martyn was introduced. The officer said he had heard much of him while in the East, and was particularly interested in his conduct toward the commander of his regiment to which he was to act as chaplain. Mr. Martyn's name had gone before him to Calcutta, and as soon as the commander heard whom he was to have for a chaplain, he declared with an oath that as for himself he would never give attentions to a Methodist. The chaplain, immediately after his arrival, was informed of the prejudices of the officer under whom he was to act, and determined at once to remove, if possible, what would necessarily be a great hindrance in the way of his doing good to the soldiers. Finding that the commander would not call on him, nor show him any respect, he resolved at once to make the first advance. He was received formally, and kept at a distance. But without noticing the incivility, he began in a most respectful manner to speak of the fine state of discipline in which he found the troops under the officer's command. The officer replied, that it had been his endeavor to put his soldiers in the best condition. Mr. M. remarked it was very gratifying to himself to see the efficiency of the command, and that he hoped the fine state of the army would tend to preserve the peace of the country, by proving to the natives the superiority of British power. The officer said he took pride in the discipline and appearance of his men, and was happy to find that the result of his efforts struck the eye of a stranger. Mr. M. then remarked that he had called to make his acquaintance, because in the course of his duties as chaplain, it might often be necessary to refer to the commanding officer for advice and assistance, and he hoped to have the privilege of consulting him when it should be necessary. After the interview the officer was met by another, to whom he said, 'I have had a visit from our chaplain.' 'Well, did he annoy you with his religion?' 'I was disappointed in the man; he is well educated and polite, and he pleased me much by the notice he took of my troops. I had not intended to notice him, but now I think I shall call on him.' He did so, and having his agreeable impressions strengthened by farther conversation, which was continued on the subject of the army and the political state of Indiana, &c., determined to invite him to dinner in company with officers of the army. Mr. M. did not say much at the dinner, but treated all with politeness. The commander was very profane, and whenever he swore Mr. M. looked grieved, but was silent. After dinner, while the commander stood alone near a window, he went to him and entered into conversation, and after a time remarked with the utmost meekness that he trusted he might be allowed to say that profane swearing was a bad habit. The officer was a little confused, but at once replied that the habit was one which military men were apt to fall into, but that it was certainly very improper to indulge it, especially in the presence of a clergyman. Mr. Martyn pointed upward and replied, 'The sin is not against me. The account is to be rendered to one higher.' 'Certainly,' said the officer, 'the thing is not to be defended.' After this he acknowledged to a friend his interest in Mr. M., 'for,' said he, 'he altogether disappointed me. I thought him a harsh, rough man, but he is gentle and polite, and very interesting in conversation. He reproved me for swearing, but he did it with such kindness and meekness that I could not resent it.' He admitted Mr. M. into his confidence, and enjoyed the benefit of his instructions and example, and after a time gave proof of being a converted man, and made a profession of Christ before the world. When he heard of the death of Mr. Martyn he wept like a father mourning over his son."

Come, for all things are now ready. LUKE xiv. 17.

And him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out. JOHN vi. 37.

CHRIST, in his gospel sweetly invites every convinced sinner to come unto him, promising he will in no wise cast out: for all things are now ready: Hear, sinner, the blessed invitation, it is your Savior calls; his arms are extended for your reception. Delay not, but fly unto him; cast yourself upon him, even at the foot of his cross; and, like the humble publican, cry, God be merciful to me a sinner: and depend upon it, he will not thrust you away. Remember, when in the days of his flesh, he healed ALL that come unto him; and think you, now he is in glory, he is not as willing to save? Yes, he declares he will save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him. Perhaps you want ability:—cry unto him, and he will make you able. Let no carnal reasoning or excuses whatever, prevent your speedy acceptance of the gospel call: plead not that you are too unworthy to come to Jesus; it is he alone can qualify you to be a welcome guest at the marriage supper. He has blood to pardon, and righteousness to justify your soul; flee then to him, since he says, Come for all things are ready.

The bridegroom calls, make no delay,
Haste to the marriage feast;
Jesus invites; with speed obey,
And join the heavenly guest.

THE GOSPEL OFFER TO ALL.

Infinite wisdom alone knows what will be the ultimate character of any man. We can not say that the worst man before God at this moment may not hereafter be converted into one of his best servants. We know not what mercy may be provided for many that are now far off indeed from the Lord, or how they may be "made willing in the day of his power." The language of the gospel is plain, "Whosoever willeth let him come;" and there is no sinner living who longs to fly to Christ, whom the sacred volume does not invite to seek refuge in Him from the wrath to come. We are very imperfect and short sighted creatures, and are totally ignorant of the designs of the Most High. I may see a very wicked man, and say that he is in the road to hell. But the same might have been said of Saul when he persecuted the Church of Christ, and longed to be the murderer of every saint. Yet unexpectedly to all the disciples, a miracle of grace was to take place in this slayer of Christians; and what a wonderous change was completed in him to the praise and glory of God! How shall this encourage ministers to preach the gospel to "every creature" in the world, and to tell all sinners that if they live and die in their present state they must be lost forever, but that if blest with repentance, and enabled to seek forgiveness of sins through Christ Jesus, vile as they are, there is "redemption in his blood" according to the riches of his grace and mercy. We have no business to make distinctions. There never will be a man sent away from the judgment seat of Christ into the regions of despair, who will not be made to acknowledge that his own stubbornness alone cast him down there. Blessed be God it is not decreed that we shall be lost because we were born in sin. Yet we can hardly fathom the mystery of the salvation of some, and the condemnation of others. But I find my way very plain, and I mean to labor for the conversion of souls as long as I can. My business is to alarm sinners in their danger; not to bring this man and that man, but all, to see their awful state and their need of Christ: not to be looking for signs of election, but to teach that he is willing to come, has the sweetest and safest evidence thereof that can be enjoyed, for he never would have been willing, if God had not made him so. You who hear the alarming words of warning and still continue hardened, give an awful proof that you are rejected of God, while your rejection of his counsels makes your condemnation just; yet hardened as you have been, when once your hearts are softened by the power of divine grace, the Lord is ready to blot out your sins by the precious blood of Christ. Hence we have nothing to do but to tell the world, in the fullest language of free grace, "Behold there is set before you an open door, which no man can shut."—Revelation iii. 8.—Rowland Hill.

STUDY HARD.—Study hard, and search diligently and deeply, and that with unwearied patience and delight. Unpleasant studies tire and seldom prosper. Slight running thoughts seldom accomplish little. If any man think that the Spirit is given to save us the labor of hard and long studies, Solomon hath spent so many chapters in calling them to dig, search, cry, labor, wait for wisdom, that if that will not undeceive them I cannot: they may as well say, that God's blessing is to save the husbandman the labor of ploughing and sowing; and that the Spirit is given to save men the labor of learning to read the Bible, or to hear it, or think of it, or pray to God. Whereas the Spirit is given us to provoke and enable us to study hard, and read, and hear, and pray hard, and to prosper us herein.—Baxter.

EFFICACY OF PRAYER.—What is it that burst asunder Peter's chains? The prayer of the Saints in the house of Mary, (Acts xii. 12.) What was it that shut and opened the windows of heaven at will? Elijah's prayer. And what did prayer effect in heaven—Jacob's hand? "As a prince he had power with God and prevailed."

THE VALUE OF TIME.

Any thing on this subject may excite the inquiry, Why a subject on which there is such a general agreement, should be introduced to the attention of our readers? In reply to this question, we say it is not because the value of time is not generally admitted; but because while it is admitted, it is either not sufficiently felt, or because those impressions are not so abiding as to lead to a due and proper improvement of this precious gift of God. It is not sufficient that the thoughts should be occasionally turned to the brevity of human life, and the great purposes that life should answer, and that the understanding should assent to the dictates of wisdom respecting the right improvement of time. But duty and interest require, that every day, and hour, and moment, should be used to the best possible advantage to secure a glorious inheritance in another world—to lay up a treasure in Heaven imperishable in its nature, and which will be given to the truly worthy at the resurrection of the just. No life is too long for the accomplishment of this great object. Neither is any too short if time is properly improved, and the Kingdom of Heaven is sought seasonably, in faith, and in preference to all created good. But the waste of time with which every class of society is chargeable, is truly astonishing! The young are unconscious of its worth—and the morning of life when the spirits are buoyant, and when existence like the spring, is in bloom, is too frequently wasted in thoughtlessness, and the moments are lashed into speed by impatience that the goal of maturity may be reached—where imagination paints scenes of higher amusement and pleasure. By the young, it is assumed that there are many years in prospect, and that the more valuable objects of life may be secured seasonably, though they should be neglected at present. With these views, habits of procrastination are formed, which, too frequently, render many lives useless, and wretched in the end. The various active duties and cares attending a maturer age, are urged as good reasons for deferring attention to the immediate welfare of the soul, to an advanced age; the uncertainty of life, and all God has said respecting His displeasure with the wicked, and the doom of those who die impenitent, notwithstanding. Nor are those who have learned to reason and practice thus, more economical of time when they become old. Having sacrificed so much, and so long at the shrine of vanity, and so long inured themselves to the waste of time; they are induced to look upon a few days, or years which may remain to them, as long, when compared to a long life already spent to little or no good purpose. Thus—

"The hoary fool who many days
Has struggled with continued sorrow,
Renews his hope, and fondly lays
The desperate bet upon to-morrow."

To-morrow comes;—'tis noon—'tis night;
This day, as all the former, flies;
Yet on he goes to seek delight
To-morrow, till to-night he dies."

The waste of time can never be fully retrieved Though there may be indescribable regrets felt in the retrospect of months and years, which bear their testimony to the indolence and prodigality, folly and perfidy, of those who have misapplied, or squandered, or murdered those moments which should have been devoted to the service of God—to the objects of philanthropy, and to the securing an unfading crown; yet they have exerted an influence which may never be fully counteracted. Though repentance and faith may bring the soul into union with God, what deep anguish must accompany the reflection that so many advantages for usefulness to others, and for acquiring spiritual maturity have been thrown away—that Christ has been so long rejected, the counsels of the Most High so long contemned, and the hands of the wicked so much strengthened by evil examples! Reader is it not

'Greatly wise to talk with your past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven!
And how they might have borne more welcome news!'

A little time is left you, Will you not redeem it! The past you cannot redeem—the future you may not enjoy. How, oh! how will you spend the present! the precious present! Shall it tell in your submission to God—in acts of duty done! or, with trumpet-tongue in the Judgment day, shall it tell of your supineness in reference to the paramount duties of life, your opposition to God, and your suicidal behavior! If you are a professed christian, How will you avoid the frowns of your Judge, and the guilt of your fellow's blood, if you remain "at ease in Zion!" or, how can it be said to you in the last day, "well done," if you do not redeem the present time in the objects of your holy calling! Are you still impenitent! How long has God waited to be gracious to you! and will you not now repent! Fly, oh! fly, from sin—from wrath—from hell while it is an "accepted time," and a "day of salvation." Fly to the Redeemer—accept the bliss of pardon—of life eternal. He calls you. Are you heavy laden? He will give you rest." Are you guilty! His "blood cleanseth from all sin." Are you old and hardened in sin? Look at the condescension of the God-man —the sufferings—the undying affections of the Incarnate Jesus, till the adamant is broken, till the heart melts in deep contrition for having abused such love. His grace will be victorious in your salvation. Come in then at the "eleventh hour." "COME FOR ALL THINGS ARE NOW READY." Are you young! Then are you the subjects of the divine solicitude. "I love them that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me." Are you indifferent! Then sudden destruction may be near. Indifference is the forerunner of ruin to the ungodly, as penitence and grief for sin precede deliverance to those who seek God. "He that, being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." Reader! know the time "that now it is time to wake out of sleep."

"TOO MUCH RELIGION IN IT—STOP IT."

A person who had subscribed for the Register some months since, came into our office the other day, and proposed paying up and discontinuing, offering as a reason for so doing, that there was "too much religion in the paper." "Too much religion," thought we! "too much religion!" how can this be? Had it been alledged that there were defects in the paper, and in the religious department among the rest, it would not have been surprising, but that expression, "too much religion," How shall we understand it? Does it imply that the amount of religious matter is so great as to leave too little room for general Intelligence? If our friend wished us to understand him thus: we wish him to take the trouble of comparing the Register with other papers, and we trust he will find there is not, after all, so great a deficiency as he may have supposed, either in amount or variety. If we are to understand him to complain of the absence of party politics, we would remind him of the fact that the paper has always disclaimed any "political character." The demand for matter of this description is fully supplied in the numerous political prints of the day. But is there not a possibility of having too much politics, as well as "too much religion?" Seldom is such a complaint heard, if heard at all. It is difficult to give a man too much of that which is pleasant to him. We are sure that some religion is necessary for every one, and in conducting the Register, we have endeavored to the best of our ability, to disseminate wholesome religious truth with reference to the immortal interests of our readers. We should be glad to benefit and please the public. But newspaper affairs aside, this expression of "too much religion," is entirely inadmissible. If religion is defined to mean Supreme love to God, a fraternal regard for our fellow men, a principle productive of justice, mercy, truth and probity, there can be no redundancy of it.—Those who have tasted the sweets of religion, know it is impossible to possess too much of it. Those who are unacquainted with its excellencies, are not proper judges of its merits and benefits. Too sure an evidence of the forgiveness of sins, and of eternal salvation? IT CANNOT BE. Too much resignation, and too full an assurance that underneath the sufferer in the trying hour, when "flesh and heart fail," are the everlasting arms? IMPOSSIBLE. Sooner could the miser possess too much gold to suit his desires! Sooner might all the laws of nature be reversed, than for the hold of the dying man on the promises of God to be too firm. We wish our readers to possess the exact kind, and amount of religion which is best for them, and no more. But we wish them to decide upon that kind and amount which is desirable, in the light of eternity. If they possess the true religion of the Bible, we opine they will not be burdened with the amount. If destitute of this, What will every thing else avail them? Reader, we pray you examine your standing before God, and determine whether you have any religion to prepare you for death, and the bliss of Heaven.

The article on our first page on Camp-Meetings, appears to have been candidly written. We hope it will be perused with equal candor. We take no sides on the question, but will endeavor to hold an even balance, and render equal and exact justice to all. Should a reply be offered, we hope it will be in a kind and christian spirit. In this way controversy may do much to elicit truth, and harmonize the views of Christians.

ABOLITIONISM AT THE SOUTH.

We were quite surprised in looking over the Christian Index, a Baptist paper, published in Washington, Georgia, to find in a communication over the signature of Rev. James McDonald, dated Jacksonville, East Florida, Sept. 24, 1840, the following paragraph relative to the mischievous tendency of Abolitionism in that quarter:—"Persecution has raged against us, and the lion is still roaring. Many evils have been brought against us, and among them all, Abolition has stood forth like the spirit of the storm. We have been, and still are, totally and conscientiously at variance with Abolitionism. We do not like to complain since so many blessings accompany us, but we have stood on the brink of the crater, seen its flames ascending, and have escaped merely." If the above statement is correct and unexaggerated, Abolitionism has gained a firmer footing in East Florida than we had supposed to have been possible. And we have no room to doubt its correctness since it is made by a minister of the Gospel; one who frequently writes for that paper, and whose communications evince a good share of talent and information.

This announcement is the more extraordinary, as there have not been, to our knowledge, any efforts made to propogate Anti-Slavery sentiments there on an extensive scale; nor are we aware that facilities are enjoyed which would favor such efforts. We are equally at a loss to know how Abolitionism could so endanger the interests or standing of any portion of Zion. We are glad, however, that the danger has been passed, and we sincerely hope that nothing bearing the name of Abolitionism may be propagated to the detriment of religion, or to the annoyance of the church of God. We wish the writer had been more particular in his narrative, and would thank the Editors of the Index to give us a fuller account of this matter as soon as convenient. We have a strong desire to know more about it.

SNOW STORM.—On the Third-day of last week the snow commenced falling and continued without abatement till the latter part of the next day, when it had fallen nearly a foot deep. The storm then turned to rain which continued that night and all the next day, which dissolved the snow and swelled the streams higher than they have been known to be in the vicinity for many months. We entertained fears that extensive damages would be done in carrying away dams, bridges, &c., but as yet we have heard of none.

There is a great scarcity of news at present, the secular papers being almost exclusively occupied with political matters. In a week or two we hope it will be otherwise. We shall probably be able to give the result of the elections in several of the states in our next.

The Cincinnati Observer, and the Congregational Observer have seldom reached us of late. The publishers of these papers would confer a favor on us by continuing to exchange.

Zion's Watchman has been received very irregularly for some time past. Will Bro. Sunderland remember us in future?

REVIVAL RECORD.

REVIVAL.

Brother N. V. Hull, in a letter to one of the Editors of the Register, says, "I have been attending a protracted meeting in Bennington, Genesee Co., fourteen miles from Clarence Hollow, which has resulted in a glorious revival of religion. Some fifty have been professedly converted and reclaimed." It is truly cheering to receive news of this nature at any time, but especially when revivals are so rare as at present. If ministers and christians throughout the country, would address themselves to their respective duties with proper zeal and spirit, How frequent would revivals and conversions be witnessed! And how mightily would the word of God grow and prevail! We sincerely hope we may often have the pleasure of spreading the news of the triumphs of Divine Grace before our readers, and that intelligence of this kind may stimulate each individual disciple of the Lord Jesus to greater diligence in his holy vocation, and encourage many to seek the pearl of great price.

REVIVALS.

On an examination of the statistics of the churches in Massachusetts, for the year ending December 1838, we find that, of 252 churches, there were 160 which appeared by the returns to have been going on in the usual manner, from year to year, without revivals; and in these churches, the additions, on profession of faith, fell one sixth short of the number of deaths and excommunications; so that if they continue in their present state, they must, in process of time, become extinct, and the curse of the Lord be written upon their ruins:—"Wo unto them when I depart from them." In the same churches, the number of infant baptisms is about three times that of the additions by profession; so that if they continue in this state, two-thirds of their own children must die in their sins, and be forever lost. In eighty-six other churches, which seemed to have enjoyed a little more than ordinary prosperity, the additions a little exceed the deaths, excommunications and baptisms; while in thirty-six others, which were blessed with decided revivals, the additions are more than twice as great as in these eighty-six, and more than five times as great as in the 160; and in these which have enjoyed revivals, the number added is nearly three times as great as the whole number of deaths, excommunications and baptisms, so that they have made a decided advance upon the world.

The statistics of 1819, the last that have been published, examined in a manner somewhat different, bring us to a result nearly similar. The number of additions by profession, is 1988. Of these, 1133 are in sixty-two churches; and 927 of these in twenty-two churches; and but 555 in 198 of the churches. The whole number of deaths, is 635, and of excommunications seventy-one, making a decrease of 706; which on an average, would give to these 198 churches a diminution about equal to their increase. The whole number of infant baptisms, is 1532, giving an average to the 198 churches of 1091, or nearly twice the number of their additions. There are also out of these 198, forty-four churches which have received no additions, in which there have been eighty-three deaths; so that there are forty-four, which, according to the average number of members, are diminishing about at the rate of one whole church every two years.

The conclusions to which we arrive from these facts, are the following:

1. That the special outpourings of the Holy Spirit, as experienced in those seasons denominated revivals of religion, furnishes the only ground of hope that the cause of Christ will make any decided advance among us.

2. That revivals of religion must be more general, more powerful, and more frequent, than they have ever yet been, in order to secure this result, in any measure commensurate with the moral necessities of our land and world.

3. That those churches, which continue from year to year, without any general outpourings of the Holy Spirit, in the revival of religion, as the majority of the churches do, have nothing better to expect than that not only the unconverted around them, but a large proportion, (probably more than half,) even of their own children, must perish; and that in process of time, their candlesticks will be removed, and they as Christian churches, become extinct.

These are appaling considerations, which it seems to us, should awaken a spirit of serious inquiry and deep humiliation among the people of God. We do not mean to assert that Christians can have a revival of religion at any time by being willing to have it, nor by setting in operation any machinery to produce it. But there is certainly an established connection between the prevailing state of feeling, spirit of prayer, and faithful discharge of Christian duty, and the blessing of God, which renders the withholding of that blessing, for any considerable time, an evidence of something wrong in the church, which calls for the deepest humiliation and the most heart-searching inquiry. And, we cannot but feel that every member of a church so situated, should deeply sympathize with the apostle Paul, in his "great heaviness and continual sorrow of heart," which he had in behalf of his impenitent kinsfolk. And now, we trust that those churches which have been blessed during this year, [illegible] the [illegible] of God's presence, and that they will expect and seek still greater blessings the year to come. And we rejoice, also, to [illegible] that [illegible] indications exist in many churches which were not specially blessed last year [illegible] of them what [illegible] and we [illegible] way we may not hope that the coming year may be truly a year of the right hand of the Most High in our churches.

Tracts blessed to an old man in Burmah.—Two years ago a Burman came along in a boat near Pantanau, on the Irrawaddy, four days' journey from Rangoon, and proposed to a [illegible] man to sell him four little books. As he could read Burmese, he purchased them with two large bunches of plantains. They proved to be "The Sheaf of Grace," and "The Golden Balance," which the Burman probably received from missionaries. He read the books and they told him about the great God. He was not satisfied. He had heard that the Karens at Maubee, an out station of the mission, forty miles north of Rangoon, had received "a new religion." The old man made his way to Maubee, through the wilderness, exposed to wild beasts and robbers; obtained light, gave up all his former customs, embraced the gospel with all his heart, and for one year has been a faithful consistent Christian with all his house. He has been the means of the conversion of several individuals in the vicinity.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Striking Effects of Tracts in a Burman Village.—At a village, a day's journey from Pantanau, Rev. E. L. Abbot says: The people flocked together, old men and children, to express their joy at my arrival. After some conversation, I asked them how many had embraced the Christian religion? 'All! all! every one of us!' was answered from forty voices. We sung a hymn of praise to God. On inquiry, I found that the first they heard of the gospel was [illegible] years ago from Burmese tracts, which they obtained from the Burmans. Some began to worship God from that time, but not having sufficient light they still practised some of their former customs. Two years ago some of the old men visited Maubee, obtained further instruction, and became more consistent in their religious life. Eight or nine months since, another deputation was sent to visit the Maubee church; learned to read; obtained books, and returned, and became missionaries to their neighbors. I have seen several of the old men in Rangoon, and two of the assistants have spent a few of the last months in these villages. For the last six months there has been a general "turning to the Lord," so that at present there are very few who are willing to acknowledge themselves heathen.—N. Y. Evangelist.

MORE GOOD NEWS.

DEAR BROTHER WALLER:—The Lord is still blessing us at this place. We baptized 21 yesterday—met last night, and received six more for baptism, and also one at the afternoon meeting. Prospects are still flattering. Glory to the name of the Lord. The mantle of our association seems to have fallen on the churches. The Macedonian cry is heard from many a quarter. O, that I were an host, then would I work to my heart's content. I often have to lament over the dryness, coldness, and barrenness of my preaching. O, that my head were waters, &c., is my cry. O, that I could feel more. I had rather weep and pray over and with poor penitent souls one hour, than to enjoy a whole lifetime finding fault with brethren for aiding Missionaries, Sunday Schools, Bible Societies, Temperance, &c. Wonder how I can feel so.—You will hear glorious news from the Franklin association—thrice glorious to the name of the Lord.

Dear brother, pray for me. Will my brethren, upon their knees, pray for me, that the Lord would grant me that humility and tenderness of heart for which my soul so ardently pants. Adieu. J. D. BLACK.

Stamping Ground, Ky., Sept. 27, 1840.
THE REVIVAL CONTINUES!

DEAR BROTHER WALLER:—The good work of the Lord is triumphing gloriously here. The Lord has astonished both his friends and his enemies at this place. Our meeting yesterday (Lord's day) presented one of the most interesting scenes I ever witnessed. We met at 10 o'clock to spend an hour in prayer and conversation. Before those exercises closed, converts pressed forward to join the church without an invitation. There was no time for preaching. Our time was spent in hearing happy converts relate their hope in Christ, rejoicing with fathers, mothers, wives, husbands, sisters, brothers, &c.; weeping over and praying for poor penitent souls. Occasionally making pungent appeals to the astonished crowd, until eighteen were added by experience. After this, we repaired to the water, and baptized forty willing converts—returned and met at night, and received seven more, in the presence of a crowded house. O, for more humility, more grace, more self-denial, and more gratitude! Glory, glory, glory, honor, praise, and power, be unto the name of the Lord. Amen and amen.

About 100 have united since the commencement of this good work. Adieu.
J. D. BLACK.

Long Meadow.—Twenty-nine persons have recently united with the church in Long Meadow, Mass., most of them the fruits of a recent revival in that place.—Cong. Observer.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Commerce.
LONDON, Sept. 11th, 1840.

The year 1840 was predicted to be a memorable year, but more particularly for France. The ancient prophecy of the East placed the fatal year of Mahommedan doom in 1256 of the Hegira—which corresponds with the year 1840. It is therefore singular that circumstances should now be transpiring which would almost warrant a belief in the fulfilment of the prophecy; and certainly what is occurring appears enough to induce the weak and credulous again to think seriously of astrology and pay homage to all political seers. But whether the Old world is doomed or not during the present year, your citizens of the New one must feel deeply interested in the stirring and thrilling events that are daily and hourly coming to our notice; and if you are too enlightened to believe in predictions, it is impossible not to arrive at the conclusion, "the times are out of joint." Let us glance but for a moment, at the pursuits lately, and at present, of the European powers. England has been at war in Affghanistan, where her arms have been victorious—she is now at war with China, where here arms might fail. France has been for the last ten years, and is now at war in Algiers—she has been practising the game at Mexico, and extending her bellicose principles to Buenos Ayres. Russia is at war with the inhabitants of the Caucausus, and has just been driven back by the Khivans. Spain has recently terminated one civil war, and she is now plunged into another. Portugal is in arms against herself, and seems resolved to have all the infamous immorality of a suicide. The capitals of France, Spain, and Portugal, present a fearful spectacle—all the elements for the direst and most horrific anarchy appear to have burst their cerements—a sanguinary spirit has been unloosed—and the demon of revolution is stalking through monarchies. At this critical juncture a mighty satrap is to be humbled, who, defying his would be conquerors, ridicules their power, invites carnage, relies upon Allah, and swears to die with his dynasty.

Correspondence of the New York Express.
FROM SINGAPORE.
SINGAPORE, May, 20, 1840.

Since my former letter there have been further arrivals here from India of ships of war and transports with troops. There are assembled here the Wellesley 74 bearing the pendant of commander Sir Gordon Bremer; the Conway, 28; Leon, 18; Cruizer, 16; and Algerine, 10. Steamers Madagascar, Atalonia, Queen and Diana, and twenty transports containing the Cameronians, Royal Irish, Bengal Volunteers, (Sepoys) and a detachment of sappers and miners—in all about 3,000 troops. The Marion, transport ship with 20 tons of treasure and the staff on board, for which there has been great preparation, arrived to-day, dismasted, from Calcutta. Besides this, four other ships of war are expected from the Cape, under Admiral Elliott, who has been appoined Commander-in-chief from England. But owing to the approach of the Typhon season in the China Sea, orders have just been isued from the ships to prepare for sea on the 30th inst., and unless something turn up in the meantime, the whole division will sail for China on that day.

Every preparation in provisons and money has been made, and the Commissariat Department is highly spoken of. The privates have not been permitted to land, much to their disappointment: but the officers are fine looking young men full of spirit. Nothing has yet been rumored of their intention after they shall have reached the coast of China—and conjecture is as busy as ever. It is siad and believed by many, that the island of Chusan, in lat. 30 degs. is to be occupied and garrisoned for the present. Its proximity to the coast, and situation near the tea and silk country, offers great commercial advantages—and doubtless the Chinese, who are more mindful of Chusan becoming a British settlement, will flock there to "make bil pigeon"—more particularly as the "smoke ships" will be able to keep the war junks at a respectful distance.

SINGAPORE, 30th May, 1840.

I have to inform you of the actual departure of the first division of the China expedition this morning, under the command of Commodore Sir Gordon Bremer, in the Wellesley 74. A fleet, composed of upwards of thirty vessels of all classes—two steamers included—are now gallantly mooring up the straits towards the China seas, and in ten days the S. W. Mission will take stand up to near the entrance of the Bogue. It is now currently reported that the fortifications of the Bogue will be attacked and destroyed, in order to make an impression on the Chinese, and prepare to give a fair hearing to the Plenipotentiary appointed at home to come out for the purpose of Negotiating. How far this sort of proposition will induce the hearts of the sons of the "central land" to listen to the "talk" of the forthcoming "red haired men," remains to be seen, and I will not anticipate history with my own conjectures. It is remarkable enough to see some of the largest Chinese junks moving on in company and bound to China, as it were under their protection—so little idea of the dangers to be apprehended by the approaching collision between the British and themselves, do they seem to have.

And this, perhaps, shows as much as any thing, the little sympathy existing between the Chinese and their Government. It would appear as if they considered the quarrel as between the English and the Mandarins, or Servants, and a matter regarding them in no wise.

The new Admiral, Sir Gilbert Elliot, from the Cape, and the vessels of war have not yet arrived. Some other detachments of troops are expected from India. I may remain here some time longer, and shall not fail to communicate to you any matter of interest that may reach me.

Yours, &c.
AN AMERICAN TRAVELER.

SUMMARY.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

A report was recently offered and made public, of a Committee of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, appointed to consider the subject of the visit of the French frigate L'Artemise to the Sandwich Islands.

The Committee proposed the following resolution, which with the report was adopted by the Board.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board, no just ground of complaint existed against any of its missionaries in relation to the professed cause of the visit of the French frigate L'Artemise, to the Sandwich Islands in July, 1830.

It is not the business of your Committee to recommend to this Board, by any public act, to express their astonishment in respect to another branch of this subject, which however, was not one of the professed objects of the visit of Capt. Laplace to Honolulu, and which had therefore no necessary connection with the alleged persecution of the French missionaries, on their return to the Islands. It belongs to the civilized world properly to characterise the spectacle of the acknowledged representative of a great and powerful nation compelling a few defenseless islanders on whom the light of civilization was just beginning to dawn, by means of a treaty dictated at the cannon's mouth to renew the demoralizing traffic in ardent spirits, for the apparent benefit of French agriculture and French commerce. The fact that this traffic had been previously prohibited to the citizens and subjects of all nations, and that the enemies of your missionaries at Honolulu prevailed upon Capt. Laplace to insist upon its renewal with the subjects of France, as one of the treaty stipulations, your Committee apprehend accounts satisfactory for the many slanders which were heaped upon those missionaries there.—There can be but little doubt therefore that the original suspension of this traffic, in relation to which the American missionaries were known to have exerted an active influence, had a much greater influence in placing these faithful ministers of the cross out of the pale of that protection which the laws of civilized warfare always give to non-combatants, than all others combined, and that the commander of L'Artemise, if not the French government itself, was actually deceived by the false representations of those who were or wished to be engaged in a business, equally destructive to the temporal and eternal interests of the human race.

Mormon Conference!—This people held a conference at Nauvoo, on Saturday last which continued three days. It is estimated that there was not far from three thousand in attendance. A gentleman who was present, speaks in the highest terms of the appearance of the immense assemblage, and the good order which prevailed. The mild and humane laws of our State, and the tolerating and liberal principles which abound among our people are having their Society is not only increasing its numbers, but individually their condition is greatly improved, surrounded as they are expecting a large accession to their numbers in a short time from England—one of their preachers, a Mr. Turley, having met with distinguished success in that country.

John C. Kennet, Quarter Master General of Illinois, was baptized at Nauvoo, in the belief of the Latter Day Saints, (Mormon Faith) one day last week.—Quincy (Ill.) Whig.

The Hon. S. S. Prentiss, of Mississippi, who has been traveling through the northern part of this country, for some time past, in the course of his travels chanced to stop at Niagara Falls, accompanied by a favorite body servant, which he claimed as his property. The slave, however, took a different view of the matter, and finding himself so near her Majesty's dominions, felt a very great desire to view the same, nearer than he was, and accordingly crossed the river, and finding the country to realize his expectations, concluded to remain, without leave asking. The Hon. Senator proceeded on his way, wondering, probably, how the said slave could be so ungrateful as to leave such a happy situation as he was in. He has probably found out by this time, what he might have thought of before, viz:—that each man is the best judge of that which constitutes his happiness.—Chr. Reflector.

Resumption of Specie payments.—The resumption question occupies much attention. The great difficulty is the indebtedness of Philadelphia to the East, which amounts to about $6,000,000. Unless some satisfactory arrangement can be made on this important point, a general resumption, as before stated, is impossible. Our banks, even in the present reduced condition of their circulation, could not spare $3,000,000 with safety, so that any sudden demand for specie in New York and Boston would immediately lead to drafts upon this city, and to all the unpleasant consequences. An arrangement it is well known, has long been in progress, designed to change this immediate indebtedness of $6,000,000 into indebtedness on post notes, ranging from 12 to 18 months. Nearly all the Philadelphia banks have expressed a willingness to assist in the plan, by loans to the United States Bank. A fear, however, still exists in one or two timid quarters. It is, lest after the resumption under these circumstances, these post notes should be sent to Philadelphia and sold for bank notes and specie be demanded for the latter. Doubtless, however, our bank financiers will hit upon some expedients calculated to avoid this rock, and bring about the desirable consummation with regard to specie payments. —Bicknell's Register.

Pontifical States.—A Toulon correspondent of the Courier Francais, in mentioning the reported disturbances in the Papal States, says that the Pontfical Government has demanded the intervention of Austria.

A letter at the Philadelphia Exchange states that the line of rail road from Vicksburg to Jackson city, was passed over on the 25th of September for the first time by cars, and on the 1st of October fully opened for the transportation of passengers and merchandise.

New Seaport in Texas.—A Texas papper mentions the discovery of a new harbor at the 'West Pass' of Galveston Bay, about 25 miles from Galveston. A new city, called San Luis has been laid out on an island of that name, separated from the main land by a strait of 106 yards wide, over which a bridge is now in process of construction. The depth over the bar at low tide is 12 feet, and the harbor is said to possess great advantages over Galveston in regard to the facilities and safety in approaching it. The island of San Luis, it is said, is not liable to overflow, and the site is free from marshes. Lots have been sold at a good price. It is in contemplation to run a railroad, 14 miles long, from San Luis to the River Brazos.

Sale of L'Amistad and Cargo.—We learn from the New London Gazette of the 21st inst., that in pursuance of a decree of the Circuit Court, that famous vessel, the Amistad, together with her cargo, was, on Thursday last, sold by auction, under the direction of the marshal of the district, at the custom house in this city. An appraisal was had of vessel and cargo when the goods were first landed. We understand that the amount of that appraisal was about 6600 dollars, and that the gross sales will amount to within 4 or 500 dollars of that sum. The vessel was valued by the appraisers at 600 dollars, and sold for 245 dollars.

The Davis's Strait Whale Fishery has failed completely. The correspondent of the London Shipping and Mercantile Gazette writes from Peterhead, Sept. 30, that the Regalia Kerr, of Kirkaldy, from Davis's Straits, passed by that forenoon, clean, with intelligence of the complete failure of the fishery this season, and the loss of the whale ship Hecla. Among 20 vessels (stated as the whole number from the United Kingdom) heard from between July 9 and Sept. 19, there were only 6 fish; of 7 vessels heard from in September, one only had a fish.

Reverses of Fortune.—The U. S. Marshal who has just completed the census of Cincinnati, mentions these incidents:

I met a man who had ruined himself by intemperance, and was subsisting on charity, that I knew in Pittsburgh in the year 1815, owner of a fine property and store worth $50,000 at that time. The property alone, I have no doubt, would since have brought $150,000.

I found in the person of a day laborer in one of our foundries, a man who had once owned a large iron establishment in Scotland, on the Carron side. He had become involved with others, and rendered thereby insolvent. My sympathies were the more strongly excited here from the simple dignity which forebore repining or complaint, the family manifested in the case.

I found also the widow of a distinguished professor in an Eastern college, who was at the time eating her humble supper with her daughter, under such circumstances of penury, that their very table was formed of a board laid across an old barrel!

I have found in the city two cases of disparity of age between the oldest and youngest brother, worthy of notice. In one instance the oldest brother was 60, the youngest 25. In the other when the father was living, and aged 73 years, one brother was 46 and the other 2.

Exchange in Boston.—An attempt is being made to erect an exchange in Boston, on the site of the old State Bank, in Chesnut street. The cost is estimated at $310,000. All of which, except $60,000 has been subscribed.

Popular Increase.—The Cincinnati Chronicle estimates the number of votes polled in the late election in Ohio at 270,000 being 60,000 more than was ever polled in the state before.

A Cincinnati paper states, that four hundred miles of hogs were killed in that city the last year.

NOTICES.

The publishers of the Seventh-day Baptist Register, being desirous to contribute as much as possible to the advancement of the cause of Temperance, and believing that the establishment of houses for the accommodation of the traveling public on the principle of total abstinence from all that can intoxicate, highly conducive to that end: propose to open the columns of the Register, for the gratuitous insertion of notices or advertisements of all public houses, conducted strictly on the above principles of entire abstinence from all that can intoxicate, and after having inserted such notice or advertisement as long as in our judgment may be necessary, we propose to form a list of such houses and the places of their location, with the names of the proprietors, as a general directory for the benefit and convenience of those who may wish to patronize such houses.

In proffering our aid for the support of Temperance principles, we disclaim any hostility to those men throughout the country who keep houses for the public accommodation, and continue the traffic in intoxicating drinks. It is the practice we wish discontinued, without injury to any, and to the benefit of all. We are confident that those Inn-keepers who banish distilled and other intoxicating drinks from their houses, can be sustained, and will be sustained if Temperance men will be true to their avowed principles, and we doubt not they will prove themselves so, and patronize houses conducted on the above principles, if they are informed respecting their location and character. Keepers of public houses of the above description, who may please to avail themselves of our offer, may direct their communications, post paid, to the Editors of the Seventh-day Baptist Register, De Ruyter, Madison Co., N. Y., which will receive prompt attention. Publishers of newspapers, and especially those who are friendly to the Temperance cause, are respectfully requested to copy the above or the substance thereof, which favor will be cheerfully reciprocated.

MISS H. COLEGROVE would respectfully inform the Friends, and Patrons of her school, that she has furnished her room on Cortland street for a winter school, and is now ready to receive Scholars.

THE PHILADELPHIA MIRROR: A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND NEWS.

The subjects of this periodical will consist of original and selected tales, sketches, biography, essays, poetry, &c. &c. together, with a general synopsis of foreign and domestic news upon the cover.

SOMETHING TO BE CONSIDERED.—It is presumed that most persons who have subscribed to any of our large weekly newspapers are aware that it is next to impossible to preserve them in an unmutilated state, consequently we have adopted the present plan, by which we secure all the advantages of a newspaper, and still retain the conveniences of a periodical.

The body of this work will consist of what is termed literary matter, correctly arranged, and with the last number of each volume we shall publish an index of contents and title-page—issued in a convenient form for binding. The cover will consist of foreign and domestic news, notices of marriages, deaths, &c., and all subjects that generally comprise the news departments of weekly papers.

The proprietor has effected such arrangements as shall enable him to furnish choice productions from the prolific pens of most of our prominent writers.

TERMS.

The MIRROR is published every Saturday; each number will contain eight large quarto pages, enveloped in a finely printed cover, at the very low price of Two dollars and fifty cents per annum, payable in advance. No subscription received for a less period than one year. Postmasters and others who procure two subscribers, and remit Five Dollars to the proprietor, shall receive the Third copy gratis.

As two dollars and fifty cents, in many instances, is an inconvenient sum to remit by mail, therefore, if any person will send us two dollars, they will be credited that amount, and receive the work accordingly.

All orders addressed to the publisher, WM. B. ROGERS, No. 49 Chesnut street, Philadelphia, (post paid,) will receive immediate attention.

Editors of newspapers, by copying this prospectus, and sending a paper of the same to the office, shall receive the Mirror for one year.

Any money current in the respective states in which the subscribers may reside, will be received in payment for subscription at par.

POETRY.

From the British Magazine.

AUTUMNAL HYMN.

The leaves around me falling,
Are preaching of decay,
The hollow winds are calling—
"Come, pilgrim, come away!"
The day in night declining
Says I must too decline
The year its bloom resigning—
Its lot foreshadows mine!

The light my path surrounding,
The loves to which I cling,
The hopes within me bounding,
The joys that round me wing—
All, all, like stars at even,
Just gleam and shoot away,
Pass on before to heaven,
And chide at my delay.

The friends gone before me
Are calling me from high
And happy angels o'er me
Tempt sweetly to the sky.
"Why wait," they say, "and wither,
'Mid scenes of death and sin!
O rise to glory hither,
And find true life begin!"

I hear the invitation,
And fain would rise and come,
A sinner to salvation,
An exile to his home;
But while I here must linger,
Thus, thus, let all I see,
Point on with faithful finger,
To heaven, O Lord, and Thee!

AFRAID TO DIE.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

"And deliver them,—who through fear of death, were all their life-time, subject to bondage." HEB. ii. 15.

Afraid to die?—afraid to sleep
In earth, our tranquil mother's breast,—
Where snares and troubles vex no more—
And all the weary are at rest.

Afraid to die?—afraid to take
His hand, who trod the shadowy vale,
Who points to pastures fresh and green,
And living streams that never fail.

Afraid to die?—afraid to bear
The pang that but a moment tries,
And o'er the sway of pain and care,
Ascend the mansions in the skies.

Afraid to die?—afraid to leave
The cradle and the worthless toy,—
And take our ripened being's crown,
And soar to consummated joy.

Afraid to die?—afraid to trust
His promise, who shall rend the tomb,
And raise the renovated dust,
More glorious from its transient gloom.

Afraid to die?—afraid to meet
The guardian bands, who watchful wait,
And spread their radiant pinions wide
To bear us through salvation's gate.

Afraid to die?—prefer to be
A stranger in these courts below,—
A pilgrim—when the lights of home,
Bright through our Father's windows glow.

Afraid to die!—ah, what avails
Whether by sickness, storm or fire,
The ethereal essence finds its place,
And rises to the Eternal Sire.

Afraid to die?—oh, grant us grace,—
Thou, who didst dare the spoiler's strife,
Calmly to meet his cold embrace,
And soar to everlasting life.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE BLUE LAWS

CONCERNING FASHIONS, INTEMPERANCE AND TOBACCO.

It is well for many people that the laws of the pilgrims are not in force now-a-days. The fashionable follies of our times would have been an abomination in the eyes of the pious Puritans. The following were some of their enactments, and the punishments inflicted.

"Law 1.—Pride in wearing long hair, like a woman's hair; others wearing borders of hair, and cutting and curling and immodest laying out of hair.—grand jurors to present, and the court to punish by fine or correction.

"Law 2.—Excess in apparel, strange new fashions, naked breasts and arms, and pinioned superfluous ribands on hair, &c., the court to punish at discretion.

"Law 5.—Tobacco-takers and common swearers, the constable directed to present to the next magistrate, to be punished at discretion.

"Law 6.—For drunkenness, the offender to pay ten shillings,—excessive drinking, three shillings and four pence,—tipling about half an hour, a crown."

The above extracts, compared with prevailing habits, show that human nature is prone to the same foibles now that it was 200 years ago; and however, as a people, we may have advanced in intelligence, still a vain imagination and a depraved appetite to the same follies and vices against which the Puritans legislated.

The habit which the pilgrims condemned of "pride in wearing long hair like a woman," is at this time prevalent to some extent among the victims of fashion. Old people tell us, that this is a degenerate age,—that the present generation have neither the strong sense, nor the physical energy which distinguished the fathers. In some cases this may be true, and in other cases it may not. In those cases where the parents, by a vigorous and active industry, accumulated a fortune, and have reared their sons in comparative idleness, and dependent on their father's reputation and his property to maintain their place in society,—in such cases it is probably true that the present generation have degenerated intellectually and physically; but why any individual should desire to manifest the effeminacy of his mind by assuming the female habit of wearing the hair, we cannot imagine. We have set it down, as we suppose most others do, that feminine habits are indicative of feminine character. Speaking of men adopting the feminine habit of wearing the hair, the apostle says, "Doth not nature herself teach you, that if a man have long hair it is a shame unto him?" In our western forests, nature teaches the untutored Indian the proprieties of life in regard to this subject. A warrior would deem it an impeachment of his manhood were his hair left unshorn around his face and shoulders. But as those in civilized society, who adopt this unmanly and unchristian habit, cannot be expected to regard the teachings of the Scriptures, and as they do not regard the teachings of Nature, we hope their parents will teach them to avoid a habit which ladies alone may adopt with propriety.

"Law 2.—Excess in apparel, strange new fashions, naked breasts and arms, and pinioned superfluous ribands on the hair, &c., the court to punish at discretion."

That "women should adorn themselves with modest apparel," and that delicacy and taste should be regarded in personal attire, is not only suitable, but commendable. In fitting up the garniture of nature, the benevolent Maker has displayed taste and beauty that are inimitable. But when modesty and taste are abandoned, and females professing virtue, and in some cases piety, adopt fashions which originate in that hot-bed of vice, the Parisian stage, they sin against the "modesty of nature," as well as against God. And by their apparel, or rather want of apparel, they obtain for themselves the gaze of the vain and vicious, and the pity of those who believe that want of modesty is want of sense, if it be no worse.

One would suppose that professing Christians would be influenced in matters of apparel by the teachings of the Scriptures, which they profess to regard as a rule of duty. What then saith the Bible? Hear how explicit,—"That women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold or pearls, or costly array." How explicit! we say again. And yet, if one were to judge by some assemblages that are to be met with, one might suppose that modest apparel, and shamefacedness and sobriety had fled to another planet, and that gold and pearls and costly array were the admiration of the world, and, to some extent, of the church of Christ. Were one of those who have gone up through great tribulation, and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, to visit again the church militant on earth, we fear he would be forced to the conclusion, either that some people did not know what was written in the Scriptures, or else they preferred conformity to the world rather than to the Word of God.

We need not say that there is still need of reformation in relation to the two latter subjects of Pilgrim legislation—"drunkenness and tobacco-takers." The temperance reformation, we hope, has accomplished something in abating the habit of intoxication; but the evil of tobacco-taking is rife throughout the community. We do not know which is most addicted to the habit, the colored or the white population. The evil is more apparent on the Sabbath-day than on any other day of the week. On that day, men of "every color and every cloth" may be seen displaying themselves on the pavement, and exhaling into the air the nauseous fumes of tobacco-smoke. Even the market-houses are infected by the evil. At the stalls, where fresh meat is retailed, men may be seen at one moment handling the nauseous cigar, steeped in saliva, and at the next their besmeared fingers are upon the steak that is to be prepared for dinner. We believe it is admitted, that the tobacco weed is one of the filthiest that grows, and the whole creation eschews its use, except an abominable worm, the appearance of which is as hateful to the eye as the weed itself is to the natural taste. If men will smoke tobacco, we protest against them blowing their smoke into our faces, and soiling our food with their fingers.

We commend to all those who are addicted to the disagreeable habit of chewing or smoking tobacco, to read a tract published by Dr. Mussey, on the baleful effects of tobacco, and we are sure they will be convinced that the habit is a very silly, as well as a very injurious one.—Cincinnati Observer.

AN INCIDENT IN REAL LIFE.

The Philadelphia Inquirer relates the following affecting incident as having recently taken place in Philadelphia: A poor woman with an intemperate husband who was all kindness and affection when the demon of drunkenness was not the master of his mind, had, after various trials abandoned the miserable man, and become a domestic in a family in the western part of the city. The husband, rendered desolate and desperate by his conduct on the part of his wife, plunged still more madly into the vice which had nearly destroyed him. For some days the poor wife, who, with all his faults, clung to him with the tenacity of woman's love, and still cherished a hope of his ultimate reform, could learn no tidings of him, and was miserable indeed. All his words of kindness and affection crowded on her memory; she saw him only as he was in his early manhood, when he came to her with looks of gentleness and drew bright pictures of their wedded life, before he had lost his energy of spirit, had fallen a victim to the temptations of the convivial circle. She conjured up a thousand phantoms of his wretchedness and despair—of his sickness and death, with none to close his eyes or to shed one tear of pity or of grief upon his lifeless corpse. The poor creature wandered about the house for a few days in deep mental distress, and almost unable to discharge the duties of her humble position. She then went to the lady with tears in her eyes confessed the weakness and virtue that was struggling in her bosom, and asked permission to go in search of her unfortunate husband. It was granted freely and promptly, for the cunning eye of woman had already read the whole story in the features and actions of the poor domestic. She was absent two weeks when she returned, the very shadow of her former self, and clothed in a deep suit of mourning. She had found her husband in some low hovel in the suburbs, the spark of life just flickering in the socket. He recognized his faithful wife—seized her hand, pressed it to his lips, and asked her forgiveness. She fell upon her knees, and as she joined her prayers with his, the soul of the poor drunkard parted from the body and passed on to eternity. Her last farthing was expended in providing him with a decent burial, and when she related the story of his unhappy end, last embrace and dying smile, the heart of the poor woman seemed as if it would break with the convulsive nature of her grief. And such is woman's love!

HEBREW WOMEN.—Wherever the women of the Hebrews are to be found (and where are they not?) they still exhibit the type of that intellectual beauty which subdued Egypt, and reformed the penal statutes of Persia; and their fine heads are cited by science as models of the highest moral conformation. Bright thoughts flash from their bright eyes, quick perceptions animate their noble lineaments; and if the force of circumstances is no longer directed to elicit the high qualities of an Esther or a Judith, the original of the picture, drawn by the prophet king of the "virtuous woman whose price is above rubies," may be found among the Jewish women of modern as of ancient times; for "they eat not the bread of idleness," and the "hearts of their husbands trust in them."

HAARLEM SEA.—The Dutch government have had in contemplation for centuries, to drain the large lake called Haarlem Sea, and have at length determined to commence operations. The machine employed, which is the invention of Dietz, a civil engineer, will be worked by a steam engine of 120 horse power. The whole operation, including the expense of ten machines, and the employment of them for 800 days, in which time the work is to be completed, is expected to cost only £64,000. If the enterprise be crowned with complete success, perhaps the thrifty Hollanders may undertake to redeem again from the water, the extensive country now occupied by the Ruider Zee, which, previously to the inundation in the thirteenth century, was for the most part, a highly cultivated and populous district.—Bap. Adv.

FOR THE FARMER.

THE GRAND EMPLOYMENT.

The study of agriculture as a science, and its pursuit as an employment, we deem admirably calculated to produce individual happiness; inasmuch as it leads the mind away from the turmoil and bustle of many other pursuits, and places a reliance on individual exertion and the blessings of Heaven.

There is a mistake, and a fatal mistake, too, in the minds of many of our young men, in respect to farming. They are anxious to engage in any occupation but that of a cultivator of the soil. They look upon labor, especially agricultural labor, as less profitable, if not less honorable, than any other employment. It is this error, we believe, that has filled our country to oxerflowing with professional men and reckles speculators. A small portion only of the younger class, can obtain sufficient employment to render their situation independent; while the larger portion are nearly destitute of business. As for the latter class, they are a worthless set of beings, a nuisance to the country; as they eat the corn they, in no way, contribute to raise.

The grand mistake that farming is disreputable, is an error of the present day. Farming was held by the ancients in high repute, as it is by many of the great and learned men of the present time. The Emperor of China annually, we are told, takes his team, ploughs his field, and sows his grain; after which he invokes the blessing of Heaven, thus setting a noble and praiseworthy example to his subjects.—Cincinnatus was taken from the plough and made dictator of Rome; and in America, Washington left his farm, Putnam his plough, and Stark our own granite hills, to head the victorious armies of the Revolution; and of still later time, Jackson, Webster, Clay, and a host of others, are far more happy when directing their farms, than when engaged in the councils of the nation.

It is imagined by some, that a farmer is coarse and illiterate; such is not necessarily the fact. No pursuit offers more opportunities for the cultivation of the mind; and that man who does not read cannot expect to excel in the cultivation of the soil.

Farming is one of the most peaceful, as it is also one of the most patriotic occupations; and were I young and again to commence business and at liberty to choose my occupation, I would select that of a farmer. It is true, the gains of the husbandman are small; but they are sure. There is a great satisfaction in looking over our farms, realizing they are ours, that they are not like the property of the speculator, thrown at mere haphazard.

In the labor of the field under the blue arch of heaven, when the breeze is pure and refreshing, there is that freedom from care and perplexity seldom enjoyed in any other pursuit.

What situation or occupation, can confer on us more happiness than that of a farmer? He sees his crops arise and flourish around him, the fields of waving corn and yellow grain; trees of his own planting loaded with fruit; flocks and herds grazing upon the hills which are his. And when winter comes the farmer has ample leisure and opportunity to improve his mind. Who can, with suitable language describe the happiness of the industrious and intelligent farmer, with his family clustered around his hearth, listening to an interesting volume, read by one of their number; while the mother and daughters ply the needle in almost breathless silence?

Such is the situation of the farmer, who embracing the opportunities his occupation affords for the improvement of his mind, pursues his moral labors with industry and virtue.—Cheshire Farmer.

A just proportion of the farm is suitable for ploughing, and has not been reduced by bad husbandry. The timber land is the best in this vicinity, having never been used for any purpose. The farm is well watered with a small brook and several never failing springs, and is situated in a good and peaceable neighborhood of wealthy farmers, one mile west of the local center of the town of Preston, Chenango county, N. Y. It lies on the west side of the road leading from Pharsalia to the village of Oxford, which is about 4 1-2 miles distance to the south east. The road leading from Mecklenburgh village to Norwich, the county town, runs from west to east through the center of the farm. It is about six miles to Norwich. The farm is situated about eighty rods north of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, and two miles west of the Congregational meeting-house two and a half miles east of the Free-will Baptist & Universalist meeting-houses, and two and a half south west of the new Baptist meeting-house. The District School house adjoins the premises. For pleasantness of situation, religious, social and political privileges, we presume it cannot hardly be surpassed in the western country. THE STUDY OF PROPHECY.

It was the object of a former essay to set forth the advantages of an acquaintance with prophecy to those who lived under the old dispensation: the object of the present will be, to prove that such an acquaintance with these prophecies cannot fail to have a most beneficial effect upon ourselves:

1. In establishing more securely our own faith. The evidence arising from prophecy may be fairly regarded as among the very strongest; and it will be recollected, that to these prophecies concerning the Messiah, and to their exact fulfilment in himself, our Lord referred, and more especially after his resurrection, when he terms the apostles "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets had spoken;" when he affirms that "Christ ought to have suffered these things, and enter into his glory," that is, that it was quite in accordance with the whole strain of prophecy that he should have been crucified, dead, and buried, and should, on the third day, rise again; and then, beginning at Moses, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things that referred to himself. And thus we find St. Peter on the day of Pentecost, expostulating with the Jews, convincing them of their guilt, and proving, by reference to prophecy, that Jesus, whom they had crucified, was He of whom David spoke: while a similar effect was produced by his appeal to the same evidence, when the people ran together unto him and John, in the porch of the temple called Solomon's, astonished and amazed at the miracle of healing wrought on the lame man who sat begging at the gate. The study of fulfilled prophecy, then we may expect, will have the important effect of establishing us more securely in the faith; and were those who call in question the Bible as the revelation of God to his creatures, and who in the pride of an unsubdued and unsanctified heart deny the Lord Jesus Christ, to study these prophecies with greater care, and with humble prayer for the Divine guidance, there is little doubt but that they would be speedily brought to the acknowledgment of the truth. It will be observed that I say the study of fulfilled prophecy; for it is most important to keep the distinction in mind between that which is fulfilled, and that for the accomplishment of which we are yet to look. "I must express the conviction of my mind," says one admirably well qualified to judge on this subject, and one to whose patient investigation of the Scripture testimonies to the divinity of the Messiah the Christian church is under the deepest obligations,—"I must express the conviction of my mind, that it is not the immediate duty of all Christians to engage in this branch of scriptural inquiry—the study of unfulfilled prophecy; and this conclusion rests upon the plain reason, that God has not made that the duty of any persons for which he has not furnished them with the necessary means. But the larger part of sincere and devout believers cannot command time which those long and laborious disquisitions require, in order to pursue them advantageously; and, if they had sufficient leisure, without neglecting plain incumbent duties, they are not possessed of that acquaintance which philology and history, which is manifestly indispensable to investigations of this nature. Let not such excellent persons regret their disability; they have other and more profitable objects to engage their attention and to fill their hearts; they need not occupy themselves with a light shining in a dark place, when they can walk under the brightness of the Sun of Righteousness,—the clearly revealed doctrines and promises, the precepts, examples, devotional compositions, and historical illustrations of the divine word." It had been well, had these judicious remarks been adopted as the rule of conduct by many in our own day, who seek to be wise above that which is written, and to pry into the secret things which belong to the Lord our God, who have been led away from the sober interpretation of Divine truth, and too often to interpret the most mysterious prophecies of the sacred volume according to their own crude fancies.

2. The study of fulfilled prophecy will increase our admiration of the wisdom and goodness of the Almighty. It has often been urged as an objection to the truth of Christianity, that it is utterly inconsistent with our notions of infinite benevolence to suppose that the Most High would have suffered so many ages to pass before the Advent of the Messiah; and that had he intended to make a revelation of his will by a messenger especially qualified for the work, that messenger would have appeared at a much earlier period. From an acquaintance with prophecy, however, we learn, that even before the Almighty passed the sentence of condemnation against the guilty pair, a Deliverer was promised. The light of revelation was not poured in upon man at once and with full splendor; the obscurity of the dawn went before the brightness of the noon-day. The will of God was at first made known by revelations dark and mysterious; to these succeeded others more clear and perfect, in proportion as the situation of the world made it necessary.—Throughout the whole chain of prophecy, however, we behold the Divine mercy to man set forth. We have seen that these prophecies were the stay, and the comfort, and support of God's servants in every age of the Church; and the fulness of the time did not arrive for many ages, when it should please God to send forth his Son; yet, the propitiatory sacrifice made by that Son on the cross was as ineffectual to the removal of the transgressions of those who lived before, as of those who lived after his advent. It is their ignorance of the divine plan of mercy, which induces unbelievers to cavil at the word of God. Would they but patiently study its hallowed pages,—would they but derive its sincere milk, that they might grow thereby,—would they but come unprejudiced to the investigation of the truth,—they would be soon led to adore that mercy, which even from the earliest times promised a deliverer,—one mighty to save, who should reverse the sentence of condemnation, and restore man to that liberty, and light, and felicity, which he had forfeited by transgression.

3. But an acquaintance with fulfilled prophecy is calculated to excite us to active diligence in the great works of the Christian calling, more especially those which refer to the advancement of the kingdom of the Redeemer. Such an acquaintance assures us that God's word standeth for ever sure; that every jot and tittle thereof will be accomplished; and that whatever impediments may appear to stand in the way of the accomplishment of his purposes, they must all be finally overcome. Now God hath expressly assured us that the time will ultimately arrive, though he hath not pleased to state the precise period—for the times and seasons are in his own hand—when all men shall know him from the least even to the greatest. He hath positively declared that the dominion of the Messiah shall be from sea to sea, and from the river unto the end of the earth. We cannot, therefore, doubt the exact fulfillment of his word. Every obstacle must disappear, every impediment be removed, in the accomplishment of an end so desirable, an object so glorious. He deigns to employ the agency of man; he purposes that man shall be to his fellow-man the herald of peace—the messenger of salvation; that the kingdom of the Redeemer shall be enlarged by human exertion, blessed and rendered efficacious by his good spirit. Here, then, is a call to active diligence in seeking to promote the knowledge of the Savior among men; here is a motive which should lead us to be steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Many, indeed, are the discouragements in the way of Christian exertion in this particular; but the encouragements infinitely surpass them. The spread of Christianity may be slow, it may be gradual, it may scarcely be perceptible, it may appear to some to be impossible; yet ultimately we are assured it will cover the earth, even as the waters cover the channel of the great deep. And what, it may be asked, have we done towards the accomplishment of an event so glorious? If we trace with gratitude and delight the gradual development of the plan of mercy, from its first dawning in paradise until it burst forth in splendor in that adorable Savior who was the light of the world, the Sun of Righteousness; if we meditate with thankfulness on His advent in the flesh, whose testimony was the spirit of prophecy—we shall pray for the speedy accomplishment of those prophecies which declare his ulterior triumphs in the world; we shall, according to our several abilities, seek to promote the honor of his name, to advance the interests of his kingdom. If we rejoice to look back, as Abraham rejoiced to look forward to his day; if he is to us as he was to the Psalmist, all our salvation, and all our desire,—then, assuredly, we shall be fired with a holy zeal to hasten that time, when from the rising even to the going down of the sun his name shall be great among the heathen; the prelude of that day when he shall appear in glorious majesty to judge both the quick and the dead. Alas, our lukewarmness in this particular may easily be traced to the little value that we affix to the knowledge which we possess of God's purposes of mercy in his Son. It is because we do not estimate aright the blessings of redemption, that we seek not to impart a knowledge of them to others; it is because we are not constrained by the love of the Redeemer, that we feel so little interested for the welfare of our fellow-men; and it becomes us to consider upon what principle we can lay claims to be regarded as Christians, if we are neither anxious that the glory of the Redeemer should be advanced, or the blessings of his salvation be made known; if, while the fields are white unto the harvest, we send not forth laborers into these field; if, while the cry of the heathen is the entreaty of the man of Macedonia to St. Paul, we send not over and help them;—for, to use the words of Dr. Johnson, "He that voluntarily continues ignorant is guilty of all the crimes which ignorance produces; as to him that should extinguish the tapers of a light-house might justly be imputed the calamities of shipwreck."

ETERNITY REALIZED.

A brother in Christ begs leave to submit the following statement to the attention of his fellow travelers to eternity, in hopes that it may be a means, under the divine blessing, of producing a profitable train of thought and inquiry, and thereby exert a profitable influence in their souls.

Some few months since, while upon my bed, a sense of apparent realities was produced upon my mind, about as follows:

"It seemed that my soul had awakened to consciousness in eternity. I could look back upon my past life as forever closed. I began to recollect Christ, and how I had grieved his Spirit by many sins of commission, which, in my life time, I had accustomed myself to look upon as rather innocent amusements, or mere trifles. But now their turpitude swelled into mountains in magnitude in the all-searching sight of the scritinizing eyes of Jesus Christ. I saw plainly that I had carelessly indulged in what had been forbidden by the Holy Spirit in many of the days of my past life. And now I could not feel in my soul that the Savior could consistently say to me, "Well done, good and faithful servant." On the contrary, as I thought on my past life, with its evidences of my imperfect faith, I could not but feel self-condemned; and presently my agonized soul began to hear what seemed to me the language of Jesus himself, uttered directly to me, in substance: "You have not done your duty. Look at your past life. You have been an unfaithful servant. You did not serve me earnestly enough. You studied your carnal ease, even in neglecting your closet prayers. You would not deny yourself even the mere trifles of self-indulgence, which I asked you to give up." My conscience appeared to be the servant of Jesus, and to repeat these intensely tormenting truths, while my soul in fearful horror and remorse seemed to plead for a return to the world of probation, that I might live my life over again. "O!" I exclaimed in an agony of anxiety, "if I were only back in that world of privilege again, I would be in earnest now—I would deny myself—I would do any thing, make any effort to serve Christ. Let me go—let me go." But the last hope of such a privilege faded entirely away, as it seemed that my soul must settle down in despair under the overwhelmig fact that my days of probation were for ever finished, and that it was now too late to make or keep resolutions to serve Christ! O my conscience, how it spoke! O the remorse! O the despair! God only knows what I felt.

And now, let me ask, Was not that searching whispering of conscience, and that thrillling consciousness of being upbraided by the Lord, a very type of the unfolding of the worm that dieth not? O God, deliver me from its eternal stings! Let it never coil around my immortal spirit beyond the grave. O let me fly to the mountain! and there pray, believe, groan, and work in the strength of Jesus, until I have been enabled so faithfully to serve Christ that my soul may be taken up to feel the consciousness that He can consistently say to me at the last, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Dear reader, if you should die to-night, with what consciousness would you wake up in eternity? Will you not now resolve with me to live until you die just as you must suppose your spirit would promise to do, if it had gone to eternity, and was granted the privilege of returning to this world of probation only for a few days?—Ch. Adv. & Jour.

WORLDLY WISDOM.

The wisdom of worldly-minded men must needs be great, since our Lord assures us, that it is greater than that of the children of God;—yet with all its pretensions and fair appearances, it is fatal to those who follow it. This crooked and subtle wisdom is most opposite to that of God, which is ever plain and most simple; and what does it avail its professors, seeing they are always taken in their own devices!—The apostle St. James, saith of this kind of wisdom, that it is earthly, animal (or sensual) and devlish; earthly, because it confines its care to the getting or possessing the things of earth. Animal or sensual, because it seeks only to make provision for gratifying the passions or sensual appetites; and devlish, because to the subtlety and penetration of a demon, it joins also the malice; men, so qualified, think to impose upon others, but in the event, they deceive only themselves.

Blind, therefore, are all those, who think themselves wise, without the grace of Christ Jesus, which only can make us truly wise. They are like those, who in a dream think themselves awake, and believe all the objects they imagine to be true and real. And while they are pursuing their vain projects of pleasure or ambition, (so great is the infatuation that possesses them) they see not what lies in the way before them; sometimes disgrace, always death, judgment and eternity. These great objects daily advance, and approach nearer to profane men; yet they see them not. Their political skill foresees every thing, but the inevitable fate of all they set their hearts upon. O mad and infatuated men! when will ye open your eyes to the light of Jesus Christ, which discovers the emptiness of all grandeur here below!—Fenelon.

A WORD IN SEASON.

Mr. Rutherford was accustomed to come to the parish of Agherton, where Adam Clark's father resided, and to preach in different places. Adam heard him every where; and in returning from the places of preaching, was in the habit of walking behind him, and took delight in literally treading in his steps: this was before he had any personal acquaintance with him. One evening Mr. R. noticing a little lad trotting after him, whom he had often observed at the preaching, turned about and said, "Well child, God hath said, "I love them that love, and they that seek me early shall find me." He said no more, and Adam pondered these words in his heart; and thus reasoned on them: What does he mean by "they that seek me early?" I rise early, and my first work is prayer—is that what is meant? No, it is they who seek God early in life—when they are young: then, thus I seek, and thus I will seek the Lord. He said also, "they shall find me:" others, perhaps, may seek and not find: but God says to the young, "they SHALL find." This gave him great encouragement. Other preachers took no notice of him; probably supposing that one so young, could not be expected to have much concern for his soul. Experience, however, has indisputably shown that the true light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world, shines often very powerfully on infant minds: and that we cannot be too attentive to their cultivation, and that the best fruits may be expected from a careful management of such soils.

JESUS IS PRECIOUS.

The Lord Jesus resembles a precious stone, which has various points of radiancy, and from which many different lights of consolation and joy proceed. According to the necessity of the circumstances in which we are placed, sometimes one side, and sometimes another, appears pre-eminently lovely: and there is no situation and no emergency in which we do not find Jesus efficacious in one of his aspects. For example, to the bruised heart we would represent Christ as the friend of sinners; to the weak and timid soul, we will show him as a hero, ready to overcome all their enemies; to the sick and afflicted, he is the unwearied Physician; to the maimed and cripple, the tender nurse; and to those trembling ones, who know not how they are to stand at the judgment seat of God, we should exhibit him as the Lord who is our righteousness. Thus, if I may so express it, the heavenly Father turns Christ as a precious stone before the eyes of the people of Israel, according to their necessities; and in the mirror of the revelations makes his colors to be reflected, and his lights come forth, sometimes from another. This can be discerned through every period of sacred history; for there is always one side of the image of the Messiah turned towards us, more clearly marked than the others or bearing a more characteristic stamp; it is always that which is most suitable to the necessity of the time.—Krummacher.

AN IMPORTANT IDEA.

The author of the Church Members' Guide, while treating on the mode of conducting church meetings, observes, that "It would conduce to the order of these meetings, if it were understood that they were meetings for devotion, and not for debate. They should ever be attended with the usual services of a prayer meeting; that is, with singing, supplication, and ministerial exhortation. If business is to be done, it should be introduced amidst the services of devotion and transacted in the spirit of it." If the above advice were followed, church meetings would be seasons of interest to all who attend. Instead of the pain and grief which the Lord's people are often made the subjects of at these seasons, in consequence of brethren and sisters being at variance, and manifesting a vindictive spirit towards each other, they would be refreshed, and angry discord would be quelled and wounds healed. And if the brethren should feel under the necessity of rejecting an offending member, it would be done with decision, but in the spirit of love, that would make the offender feel that unless he should return to God and his brethren by timely and hearty repentance iniquity would be his ruin.

TYRO.

SOLITUDE.—An hour of solitude passed in sincere and earnest prayer, or the conflict with, and conquest over a single passion or "subtle bosom-sin," will teach us more of thought, will more effectually awaken the faculty, and form the habit of reflection, than a year's study in the schools without them. A reflecting mind is not a flower that grows wild, or comes up of its own accord. The difficulty is, indeed, greater than many, who mistake quick recollection for thought, are disposed to admit: but how much less than it would be, had we not been born and bred in a Christian and Protestant land, very few of us are sufficiently aware. Truly may we, and thankfully ought we to exclaim with the Psalmist, "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding even to the simple.—Coleridge (Aids to reflection.)

CHRIST IS ALL.—All my hope, as to freedom from that darkness which is my burden, is from Christ's prophetical office; and my hope of freedom from the guilt, pollution, and power of sin, and acceptation with God, arises from his kingly and priestly offices. I have no hopes of mercy in time or eternity, but only through Him. It is through him, that I expect all, from the least drop of water to the immense riches of glory. Luke xxiv: 45. Hebrews ix: 28.—Halyburton.

THE CROSS.

There was a custom once prevalent, it is said, among some of the Indian tribes of the West, which, like a similar institution among the Jews, coincided very remarkably with some of the great characteristics of the plan of salvation by Jesus Christ. It was this; when and where ever these Indians pitched their camps for any considerable time, they cut down a sapling, and having stripped off its bark, and stained it with the blood of beasts taken in hunting, they planted it within their encampment, as a post of refuge. Now, whoever of that tribe was pursued by the avenger of blood, could he but reach forward and touch that consecrated wood, he was safe, although the tomahawk were descended upon his head, and the knife aimed at his bosom.

Now, fellow sinner, there is just such another post of refuge planted expressly for you, on Mount Calvary. Nor does that hallowed wood lack the stain of blood. O! it has been dyed, deeply dyed, by these atoning fountains which burst from a Savior's broken veins, for you. Lay hold of it without delay. While the insidious enemy of your soul is showing you, from some mountain-height of imagination, the honors, riches and glories of this world, and all the alluring prospects of time and sense, the avenger of blood is close upon you; of blood, not of beasts, but of the everlasting Son of God, which you trample under your feet as long as you stay away from the cross. How often has that avenger held the sword of justice over your head, and how often withheld the blow at the interposition of mercy! How often, like the Egyptian mother in the wilderness of Beersheba, has a crucified Savior stood as it were, at a bow-shot over against your soul, and plead with you to come and drink at the fountain of living waters, without money and without price. Take hold of the cross now, and with a faith that shall join you forever to Him who bled thereon. The avenger has his eye upon you; he follows you through every lane of life, nor misses once the track; he has whet his sword, he has bent his bow; beware lest he make you the object of that sudden and fearful retribution which waits those who persist in doing despite unto the spirit of grace.

GOD'S FORBEARANCE.—If by the light of nature it be judged a crime worthy of a burning fiery furnace, to refuse the worship of what it esteems to God, although it be but the work of men's hands, how shall we escape the far more dreadful punishment, if we neglect the worship of the living and only true God? On the other hand, if we compare the judgments of Almighty God, in regard to this life, and the hasty and passionate sentence of this enraged king, "Ye shall be cast the same hour," &c., how infinitely more patient is the great God of heaven towards men, than man generally is to man! How forbearing is the divine justice, though provoked every day by the most enormous crimes, nay, by repeated profanations and contempts of his holy name, as well as righteous laws, and especially by refusing honor and worship to that image, that only image of himself, the Lord Jesus Christ, which he has set up, and commanded all people, nations and languages, to fall down and worship! Yet he still forbears, still respites the punishment, not only for hours but for days and years! Experience, then, must needs teach us how full of compassion and mercy, how long suffering and gracious the Lord is. And can we forbear to love the Lord our God, who so loveth us? Such men only taste not the sweetness of his mercy, who feel not their own misery. Such only are insensible of his goodness, who hate not their sins, who love not their own souls, who choose death. Did we but know thee, did we but know ourselves, we could not but love thee. O, may we so know and love thee here, that hereafter we may know thee as thou art, and love and enjoy thee for ever! Amen.—Wogan.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

HOW TO STAND WHEN ERROR IS RIFE.

BY DR. MASON.

1. Be students of the holy Scriptures; search them; dig in them as for hidden treasures, and you shall find that which will make you wise unto salvation, while the scorner seeketh wisdom and findeth it not. But remember that he who gave them for a light to your feet and a lamp to your paths, must open your eyes before you shall see wonderful things in his law. Sweet, and blessed, and freely given are his gracious teachings. Did not our hearts burn within us, said one disciple to the other, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures?

2. Repress vain curiosity. Inquire not into the reasons of those things which are to be received on the credit of the divine testimony. Be satisfied that the Lord hath said it, and ask no farther. They, who boldly intrude into those things which they have not seen, may pretend what they please: but you have the highest authority in earth or heaven for being assured, that they are only vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind, and with all their knowledge or speculations, can do you nothing but harm.

3. Open not your eyes to the suggestion of new light and new discoveries in religion. "The true Christ is no new Christ." He is the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever. There is no room for discoveries in God's revelation for the salvation of men. The revelation is itself the discovery. You are not to look for a new way to heaven.—Jesus Christ is the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh to the Father but by him. This has been the divine method from the very beginning. That which a thousand years ago brought his sons and daughters to glory, viz. the making the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings, must bring you thither, or your arrival there is hopeless. And as to the new light which is the boast of those who turn aside from the holy commandment delivered unto them, rely upon it, it is nothing but a new edition of old darkness, only resembling more than it did the dunnest smoke of hell.

4. Keep especially clear of uncommon pretenders to charity. Satan will mask his designs so long as he can, and so will all his ministers. Believe that God is love, that he is the great and essential charity. Be satisfied then with as much charity as he has shown, and do not think of improving upon your Maker by entertaining and expressing a more charitable opinion of sinners than himself. He hath said and will make it good, and see that your charity do not trench upon his truth: he hath said, gainsay it who will, He that believeth not shall be damned.

CHRISTIANS MUST NOT PLEASE THEMSELVES.—If there were no corruptions within, nor temptations without, many Scripture exhortations to watchfulness would lose their significancy. If we were to meet with no opposition, or reproach, or ill usage on account of our profession, it would be needless to call us to consider Him who endureth the contradiction of sinners against himself. If all things were agreeable and smooth, according to our fond desires, the graces of gentleness, forbearance, patience, long suffering, meekness and resignation, would have no place. It is often as true in spirituals as in temporals. We know not what we ask. Let us expect things disagreeable to the flesh—remembering that even our Lord pleased not himself. In Scripture, the Christian life is called a trial, a race, a wrestling, a warfare, a crucifixion, a death—all terms importing violence and suffering. Let us therefore cheerfully take up our cross, and daily follow the Lord in the way of self-denial, the way in which he himself walked, and which he has appointed expressly for us. Cheerfully commit your soul to him as to a faithful compassionate Savior, who beholds all our strugglings, and will never suffer us to be tempted above what we shall be enabled to bear.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE BREAD OF LIFE.

'Mother,' said little George, 'what does Christ mean when he says, I am the bread of life? I never could understand this text.'

'I am glad my son,' answered Mrs. Selwyn, 'that you feel interested enough about what you read in the Bible, to wish to understand its meaning, and this is a very important text. The meaning of it is this, Christ is the bread on which our souls must feed in order that they may live and be happy. That is, unless we trust in him, and love him, our souls will die forever, just as your bodies would die, if we had no food to eat."

'But, mother, you say that we must love Christ that we may be happy; now I know a great many boys who are always very lively and full of play, and never seem unhappy, who I am sure do not love the Savior, for they take his name in vain, and even play on the Sabbath.

"They may appear happy George, but depend upon it they are not. It is certainly true that their souls are dying for want of food, though what makes it still more sad, they know it not. You recollect going to see your little cousin William, when he was dying in a consumption. You know he thought he was not sick at all; was not willing to take any medicine, and told you when you left him, that he thought he should be able to prevail on his mother, to let him come and see you the next day, and that very day he died. Just so it is with those wicked boys you speak of, they will not believe that their souls are perishing without Christ. But suppose God should remove them from this world, what do you suppose would be their feelings? Would they not be convinced then that they had nothing to make them happy? Christ alone, my dear boy, can make us happy in this world, and in that which is to come; but if we will not serve him, here, he will leave our souls hungry and dying for ever.—Youth's Friend.

FORM OF GODLINESS.—Is it not strange what multitudes profess the truth and yet hate it, and were never drawn by the cords of love! How many court the name of Christian, and woo the shadow of religion, who never knew the truth of it. Certainly that is convincing evidence of the Gospel's conquest, that so many knees should bow to the name of Jesus whose hearts were never really subdued to him.—Fleming.

SIN.—If prayer do not constantly endeavor the ruin of sin, sin will ruin prayer. Job xxvii: 10. To live in sin, and yet to believe the forgiveness of sin, is utterly impossible. Psalm lxvi: 18, 19.—Owen.

Diversity of opinion in the christian church cannot be avoided, unless all men had the same humility, not to be wise above what is written; the same ability to investigate the truth of what has been written; and the same honesty to profess it; contumelious language, bitterness of spirit, and uncharitable censuring might be avoided, and ought to be avoided by us all.—Bishop Watson.

If I were to condense my prayers for my country into the shortest compass, it seems that my prayers would run—"Sanctify, Oh Lord! first of all, the pulpits of my country, and then, Oh Lord! vouchsafe to sanctify the press.

You must rather leave the ark to shake as it shall please God, than put unworthy hands to hold it up.—Lord Bacon.

ON WHOM RESTS THE RESPONSIBILITY?—A writer in the Boston Recorder, objects to the practice of addressing churches, as such, exclusive of the congregation, for the purpose of raising missionary funds, and insists, as many who are not communicants subscribe liberally to objects of benevolence, that they ought not to be overlooked.

But never let the church be led to believe that they may share with the world the responsibility of sending the gospel to the destitute. Every thing that benevolent men who are not members of the church, may be disposed to contribute, should be gratefully received and acknowledged, but the dependence of the perishing world must be, under God, on those who have consecrated themselves and their substance to the Lord. They who have been bought with the blood of Christ, and have professed to be willing to spend and be spent for him, they and they only are to be relied on as the dependence of the missionary course. The church must feel that this work of Christianizing the world rests on its hands, and sooner or later it must be done. It is idle to talk of sharing it with those whose kingdom is of this world.—N. Y. Obs.

IRISH TEMPERANCE.—A late letter from Ireland, published in a Scotch paper, states as follows:—"We have now in our society two millions and a half of teetotallers, and I feel proud to tell you that they are every where considered as the most moral and peaceable people in the country. The records of the law courts prove the state of morality in any society, and I rejoice to think that, according to the returns of the late assizes, there was not a single teetotaller prosecuted before a judge or jury for any crime throughout the entire kingdom. Let this state of things always continue, and the result will tend to our own glory, and to the honor of our society."

PUNGENT PREACHING.—An old man being asked his opinion of a certain sermon, replied, "I liked it very well, except that there was no pinch to it. I always like to have a pinch to every sermon." I was reminded of this anecdote by the remark of a son of Neptune, from Nantucket, whom I met in the gallery of a crowded church last Sabbath evening. He said it was a handsome sermon, but he would have liked it better, if it had struck the harpoon into the conscience of the sinner.

THE SOUL.

Not all that tongue can say, or pen can write,
The value of the immortal soul can tell;
Doom'd to ascend the worlds of endless light,
Or sink to regions of an endless hell.
Suspended on each hour we live, hangs all
The weal or wo of our eternal home;
The present now we hear the gospel's call,
Embrac'd we live—refus'd we are undone!
The blood of Christ was freely shed for us—
All heaven would bid us "come in welcome" there;
O let us now escape sin's dreadful curse,
Fly to the Savior, and his mercy share. D. F.

Ashfield, August, 1840.

FEARS OF UNBELIEVERS.—"There is one thing," said Mr. S., a professed infidel, to one of his companions in sin, "which mars all the pleasures of my life." "Ah," replied his companion, "what is that?"—"Why, I am afraid the Bible is true. If I could know for certain that death is an eternal sleep, I should be happy; my joy would be complete. But here is the thorn that stings me? This is the sword that pierces my very soul! If the Bible be true I am lost for ever! Every prospect is gone, and I am lost forever!" This unhappy man soon undertook a voyage, was shipwrecked and drowned, and most probably sunk into the mighty deep in all the horrors of absolute despair.

FEARS OF DEATH.—A young man on one occasion was conversing with a person of respectable character, but an unbeliever.—Their conversation turning on the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death, the young man inquired what the hopes of his acquaintance were respecting a future state. "George," he replied, "I must confess that I had rather be a deist in company than alone." This concluded the conversation.

A Lincolnshire farmer furnishes the following narrative:

One morning as I was taking a walk, I met with my neighbor Mr. M——, and as we passed from one subject to another in our conversation, we came at last to "evening walks," and the following discourse took place:—"I do not like to walk in the evening," said Mr. M. "Why, what are you afraid of?" "I don't know." "Are you afraid some body should kill you?"—"I don't know about that, but the thought of dying is dreadful to me! I would rather suffer anything than die."

"Why sir, this rather surprises me, to believe, as you say you do, that there is no God; or, if there is, He minds not how we live, and to be afraid of death." "O S——," exclaimed he, "I would rather suffer all the accumulated misery of mankind, than die; I would rather suffer to be chopped up into the smallest particles, if I might but live, than die. Yes, sir, I would rather undergo all the pain and misery that men have felt, do feel, and will feel, to the end of time, than die." "If this is being an infidel," said I, "I do not wish to embrace your sentiments." "No, sir," he replied, "you are better as you are."

How striking and instructive is this testimony! how desolate are they who are without God! how painful are their misgivings! and how infinite is the advantage of the humble Christian!

Dean Swift says he never knew a man rise to eminence who was accustomed to lie in bed late of a morning.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, November 10, 1840.

SABBATH AND BETHEL CONVENTION.

A Sabbath and Bethel Convention has been appointed at Cincinnati, to be held on the 19th inst. The objects proposed by the Convention, are

1. To devise means to enlighten the public mind respecting the impropriety of traveling on the Sabbath.

2. To make an appeal to the commercial community in behalf of Sabbath-keeping and Temperance boats, showing the advantage promised to those who patronize such vessels.

3. To harmonize the views and efforts of the friends of the Bethel cause on the western waters. While the Convention are together, we could wish they might endeavor to ascertain whether there is any law for the observance of the first day of the week as the Sabbath, and if they satisfy themselves that such is the fact, we hope they will make it as public as possible, that those who have no regard for any day as the Sabbath may be profited, and those who know of no other Sabbath than the seventh-day of the week, may be enlightened.

ANOTHER CONVENTION.

A Convention has been appointed in Boston, on the 18th inst., to consider the claims of "the Sabbath, the ministry, and the church," to be regarded as divine institutions. The fears of several Editors have been excited on the subject, as though these institutions were in danger. The New York Observer, in concluding an article on the subject, asks:—"But seriously, is there nothing in these calls for reform that is calculated to awaken the fears of the wise and good? If the sanctity of the Sabbath is to be assailed by the ruthless hands of professed christians, we would anxiously enquire, What next? The Baptist Advocate says, "We regret to remark that the Morning Courier, of Boston, expresses approbation of the convention called in that city, 'to examine the validity of the views which generally prevail in this country, as to the divine appointment of the first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath,' "&c., and concludes thus: "Brownsonism must be beginning to assume form and substance, in the land of the Puritans." For ourselves, we are glad the spirit of inquiry is extending, for we are confident that the institutions of the ministry, and the church, will lose nothing by the severest scrutiny, and that the assent of all honest persons will be yielded to their divine origin. And if the first day of the week has been divinely appointed as the Sabbath under the Gospel dispensation, a discussion could hardly fail to operate favorably on the subject, and impress the public mind with the importance of observing the first-day more strictly. Certainly, Br. Wyckoff would have no objections to a discussion relative to immersion, as the true & only mode of christian baptism. And why? Because he is confident the views of Baptists would win upon the minds of christians by such a measure. Why not then canvass the claims of the first-day!—Has truth any thing to lose by investigation? If there is any proof of a divine command for first-day keeping, we sincerely wish the public at large might be apprized of it. For ourselves, we should as soon think of establishing Pœdo-baptism as the true and Gospel rule, as to find any thing to invalidate the claims of the seventh-day of the week, to be the true Sabbath in all ages of the world!

Will the Advocate tell us, Whether the fourth commandment is still binding on christians? If it is, How can the conclusion be avoided that "the seventh-day should be kept holy!" If it is abrogated, Where is the appointment of the first-day to be found? If there is no law found in it is favor, Can it be a sin to do ordinary business on that day?

The newspapers in several parts of the country, have lately given publicity to accounts of the great persecution of the Jews at Damascus. Much christian sympathy has been excited and christian governments have interposed successfully to obtain the release of those who were oppressed, and the punishment of the offenders. Recent accounts from a missionary at Constantinople, state that a young Jew who has lately embraced Christianity, has been most cruelly persecuted by his family. Through the influence of his acquaintances, he was imprisoned by the Turkish officers, for no other crime than having abandoned the Jewish faith. His sufferings were very great, and when released by christian effort, it was thought he could not have much longer endured the hardships he was subjected to. When restored to his friends, he was by them imprisoned a second time, with a view, it is thought, of terminating his life if he continued his attachment to the Christian faith. Doubts were entertained relative to his final release.

The Religious Herald, which contains a long article on the subject, calls on American christians to evince as much active and public sympathy for this persecuted christian brother, as they have lately done for the persecuted Jews, and to call on the Jews unitedly to interpose in behalf of the sufferer; and to reprobate the persecuting spirit of their brethren. The forbearance and love of Christ and his followers to the Jews, have ever been in exact contrast with their cruelty and opposition to Christ and his members. Christ is ruling even now "in the midst of his enemies." His final triumph is certain.

REVIVAL.—It affords us unfeigned pleasure to be able to state that a revival of religion commenced at the session of the New School Presbyterian Synod, at Richmond, Va. The devotional exercises continued several days after the business was finished, and 8 or 10 souls were hopefully converted to God.—This is proof that when brethren cannot live in harmony together, it is expedient to separate, and labor apart for the advancement of the cause of Christ. We have not, to our recollection, heard of a revival, or much of a revival spirit, at a General Assembly while the church remained together for several years past. It has separated, and now there has a revival commenced at the session of a Synod. It were well if all the business meetings of the different denominations, looked at such a glorious object as a revival of religion. Those whom God's spirit fails to unite, His providence will separate.

Thirty ministers were in attendance, and several churches have united with the Synod this session.

Rev. Messrs. Van Doren and Stryker, were ordained on the first instant in New York, and are expected soon to sail for Batavia as missionaries of the Dutch Reformed Church.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

THERE SHOULD BE ORDER IN THE HOUSE OF GOD.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Some ten or twelve years ago, having occasion to travel in Western New York, I found in a certain district that an extensive revival of religion had been experienced a short time previous, and that the churches in the vicinity were enjoying the labors of a Missionary, employed by one of the Domestic Societies formed for that purpose. Going on a fine evening to hear the Missionary preach, I found the house crowded at an early hour. After the usual introductory exercises, the preacher read his text and commenced his sermon. Soon, a few boys nearly grown to manhood, began to disturb the congregation, as well as the preacher, by whispering, making noise with their feet, &c., when the preacher stopped and requested them to be quiet, and give attention to what was said. Whether they considered this inconsistent with their privileges, and out of the preacher's province, or otherwise, the disturbance was soon recommenced and they were again reproved. At this time, some were making their way out of the house, while others were coming in, others were busying themselves by strange contortions of their bodies, & a much larger number moving their feet to the great inconvenience of those who were near them. The confusion from all these causes was too great in the estimation of the preacher for him to proceed, and stopping suddenly, he proposed to leave the subject he had selected, for a few moments, while he should call the attention of his hearers to another which had just presented itself to his mind. He then read Eccl. "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools." Entering at once on the explanation of this text, he observed,

1. That the term, "house of God" in the text, might be applied to any place where there might be a congregation assembled for worship. An edifice erected for that purpose expressly, or a dwelling, or a school-house, or even where there was no building, and made an allusion to the patriarchs worshiping at Peuiel in the open air, and calling that place the house of God, though no building was near.

2. In the second place, he explained briefly what is interdicted in the text, "Keep thy foot." This, he said, forbade any unnecessary movement of the congregation, such as changing places, going out or coming in, or any thing which would prevent either individuals, or the assembly at large from hearing the instructions of the sanctuary; since to be saved, men must believe—to believe, they must hear—and to hear, there must be preaching, and an opportunity to hear it, and to disturb those who wish to hear and know the truth, was a sin against God, and evinced great unkindness to others, as well as a want of self-respect. It was, he said, a foolish sacrifice of time—of opportunity to obtain wisdom—even wisdom unto salvation—a wanton sacrifice of reputation and of feeling He then urged the various motives to an orderly and respectable demeanor in the house of God, and in conclusion, expressed his convictions that the whole assembly would be attentive, since the subject they were considering was so important.

The gospel is now preached as the means of reconciling the world to God. Parents were entreated to impress these things on the minds of their children, and see that their deportment in the house of God was decorous and becoming. The young were exhorted as they valued a "good name," to avoid all who might be disposed to disturb the worship of the sanctuary. And, said the preacher, I am confident you will give your undivided attention to the subject we are soon to resume, since the salvation of souls may be intimately connected with the attention now required of you. And I trust that all the youth here present, who place any value upon a good character, (and I flatter myself that most of you do,) will labor to impress on those who may be indifferent and careless, the importance of giving immediate attention to the things belonging to their eternal welfare. And if at any time there should chance to come into your assembly, any one who may have been brought up in a new or "back settlement," and less favored in respect to religious instruction than yourselves, and who evince so little regard to the principles of decorum, as in any way to disturb the devotions of christian worshipers, avail yourselves of an early opportunity to repeat to them this text, "Keep thy foot," &c. The subject was resumed, and a more orderly congregation I never beheld. I trust that good was done that evening. Many times since, I have heard that the hint thus solmenly given, was remembered by the youth of that vicinity, and if any disorderly conduct transpired, the guilty were rallied as having been brought up in a "back settlement." This circumstance has subsequently led me to the following inquiries,

Are ministers sufficiently faithful with their hearers in reference to a proper attention to the word of God! And are not many of their well meant efforts rendered inefficient by this neglect. And have not their hearers a right to expect them to see that order is observed in the house of God, as much as too preach the gospel or perform any other duty? Are not church officers too indifferent to the interests of religion in this respect? Can the cause of Christ prosper to any desirable extent, in the church while their own children are not properly trained? And while their example is followed by others, Can parents offer any just excuse for themselves, while they leave it to their children whether they will regard the Sabbath "according to the commandment," whether they will attend the house of God or not! and whether they will demean themselves properly when there? Surely, in this respect as well as others, "A child left to himself bringeth his parents to shame." And will not christians add their influence and exertions to their prayers, that the abomination that makes desolate may not be allowed to enter the "holy place?" To the same extent only, as the Lord God is sanctified in the hearts of the hearers in any place, will His word and the ordinances of religion be properly appreciated. May every attendant at the gate of Zion always remember that "God is not the author of confusion, but of order." T.

To the Editors of the Register:

Gentlemen:—I am happy to observe that in the Register of this day's date, (Nov. 3d,) you have announced an important and feasible arrangement for aiding the cause of temperance.

The following paragraph from your pen, furnishes me with a text on which I feel inclined to comment for a moment:—

"In proffering our aid for the support of temperance principles, we disclaim any hostility to those men throughout the country who keep houses for the public accommodation, and continue the trafic in intoxicating drinks. It is the practice we want discontinued, without the injury of any, and to the benefit of all."

When we reflect how many there are who are liable to misconstrue the motives of those who engage in advancing the various enterprises of reform, your disclaimer of "hostility," may be regarded as appropos in no less degree than it is characteristic; but a moment's reflection will convince any candid mind, that your proposal bears a most benevolent aspect towards all those landlords who yet "continue the trafic in intoxicating drinks."

Tavern-keeping is a responsible and respectable business. I speak of it as an occupation designed to provide a temporary home for the weary traveller. Who does not like to sing,

"Home, sweet home"!

And when a man, far away from his own cheerful fireside, feels that

"There is no place like home"—

he cannot fail to greet with joy the well-kept "INN," "house of entertainment," (so says the dictionary,) where he is to make himself as much at home as he can, for the night.

This is the way I try to look at tavern-keeping, wishing to extricate the word from that painful association, which, from long erroneous custom and deleterious statute enactments, assails the mind at the first mention of it.

The vending of intoxicating drinks—is that business to be considered as a proper appendage to the provisions of a home for the wayfaring man? This has been the misjudged demand of thousands, and from this great error we now seek deliverance. To retail poisonous beverage! Who can believe that a respectable proprietor of a traveler's home, would consent that this disgusting excrescence, should be regarded as a part and parcel of his otherwise respectable employment, if he did not suppose that a virtuous public demanded such work of him? Let the public demonstrate that they do not make this demand, and the landlord will say, "I thank you, gentlemen, I am happy to be relieved from this conscience-tormenting drudgery." Your temperance project, therefore, Messrs. Editors, looks directly "to the benefit of all"—not excluding landlords themselves.—Success, success! gentlemen.

Yours, TEMPERANCE.

WHO PRAYS FOR OUR COUNTRY TO-DAY!

I trust many do. It is the day on which the choice of citizens in this state, and in several other states, is expressed for rulers; or rather I should say, for public servants, or agents. To God we must go for help, or there can be no help for us as a nation. O that we felt this more deeply!

God can help us to maintain those fundamental principles of impartial liberty which our revolutionary fathers espoused, and bequeathed as a rich legacy to us, that we might develope them until liberty shall be proclaimed to all the inhabitants of the land.

My heart is refreshed by a sentiment which I find at the close of a letter which I this morning received from a valuable correspondent; the subject of our correspondence is, constitutional ecclesiastical action against slavery, by Presbyterians in central and Western New York. He says—

"I hope we may be directed by the wisdom which is from above in this important matter. My opinion is, that we are to look mainly to the church of Christ for the extermination of this evil. Salvation to the slave must come out of ZION." Amen! Amen! my heart responds. Therefore let the friends of Zion gird themselves for the work, and expect success from God.

For the Register.

What is religion? In what does it consist? While we pass through the vast domains of earth, and tender to each devotee this important question, on which hangs the destiny of the immortal soul, How diverse the response? Some think that this forever blasts all mortal hopes to reach the acme of the spirit's strong desire, and settle down in inglorious, joyless ease; a prey to doubt and lank despair: faintly hoping yet to learn that which they believe to exist, but know not where to find—the true religion. While others from this, through false axioms, draw the conclusion that all the anxiety of man is but a flight of the mind; baseless and hopeless—there is no God; consequently, no true religion. Like the man who has never heard of, has overlooked or despised the telescopic power; turning his eyes to the vast orbs of light unaided; becomes bewildered, lost in thought, and shrinks back into his former meanness to grovel in the dust: so have these through ignorance and arrogance withdrawn their gaze from glorious light, to bind it to earth, contemning true religion. A darker cloud than this never need to be drawn over the mind, to blot out every ray of light, and shroud in night all human kind. But while these falter, reject and despise, follow for one moment the humble aspirant for the gem of life. While he views the discordance in the belief of man, yet finds that they all merge into this—life beyond the tomb—he argues, that which attracts as to a common center all mankind, must be of power divine, no ignus fatuus of the mind. Thus basing his hope on a just theorem, he proceeds, aided by the light of nature, reason, and revelation, in search of that foundation on which he may "stand unmoved amid the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds." And where does he find it? He looks upon the worshipers of fire, of Vishnoo and Gaudama, and the hosts of images and names used as symbols of the true, and of imaginary deities. He follows them into their temples and groves; they are stained with blood and adorned with the bones of human sacrifices. He follows them in their vigils and orgies. He looks upon their temples founded in blood, and reeking in human gore; the more humble kind with its uncarved posts, transfixed the body of some hapless victim, while for those of lofty dome, and rich in sculptured beauty—whole hecatombs of men do perish as incense to their Gods. He follows these worshipers into their political and social circles, and the same darkness that reigns in their religious rites, controls here. Self-love, licentiousness, and pride, rage with epidemic power, and man is leveled near to the brute. Darkness! horrible darkness! With a sad and sickened heart he turns from the scene, exclaiming, This cannot be true religion! Next, he turns to the followers of the Prophet, and examines the virtues of Islamism. Their gilded mosques and places of prayer, all scrupulously pointing to the tomb of the prophet, may fitly be considered as corruptions of Jewish and Christian worship. Their extreme punctuality in all their ablutions and prayers are striking features in their religion. But when he sees that it is but form, and form so arranged as not to interfere with the growth of corruptions in the heart, but will permit a man in the intervals of duty to prosecute rapine, murder, and lust—and that it confines the principles of charity in practice to its own devotees—and there makes it something which might be called almost any thing rather than itself—he finds no rest therein to ease his weary soul—and their heaven—a ball-room—a feast of sensualities—a revel in all iniquitous courses made holy. Are these what he desires? He has tried them upon earth and found them fleeting. They have become vapid and have palled upon his senses. He wants a heaven more spiritual, more pure. He is sick of earthly pleasures, nor wants it more hereafter. He says this life and heaven cannot be that of the true religion. He leaves Gaudama, Mahomet, and their thousand compeers and turns to Christianity. Entering its portals at Rome, he is awed with its cathedrals, its formulas of vespers, matins, consecration of the host, and other rituals. But amid all the splendor of cathedrals and chapels, the pomp of the prietshood, and the imposing awe of their worship; he finds not the love and meekness that his Bible declares to be the characteristic of those that are born of God. He looks upon the professed followers of Christ throughout the world. He sees them divided and subdivided, contending and striving with their might for the mastery as though each had seized a limb of christianity and would sever it from the body, rather than yield the contest. Beholding the christian church thus, at first he recoils from the sight, thinking that it cannot contain the true religion. "He hears a voice behind him, saying, this is the way, walk ye in it." Then he remembers the words of the Scriptures, "They are not all Israel that are of Israel," "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of all kinds," "Many shall seek to enter in and shall not be able," &c. And by the light of these, with other eyes he looks upon the church, and notwithstanding there are many "who have stole the livery of the court of Heaven to serve the devil in," and many who through ignorance and weakness stumble far and wide; yet he finds a humble few who bring forth fruits meet for repentance—who bear the image of the heavenly—who love one another with a pure heart, fervently. With these he associates. He goes with these to the sanctuary. There he finds no boasting; but deep repentance and humble confession of sins. Their hearts burning with love to God and zeal in his service; they spread forth their hands and invoke the blessings of Heaven upon the church and the world He follows them in their toils through the week, and while they are industrious and laborious in their callings, temperate in pleasures: he finds it is not because they love gold, (they hoard up no treasures,) but because they love God. They labor that they may have to give to them that need—that they may help sustain the servants of the cross at home and abroad, and spread the word of God and Gospel light o'er the lands of darkness and misery. Their hearts bleed at the sight of other's woes. "They weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice." He follows them in their visits of charity, and sees them from their stores relieve their fellow's wants, and that no hovel is so wretched, or its inmates so low that he cannot enter, relieve with his hands, soothe with his words, and help with his prayers, those on whom affliction rests, or whom sin has beguiled. They seek not the glare of light in which to work, that all men may see and praise. They cringe not for the favors of the great, and bow to none but God. Before him they humbly bow, own themselves strangers on earth, and seekers of a heavenly home. With admiration he beholds the lustre of their lamb-like christian garb, and learns that there is benevolence without other interest than that of enjoying the presence of God's love, and the pleasure of doing good. Exulting he exclaims, "I have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph." This is the true religion.

Let every nation bow,
And every soul adore,
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] the spirit from above,
[illegible] the heart with light and love;
[illegible] to man in every region,
[illegible] the true religion.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

FROM CHINA.

The ship Delhi, announced by us yesterday brings no particular news from Canton. She left Whampoa reach on the 3d of June, and passed Macao on the 5th. The English fleet had not arrived, but the Delhi passed an English war steamer, within two days sail of the Chinese coast.

The report of the destruction of the forts at the Bogue, by the English, is not absolutely contradicted by this arrival. That report came from Bombay, date there July 23; the squadron might have arrived and destroyed the forts after the Delhi left, and the tidings still have reached Bombay by the 23d July. We think the report, however, not very likely to be true.—Spectator.

CANTON, May 30, 1840.

It now appears quite certain that a strong British force will be sent on here, and that its appearance may be looked for about the 1st or 15th of July, at latest. Of the plan of operations, nothing is known to us, but the impression is general that the first step will be to take possession of and to hold the Bogue forts and the city of Canton. Those now resident here are in consequence narrowing down their engagements as much as possible, in order to be able to leave Canton on the arrival of the force, should it be found necessary to do so.

The effect of the intelligence from Singapore has been favorable to our market for imports, particularly for cotton, in which there has been some advance. In piece goods we cannot report an improvement in prices, but dealers evince more willingness to purchase than they have of late done.—We quote the prices, offered by purchasers.

FROM TEXAS

The New Orleans papers of the 20th instant contain intelligence from Galveston to the 6th. The principal item is a rumor that the town of San Antonio had been attacked by the Cumanches, and that a severe conflict had ensued, in which several of the citizens were killed. This news comes only in the shape of rumor, brought by a traveler. Highly favorable accounts are given of the grain and cotton crops, but money is very scarce; of course prices are ridiculously low.

Gen. Felix Houston—the papers persist in calling him Houston—has issued his proclamation, inviting the citizens to join in an expedition against the Indians. He proposes to raise an army of 1600 men, and carry the war into the enemy's country.

The Texan agent in Mexico has written to his government that there is no prospect of an amicable arrangement between the two republics.

By a law of the last Congress the experiment of direct taxation has been set in full operation in Texas; the property of citizens pays a half and that of non-residents one per cent. per annum.

The steam ships New York and Savannah are to ply regularly between Galveston and New Orleans.

Extract from a letter to a gentleman in Cincinnati, dated Colorado City, (opposite La Grange, on the Colorado,) Sept. 26, 1840.

"We have the finest prospects in the world for the rapid improvement of our country. Crops are splendid. Corn has been sold at 25 cents per bushel on the Colorado, between this place and Austin. The land on our prairie that you and I ploughed in our shirt sleeves on the 12th of last February, will produce 75 bushels per acre, even with Texas culture, which you know is none of the most scientific. A man gave me a few days since 600 lbs. of fodder and 5 bushels of corn, rather than pay me $5 in specie. The Colorado Valley can say to emigrants this year, come on, as many as wish; we will have enough for you all; millions of pecans, plumbs and grapes grow wild in our forests. Hogs seem to spring up like magic, and our prairies begin to be dotted over with cattle.

"The Mexicans and Indians are not thought of here, only as objects of news at distance. We feel, and are as secure, as you are at Cincinnati. The valley of Buckner's Creek, a lovely tract southwest of this, well timbered, rolling land, is just filling up with emigrants, who, by winter, will form a strong settlement. Captain F. from Troy, New York, an intelligent millwright, has recently arrived here, and bought 400 acres of excellent land on Buckner's Heights; he is now preparing to erect a saw and a grist mill and a dwelling house. He is cutting his land into smaller farms, for three or four families that he expects this winter from New York state.

"We have had a pleasant summer and timely rains. The prospect of the cotton crop in those parts of Texas where its culture has been attempted, is very good.—But comparatively few of our farmers, however, have engaged in its culture, owing to the influx of emigrants, which creates a good demand for provisions. The export of cotton from Jackson county alone, will be from 7 to 800 bales. A good deal is shipped from Galveston directed to England and France; and I see by a late New Orleans paper, that the import of cotton at that port alone, from Texas, the past year, was about 4,000 bales. Last year it was rather less than 3,000.

"Fruits and vegatables have done nobly this season. Our crop of peaches was truly immense. Figs thrive well. Colonel Morgan, at New Washington, on Galveston Bay, has some hundreds of fig and orange trees of full growth. Another gentleman, near Texana, has a large orchard of fig trees in bearing. Vegetables of almost all kinds have been raised in great abundance, for the first time since the settlement of this country; thanks, in part, to the Yankees, who supplied us so liberally with garden seeds last spring.

"Mr. F. Ernst, of Industry, near the Brassos, where you stopped last winter, has gone into the culture of the Cuba tobacco and manufacture of cigars, which good judges speak well of. I do not see what should prevent tobacco from becoming a great staple with us, as well as with Cuba."—Cincinnati Chronicle.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.

TRENTON, Oct. 27.

The Legislature convened this afternoon, all the members being in their places except Mr. Vredenburgh, the member of Council from Monmouth.

In Council, Hon. Joseph Porter, of Gloucester, was elected Vice President, having received 11 votes, and Mr. Haines from Sussex, 4. Robert E. Hornor was re-elected Secretary, having 12 votes, and James D. Westcott 5, Halsey Canfield was re-elected Sergeant at arms.

In the House, John Emley, Esq. of Burlington, was elected Speaker, having received 41 votes, and George W. Smyth, of Warren, 12. Samuel Prior, Junior, of Salem, was elected clerk by the same vote, over William A. Benjamin. George M. Forman was re-appointed door keeper, without opposition. I give you a sketch of the proceedings of the House of Assembly.

A message from Council announced the organization and the names of its officers.

On motion of Mr. Lee, the following committee was appointed to wait on the Governor, who arrived this morning, viz: Messrs. Lee, A. Brittin, and George W. Smyth, on the part of the House. Messrs. Irick and Doremus are the committee of Council.

To-morrow we shall probably have a message from the Governor. The session will not extend, I presume, beyond this week.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

AN INTERESTING VOLUME.

A volume of letters by Mrs. ADAMS, the wife of John Adams, has just been published in Boston, of which the editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser affords two or three specimens. They are edited by her grandson, Charles Francis Adams, with a prefatory memoir. We have read them with that affectionate interest which pertains to such records of the sympathies, the fears, and the hopes of the patriots who were chiefly instrumental in achieving the National Independence. Mrs. Adams was the worthy companion of one among the first of those patriots in every vicissitude of his glorious career. The letter was written by her the day after the battle of Bunker's Hill. There is no despondency in its tone, altho' at that period only the bravest trusted in the ultimate triumph of the American arms. It is addressed to her husband.

Sunday, June 18, 1775.

Dearest Friend:—The day, perhaps the decisive day, is come on which the fate of America depends. My bursting heart must find vent at my pen. I have just heard that our dear friend, Dr. Warren, is no more; but fell, gloriously fighting for his country; saying, better to die honorably in the field than ignominiously upon the gallows.—Great is our loss. He has distinguished himself in every engagement, by his courage and fortitude, by animating the soldiers and leading them on by his own example. A particular account of these dreadful, but I hope glorious, days will be transmitted to you, no doubt, in the exactest manner.

"The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but the God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power to the people. Trust in him at all times, ye people, pour out your hearts before him. God is a refuge for us." Charlestown is laid in ashes. The battle began upon our entrenchments upon Bunker's Hill, Saturday morning about three o'clock, and has not ceased yet, and it is now three o'clock Sabbath afternoon.

It is expected that they must come over the Neck to-night, and a dreadful battle must ensue. Almighty God cover the heads of our countrymen, and be as a shield to our dear friends! How many have fallen we know not. The constant roar of the cannon is so distressing, that we cannot eat, drink, or sleep. May we be supported and sustained in the dreadful conflict! I shall tarry here till it is thought unsafe by my friends, and then I have secured a safe retreat at your brother's, who has kindly offered me a part of his house. I cannot compose myself to write at present. I will add more as I hear further.

Tuesday afternoon.

I have been so much agitated that I have not been able to write since Sabbath day. When I say that ten thousand reports are passing, vague and uncertain as the wind, I believe I speak the truth. I am not able to give you any authentic account of last Saturday, but you will not be destitute of intelligence. Colonel Palmer has just sent me word that he has an opportunity of conveyance. Incorrect as this scrawl will be, it shall go. I ardently pray that you may be supported through the arduous task you have before you. I wish I could contradict the report of the Doctor's death; but it is a lamentable truth, and the tears of multitudes pay tribute to his memory; these favorite lines of Collins continually sound in my ears.

How sleep the brave, &c.

I must close, as the Deacon waits.—I have not pretended to be particular with regard to what I have heard, because I know you will collect better intelligence. The spirits of the people are very good; the loss of Charlestown affects them no more than a drop of the bucket.

I am most sincerely yours.

Thus wrote Mrs. Adams, at the commencement of the war. Here is a most beautiful letter to Mr. Adams, written on the day that he as Vice President was to count the electoral votes before Congress, and declare himself elected to the Presidency.

"The sun is dressed in brightest beams
To give thy honors to the day."

And may it prove an auspicious prelude to each ensuing season. You have this day to declare yourself head of a nation. "And now, O LORD my God that hast made thy servant ruler over the people. Give unto him an understanding heart, that he may know how to go out and how to come in before this great people: that he may discern between good and bad. For who is able to judge this thy so great a people?" were the words of a royal sovereign, and not less applicable to him who is invested with the Chief Magistracy of a nation, though he wears not a crown nor the robes of royalty. My thoughts and my meditations are with you, though personally absent, and my petitions to Heaven are, that "the things which make for peace may not be hidden from your eyes." My feelings are not those of pride or ostentation upon the occasion. They are solemnized by a sense of the obligations, the important trusts, and numerous duties connected with it. That you may be enabled to discharge them with honor to yourself, with justice and impartiality to your country, and with satisfaction to this great people, shall be the daily prayer of your A. A.

A volume thus filled is most welcome.—Our countrywomen may be proud of it, for she who frankly uttered these sentiments has illustrated the brightest virtues of her sex.—Nat. Gaz.

Missionary Enterprise.—It is said to be the intention of the London Missionary Society to send a missionary to the city of Rome. This, we believe, to be a measure of great moment. The man sent should be a person of remarkable circumspection, and he should be well known to the foreigners inhabiting the Imperial City. Of course he should be under the protection of his own government through the British Consul.—Under such circumstance, he could not be removed by the secret emissaries of the Inquisition without his disappearance being made a subject of national inquiry.

We believe the city of Rome to be missionary ground, furnishing, in the ignorance of the inhabitants regarding evangelical truth, and in the awakening inquiries for knowledge, as urgent a call for the heralds of peace and salvation, as when first visited by the Christians from Jerusalem. And certainly the Pope cannot be, either in the extent of his power, or the fierceness of his wrath, so fell a lion as Nero from whom, still, God for a while delivered the Apostle Paul, as well as those who preceded him, and made the persecutions that fell upon them redound greatly the spread of the truth. —Bap. Adv.

The Western Christian Advocate, a Methodist paper, announces its determination henceforth to destroy as soon as received, all communications not accompanied with the real name of the writer. Such a determination is proper and consistent. If a writer is not willing to entrust his name to the editor of a paper, he cannot reasonably expect his communcation to be read, much less to be published.—Bap. Adv.

GREAT MORTALITY AMONG THE LAST IMMIGRANTS.—We understand from a respectable gentleman who is now on a short visit here from Edina, that forty-two of the last emigrants by the Saluda, have died. They had been located at Bassa Cove, until Bexley was got ready for their accommodation,

The World's End.—During the last two or three centuries upwards of thirteen fixed stars have disappeared. One of them situated in the Northern Hemisphere, presented a peculiar briliancy, and was so bright as to be seen by the naked eye at mid-day. It seemed to be on fire, appearing at first of a dazzling white, then of a reddish yellow. and lastly of an ashy pale color. La Place supposes that it was burned up, as it has never been seen since. The conflagration was visible about sixteen months. How dreadful!—A whole system on fire, the great central luminary and its planets, with their plains, mountains, forests, villages, cities, and inhabitants, all on flames, consumed, and gone forever.

A man in Mercer county, Pa., the day after he was married, while standing with his wife by the side of a young horse with which he was playing, was kicked by another, and then dragged by the one whose halter he held till he was killed—his skull being dreadfully fractured.

SUMMARY.

Elections.—The returns from this state are not sufficiently full to indicate the result of the elections. Enough has been learned to render it probable that the Whigs have succeeded in electing their Governor, and that the Harrison electors are chosen. There will probably be a Whig loss in the Assembly. We hope to be able to give the official result in our next. The election in the city of New York is said to have been very quiet. Administration majority, 1,322.

Pennsylvania.—The vote in this state is probably closer than at any former election. Our opinion is, that the Administration party have the electoral vote of the state.

Rhode Island.—In this state the whigs have a majority of about 2,000.

Maryland is Whig by about 1,000 majority; so say the neutral papers.

Connecticut.—The Whig majority in this state is 6,373. Every county is said to have given a Whig majority.

Maine is reported to have gone for the Whigs.

Ohio.—There is said to be a great Whig gain since the election for state officers. Harrison's majority will be probably more than 20,000.

Virginia.—In twenty-four counties, nearly complete, Harrison majority 1,374. But the Whig papers say the gains must be proportionably heavier west of the mountains, in order to elect Gen. Harrison. We incline to the opinion that Mr. Van Buren has the electoral vote of this state.

New Jersey.—It is reported that this state has gone for the Whigs. Four counties, nearly complete, give Harrison a majority of 2,087.

New Hampshire.—In six counties, nearly complete, there is an administration majority of 3,316. Gain, since 1838, of 2,111.

Mormons.—There have lately arrived in this country, two hundred Mormons, from England, on their way to Quincy, (Ill.) Two thousand more are expected soon to arrive, destined to the same place.

Thursday, the 19th inst., has been appointed by the Governor of Connecticut, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer.

Miss Eleanor Macomber, who has been laboring as a Baptist missionary since 1830, four years among the Chippeway Indians, and five years nearly, in Burmah, died in that country on the 15th of April last, aged 39 years. She was devoted, zealous, and successful in her work.

Three American sea captains are said to have entered the service of the Chinese Government in the present war.

The British Wesleyan Conference commenced at New Castle, upon Tyne, on the 29th of July. Rev. Robert Newton who lately visited this country, was President. The whole number of members in the society throughout the world, is 428,729. Increase during the year, 22,559.

The President of Wabash College, Indiana, Rev. E. W. Baldwin, died on the 15th of October, of a protracted illness, aged 50 years.

The Presbyterian, published at Philadelphia, has expressed an opinion that a Presbyterian, that is, a member of the Old School assembly, ought not to commune with members of the New School, or of the Methodist connection.

Hon. John S. Spencer, U. S. Senator from Maryland, died at his residence in Worcester Co., on Thursday morning last.

Expeditious.—Newspapers were lately sold in the streets of New York, in less than fourteen days from the time they were issued from the London Press.

Dancing.—Fanny Ellsler, who has danced for the people of New York, forty-seven nights, has received the snug little sum of $60,000 for her services. What will she say to the Europeans on her return of the hard times in America?

Hon. John Q. Adams has engaged his services in behalf of the Amistad captives, as senior counsel, and is expected to make the closing argument in the Supreme Court, at Washington, at the final trial of the cause in January next.

Temperance.—The Roman Catholic Priest, who has been most successfully engaged as a temperance missionary, lately declared that his society numbered two millions and a half. A great diminution of crime, and the breaking up of whiskey distilleries, has been the result of his labors. The whiskey trade is said to be at an end.

Ordination.—Rev. Henry W. Dodge, a graduate of Columbian College, was ordained to the work of the ministry in Washington, D. C., on the 25th ultimo. Rev. D. Chapin and Rev. O. B. Brown, officiated. Illinois, it is said, is to be the future scene of his labors.

Rev. A. M'Clay has returned from England, whither he went some time since to secure the co-operation of the Baptists in that country in sustaining the translations of the scriptures, made by Baptist missionaries, in foreign lands. He has been successful. The English Baptists have formed a translation society of their own, and will co-operate with the American Baptists.

Twenty-five ministers have left the Universalists within the last six years; and more than sixty Societies have suspended the regular maintenance of preaching in the United States since 1830. Yet the number of societies and ministers have greatly increased during the same period.

The Sciota Baptist Asssociation received accession by Baptism of one hundred and forty during the past year.

Hon. John McLean, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, has published a volume of Reports of the Decisions of the Court in which he presides, of 600 octavo pages. It is expected the work will be continued, and other volumes issued.

There has been an Anti Slavery Convention held recently in New York by members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Anti Slavery journals say, there was a greater amount of piety and talent represented in this Convention than in any former one. Resolutions were passed censuring the action of the General Conference on the subject of Slavery. That church will be very fortunate, if a division is not the result of these movements.

An iron steamboat is now building at Louisville, Ky.

Two men were badly scalded some days since at Toronto, U. C. by the bursting of the boiler of the steamboat Gildersleeve.

A College is about to be established at Clinton, Miss., by the Methodists.

Ten thousand rupees is offered to the first Hindoo widow who may re-enter the married state by a wealthy Hindoo. The object would seem to be the abolition of the custom of burning widows on the funeral pile of their husbands.

POETRY.

From the Southern Literary Messenger.

THE POWER OF DEATH.

Inexorable death!
Come when thou wilt in thy therrific power,
Thou com'st unbidden—in unwelcome hour—
And all whose life is breath,
At thy approach—the myriads of the sea,
Of earth and air—submissive bow to thee.

All climes confess thy reign—
All tribes and people, civilized and rude,
In busy scene, in peaceful solitude,
And on the bounding main,
Must sink 'neath thy dominion firm and fast,
Like unremembered generations passed.

O'er all thou rul'st elate—
In earthquake, avalanche, and lava form,
In fire and famine, pestilence and storm,
And cup inebriate;
In infidel revenge, and bigot zeal,
Thou madly flam'st the pile, or bar'st the steel.

When war awakes in wrath,
Thou ridest furious on the arrow's wing,
And sabre's edge—thou rushest with the sling,
And tread'st the charger's path;
When carnage tires, in sullen state alone
Thou brood'st unseen, to hear the wounded groan.

I've passed through pleasant vales,
And sweet sequestered groves, where smiling peace
Blest sturdy labor with a rich increase—
There, thy recorded tales,
Tell, that the rustic in his humble field,
Thou strik'st as sure as warrior on the field.

The mightiest of the brave—
At whose great bidding nations bend the knee—
Must, at thy summons, yield his life to thee,
Obedient as a slave.
Kings, priests, and sages, like the unlettered clown
Who turns the sod, shall to the grave go down.

Look where the pious throng
In holy aisle for worship congregate—
And where the independent crowd debate
A real or fancied wrong;
Or look, where judges sit, and statesmen stand—
Thou hoverest near, with dart-uplifted hand.

Gaze on the father's face,
When wife and children gather round the hearth;
While he instructs, she, partial, guides their mirth—
How happy is the place!
Yet, in the moment of his pride or prayer,
Thou com'st unseen, and strik'st the dearest there.

Around my humble hearth,
A loving wife and prattling children smile,
Whose winning ways my weary cares beguile
With unrestricted mirth.
Destroyer Death! thy visit there delay—
Oh spare the loved, till some far future day!

But soon the feeble hand
That vainly pens this ineffectual lay,
Shall passive sink beneath thy awful sway,
And join the spectre band.
Then, Heaven, on thee the father will rely,
To shield his orphans, and their wants supply!

Thou, who from pole to pole
Sustain'st with wond'rous skill earth's mighty round,
And guid'st thro' space, hast Death in limits bound—
And the immortal soul—
The precious gift—he only come to free,
But dares not touch—it soars unharmed to Thee.

When dawns the day of doom,
At the dread trumpet's sound, and sun and skies,
Dissolved, the good and guilty shall arise
To judgment from the tomb!
Then, to the King of kings thou shalt restore
Thy sceptre, Death, and reign on earth no more!

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE BURNING SHIP.

For many years I had never heard from home, but still the fond remembrance of early enjoyments in that sweet spot clung to my soul, and became the subject of many sketches from my pencil, some of which the captain had taken to ornament his cabin. Agnes, in all her loveliness, was always present in my imagination; prompting me to many an honorable action, and restraining me from every thing which could bring discredit on my affection. To her dear image I was indebted for the respect and esteem I enjoyed from every one on board. The master's mate had been promoted to a lieutenancy, and I was appointed to fill the vacant station. Often did I rejoice in my heart at the prospect of once more embracing those who were so dear to me; and as often did the sickening sensations of distracting doubt agitate my breast.

One lovely evening, the sky was beautifully serene—the ocean, like a clear mirror, reflected the golden rays of the setting sun and the light breeze just lulled the spreading sails to sleep, propelling the ship almost imperceptibly along, at the rate of three knots an hour. It was one of those evenings that baffle the painter's art, and only the poet can portray. The first watch was drawing to a close; it had struck 11 bells; the seamen on the look-out had proclaimed "all's well!" and every thing was again hushed to solemn stillness. I was standing on the gangway, full of pensive musings, watching a bright star, just kindling on the verge of the horizon; it beamed like a ray of hope irradiating the gloom which hung heavily upon my heart. Suddenly it expanded like a glowing meteor, and the ocean was illuminated with a red and gory tinge. I was struck with astonishment; but at the same moment an exclamation resounded fore and aft, "A ship on fire! a ship on fire!" and the horrid conviction was, alas! too evident. In a few minutes the flames were distinctly visible, and the ship was pronounced to be above five miles distant. Never before did I witness such alacrity among our crew as in that hour of peril. The captain, and every officer and man were on deck immediately, and as it was impossible for the frigate to approach in sufficient time to rescue the sufferers, before ten minutes had elapsed from the period of first noticing the fire, every boat was in motion towards the scene of danger. It fell to my lot to command the captain's gig, a swift-pulling boat with seven men, who bent to their oars with all the might of brave and generous spirits. As we drew near, the destructive element raged with increasing fury; and the shrieks of the wretched creatures came mingling with the crackling of the flames and the crash of falling masts. The frigate had fired guns and hoisted lights to show that succour was at hand; the boat's crew occasionally cheered, to announce that they were approaching to the rescue.

The shouts were returned from the burning ship, but so wild, so fearful, they sounded like the expiring yell of agony that still clung to hope and life. I would have dashed instantly alongside, but the old coxswain respectfully warned me of the danger of such a measure, "as the boat," he said, "would instantly be swamped by the crowds that would rush into her." We are now within a short distance of the vessel, and oh! what a sight of horror was presented! The ports were all open, and the flames pouring from them as from so many mouths, seemed eager for their prey. Numbers of poor creatures were swimming towards us, while others held pieces of shattered spars, with strong convulsive grasp. The fore part of the ship was nearly consumed, and the upper part abaft was rapidly falling in. Those who could swim, we left for other boats to take up; and pulling under the stern, we lay unobserved, by the gun-room ports, while the fiery fragments came tumbling thick about us. Trusting to my skill in swimming, should it be deemed requisite to jump overboard, I instantly entered the port hole; and the ship having turned before the wind, what little air there was drove the greatest part of the smoke forward; yet there was an almost insupportable heat, and the suffocating vapors bid defiance to my efforts to penetrate further. A feeling I cannot account for—an indescribable feeling—urged me on, and I reached the gun-room ladder, at the bottom of which lay a human being, whose sufferings apparently were over. I passed my hand quickly to her heart and discovered that the individual was a female; she was yet living, and in a few moments she was safely in the boat.

Again I returned with three of my crew, and soon had the satisfaction of rescuing eight poor wretches, who lay in a state of insensibility, and must soon have perished. Stimulated by success, we penetrated to the burning deck above; and never shall I forget the horror of the spectacle. Here all was brilliancy. Several half burned and mangled bodies could be distinguished in the flames.

Near the transom sat a mother with an infant in her arms. She heeded me not, but clasped it closer to her bosom—gave one wild shriek, and mortal agony was over. The infant was secured. Numbers that remained sought refuge in the sea. The female I had saved was still in insensible. The worthy coxswain had wrapped the infant in his jacket, and it was now sweetly sleeping in a box by his side.

In the bow of the boat a gray-headed man exclaimed, "My son, my daughter—where are they?" Another voice feebly uttered, "My father." It was Sir Edward's son. The female was raised in my arms, and I recognised my Agnes!

My boat the second time was filled, and we made for the frigate. Suddenly, an awful explosion shook the whole atmosphere, the glare of light was for a moment increased—the next, a shower of blazing timbers fell in every direction around; and the pale moon alone shed her silvery effulgence on the transparent wave. No shouts, no shrieks were to be heard; the bitterness of death had passed, and all was tranquil as the grave. Happily the burning ruins had struck none of the boats. The boat then again repaired to the place, but except the shattered fragments of the wreck, no trace was left; the swelling billow rolled smoothly on—and that gallant ship, with many a stout heart, was buried beneath its deceitful surface. Still we passed across and across, in every direction, and long after the sun had kindled up the day, our search was continued—but nothing met our view, except mutilated fragments of human bodies, and pieces of blackened timber.—All hands repaired on board, the boats were hoisted in, and the frigate pursued her way to England.

THE MAID OF MOSCOW:

OR, WAR FATAL TO THE HAPPINESS OF WOMAN.

Moscow was in ruins; and the French soldiers while eagerly searching every part of a ruined church, perceived a lamp at the end of a dark gallery, glimering on a small altar. They immediately proceeded towards it, and found there a young female elegantly dressed, and kneeling in the attitude of devotion. At the noise of the soldiers the unhappy girl screamed violently, and fell into a swoon. In this condition she was carried before a French general. Her countenance, in which grief and despair were equally blended, was irresistibly interesting. As her recollection returned, she seemed to deprecate the care that had been taken in recalling her to life. The general begged her to relate her misfortunes.

"Of what use," said she, "would it be to mention to you the woes of house, that will soon be annihilated. Suffice it, that the name of my father is celebrated in the history of your empire, and that he is now serving with distinction in the army which is gloriously fighting in defence of our country.

"My name is Paulowna. On the day preceding your entrance in Moscow, I was to have been united to one of the young warriors who had distinguished himself at the battle of Majaisk. But in the midst of our nuptial solemnities, my father was informed that the French were at the gates of the city! and, suspending our marriage, and taking my husband with him, they hastened to join the army. Our anxieties grew apace. The next morning, as I sat with our afflicted family, we heard the roar of cannon. The noise evidently came nearer; and we no longer doubted that we must quit Moscow. We instantly fled; but when we arrived near the Kremlin, an immense crowd met us, and rushing hastily by, parted me from my mother and sisters. I endeavored to call them by cries; but the noise of arms, and the shouts of an infuriated populace, entirely overpowered my feeble voice.

"The French meanwhile penetrated into the town, and driving all before them, advanced towards the Kremlin. To find a shelter from their excesses, I ran with many others into the citadel, which was considered as a place of security. As I could not mix with the combatants, I retired to the church of St. Michael, seeking refuge among the graves of the czars. Kneeling near the sepulchres, I was invoking the names of those illustrious founders of our country, when on a sudden some brutal soldiers broke in upon my retreat, and dragged me from a sacred and inviolable asylum."

When the wretched girl had finished her story, she burst into a flood of tears, and, throwing herself at the general's feet, implored him to respect her virtue, and restore her to her relatives. The general, pretending to pity her misfortunes, pledged himself to relieve them. He offered his house as a protection, and promised to use his endeavors to discover her father and distressed mother; but this apparent generosity was only a snare to deceive the innocent Pawlona, and make, as he did, the victim of his treachery and brutal passions.

This tale is only a specimen of what occurs in the capture of every city; and an extract from Labaume, an eye-witness of what he relates, may suggest the extent to which such deeds of hell were perpetrated. "The terrific dread which reigned in every mind, was heightened in the dead of night by the shrieks of the unfortunate creatures who were massacred, and the cries of young females who fled for refuge to the palpitating bosoms of their mothers, and whose ineffectual struggles served only to inflame the passions of their violators. The soldiers gave themselves up to the most unbridled licentiousness. No retreat was safe. No respect was paid to nobility of blood, innocence of youth, or tears of beauty.

Political Ambition—its end.—While the Presidential election is the all engrossing topic, it is fitting that we should try to bring valuable instruction from it. And we know not in what way we can do it better, than by pointing to the end or all successful ambitions in politics. John Q. Adams declared in Congress, that the four years of his presidency were the most unhappy years of his life. And an article which is going the rounds of the papers, makes one of Mr. Van Buren's friends say, that the cares of office, have so exhausted his frame, that he appears like a man recovering from a long and severe sickness. Here then is a true picture of the happiness, gained by reaching the highest post of political honor. The elevation to that honor, for which so many of our leading politicians are sighing, and making such immense sacrifices, is only a plunge into an ocean of cares and vexations.

And yet with the undoubting knowledge of this fact, there are thousands of the leading minds in the political world, who would be willing to assume that post, though it were in a degree ten-fold of what it is, a bed of thorns. Thus, we see, that ambition charges the mind with a spirit at war with its own peace; and seeks gratification by rushing, with open eyes, right into a scene of wretchedness. It is a fever of mind, or rather a delirium, which seeks to alleviate itself by painful inflictions. As the man possessed of the devil, was found cutting himself with stones, to relieve his anguish, so these show themselves possessed with a spirit similar to that of him who caught a fall from heaven to hell, by seeking to climb higher and take the throne of God.

And the spirit which actuates all office-seekers, high or low, is the same, and from the same service, and tending to the same unhappy results. So far as the present political agitations are made by the struggles of ambitious men for office, they present the spectacle of thousands, of the most gifted men of the nation, contending for a prize of wretchedness, and the privilege of making themselves unhappy. Truly "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!"—Puritan.

TRUE MORAL COURAGE.

The Rev. Mr. Fletcher had a very wild and profligate nephew in the army, a man who had been dismissed from the Sardinian service for very bad conduct. He had engaged in two or three duels, and had spent all his money in vice and folly. The wicked youth waited one day on his eldest uncle, Gen. De Gons, and presenting a loaded pistol threatened to shoot him unless he would that moment advance him five hundred crowns. The General, though a brave man, well knew what a desperate fellow he had to deal with, and gave a draft for the money, at the same time speaking freely to him on his conduct.—The young man rode off in high spirits with his ill-gotten money. In the evening passing the door of his younger uncle, Mr. Fletcher, he called on him and began with informing him what Gen. De Gons had done; and as a proof, showed a draft under De Gons' own hand. Mr. Fletcher took the draft from his nephew and looked at him with surprise; then, after some remarks, putting it into his pocket, said; "It strikes me, young man, that you have possessed yourself of this note by some wrong method; and in conscience, I cannot return it but with my brother's knowledge and approbation." The nephew's pistol was in a moment at his breast. "My life," replied Mr. Fletcher, with perfect calmness, "is secure in the protection of an almighty power; nor will he suffer it to be the forfeit of my integrity and your rashness." This firmness drew from the nephew the observation, that his uncle De Gons, though an old soldier, was more afraid of death than his brother. "Afraid of death!" replied Mr. Fletcher, "do you think I have been twenty-five years a minister of the Lord of life, to be afraid of death now? No, sir, it is for you to be afraid of death. You are a gamester and a cheat; yet call yourself a gentleman! You are the seducer of female innocence; and still say you are a gentleman! Look there, sir," pointing to the heavens, "the broad eye of heaven is fixed upon us. Tremble in the presence of your Maker, who can in a moment kill your body and forever punish your soul in hell."

The unhappy young prodigal turned pale and trembled with fear and rage. He still threatened his uncle with instant death.—Fletcher though thus threatened, gave no alarm, sought for no weapon, and attempted not to escape. He calmly conversed with his profligate relation, and at last perceiving him to be affected, addressed him in the kindest language, till he fairly disarmed and subdued him. He would not return his brother's draft, but engaged to procure for the young man some immediate relief. He then prayed with him, and after fulfilling his promise of assistance, parted with him with much good advice on one side, and many fair promises on the other.

MARRIAGE.

One of the most remarkable features of this extraordinary institution, is the successive changes it undergoes in the course of its history. When the young husband and wife first enter upon the new relation, how little do they foresee what is before them.—As they take possession for the first time, of their new house, and enjoy its cheering aspect, its regularity and quiet, and its expression of domestic peace and joy, how little do they anticipate the trials and vicissitudes, the deep and yet unseen fountains of joy and sorrow, which lie in their way! In a few years how changed! One after another has been added in various ways, to the company which began only with two until at length they find themselves presiding over a numerous circle of children, and relatives, and domestics! the father and mother both involved in responsibilities, from which they would have altogether shrunk had they anticipated them at the beginning. In a few years this happy circle must be broken in upon and scattered.—Death comes and makes one and another his prey; others gradually arrive at maturity, and leave their father's roof to seek other homes, and to return no more to the ark which sheltered them at first; and at last, the father and mother are left alone, to spend their declining years at their solitary fireside, to look back on scenes of activity, and trial, and enjoyment, which can never return. Such is the outline of thousands of families.

COFFEE.

The use, or rather abuse, of coffee, is said to produce feverish heat, anxiety, palpitation, trembling, weakness of sight, and predisposition to apoplexy. The quality and effects of coffee, however, differ according to the manner in which it is roasted. If undone, its virtues will not be imparted, and its infusions will load and oppress the stomach; if it be overdone, its properties will be destroyed, it will heat the body and act as an astringent. Musgave and Percival recommended its use in asthma; indeed, most persons laboring under that distressing malady seem to derive benefit from its use. The principle of coffee is the caffein, discovered by Robiquet, in the year 1821; and it is to this active principle that its beneficial or baneful effects can be attributed. Recent experiments tend to show that is possessed of powerful subrifuge virtues. To obtain this result, raw coffee has been used. It gives to water a greenish hue, and thus saturated has been called the citrine of coffee. Grindel has used this preparation in the treatment of intermittent fevers in the Russian hospital of Dorpat; he also administered the raw coffee in powder. In eighty cases of this fever, scarcely any resisted the power of this medicine, given either in powder, decoction, or extract; but he seems to consider the latter form the most effectual. From this physician's observations, coffee may become a valuable addition to our materia medica, and the homœopathic practitioners maintain that they have employed it with great success in various maladies.—Dr. Milligen.

Maxims of Bishop Middleton.—Persevere against discouragements. Keep your temper. Employ leisure in study, and always have some work in hand. Be punctual and methodical in business, and never procrastinate. Never be in a hurry. Preserve self-possession, and do not be talked out of a conviction. Rise early, and be an economist of time. Maintain dignity, without the appearance of pride; manner is something with every body, and everything with some. Be guarded in discourse; attentive and slow to speak. Never acquiesce in immoral or pernicious opinions.—Be not forward to assign reasons to those who have no right to ask. Think nothing in conduct unimportant and indifferent.—Rather set, than follow examples. Practise strict temperance; and, in all your transactions, remember the final account.

The way to be happy.—Believe all that God has spoken; do all that he has commanded; and expect all that he has promised.

Fear nothing but sin.

THE USEFUL CHILD.

If I recollect right, she was but ten years old when she died. Her father is a minister of the Gospel. One day as he was relating to me the afflictions through which he had passed, he spoke of this little daughter who died rejoicing in the Savior. On the day of her death many of her father's hearers were at the house. Among them was found a colored servant girl, who had walked several miles that she might look upon little Emeline's face once more. Emeline had met her in the Sabbath school, and had there assisted her to learn to read, and had told her of Jesus. This was the secret of the attachment. Such a visit bestowed more true honor upon the departing hour of that sweet child, than all the ungodly world ever gave to the memory of its greatest favorities.

THE FLIGHT OF TIME.

Time is like the weaver's shuttle. It is now November, 1840. It seems but a moment since 1830. The ten years—how like the shuttle they have glided! Ten more will glide as rapidly. The date will soon be, one thousand eight hundred and fifty. But where shall we then be? If here, amid what scenes? If we shall not be found in this world—Where shall we be? Time is man's path-way to eternity.

RELIGIOUS.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

REPENTANCE, AS ASCRIBED TO GOD.

Repentance, in its simplest and most accurate signification, implies a change of purpose and design; and in that sense, the expression cannot be descriptive of the procedure of the Supreme Being. From his eternal purpose he cannot swerve, in his resolutions he cannot change, for "God is not a man, that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent." But the term repentance so often inscribed to God in the Holy Scriptures, has reference not to his eternal purposes, but to his outward administration, having respect to decisions which are not absolute; but conditional. The Lord issues certain promises to be fulfilled upon conditions of obedience. He denounces certain threatenings to be executed in the event of a continuance in ungodliness—and yet in the counsels of God it is well known, whether those promises and denunciations shall effect that for which they have been set forth; but seeing that the eternal counsels of God are unseen, and cannot therefore affect the free agency of the creature, the Lord employs such means as are naturally calculated to accomplish his own righteous purposes with men, altogether irrespective of those eternal decrees which are open only to the infinite mind.

All God's purposes towards men while they continue in this world, are purposes of mercy and compassion. God's warnings, and threatenings, and judgments are sent, not for the punishment of men, but "for their profit." His visitations are intended for correction, not for vengeance; for when God threatens judgment, his object is not to destroy, but to deliver; by his terrors to awaken the perverse from their perversity, to lead them to repent and to seek after salvation. Times have been, when God has stretched out his hand in wrath, and sent forth his vengeance, unmingled with mercy, before the eyes of an astonished world.—So the fiery tempest descended upon the cities of the Plain. So the floods of the Red Sea overwhelmed the rebellious King of Egypt with his host. So the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up Korah and his company of profaners. In those instances, mercy was manifested towards the survivors, because to them the judgment was exhibited as a warning; but in as far as the sufferers were concerned, the divine visitation was exclusively punitive, inasmuch as there was no farther time or space given them to repent; but as long as life is spared, mercy is still offered, and grace is still free; and from amid the thickest clouds of divine judgment, the voice of love is heard proclaiming, "fury is not in me saith the Lord;" proving that the subject of all such afflictive dispensations is this, to correct the sinner's perversity, so as to render all further judgment unnecessary.

This will appear more obvious, if we consider that it is with the creature as sinful and impenitent, that God is offended. Guilt awakens all the controversy between God and man; and towards the creature, though a transgressor, God is still full of all compassion. But while he pitieth the sinner, he hateth the sin. With judgment he visiteth it. He warneth the sinner not to persist in it. He denounceth wrath and eternal vengeance as the unfailing and necessary consequences of unrepented, and unforsaken guilt. If those threatened judgments produce not the desired result, then is God faithful to execute his threatened vengeance; but if those warnings and threatenings, have the effect of inducing the sinner to forsake his sin, so soon as he turns from his evil way, the threatened judgments of Jehovah cease to be applicable to the penitent—because the sin which called the menace forth has been abandoned. In accordance with this view the Lord saith by the mouth of the prophet—"At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation—to pluck up, or to pull down and destroy it;—Jeremiah xviii: 7—10—if that nation return from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them—if they do evil, I will repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them."

When therefore in scripture, God is spoken of as repenting, the expression indicates no alteration in his nature and purposes, "no variableness or shadow of turning" in the arrangements of his moral government. All those are fixed and immutable. Properly speaking no change at all is undergone, so far as the Divine Being is concerned. The whole change is upon man. The threatened judgments of God are not executed, but those judgments were threatened against the rebellion and impenitence whereby the creature was defiled—and the judgments were only withdrawn when the creature had abandoned the corruptions that called for vengeance. In all this, God is still the same; hating sin, and menacing the creature with wrath while he persists in it; loving righteousness and promising favor to the creature who turneth from his sins unto the Lord, all fulfilling the words of his promise; Isaiah lv: 7. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord; and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

The preceding remarks to my mind are as satisfactory as they are resplendent, and evangelical; being equally consistent with reason, experience, truth, justice, mercy, holiness, and peace.

G.

CONSCIENCE.

Christ with a word can surging waves appease;
His voice a troubled soul can quickly ease.

Observation.—When the sea works, and is tempestuous, it is not in the power of any creature to appease it. When the Egyptians would by their hieroglyphics express an impossibility, they did it by the picture of a man treading upon the waves. It is storied of Canute, an ancient Danish king, that when a mighty storm of flattery arose upon him, he appeased it by showing that he could not appease the sea. But one of his courtiers told him, as he rode near the sea-side, that he was lord of the sea as well as land. Well, said the king, we shall see that by and by; and so went to the water-side, and with a loud voice cried, "O ye seas and waves, come no further, touch not my feet." But the sea came up, notwithstanding that charge, and confuted the flattery. But now Jesus Christ hath the command of them indeed. It is said of him, Matt. viii. 26, "That he rebuked them."—And Mark iv. 38, he quiets them with a word, "Peace be still," as one would hush a child, and it obeyed him.

Application.—Conscience, when awakened by the terrors of the Lord, is like a raging tempestuous sea; so it works; so it roars; and it is not in the power of all creatures to hush or to quiet it. Spiritual terrors, as well as spiritual consolations, are not known till felt. O when the arrows of the Almighty are shot into the spirit, and the terrors of the Almighty set themselves in array against the soul; when the venom of those arrows drinks up the spirits, and those armies of terrors charge violently and successively upon it, as Job vi. 4.—What creature then is able to stand before them! Even God's own dear children have felt such terrors, as have distracted them, Psa. lxxxi. 15. Conscience is the seat of guilt. It is like a burning glass, so it contracts the beams of the threatenings, twists them together, and reflects them on the soul, until it smoke, scorch and flame. If the wrath of a king be like the roaring of a lion, then what is the Almighty's wrath! which is burning wrath, Job xix. 11. Tearing wrath, Psal. l. 22. Surprising wrath, Job xx. 23. And abiding wrath, Job iii. 36.

In this case no creature can relieve, all are physicians of no value; some under these terrors have thought hell more tolerable, and by a violent hand have thrust themselves out of the world into it, to avoid these gnawings; yet Jesus Christ can quickly calm these mystical waves also, and hush them with a word; yea, he is the physician, and no other. It is the sprinkling of his blood, which, like a cooling fomentation, allays those heats within. That blood of sprinkling speaks peace, when all others have practised upon the soul to no purpose; and the reason is, because he is a person in whom God and man, justice and mercy meet, and kiss each other, Eph. ii. 14. And hence, faith fetches in peace to the soul, Rom. v. 1.

Reflection.—Can none appease a troubled conscience, but Christ? Then learn, O my soul, to understand, and daily more and more to favor that glorious name, even Jesus, that delivers not only from the wrath to come, but that which is felt here also.—Oh! if the foretaste of hell be so intolerable, if a few drops let fall on the conscience in this life, be so scalding and insufferable; what is it to have all the vials poured out to eternity, when there shall be nothing to divert, mitigate and allay it?

Here men have something to abate those terrors, some hopes of mercy, at least a possibility; but there, there is none. O my soul! how art thou loaded with guilt! and what a Magormissibab wouldst thou be, should God rouse that sleepy lion in thy bosom! My condition is not at all the better, because my conscience is quiet. Ah, the day is coming when it must awake, and will lighten and thunder terribly within me, if I get not into Christ the sooner. O Lord! who knows the power of thy wrath? O let me not carry this guilt out of the world with me, to maintain those everlasting flames? Let me give no sleep to mine eyes, nor slumber to my eye-lids, till I feel the comfort of that blood of sprinkling, which alone speaketh peace.—Flavel.

"YE KNOW NOT WHAT YE ASK."

Would ye sip from the golden cup of fame?
Would ye strive for the meed of a deathless name?
Would ye nerve the soul for the glorious task?
Ye know not, ye dream not, the boon ye ask!

Do ye pant for the wealth of the buried mine?
Would ye crush thy soul on the idol shrine?
Would ye shroud the heart in a golden mask?
Ye know not the fearful boon ye ask!

Would ye share in the glorious gift of song?
Can ye meekly bear with neglect and wrong?
Would ye live with the depths of thy soul unread?
Then know what ye ask, e'er the prayer be said!

Would ye move in the holy light of love?
Would ye spread your wings for a home above?
Would ye sue for the dove of peace to rest
Its folded pinions within thy breast?

Would ye list to the still, small voice of GOD?
Do ye joy to walk where a Savior trod?
Do ye pray for strength in the glorious task?
Then know ye the precious boon ye ask.

Boston, Sept., 1840. INEZ.

THE LABORERS ARE FEW.

There is one missionary to every six hundred thousand heathens. What should we think of one clergyman for the entire principality of Wales?—or two, for the whole metropolis?—or four, for Scotland?—or only twenty for the whole of the island?—for that is about the proportion. What, I would ask, could be expected from the exertions of that number of clergymen spread over so large a sphere of action? Where the means are small, how is it possible to expect great results? We should be thankful that so much has been done, with such small means at our disposal.

Let us suppose a missionary at Benares, where there are three hundred thousand idolators. After he has mastered a language so difficult, and so widely different from his own, what is he, alone, to do in a city crowded with Brahmins; whose belief in their own faith, if it be not of conviction, is upheld by their interests? If the missionary were to begin by telling any of these men of a divine atonement, they would tell him they had a greater in their own religion; if he speak to them of miracles, they adduce from the fictitious legends of their religion, miracles which they assert go far beyond ours: if he speak to them of the divinity of a Savior, they, at the utmost, class him as one of their 300 millions of gods: if he talk to them of the purity of our faith, he raises their strongest objections; for it is the purity of our faith which deters many from embracing it, and it is the wickedness of their own—giving a scope, as it does, to the gratification of their passions—which weds them to it. But there is another difficulty which the missionary has to encounter: even where he may produce conviction on the mind of the Hindoo, the convert is deterred from an open profession of Christianity, as it would take him from his family and his friends, and cast him out on the world. Under such circumstances, the missionary at Benares would despair, if he were not upheld by confidence in Him in whose cause he had embarked. It is that alone, which can sustain him in his task; rather than any appeals from the society at home, however strong or affectionate. Are we not then too sanguine in our expectations of what can be done by individual exertion.—Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel.

SIN NO MORE.

BY SAMUEL WOODWORTH.

A song of gratitude begin,
To praise the God who saves from sin;
Who marks the penitential tear,
And deigns the contrite sigh to hear,
Who whispers peace when we our sins deplore,
"Thy God condemns thee not—offend no more."

But ah! such love can ne'er be sung,
Such boundless grace, by mortal tongue,
For e'en celestial minstrels deem
Their highest skill below the theme,
Yet mortals can with gratitude adore
The God who pardons all who "sin no more."

Dear Lord, is this condition all,
To fight the foes that wrought our fall,
Thus armed with Hope I'll quell a host,
Nor let my heavenly seat be lost.
Oh, then repeat the sweet assurance o'er,
"Thy God will not condemn thee—sin no more."

CHRISTIAN SUBMISSION.

If you think that the following paragraph, which is extracted from an unpublished letter, by John Newton will edify your readers, the insertion of it in the Christian Intelligencer, will gratify

MYNHEER.

CHRISTIANS MUST PLEASE THEMSELVES.—If there were no corruptions within, nor temptations without, many Scripture exhortations to watchfulness would lose their significancy. If we were to meet with no opposition, or reproach, or ill usage on account of our profession, it would be needless to call us to consider Him who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself. If all things were agreeable and smooth, according to our fond desires, the graces of gentleness, forebearance, patience, long suffering, meekness and resignation, would have no place. It is often as true in spirituals as in temporals. We know not what we ask. Let us expect things disagreeable to the flesh—remembering, that even our Lord pleased not himself. In Scripture, the Christian life is called a trial, a race, a wrestling, a warfare, a crucifixion, a death—all terms importing violence and suffering. Let us therefore cheerfully take up our cross, and daily follow the Lord in the way of self-denial, the way in which he himself walked, and which he has appointed expressly for. Cheerfully commit your soul to him as to a faithful and compassionate Savior, who beholds all our strugglings, and will never suffer us to be tempted above what we shall be enabled to bear. —Christian Intelligencer.

FOR THE MINISTER.

THE PREACHER'S MANNER.

"On the value or importance to the speaker, and to others, of the accomplishment which has been described, namely, "a good manner in delivery," I am prepared to take strong ground; prepared to say, even, that it is almost, if not quite, fundamental to any very extended success. There is a foundation in our nature for a sure effect, in all instances of agreeable warm-hearted address. We are so made, that looks, tones, and gestures, if adjusted according to nature and the offspring of a living soul within, arrest and move us. There is something in our breasts which solicits the 'ORATOR'S TOUCH,' and which is quick and generous in its response. 'The multitude are looking for it from the pulpit, the bar, the senate chamber: they are ready to be instructed, to be moved, to be aroused, transported. Yes, the most obstinate are willing to be enlightened; the most obdurate to be melted; the dullest to be charmed; if the power and the wisdom come in the form of eloquence.' Look at the importance and value of a good manner! A 'good manner,' or delivery, helps to get out and construct good matter.

"The good speaker, as compared with the poor one, other things being equal, will always have the best matter. Certainly, as a general thing, he will have the matter in the best shape. A good, forcible, emphatic delivery, abiding as a living idea in the mind, constitutes a standard, to which the expression or wording of the thoughts is brought.

"A good manner will help the preacher to an auditory. It will increase the number of his hearers. It has power to draw in those who are not interested in the truth. Not only so. It will not only help the preacher to hearers, but also a hearing.—It will not only attract attendance, but attention. It augments the force and effect of the matter upon the minds of those who really attend it. Again: a good delivery is exposition. More meaning comes out in the case of apt delivery; and the meaning which does come forth by the force and fitness of delivery, acquires thereby a vivacity and impulse that carries it more largely and deeply into the minds of the listeners. Indeed, manner has power often beyond exposition. It conveys meaning where otherwise there would be none. Itself is the meaning and the matter, and occasionally, in the hands of a master, it has almost incredible power.

"A question here springs forth:—May preachers as a general thing, reach the agreeable and forcible in delivery? Yes; the agreeable and forcible in manner may be reached by us with as much certainty as we obtain other things, if we would only try for this as we try for other things. Dr. Porter informs us, that, in middle life, he went to work and broke up a stiff and clumsy pair of jaws, and from an afflictive monotony passed, as we know, to a range and flexibility of tone adequate to the highest purposes of the orator. Demosthenes was, in the first instance, hissed from the rostrum, for very badness of manner. He went out and studied assiduously; and, ere long, returned with a power of manner, by which, with the aid of well-compacted matter, swayed and impelled the nation at his pleasure. These results came from strict and earnest attention to the thing.

"Is there not a solemn obligation resting upon preachers of the gospel and ambassadors of Christ, to attend well to their delivery, and the manner of addressing men on the subject of the great salvation?

"To a warmly benevolent mind, what an incitement to the culture of the power of address lies in the fact, that among all the endowments of the Creator, it is our greatest and best power of good. The living voice is the grand, ordained instrument of the world's awakening and redemption.—Shall not heaven's unchanging ordinance be regarded and obeyed, in the better cultivation of the voice? 'Whitefield,' says his biographer, 'sought out acceptable tones and gestures, and looks, as well as acceptable words.' Was Whitfield wrong? Then many, like myself, are far wrong. Let the rising ministry take warning! Awkwardness in the pulpit is a sin, monotony is a sin, dulness is a sin, and all of them sins against the welfare of immortal souls. As preachers of the gospel, how can we get clear from the conviction, that we are as really in fault before God, if our hearers go to perdition, because our manner is stupid and wrong, needlessly so, as we shall be if they go there because our heart is wrong? And how should we feel to know that some are hopeless wailers in the pit, because we were incorrigible drawlers in the pulpit! The attainment of a good delivery, is, in the preacher, surely a beneficent attainment, reaching forward and upward in its results, to the world of celestial glory.

"The nobleness of the attainment is another consideration. The tongue, according to the sacred poet, is the glory of our frame. An eloquent tongue joined with an eloquent mind, rich in knowledge, powerful in conception, fitting and forcible in delivery, is a double glory, especially when employed in the advocacy of the gospel.—Those who cultivate this power under the impulsive influence of a holy mind, may expect to abound here in truly imperishable achievements, and will hereafter be raised to shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars for ever and ever."

HINTS FOR MINISTERS.—There is nothing out of heaven, next to Christ, dearer to me than my ministry.—Rutherford.

LITERATURE.

CONTRAST BETWEEN THE NILE AND THE MISSISSIPPI.

The following is the conclusion of an elegant sketch, from the pen of the late learned savan and traveler, Dr Nott, of Rodney, Miss.

"The vale of the Nile, so long the admiration of the traveler, is deserving of praise, both for the fertility of the soil and the absence of frost. It is formed entirely of the deposition of the river, which carries within its bosom one-fifth of the earthly matter found in the waters of the Mississippi, and is more fertile than this river but less so than Red River of Louisiana.—When the river is rising, and even until it returns within its banks, the water has a very dark color, which it exchanges for a light red after a fall of ten or fifteen feet.—The blackness of the water and soil seems to be communicated from the decomposition of basalt. This we infer from finding the basalt to underlay the red granite at the first cataract, and the sandstone of the second cataract, and may constitute a great part of the mountains of Abysinia.

"Egypt, in an agricultural point of view, is peculiarly situated. While all the regions of the Mediteranean are favored with rains during the winter and spring seasons—plenty, the result of moderate and repeated rains, and famine, the offspring of excess or deficiency of rains—Egypt is a country of perpetual growth—a country where rain never falls, and where cultivation entirely depends upon the waters of the Nile. Nor is the Nile more certain to arrive at the convenient and happy point of elevation than the Mediteranean regions to be attended by moderate and timely rains. The Nile is not subjected to the same extremes of elevation as the waters of the Mississippi, but a double fatality attends it, in rising too high or not high enough—for, in either case, a famine follows. If so high as to pass freely over the banks, the summer and fall crops will be lost: and if not sufficiently high to cover or soften the land in the rear, not only are the farmers unable to irrigate the first crop, consisting of cane, rice, cotton, flax, beans, and dura or guinea corn, but are unable to procure water to soften the back lands by which to sow the wheat and barley crops.

"The Nile, like the Mississippi, has its region for the growth of the cotton plant. While the valley of the Nile contains three degrees of latitude more profitable for cultivation, the product is one-fifth in quantity of that of the Mississippi. The difference in quantity to the acre, is in part owing to the high water which occurs at an unfavorable period—a time when the cotton bolls are more rapidly forming than at any other time of the annual growth, and when the tap root having descended fifteen feet, suffers decay from being soaked in the water. The fibre is long and silky, possessing a like number of nodules, and is often found to partake of the cream or orange color, which it acquires from a union of the oil and alkali of the fibre. This occurrence is less frequent with the cotton of the Mississippi, on account of too much dampness of the climate—but where it does exist, can be detected by entering a gin cotton room at night, as it fails not to impart the smell of soap.—The cotton of Syria, Palestine, and Asia Minor, is without this color: the fibre is short and less fine, and the product to the acre is less than one-eighth of that of the cotton regions of Mississippi. Such a difference in the quantity and quality of the cotton may proceed from too much dryness of the growing period and the coolness of the spring and fall seasons. Thus it appears that in all countries where the summers are without rain, and the atmosphere as dry as in those of the countries above mentioned, the cotton plant cannot be very profitably cultivated.

"We are inclined to think that all the cotton regions of South America, as well as those of Asia and Africa, are accompanied by such circumstances, or, as in the East Indies and Mexico, attended with too much rain during the growing season.—Hence the conclusion is, that the cotton plant is most profitably cultivated in the United States—and that considering the continued wanting of the people of all other cotton countries, the article for centuries will continue to be the most profitably cultivated of all the products of the American States.

The Nile, unlike all rivers known to us, divides a desert of two thousand miles in extent, consisting of frightful plains of shifting sands, and mountains of lofty and precipitous rock, where rain never falls and vegetation can never exist. Amidst these dreary abodes of perpetual silence a majestic river flows from south to north, and like the Mississippi and Red River, ever bearing to the eastward, and ever wearing the cliffs off that side. The river consists of a volume of water about four hundred yards wider than the Mississippi, with less than half its depth, and nearly one-third less in velocity. The Nile, like the Mississippi, has its oceanic lakes. Their configuration distinguishes them from those formed by the cut off. They are traced one hundred miles up the river, lake Moeris being the highest: while on the vale of the Mississippi, detached portions of the Gulf of Mexico are detached four hundred miles above its mouth.

"The vale of the Nile, for one thousand miles in extent, may average fifteen miles in width—while the Mississippi, for the same distance, will average forty miles.—The Nile appears to contain two-thirds more arable land than the Mississippi, and when we take into consideration all the circumstances of the two rivers, we are constrained to allow to the Nile a term of years vastly greater since the alluvial land has been in a state of accumulation."

SUBMARINE FOREST.—We have been favored with an inspection of several specimens of the fossil remains of this forest. It lies on the sea coast below Southorne, or Owthorne, and extends along the shore for some hundred yards and probably a considerable way beyond low water mark into the sea. The most prominent portion now visible is to the north of the ancient sight of Owthorne church, supposed to have been built early in the 13th century. Whether the ground on which this forest once stood has experienced the change which has taken place through the agency of a convulsion of nature, or from the mere gradual encroachment of the sea, does not appear from any documentary testimony—we think from the last, the cliff above it being remembered by old inhabitants to have been much nearer the fossil remains than it now is, and must have been part of the mainland on which the forest stood. These remains consist of fir, beach and oak, most of them in a carbonized state, and crumbling to pieces on any force being applied to them. A few months ago, the vertebræ and antlers of a stag were found, which are now in the possession of the Rev. C. Sykes of Roos. The trunks and boles of many of the trees now visible are from twelve to eighteen inches in diameter, and from three to four feet above the surface, inclining in different directions, from a horizontal position to an angle of about 30 degrees. The arms and branches are prostrate, and partially imbedded in the sand of the shore. The best time for a survey is the second and third day after the full and change of the moon, as the tides then ebb and flow the lowest.—Hull Paper.

EGYPTIAN TITLE-DEEDS.—A few years ago, the Swedish Consul at Alexandria obtained an original MS. deed, written in the Greek language, on papyrus. It is in good preservation, though it is 1944 or 1946 years old, or more than 100 years before Christ. A perfect fac simile was obtained by Gen. Minutoli, and transmitted to the Academy of Science at Berlin, where it was engraved and published. In the last number of the North American Review, is a fac simile from the Berlin engraving, made (without being drawn anew,) by the new and admirable process in lithography, called Dixon's transferring process, from the name of an ingenious mechanic, Mr. Joseph Dixon, of Taunton, Mass. The manuscript is an original instrument of sale of a piece of land in the city of Thebes, and bought by one Nechutes. The document is interesting, as a memorial, in the history of the written language of Egypt. We have never had so ancient an authentic monument of a cursive or running hand.—By an extraordinary coincidence, another papyrus has been found, containing the record of a law suit, in which reference is made to title-deeds, by which Nechutes, the purchaser in the deed just explained, bought the land which was in litigation.

HOW TO ENTER UPON A SCIENTIFIC PURSUIT.—In entering upon any scientific pursuit, one of the student's first endeavors ought to be to prepare his mind for the reception of truth, by dismissing, or at least loosening his hold on, all such crude and hastily adopted notions respecting the objects and relations he is about to examine, as may tend to embarrass or mislead him; and to strengthen himself by something of an effort and a resolve, for the unprejudiced admission of any conclusion which shall appear to be supported by careful observation and logical argument, even should it prove of a nature adverse to notions he may have previously formed for himself, or taken up, without examination, on the credit of others. Such an effort is, in fact, a commencement of that intellectual discipline which forms one of the most important ends of all science. It is the first movement of approach toward that state of mental purity which alone can fit us for a full and steady perception of moral beauty as well as physical adaptation. It is the 'euphrasy and rue' with which we must 'purge our sight' before we can receive and contemplate as they are the lineaments of truth and nature. —Sir John Herschel.

Marine Shells.—There are few situations on the sea-coast which do not produce some species of shells. The lowest ebb of the tide is the best time for searching for them. The rocks, corals, and stones which are then left exposed should be carefully examined for tritons, limpets, sea shells, and other adhesive tribes, which are fixed upon the surface, or shelter themselves in the crevices; they are detached by suddenly passing a knife between them and the substance they are on. Muscles and other gregarious bivalves, furnished with a byssus, likewise occur in such situations. Wherever the rock, mud, or sand is pierced with round holes, the collector may be tolerably sure of finding bivalves; they are procured either by breaking the rock with a hammer or digging deep into the sand or mud with a spade. The little puddles of salt water left by the tide are the habitations of many univalve shells, and others will be found beneath loose stones and sea-weeds. If any shells appear to have been recently cast upon the beach, and are not broken, they may be collected. After a gale of wind or violent storm, the shore should be immediately visited, as fine shells are frequently to be met with; if the line of coast is extensive, a few boys should be engaged to assist in the search. This must be done quickly, it not unfrequently happens that the next flow of the tide takes away every shell. Small islands and coral reefs are generally rich in shells.—Swainson's Taxidermy.

Manufacture of Mosaic.—Leaving St. Peter's we walked to see the manufactory of mosaic. It differs from the pietradura in this, that while stones are employed in the Florentine mosaic, the material used in the Roman is a composition of lead, tin, and glass, smelted and mixed with colors; of this there are said to be eighteen thousand shades. We walked through a long room lined with cases, in which this is arranged, to the workshops. Here we watched the progress of the mosaic manufacture for some time. In an iron frame is placed a stone, the size of the intended picture; and on it is spread, inch by inch, a kind of mastic, which when dry becomes as hard as flint. While yet soft, the workman inserts in it the small pieces of which the mosaic is formed, cut and ground with the utmost nicety to the shape required. The time necessary for the completion of these pictures is of course great, and the expense proportionate, some costing nearly £5,000. When the copyist has faithfully executed his task, there is still much to be done; the mosaic is laid on a table, and the interstices are filled with a peculiar sort of wax, prepared for this purpose; the surface is then ground perfectly smooth, and the whole polished. The subjects generally chosen are the finest pictures of the old masters; and it is wonderful to see the beautiful copies produced by such mechanical means.—Miss Taylor's Letters from Italy.

Dreadful Earthquake.—The account of the falling of a part of Mount Ararat shaken down by earthquake, with a terrible destruction of human life, is confirmed. The St. Petersburgh Abeille du Nord of September 11th, publishes the following letter, dated Tifflis August 13th:

"You have doubtless heard of the terrible earthquake of Mt. Ararat, which has totally destroyed the town of Makitcheman, damaged all the buildings at Erivan, and devastated the two districts of Sharoar and Sourmate, in Armenia. All the villages in those districts have been destroyed. The earth is rent in such a manner that all the cotton and rice plantations have perished for want of water. But the most awful event has taken place in the neighborhood of Mt. Ararat. A considerable mass was loosened from the mountain and destroyed every thing in its way for the distance of seven wrests nearly five English miles.

Among others, the great village of Akhouli has had the fate of Herculaneum and Pompeii. Above 1,000 inhabitants were buried under heaps of rocks. A thick fluid, which afterwards became a river, ran from the interior of the mountain, which was opened, and swept over the ruins, and carried with it the corpses of the unfortunate inhabitants of Abhouli, the dead animals, &c. The shock continued to be felt every day in the above mentioned districts, and entirely laid them waste; then the shocks became less frequent.

Ararat is not yet quiet; the day before yesterday I was awakened by two violent subteraneous commotions.

HOMAGE TO VIRTUE.—Bad as men are, they dare not appear as open enemies to virtue; when, therefore, virtue is persecuted it is represented as counterfeit, or some crime is laid to its charge.—La Rochefaucault.

HUME, THE DEIST.—David Hume observed, that all the devout persons he ever met with were melancholy. On this Bp. Horne remarked—"This might very probably be; for, in the first place, it is most likely that he saw VERY FEW—his friends and acquaintances being of another sort.— And secondly, the sight of him would make a devout man melancholy at any time."

"WHY, FATHER, OTHER BOYS DO SO, WHY CANNOT I?"

The difficulties which attend the right discharge of parental responsibility, are numerous and great. Among these, and by no means the least of them, is the manifest absence of discipline, which unhappily prevails in too many families. All admit the importance of such government, to the welfare, as well as the usefulness and respectability of children, yet few comparatively make it their care to administer it on the principles laid down in the Bible, and with a view to the best interests of children. Too many are influenced by a misnamed tenderness, which leads them to allow children to do as they please, not as they should. Children are prone to think best of that policy which gives the most liberty, and imposes fewest restraints. This leads them to plead the laxity of many parents, in justification of themselves if they have erred, or of an undue extension of privileges in opposition to the decisions and commands of parents, even though dictated by the purest affection and the most ardent desire to promote their best interests. "Others do so, and why may not we?" is plead in favor of exemption from proper application to useful studies, and in reference to mixing with improper company, and engaging in pursuits which gratify their inclinations rather than confer any benefit. Is any thing novel or fascinating to be exhibited? and do they wish to be present? an objection is met by "Others go, why should I be hindered?" Is there a cotillon party or a ball in the neighborhood, or any assemblage which to the mind of an experienced parent threatens any evil to the taste, or morals, or health of young persons? how strongly and yet how inconsiderately is the liberties of others plead as an offset to parental scruples on the subject? Does the glitter and pomp of wealth and fashion attract the attention and raise in the youthful mind the desire to imitate those whose circumstances allow, or whose vanity and extravagance prompt them to indulge in excess of apparel, furniture or equipage? how frequently is it assumed that it is due to character and respectability to appear on a level with such, and to misjudge the best intentions in parents in withholding the means of indulgence, as a want of affection, coupled with unjustifiable penuriousness. Do temptations present themselves to neglect the proper sanctification of the Sabbath, by remaining at home or taking a ride, or strolling about in company with those who have no proper idea of its sanctity? where is the community so strict that a child could not claim to satisfy himself that too much account was made by some of holy time, and plead even respectable authority in favor of a more lax, or, as he might term it, agreeable manner of spending the day which God has blest? "Others do so, why this puritanical strictness?" The habits, in many instances, which are formed in youth to the grief of parents and to the detriment and subsequent regret of the young, are strongly induced by the example of others; such as indulging in foolish outlays of money, the use, in various ways, of tobacco and intoxicating drinks; and frequently every remonstrance of the kindest of parents and friends is met with "Others use them without injury, why should we deny ourselves of them?"

"We will not acknowledge that we are not capable of governing our appetites." Parents may do immense good or harm to their own children and the rising generation around them. By a proper management of their own children they may indirectly benefit others; by a contrary course they may diffuse a most pernicious influence, and poison the tastes, sentiments and morals of the young. Are you a parent? Could you hear one whom you have been instrumental in bringing into existence, taking your Maker's name in vain, without shuddering? It seems hardly possible that the most profane men in society could hear a beloved child indulge in it without the most painful sensations. And would not any departure from the rules of propriety by one thus near to you produce regret? Should not your affection for your children be evinced by using every possible effort to prevent any conduct which would cause regret at the day of judgment? Are you a child? then think of the solicitude which is felt by your parents. Their experience, their affection for you, and the relation God has placed them in to you, entitle them to honor and affection from you. Shun the snares that surround you. Refrain from the company of the vicious. Revere the Bible. Honor the institutions of religion. Redeem your time to lay up a stock of useful information. Abstain from the maddening bowl; there is death in the inebriating cup! Live simply, consulting the demands of nature rather than the practice of others—always bearing in mind the truth, that the habits and practices of others will form no excuse at last for any delinquency of your own.

LADIES' COMPANION.—The November number of this Magazine is before us. It contains its usual variety of matter, of which we have transferred several articles to our columns. A great number of popular writers are contributors to its pages, and the work is done up with great elegance. The present number contains a beautiful engraving of the "Cemetery of Mount Auburn." The Companion has, we believe, the most extensive circulation of any work of the kind in the U. States, which is the best comment on the enterprise of its proprietor.

THE ELECTIONS.—It is now ascertained that Wm H. Harrison has a large majority of the electoral votes for the Presidency of the United States.— This result was known even before the returns from Pennsylvania were received; the official returns from which state give him 186 maj. He will probably receive more than 200 of the 294 electoral votes.— We are glad to see that the public mind is again tranquil after one of the most tremendous political agitations ever known in this country. It becomes the now dominant party to characterize their movements with moderation, impartiality, and economy; especially does it become those who are to wield the destinies of this nation, to "be just, ruling in the fear of God."

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

We are cheered with accounts of the out-pourings of the Holy Spirit in a number of the states, and so far as we can judge there is an increased attention to divine things manifested in the country generally. There is reason to expect the present winter will be an auspicious one to the church at large. All the movements which are recorded, indicate an increase of activity on this subject. The public mind is now relieved of the political anxiety which may to some extent have operated adversely to the interests of piety. We record below some of the cheering news which has reached us since our last.

REVIVAL RECORD.

From the Vermont Telegraph.

Bro. Murray:—I embrace this opportunity to inform you, and the friends of Christ in general, of what the Lord is doing in this place. In one of the June numbers of your paper, they were informed that the Lord has blessed the Baptist church in this place abundantly, within four years past; and it is with pleasure that I am permitted to say that He still remembers us in mercy. Since that time, the Lord has been continually adding to our numbers, such as we trust have been born of the Spirit. Several have professed to find peace in believing, and others that have found Christ precious to their souls, in years gone by, have publicly acknowledged it by submitting to the ordinance of baptism. There have been 23 added to the church—15 by baptism, and 8 by letter. Others are soon to follow on to know the Lord. Our meetings at the present, are generally well attended and some are inquiring what they must do to be saved. Pray for us. Yours in the bonds of Christian love. C. G.

From the Religious Herald.

Sandy River, Va., Oct. 25, 1840.

Dear Bro. Sands:—There has been quite a pleasant state of religious feeling among a part of the people of my charge, for some time. I have had the pleasure of baptizing upwards of ninety persons in the course of the last few weeks—43 at Nottoway church—40 at Chestnut Hill and 8 at Mercy Seat. The two last-named churches are under the pastoral care of Bro. J. W. D. Creath, and the duty of baptizing devolved on me, on account of his illness. There are others who expect soon to follow the footsteps of their Lord and Master, through the liquid grave.

We have recently held a protracted meeting in Farmville, at which about ten persons professed to obtain pardoning mercy. There are several serious persons in that congregation, who have not yet obtained hope. May their number increase, till "the whole earth shall be filled with His glory!"

Your brother,

DANIEL WITT.

OLD WINTER IS COMING!

BY MISS HANNAH GOULD.

Old Winter is coming again—alack!
How icy and cold is he!
He cares not a pin for a shivering back,
He's a saucy old chap to white and black,
He whistles his chills with a wonderful knack,
For he comes from a cold country.

A witty old fellow this Winter is;
A mighty old fellow for glee;
He cracks his jokes with a pretty sweet miss,
The wrinkly old maid unfit to kiss,
And freezes the dew of their lips,—for this
Is the way with such fellows as he!

Old Winter's a frolicsome blade, I wot,
He is wild in his humor and free!
He'll whistle along for the 'want of his thought,'
And set all the warmth of our furs at nought,
And ruffle the laces the pretty girls bought;
For a frolicsome old fellow is he!

Old Winter is blowing his gusts along,
And merrily shaking the tree!
From morning to night he will sing his song;
Now moaning and short—now howling and long,
His voice is loud, for his lungs are strong—
A merry old fellow is he

Old Winter's a wicked old chap, I ween—
As wicked as ever you'll see!
He withers the flowers so fresh and green—
And bites the pert nose of the miss of sixteen,
As she triumphantly walks in maidenly sheen—
A wicked old fellow is he!

Old Winter's a tough old fellow for blows,
As tough as ever you'll see!
He'll trip up our trotters, and rend our clothes,
And stiffen our limbs from fingers to toes—
He minds not the cry of his friends or his foes—
A tough old fellow is he!

A cunning old fellow is Winter, they say,
A cunning old fellow is he!
He peeps in the crevices day by day,
To see how we're passing our time away,
And marks all our doings from grave to gay—
I'm afraid he is peeping at me!

THE COTILLON PARTY.

To Uncle William:

Fashion-Ville, Oct. 15, 1840.

MY DEAR UNCLE,—I presume that your attention is now much occupied by the great interests of our nation; but I will venture to propose to you a question which perplexes my mind. From the evidence which I have always had of your solicitude for me, especially since the decease of my dear parents, I feel confident that you will hasten to answer me. Without further preface, I will inform you that I am invited to attend Cotillon Parties in our village, one evening in two weeks, during the approaching winter. The young gentleman who proposes to accompany me, is the only son of Esq. W——, a respectable family as you well know. You also probably know that the young man himself is industrious, well-informed, of pleasing manners, and a thorough temperance man. He promises to see me home in good season, without fail. I might mention to you some other circumstances that have weight with me, but I feel some delicacy in referring to them very definitely at present. It may be sufficient that I simply intimate, that your knowledge of human nature qualifies you to judge correctly of the feelings of a young lady, an orphan girl, when such a question as this comes before her, the decision of which, she is aware, may seriously affect her future prospects. I confess that I feel somewhat inclined to attend the parties; yet something whispers of danger.

Uncle, what shall I do? Your advice will have much influence with me, and for it you shall receive the gratitude of

Your affectionate niece,

AMANDA.

Uncle William's Reply to Amanda:

Reflection-Ville, Oct. 25, 1840.

MY DEAR NIECE,—Your welcome note found me, as you anticipated, much occupied in contemplating the momentous affairs of this land of the Pilgrim fathers.— What God in his all-wise Providence designs to do with the descendants of those whose feet were joyfully placed upon the rock at Plymouth, and what will be the destiny of those who are incorporated with them in national capacity and responsibility —are questions which render me increasingly serious every hour.

But I will try to disengage myself from these topics for a few moments, that I may answer your question.

Amanda, if I were to advise you to attend those parties, would you not read the advice with utter astonishment? You would certainly exclaim, 'Uncle is not in earnest'! I am inclined to the opinion, that you are fully conscious that smiling temptation and your conscience are antagonists, and that your object in writing to me is to secure my aid to sustain the remonstrances of that faithful monitor which "whispers of danger."

My advice is, that you respectfully and decidedly decline the invitation of Mr. W——. If he is what I hope is, he will respect you for replying to him in the negative; I mean, after he has duly considered the subject. If he will dismiss you from his thoughts, because you refuse to attend the proposed parties, then let him do it. If such be his character, the sooner you disengage yourself from all intimacy with a youth of such shallowness and coquetry, the better will it be for you now, and for your "future prospects," to which you make delicate allusion. This I write in accordance with the tone of my feelings on the subject. But let me reconsider my position for a moment. The word cotillon, must be examined; I am not sure that I have in mind the right definition. I will consult Webster's Dictionary: here we have it:—

"COTILLON, A brisk dance performed by eight persons together; also, a tune which regulates the dance."

Well, your uncle finds that it turns out precisely as he had anticipated; dancing is the amusement of the party. This is what draws the youth together. They delight to move at the sound of the violin until morning-light breaks in upon them. I have no doubt that many an honest country mother, who would by no means consent that her daughters should attend a dancing school, or an ordinary ball, has been quite pleased to know that they were invited to attend a cotillon party, 'that is so different, and so nice.'

I do not intimate that you have been deceived by the name, but I put the question to you—Would you not more readily say in my presence, 'I am going to the cotillon,' than, 'I am going to the ball'?

Must I suppose, Amanda, that your enlightened mind can find entertainment in such amusements as the cotillon party proffers to you? Can Amanda, who loves to read Milton, Cowper, Young, Pollok, Mrs. Sigourney, Hannah More, Hannah Adams, and who intellectually regards the Bible— Can she take pleasure in plying her feet after a fiddle?

Reflect, Amanda, what good you may do by expressing your disapprobation of dancing parties. These can be utterly abolished if virtuous young ladies will unanimously decide against them. You, my niece, as one of that number, must take your stand firmly. Try it; your influence will be felt.

In conclusion I must remind you of a request which you made less than a year since. You requested that I would pray for you. You said that you felt yourself a great sinner in the sight of God, and you knew that you must have an interest in Jesus, or perish.

Do you think that the Holy Spirit will grant you his gracious influences at the cotillon party? Will the lightness, and song, and dance of the party be adapted to lead you to the cross of Christ? You know how to answer these questions as well as I do. I am willing to trust them with you.

My Beloved Niece! I entreat you to give your heart to the Redeemer. Then you will be prepared to plead with those interesting youth of your village, to relinquish the vain project of the parties, and to come and join themselves unto the Lord. A powerful revival of religion, and the cotillon parties, would not move on harmoniously together. We hope soon to witness in all the length and breadth of our land, glorious manifestations of God's reviving and regenerating grace. You will not, I am persuaded, lend your influence to encourage any such arrangements among your youthful associates, as would present obstacles to the reception of such blessings upon earth, as would cause joy in heaven—in which your departed father and mother would participate.

Accept this from your affectionate,

UNCLE WILLIAM.

REST.

Rest for the weary, rest;
For oh! he cannot bear
The burdened weight that fills his breast—
The crushing load of care.
Year after year rolls on,
But no relief is given—
Oh when will the burdened weary one
Be blessed with the peace of heaven!

Rest for the soldier, rest—
His mortal foes are strong;
They have smitten the plume of his blazon'd crest,
And the battle hath lasted long,
His standard trails the ground,
And his hopes are e'en as low,
And again doth the trump's awakening sound
Bespeak the advancing foe.

Rest for the pilgrim, rest—
The way is lone and drear;
The red lights fade in the distant west,
And the dark'ning clouds appear
He longs for his father's home,
Where the palm trees proudly rise;
And the shadows of eve may never come
To mantle the radiant skies.

Rest for the mourner, rest—
Oh when will the yawning grave
Delight not to take the dearest and best
Of the lovely and the brave!
Our hands have scarcely borne
Our friend to his narrow bed,
Ere another, by painful sickness worn,
Is numbered with the dead.

Rest for the ransomed, rest—
The gate of death is past;
Oh mingle your voice with the songs of the blest,
For your home is found at last.
The mourner's tears are gone—
The pilgrim's toils are o'er—
The soldier a glorious crown hath won—
And the weary cares no more.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE FOREIGN NEWS

"There was a tremendous rush for the news received by the steamers yesterday. We published our first edition immediately on the arrival of the Boston boats, before seven o'clock, A. M. Having obtained our foreign files and correspondence, a second and more complete edition was published at ten o'clock.—The President having come up from below, we published a third edition at twelve o'clock. We have seldom seen greater anxiety to obtain foreign news. Our office was thronged from morning till late in the evening. The news is of a most exciting and important character, as all who read it will at once perceive. We have no room for comments to-day."

The foregoing paragraph is copied from the Sun of Monday, and we do not know when we have read one with more regret. The statement is probably somewhat exaggerated as to the rush for papers, but even after making great allowance, there is enough left to excite a painful feeling of sorrow for such needless and most objectionable violation of the quiet and decorum that should prevail on the first day of the week. That it is good for man—for society—to have one day in seven set apart for rest from worldly occupation cannot be denied, even without particular reference to religious duty; but if that duty is taken into account, such a state of things as the Sun describes is not alone impolitic, and therefore to be lamented.

And, after all, what occasion was there, or is there at any time for this reducing of the sacred day to the same category with other days? What good is wrought by it, either to individuals or the community?— Surely the peace, comfort and happiness of no man are promoted by knowing what has taken place in Europe, on Sunday morning instead of Monday.

But it may be said that commercial men are interested in having their intelligence on Sunday. This answer does but exhibit more forcibly the evil of the practice so rapidly growing up among us. If merchants are to receive and read their foreign letters on Sunday, and communicate on that day with their correspondents at the South and West, so much the more grossly are the obligations and offices of the day violated; and if the practice continues, we may expect before long to see the Sabbath utterly disregarded, or only employed with a more intense devotion to worldly affairs, as it is in some parts of Europe.

We would respectfully suggest the inquiry whether some means of preventing this desecration of the sacred day cannot be devised and carried into execution. Every one must have observed that the steamships make their arrivals, eight times in ten, on Sunday, or late on Saturday night. This perhaps might be otherwise arranged; but at all events we cannot perceive the necessity or the propriety of setting all the newspaper establishments at work, in such utter disregard of all Christian obligation. That we speak disinterestedly in the matter must be obvious, from the consideration that the morning papers take precedence of us, in any event, when the steamships arrive on Sunday.

The preceding sound and reasonable remarks are taken from the "Commercial Advertiser" of Wednesday, the 21st inst. The manner in which the Sabbath is becoming secularised and desecrated in this city, is alike melancholy and alarming. Connected with a portion of the public press, the profanation is gross and wanton. A number of the offices of newspaper publication are on the Lord's day a nuisance to the neighborhoods in which they are found. The streets throughout the city, are infested by boys hawking the papers which issue from the press. Print-shops, houses of refreshment, and places of amusement are broadly open in every quarter. The rail-roads are thronged with Sabbath-breakers; and upon this whole subject it is evident to every serious observer, that there is a deterioration in the moral sentiment of the community, as there is a lamentable deterioration in its habits.

Whither does all this tend? the Sabbath, connected as it is with all the means of spiritual illumination, and holy, saving influences, and sanctioned by the authority of the Most High, is guarded with sacred jealousy, and never can be with impunity disregarded by any community. It is a hallowed enclosure not to be transgressed, but at infinite peril. "Ye bring wrath upon Israel by profaning the Sabbath."

Little do they who participate in Sabbath profanation, or who in any way connive at it, consider what they are doing in reference to themselves, to community, and to posterity. "Then contended I with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, what evil thing is this that ye do and profane the Sabbath Day? Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this City?"—Christian Intelligencer.

We are glad to see our brethren entering on this subject with so much spirit; for the sanctification of the Sabbath is intimately connected with the progress of pure religion. But on one point we differ with them in relation to the Sabbath. It is the time which is required to be kept holy. We know the 4th commandment requires the seventh day to be sanctified; and to us it appears that the church is wrong in assuming that there has been a transfer of sanctity from the last to the first day of the week.— If it can be proved that such transfer has been made by competent authority, the difficulty can be surmounted; but to sway mens' consciences without divine law, is at this day, not so easy, especially in so plain a case as that of the Sabbath. For however inconsistent they may be with themselves who keep no other day, and yet indulge in habitual looseness on the first day of the week, yet a reproof for such disregard of Sunday, is in thousands of instances met by a demand for a law prohibiting such labor or pastime on that day. There would be just reason to tremble for religion, if its holy precepts rested on so slender a basis as do the claims of the first day of the week to sanctification by divine authority. Most heartily would we co-operate with our brethren to sustain the ancient and beneficent institution of the Sabbath, than which, if we except the gift of the Son of God to be the ransom for lost man, and the influences of the Holy Spirit, there is no enactment or provision more beneficial to mankind. But we are constrained to say that we see no prospect of success in this matter till the subject is investigated and the practice of the church is conformed to the word of God. In answer to the question of the Commercial Advertiser, "Whether some means of preventing this desecration of the sacred day cannot be devised and carried into execution?" we reply, yes, brethren, we believe there can. Let the Sabbath be observed on the right day; let the law requiring its sanctification be brought home to the consciences of the people; let Christians correctly take scriptural ground in reference to this institution, and you place the question of the importance of the observance of the Sabbath beyond successful cavil. The law of God adduced in proof of Sabbath-keeping, will do more to redeem the institution in question from desecration, than all human enactments. Unless there can be proof produced that the fourth commandment has been abrogated, and a new enactment made for the observance of the first day of the week, it is obvious that the public mind will be more and more divorced from the observance of Sunday as an appointment of Heaven.—Eds. S. D. B. Register.

Sweden, Denmark, and Norway.—The Journal of the American Temperance Union, for this month, contains part of a letter to the Editor, from the Rev. Robert Baird, dated Stockholm, Sweden, Sept. 3d, 1840. It appears from this, that the writer left Havre in July, for Hamburg. On a former visit to this city, he distributed a few copies of his History of Temperance Societies in America, the effects of which were very happy and manifest on his return. A German missionary in the employ of the American Baptist Missionary Society, the Rev. Mr. Oncken, had labored incessantly in the cause, formed a society of 250 members, and published translations of seven temperance tracts, among which is "My Mother's Gold Ring." From Hamburg, Mr. Baird went to Copenhagen, where four years ago he found not a man who took the least interest in the temperance cause. All he could then do was to call the attention of the late king of Denmark to the subject, and distribute a few copies of the temperance history. On this visit he found those labors had taken effect, and raised up for him able assistants in the work. Having obtained their co-operation he at once took measures to have his history translated into Danish, and to publish 2000 copies, relying on the American Tract Society for funds. Of these copies, he expects to send 1000 to Norway, where the Danish language is spoken. From Copenhagen, Mr. B. went up to Christiana, the capital of Norway, where he found God had prepared the way before him. He then organized a committee to take charge of the 1000 copies, and deposited others in the book stores. He states that efforts will be made to induce the king of Sweden to request the [illegible] temperance history in the parish churches throughout all Norway, which, if done, will bring the subject before the whole people. Leaving Christiana, Mr. Baird repaired to Stockholm, where his letter is dated. He here alludes to the state of things at the time of his first visit four years ago. Then more ardent spirits were drank in proportion to the population, than in any other part of the globe. About 150,000 distilleries were in operation. Almost every chief farmer had his distillery. Mr. B. could then do little more than present his temperance history to the king. This procured him an audience with his Majesty, who promised to have the history translated into Swedish, which he did, and sent it to every parish with the king's request that it should be read. From this time the cause advanced. The last year it appeared that 25,000 distilleries had been given up. But Mr. B. represents the habits of the people to be still very bad. No less than 50,000,000 of gallons were manufactured the last year. Drunkenness has eaten out every thing good in Sweden, and, unless the temperance cause succeeds, she cannot be restored to her former virtue and greatness.—_Congregational Observer._

Little Rock, (Ark.) Oct. 14th.

The river took a sudden rise on Sunday, and has risen ten or twelve feet; which enabled the steamboat Cherokee to pass down on Sunday night for New Orleans, having on board one company of the 4th U. S. Infantry, under command of Capt. Morrison, on their way to Fort Jesup, where they have been transferred by a recent order of the Secretary of War, to relieve companies D and E of the 3d Infantry, ordered to Florida.

Among the passengers on the steamboat were Capt. Page, of the U. S. Army, with a delegation of 14 or 15 Seminole Indians and negroes, from the Indian country who are proceeding to Florida for the purpose of endeavoring to persuade their hostile brethren in that region to cease hostilities and emigrate with them to the country selected for their nation in the West. All the persons that compose the delegation were opposed to emigrating and left their native land with the greatest reluctance; but, since they have explored the country where they are located, they have become perfectly reconciled, and declare they would not exchange it for the one they left. They are the first of the emigrants who have returned, and they voluntarily accept the offer to revisit Florida, (leaving their wives and children as pledges of their fidelity,) for the purpose of removing the erroneous impression imbibed by their hostile brethren, and endeavoring to induce them to emigrate with them to the far West, where they may still hope to exist and be respected as a nation.

It is to be hoped that the representation that they will make, will have the desired effect, and cause the hostile bands who still hold out in Florida, to lay down their arms and immediately emigrate to the fine country appropriated for them towards the setting sun.

Capt. Armstrong is associated with Capt. Page in conducting this important and delicate negotiation and from our knowledge of their experience and discretion, we feel assured that it could not be entrusted to better hands.—_Gazette._

New, Cheap, and Valuable Publication.—Four hundred pages, 8vo, fine paper, handsomely bound. Price only two dollars.—The subscriber respectfully invites the attention of Clergymen, Teachers of Sabbath Schools, Heads of Families, and Booksellers, throughout the United States, to the above new, cheap, and splendidly illustrated work. Published and for sale, at No. 122 Nassau street, New York City.—Its features are better defined by the title:

Two hundred Pictoral Illustrations of the Scriptures consisting of VIEWS IN THE HOLY LAND, together with the most Remarkable objects mentioned in the Old and New Testaments, representing Sacred Historical Events, copied from Celebrated Pictures, principally by the Old Masters; the landscape scenes made from original sketches taken on the spot, with full and interesting letter-press descriptions, devoted to an explanation of the objects mentioned in the Sacred Text.

The present work differs from all others ever published in this country. The immense treasures of Art which the great Painters have bequeathed to us on Sacred subjects, are here opened to all, as far as they are capable of being diffused through the medium of wood-engravings. Among our numerous embellishments, will be found the celebrated _Cartoons of Raffaelle_, and the series of PROPHETS, so magnificently portrayed by MICHAEL ANGELO in the _Sistine Chapel._

SUMMARY.

Steam Ship President.—This vessel left New York on the third inst., and encountered head winds which increased to a severe gale. On the seventh, having been out four days and having run only 300 miles, the gale still continuing and a very rough sea, Capt. Keane assembled his passengers and communicated to them the fact that there remained only sufficient fuel on board the ship for fourteen days consumption, and that in his opinion it would be running too great a risk to proceed on the voyage under such circumstances, as there was a prospect that the gale might continue several days longer, in which case it would be impossible to reach England with the amount of coal on board, and that the interest of all concerned required them to return to New York and take in a supply of coal, and then resume the voyage. The passengers concurred in this view of the subject and the ship returned to New-York. By a statement signed by all the passengers, Capt. Keane's policy is fully justified. The President proved herself a perfectly safe seaboat not having received the least damage during the gale. Much praise is bestowed on the officers for their attention to their duty. In consequence of the severity of the gale, six of the crew were confined by illness and one died. The consumption of coal was from 35 to 40 tons per day. The President, it will be remembered, had a very long passage out the last voyage she made before the present, in consequence of which, her former commander (Capt. Fayrer,) was dismissed and the command devolved on Capt. Keane. This circumstance will add to the mortification attending the present misfortune.

Another Steamboat Explosion.—The steamer Le Roy, plying between Iola and Chattahoochee, exploded on the 28th of October, nearly opposite Blounts Town, killing six persons and wounding four more. After the explosion the boat took fire and burned to the waters edge. Nothing was saved but the mail, which was blown on to the forecastle. After the explosion, a gentleman of the name of Tapper went on board to render assistance to the wounded and to recover the bodies. Having succeeded in getting them on board the yawl, he was left on the wreck in imminent danger—the flames spreading with fearful rapidity. The yawl returned just in time to save his life. Much praise is bestowed on him for this philanthropic act. The mail was rescued by a Mr. Sutton and conveyed to its destination by the steamer Louisa.

Sudden Death.—Last Monday, as the steamer New Philadelphia was leaving the Chesnut street wharf, Philadelphia, an elderly gentleman named Newlin, while in the act of shaking hands with his son, R. Newlin, and bidding him farewell, fell down and expired instantly. His death is attributed to apoplexy.

Diminution of Crime in Ireland.—The following are from the homicide charges in the constabulary returns: In 1836, 141; in 1838, 125; 1840, 69 The decrease has equally taken place in crime in general.

A Rusian Cattle Fair.—The fair of St. Onousfre, which lasts four weeks, has this year been numerously attended. The Cossacks and Cabardians, brought in 30,000 wild horses. It also collected 10,000 horses of the finest breeds, 50,000 oxen, cows, bulls, and heifers, 100,000 sheep, and 10,000 swine.

A Valuable Lamb.—The Duke of Richmond lately offered Mr. Jonas Webb nearly $700 for a male lamb, which the latter refused.

Glasgow College.—We understand that Dr. Chalmers is a candidate for the chair of divinity in the University of Glasgow.

Liberal Donation.—The London Sunday School Union have appropriated _one hundred pounds_ to the board of the American Sunday School Union, to be distributed in books to the destitute schools in the valley of Mississippi.—_Zion's Her._

The oldest soldier in the Polish army recently died at Warsaw. His name was Felix Kymkiewiez, and he was one hundred and twenty-three years old.

It is now well authenticated that the Rothschild's hold a mortgage of the Holy City, a circumstance that gives extraordinary interest to the movements of the Jews, and to the signs of the times.

Fire.—The blacksmith shop of Mr. Ulysses Heberd, in Homer, was destroyed by fire last night. Loss about $1,600. Insurance, $850.—_Cortland Whig Nov. 10._

New American Coin.—The United States Mint is engaged in coining a new American dollar, none of which are yet, but soon will be in circulation. The new coin is of a smaller diameter, and consequently more convenient than the Spanish coin, and is altogether better executed. It is a fact not generally known, that three or four years ago a new die was got up, the coins from which looked so outrageous that it was broken. We hope they have done better this time.

Shocking Accident.—On Monday last, as Dr. David Palmer was delivering a lecture on chemistry, in Pittsfield, he inhaled some concentrated sulphuric acid, owing to the breaking of some of his apparatus. Soon afterwards, he was unable to breathe through his mouth or nose, and an incision was made into his windpipe, by which means he was living on Tuesday morning, although there were faint hopes of his recovery. He is President of the Medical School, and Professor of Chemistry and Materia Medica in the Berkshire Medical School.—_Bos. Transcript._

The U. S. Government has now building at the Navy Yard in Philadelphia, a steam war frigate, which will be in readiness to launch in about two months. She will be rigged as a ship; will require 200 men; her ordinance, 42 pounders, and 2 bombs to throw ten-inch shells; burthen, 1700 tons; length, nearly that of the President, 224 feet; extreme breadth, 40 feet; depth, 23 feet 6 inches. There is also a similar one in process of construction at the Navy Yard, Brooklyn.

Intemperance in Russia.—Nearly a fourth part of the revenue of Russia is derived from the sale of spirits. This sale is kept entirely in the hands of the imperial government. The outspread wings of the Russian eagle are over the door of every gin shop in every village throughout that vast empire. Brandy is the only spirit of which traveler's make mention. Mr. Pinkerton calculates, that "the enormous quantity of eigh-two millions of gallons of brandy alone are drank every year by the peasantry of that empire." The population being over sixty millions, it amounts to one gallon and a third for each person. In Scotland, however, it must be remembered, that parliamentary returns give THREE gallons of spirits as the average quota of every man, woman, and child, throughout that part of the realm.—_Boston Recorder._

Oliver Ames, of West Bridgewater, Mass., commenced life by making a dozen shovels, which he took to market in a wagon. He now owns three extensive factories at Easton, Baintree, and West Bridgewater—employs 60 workmen, and has four teams to carry his shovels to market. His profits are $20,000 annually. He commenced life without a dollar.

Mr. Buckingham, the traveler, and his family, have returned from the British Provinces to this city, for the purpose of taking passage in the President. He has spent three years on this side, and has visited every state in the Union, except Florida and Arkansas, from one of which he was prevented by sickness. He must carry with him the materials of as interesting and profitable lecturing on America, as he has delighted us with on Palestine. His honesty will exempt him from the grade of Hall and Trollope, &c.

An Anti-Slavery Congress at Washington.—Hon. Thomas Morris, late United States Senator, has written a letter projecting a convention of delegates from the Anti-Slavery Societies of each free state, to sit at Washington during the next session of Congress; to form an organized body, holding daily sessions, to collect all possible information on the subject of slavery: to note with accuracy the proceedings of Congress and public men: and to take appropriate measures for advancing the great project of emancipation. Conventions similar to this, for various objects, have frequently been held at London during the session of Parliament; one quite recently on the Abolition question.—_N. Y. Evangelist._

Abdication.—It is a rare event we have to chronicle—the voluntary abdication of a reigning monarch. The king of Holland, preferring peace to power, has chosen to resign his crown; the possession of which was legally incompatible with an object he has long cherished,—marriage with an accomplished lady, who is also one of his subjects. Possibly, however, he has, if the saying of the wise man have truth, only laid aside one to take another and better: for "a virtuous woman is a crown to her husband."—_N. Y. Evangelist._

Cure for Stammering.—Those, (a correspondent assures us) who suffer under the distressing affliction of an impediment in their speech, may be effectually cured—where there is no malformation of the organs of articulation—by _perseverance_ for three or four months in the simple remedy of _reading aloud with the teeth closed_ for at least two hours in the course of each day. The recommender of this simple process adds: "I can speak with certainty of the utility of the remedy."—_Literary Gazette._

Mummies.—Mr. Buckingham thinks the Catacombs of Egypt contain more human bodies than there are people now living on the globe. These mummies are now wholly destitute of any animal matter. It has all changed into a resonous substance, or decayed. They are taken from the catacomb to be exported, and to be used for fuel. The finest are exported whole as objects of curiosity for museums. Certain parts, as the inside of the head and chest, are sold as a drug, and the back bone is ground into powder for a paint, which is highly prized by artists.

A society has lately been formed in London for the purpose of preserving Oriental literature, and causing texts of standard works in every branch of Oriental literature, to be printed in the Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Sanscript and Zend languages, and in those of India, Thibet, China, and the countries that lie between China and Hindostan. At present, the whole literature of Asia, with the exception of Thibet and China, exists only in manuscript—copies, therefore, can never be numerous, and must always be expensive. These difficulties will be obviated by the formation of this society.—_Bos. Mer. Jour._

Instruction of Slaves.—The Charleston, S. C. Observer, affords evidence from week to week, of an increasing interest among the most devoted Christians in South Carolina, for the instruction of the negroes and colored people. The number for Oct. 10, contains a letter from a young man, who is looking forward to the foreign missionary field, with a preference for Western Africa; in which he gives an account of his plan of conducting a Sabbath school for the slaves. As they can not read, their lessons are learned by repeating them after their teachers. He expresses the strongest interest in the salvation of his pupils. He represents them as requiring instruction in the very first truths of religion, couched in the simplest language. As to their ignorance, he says that it surprised and deeply grieved him, to find two or three instances of adults who could not tell him _who Jesus Christ is._

"The prayer of every Christian should be offered for the removal of all obstacles, and the introduction of every facility for the intellectual and moral elevation of these perishing people.—_Cong. Obs._

Melancholy Shipwreck and Loss of Life.—Our correspondent of the Barnstable Patriot, in a slip dated 6th inst., gives the following:

"About one o'clock yesterday P. M., a schooner was seen in the bay, opposite this harbor, with a small piece of foresail set, standing to the eastward; about an hour after she was seen to capsize, as was thought in attempting to wear round.—She partly righted again, when her mainmast was gone, and four men were seen clinging to her rail for about another hour, when they were all washed off.

The vessel came on shore back of Sandy Neck, about a mile from Beach Point light, and proved to be the schooner Rodney, of Boston, Libby, master, bound from Belfast to Boston, with a cargo of leather, potatoes and spars. There is a large quantity of the leather, which the people upon the beach are getting out to-day and saving. When the vessel first struck the shore her foremast also went overboard, and she beat up, as the tide came, a complete wreck. There was, and still is, a tremendous sea running, which made it utterly impossible to render them the least aid from the shore.

She was owned, as appears by the papers, which were saved, by David Goddard and others of Boston.

NOTICES.

A PROCLAMATION,

BY WILLIAM H. SEWARD, _Governor of the state of New York._

God has been pleased to preserve our lives during another year, and to bless our land and make it very plenteous. Health, peace, and liberty have dwelt among us, and religion has ministered her divine counsels and consolations. No danger has menaced us from abroad, nor has the alarm of intestine commotion, sedition or tumult, disturbed the quiet of our dwellings. The clouds have not withheld from the earth their timely rain, nor the sun its genial heat.—The plough has not been stayed in the furrow, nor has blight or mildew diminished the abundant harvest.

We have exhibited to the world the sublime spectacle of millions of freemen, carefully discussing the measures and policy which concern their welfare, and peacefully committing the precious trust of their interests and hopes to the care of their chosen Magistrates. While our confidence in the stability of Republican Institutions is thus strengthened, their benign operation has been manifested in the sway of mild and equal laws, the enjoyment of equal privileges by all classes of citizens, the security of personal rights, and the intellectual and moral improvement of society.

In remembrance of these signal and manifold blessings and privileges, it becomes us to lift up our hearts and ascribe all the power and glory to Him, who looketh down from Heaven and considereth all them that dwell upon the Earth. I do, therefore, in pursuance of a custom sanctioned by the People, set apart and appoint THURSDAY, the Seventeenth day of December next, to be observed throughout this State as a day for the annual offerings of PRAISE, THANKSGIVING and PRAYER. I respectfully recommend to my fellow citizens to abstain from all secular occupations on that day, to gather themselves in their solemn assemblies, to render to our Heavenly Father the homage of hearts softened and warmed by his unbounded goodness, to commit to his tender care the poor, the neglected and the oppressed, and to supplicate a continuance of his favor to this People throughout all generations. However we may be separated by opinions or [illegible] all the citizens of the Republic have equal political rights and have the same motives to desire its [illegible] happiness and perpetual prosperity. The Church of the living God is one, and embraces all those who [illegible] of the Redeemer's everlasting Kingdom.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the State, at the city of Albany, this [illegible] day [L. S.] of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and forty.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

POETRY.

From the Christian Mirror.

THE BAPTISM.—Matt. iii.

He stood upon the Jordan's sacred shore—
That latest prophet of an ancient race,
In form and spirit like that seer of yore,
With double portion of prophetic grace;
A simple sandal clasp'd his foot around,
And close, his raiment rough, a leathern girdle bound.

His locks, unshorn, flow'd down with reverend air,
Parting and falling from a brow sublime,
No trace of human passions lingered there,
No impress that belonged to earth and time;
His eye, serene, the spirit seemed to trace
Of those who gathered there to seek baptismal grace.

Then came there ONE, with meek and lowly air;
No doubtful symbol of the soul within,
And yet a holy dignity was there,
That own'd no fellowship with earth and sin;
Abased the prophet stood—"I need to be Baptiz'd of Thee"—he said—"and comest Thou to me!"

"Suffer it now;"—with sandal thrown aside,
Awe-struck, the obedient prophet bowed assent—
To heaven he look'd—and to the rolling tide
Moved down—the rite performed, they upward went;
The bank regained—Heaven's drapery disappeared,
And through the parting clouds the Father's voice was heard:

"This is my Son—my well-beloved Son!"
Straight from the unveiled portals of the sky,
In dove-like form, appeared that Holy One,
Anointing Christ for his high destiny;
Unction divine! and without measure given,
A world of guilty souls to reconcile to heaven.

FALLACIES OF THE YOUNG.

In the scenes of human life presented to our observation, it appears obvious that there is a constant struggle going forward betwixt two great divisions of society—the aged and the youthful. Each of these parties act upon opposite principles. The old have found by experience that no good can be obtained, no permanent comfort secured, without the exercise of a great deal of cool judgment and prudence. They abound in recollections of innumerable instances in their past lives, in which they lost anticipated advantages by precipitency, and gained them by a cautious and patient line of conduct. They remember that, at every step in their career, they were impeded by the hurrying advance of others, or withheld by those who placed their sole enjoyment in gratifications by the way: In fine, they can describe that it was only by the due control of the passions, that they were enabled to succeed in their endeavors to obtain a competence, or respectable independence.

The young, on the other hand, know almost nothing from experience. They start in the race of life with the most transcendent ideas of their own importance and abilities. Nobody that ever lived was half so clever as they are, and all the rest of the rising generation are fools in comparison with them. They will soon show the world what can be done by their cleverness in business, and they have no doubt but the whole town will very speedily be brought to admire their talent, and hasten to support them in their project. And as for foundering in their schemes, that is quite impossible, they defy the most cunning sharper to cheat them; and they know perfectly well the vicious temptations which they ought to shun. Just let them alone, and give them a fair field, and they will show what can be done. All mankind have been wrong from the beginning of the world, and it is they who will put them right.

Such is the nature of those vague notions which more or less affect the conduct of many young men entering upon a scene of active exertion, in which they are left to pursue the courses they choose to follow. It may be remarked that at no period of life are people more adverse from advice, than when they are thus let loose from the restraints of boyhood. To the admonitions of guardians, friends, or fathers, they listen with apathy and turn away without being convinced. To the anxious proffered advice of an aged parent they most likely reply, "Well, father, that is all very true you say; but the world is now greatly changed since your young days, and the same measures will no longer succeed. There are ways of doing things now-a-days that you have no proper idea of; and just give me a trial, and I will soon astonish you with my skill and management." Of course the old man withdraws his fatherly cares from the ingenious youth—perhaps only thinking of him afterwards as in a certain sense lost, or only brought to a painful knowledge of his existence by the calls privately made upon him for pecuniary subsidies.

To whatever degree of loftiness the pretensions of the young man may have aspired, it is not long before he begins to suspect that the world is neither so silly nor so easily prevailed upon to second his views as he imagined. Presuming upon his innate knowledge of mankind, in all their various classes, he affects an excess of liberality in his dealings. He enters into acquaintance with any body, provided they have but a genteel look; implicitly gives credit when sought for, does not heed lending a few pounds when craved with a confidential air; and even becomes security for several of his dearest friends. It is generally seen that he also reckons with an amazing degree of confidence on the effects of his personal appearance. Every thing about him is to attract universal admiration. The elegant contour of his hair; his handsomely made coat; the peculiar genteel color of his gloves, the graceful droop in the chain of his watch, which he hangs around his neck in the most approved fashions—are all in his estimation to be at once productive of envy among his competitors, and the cause of the deepest admiration and love among all the young ladies who have the happiness or misery to behold him. The wise and accomplished young man further prides himself on his speculations in business. He tries to carry on trade by a sort of slight of hand, or by being up to every thing. Yet, somehow, he finds all will not do. His friends turn out unsubstantial visions; his elegant appearance fails entirely in gaining him either their credit or respect; his means vanish in schemes which are proved to be unutterably ridiculous; and he at length makes the notable discovery that other people are just as wise as himself. Thus, every succeeding year of his life, the young man thinks less and less of his abilities, or power of swaying the world to his wishes. He learns by dreary experience, that after all, dullness with prudence gets on much better than activity and heedlessness Above all, he finds that there is no possibility of attaining any great and profitable end without accomodating himself to a thousand petty circumstances that occur—without ministering the prejudices or prepossessions of—without submitting, perhaps, to many supposed contumelies and neglects—without manifestly breasting every succeeding wave of adversity that threatens to swallow him up.

So common is the fallacy of self-sufficient cleverness among the youthful, and the corresponding disregard of advice from the aged, that it would almost appear as if our race were, in this manner, by a provision of nature, doomed to be retarded in its advancement towards perfection. If each generation were to start with the full advantage of the experience of one which preceded it, it is impossible to conceive the height of prosperity and happiness at which mankind would have already arrived. But it seems to be nearly as difficult to endow with the wisdom of three-score the youth of five and twenty, as it is to train the muscles of a child of six years old to the energy and endurance of a full grown man. As the body acquires strength in a regular gradation, so the mind also attains improvement by degrees. Nevertheless, we do not despond over the case of those who naturally repel admonition from their predecessors. There is at least one form in which good council presents itself without any circumstance which predisposes men to despise it, and that is the writings which the industry and learning of ages have now largely accumulated, and which the art of printing is daily extending. It is from the reiterated efforts of the press that we are principally to look for amelioration in the tempers and the behavior of the people. In proportion as the young indulge injudicious reading, they will learn to reflect soundly; to see the absurdity of closing their understandings against deductions drawn from familiar examples of ruin produced by self-conceit, and impassioned heedlessness.—They will thus, to a certain degree, acquire that which will stand them in the stead of experience of those who have gone before them. In the same measure, by being extensively acquainted with the abilities of others—the cleverness of their predecessors, as well as of their neighbors, they will think less of their own acquirements, and put less value on their own capabilities.

Sometimes we see yonng men less headstrong than those referred to above. A few seem to step at once, as it were, into the sagacity of the aged, and they prosper in proportion as their conduct is regulated by the admonitions of prudence. The success of such is found to have resulted chiefly from the due regulation of their passions; for in this mainly lies the secret of advancement in society. They engage in their occupation with coolness and deliberation, watching opportunities for doing good, and guarding against the false steps which have precipitated others from the eminence they had partially gained. While a great portion of the young and thoughtless are drooping from the ranks and disappearing, and the aged are naturally falling away from among men, they are wisely and steadily pursuing their course; shutting their eyes and ears to the various allurements which beset them; against the pretended friendship of the vicious; against the turbulence (it may be) of their own passions; and thus, by the time they reach a mature manhood, they are in possession of those comforts and those honorable stations, which are the reward of sobriety and probity.

A MOTHER'S LAST PRAYER.

BY ANN S. STEPHENS.

"First our flowers die—and then
Our hopes, and then our fears—and when
These are dead the debt is due,
Dust claims dust—and we die too."

I was very young, scarcely beyond the verge of infancy, the last and most helpless of three little girls who were gathered around my poor mother's death-bed. When I look on the chain of my varied existence—that woof of gold and iron woven so strangely together—the remembrance of that young being who perished so early and so gently from the bosom of her family, forms the first sad link which gives forth a thrill of funeral music when my heart turns to it—music which became more deep-toned and solemn as that chain is strenghtened by thought, and bound together by the events of successive years. The first human being that I can remember, was my invalid mother, moving languidly about her home, with the paleness of disease sitting on her beautiful features, and a deep crimson spot burning with painful brightness in either cheek. I remember that her step became unsteady, and her voice fainter and more gentle, day by day, 'till, at last, she sunk to her bed, and we were called upon to witness her spirit go forth to the presence of Jehovah. They took me to her couch, and told me to look upon my mother before she died. Their words had no meaning to me then, but the whisper in which they were spoken thrilled painfully through my infant heart, and I felt that something very terrible was about to happen. Pale, troubled faces were around the death-pillow—stern men, with sad, heavy eyes—women overwhelmed with tears and sympathy, and children, that huddled together shuddering and weeping, they knew not wherefore. Filled with wonder and awe, I crept to my mother, and burying my brow in the mass of rich brown hair that floated over her pillow, heavy with the damp of death, but still lustrous in spite of disease, I trembled and sobbed without knowing why, save that all around me was full of grief and lamentation. She murmured, and placed her pale hand on my head. My little heart swelled, but I lay motionless and filled with awe. Her lips moved, and a voice, tremulous and very low, came faintly over them. Those words, broken and sweet as they were, left the first dear impression that ever remained on my memory—"Lead her not into temptation, but deliver her from evil." This was my mother's last prayer! in that imperfect sentence, her gentle voice went for ever. Young as I was, that prayer had entered my heart with a solemn strength. I raised my head from its beautiful resting-place, and gazed awe-stricken upon the face of my mother. Oh, how an hour had changed it! The crimson flush was quenched on her cheek, a moisture lay upon her forehead, and the grey, mysterious shadows of death were stealing over each thin feature, yet her lips still moved, and her deep blue eyes were bent on me, surcharged with spiritual brightness, as if they would have left one of their vivid, unearthly rays, as the seal of her death-bed covenant. Slowly as the sunbeam's pale at nightfall from the leaves of a flower, went out the star-like fire of those eyes; a mist came over them, softly as the dews might fall upon that flower, and she was dead. Even then, I knew not the meaning of the solemn change I had witnessed, but when they bore me forth from my mother's death-bed, my heart was filled with fear and misgiving.

All were overwhelmed with the weight of their own sorrow, and I was permitted to wander around my desolated home unchecked and forgotten. I stood wondering by as they shrouded my mother, and smoothed the long hair over her pale forehead.—Silently I watched them spread the winding-sheet, and fold those small pale hands over her bosom, but when they closed the blinds, and went forth, my little heart swelled with a sense of unkindness in shutting out the sunshine, and the sweet summer air which had so often called a smile to her pale lips, when it came to her bed, fragrant from the rose-thickets and the white clover field, which lay beneath the windows they had so cruelly darkened. The gloom of that death-chamber made me very sorrowful, but I went to the bed, turned down the linen, and laid my hand caressingly on the pale face which lay so white and motionless in the dim light. It was cold as ice. I drew back affrighted, and stealing from the room, sat down alone, wondering and full of dread.

They buried her beneath a lofty tree on the high bank of a river. A waterfall raises its eternal anthem near by, and the sunset flings its last golden shadows among the long grass that shelters her. I remember it all—the grave with its newly-broken sod—the coffin placed on the brink. The clergyman, with his black surplice sweeping the earth, and the concourse of neighbors gathered round that grave, each lifting his hat reverently as the solemn hymn swelled on the air, answered by the lofty anthem surging up from the waterfall, and the breeze rustling through the dense boughs of that gloomy tree. Then came the grating of the coffin as it was lowered into its narrow bed, the dull, hollow sound of falling earth, and those most solemn words of "dust to dust, and ashes to ashes." With mournful distinctness were all these things impressed on my young mind, but my mother's last prayer is written more forcibly than all in characters that but deepen with maturity. It has lingered about my heart a blessing and a safeguard, pervading it with a music that cannot die.—Many times, when the heedlessness of youth would have led me into error, has that sweet voice, now hushed for ever, intermingled with my thoughts, and, like the rosy links of a fairy chain, drawn me from my purpose. Oft, when my brow has been wreathed with flowers for the festival, when my cheek has flushed, and my eyes have sparkled with anticipated pleasure, have I caught the reflection of those eyes in the mirror, and thought of the look which rested upon me when my mother died—that broken supplication to Heaven has come back to memory, the clustering roses have been torn from my head; sad and gentle memories have drank the unnatural glow from my cheeks, and my thoughts have been carried back to my lost parent, and from her, up to the Heaven she inhabits. The festival and all its attractions, have been lost in gentle reflections, and I have been "delivered from temptation." Again, when the sparkling wine-cup has almost bathed my lips, amid merriment and smiles and music, has the last sad prayer of my mother seemed to mingle with its ruby contents, and I have put away the goblet, that "I might not be led into temptation." When my hand has rested in that of the dishonorable, and trembled to the touch of him who says in his heart there is no God, as that seemed to flow with his luring accents, I have listened to it, and fled as from the serpent of my native forests.

Again and again, when the throbbings of ambition have almost filled my soul, and the praises of my fellow men have become a precious incense, the still small voice of my mother's prayer has trembled over each heart-string, and kindled it to a more healthy music. In infancy, youth and womanhood, that prayer has been to me a holy remembrance—a sweet thought full of melody not the less beautiful that there is sadness in it.

From Friendship's Offering for 1841.

THE WOOD.

There is a beauty in the mighty woods,
Where silence sleeps, unstirred by Earth's rude riot:
The air heaves with a motion soft and quiet,
That soothes the spirit in its wildest moods.
List! from the thick-leaved boughs the lonely dove
Breathes out a low sweet song, that seems to borrow
Its softest tones from memory of past sorrow,
Touching all hearts, as 'twere the voice of Love!
How lovely, too, yon sky!—its bright blue dome
Is seen through openings of the mingled trees;
The sunlight pierces their intricacies,
Brightening the flowers and their dusky home;
Like Hope, that white-winged angel, making glad
A human heart, long desolate and sad.

"I WON'T BE A NUN."

A singular romantic affair has just been brought to our notice, namely, that of a female sailor, having arrived here some days ago in the ship Bucephalus. We understand that she is a very comely, interesting girl of eighteen, the daughter of a British officer, and related to an English nobleman, who having the misfortune to lose her mother at an early age, was placed in our English convent, with the view ultimately of taking the veil. Whilst a boarder in this place, she for the sake of her health, visited occasionally some friends in the neighborhood, where, in the house of one, she first met the object of her attachment, now an officer in one of the native regiments. Subsequently she was consigned to a convent in Dublin, to the end that she should take the veil. Here she remained some months: but resisting every argument to induce her to do so, privation, suffering and cruel treatment at the hands of the lady superior were her lot; she fell sick and was conveyed to a hospital, whence through the connivance of a young English lady, an inmate of the convent, who supplied her with the means, she made her escape in the disguise of a boy, and formed the resolution of coming out to Bombay, in search of the young officer above mentioned. We are told it could occupy a volume were we to recount all her wanderings, and the suffering and privations of the poor young creature in her endeavors to get on board a ship bound for Bombay. This at last she accomplished. A few days after the ship sailed, "the strange boy on being questioned by the Captain whence he came, proved to be a young lady; a cabin was humanely allotted to her at once, and she was treated exactly as a lady passenger.

"Truth is strange—stranger than fiction."

and here is romance in real life that decidedly elucidates the saying of the poet. We understand this young lady's history has excited some considerable interest and admiration among the society in Bombay.—Probably the whole ample page of fiction could not present an instance of greater determination and constancy than is exemplified by this case.—Bombay Times.

DEATH FROM TIGHT-LACING.

I have seen and am much pleased with your paper, and doubt not it will do much good. I hope for it an extensive circulation. In one of the late numbers you call for facts, whether communicated in elegant language or not. I have recently learned one to which I gave all possible publicity, and have told it in almost every circle of the young in which I have since found myself. Two weeks since, while on a visit to the house of a respectable, long-experienced physician, in one of the southern boundary towns in New Hampshire, he gave me in substance the following account, as near as I can recollect.

He was called, a week or two previous, to visit a young female, I think, over twenty years of age, who was distressingly ill of a complaint of the lungs, laboring under great difficulty of breathing, and which his discrimination led him at once to impute to a long-continued practice of tight-lacing—a practice which is slaying its thousands and tens of thousands in our enlightened land. There was, in his opinion, an adhesion of the lungs to the chest, and a consequent inflammation, which had proceeded to such a height that death was inevitable. Little or nothing could be done. The poor girl, after a few days of acute suffering, fell a victim to—(what shall I say! I am unwilling to wound the feelings of her friends)—her own folly and vanity. It could not be suicide, because no such result was contemplated, though the deed was done by her own hand. We can call it by no softer name than self-slaughter, for such even an external examination of the body proved it to have been. The shoulder blades were found to be literally lapped one over the other; the false ribs had been so compressed, that a space of only about an inch and a half remained between them; and so great was the curvature of the spine, which had been girded in by the cords of death, that after the corpse was laid out for interment, two pillows were put under the arch thereby formed, while the shoulders rested on the board. She was a large, healthy person, and was ignorantly led by the desire to please, to sacrifice her life at the shrine of fashion, and the prevailing false ideas of beauty of form. She was said to be of amiable disposition, and correct moral habits, otherwise.

My own mind was so impressed with the recital of this story, that I could hardly forbear weeping over the folly and weakness, and ignorance, and wickedness of my sex. I inwardly wished for the ability to ring this case of suffering and death in the ears of every female in our land, until their voluntarily-assumed "strait-jackets," that indicate nothing better than mental aberration in the wearers, should be voluntarily thrown aside.

FEAT OF SOME SPIDERS.—Mr. Roland Lyman, of this city, recently left a gold ring, with a piece of paper for a label, lying within it, upon his watch bench. The next morning he found that a large black spider from the ceiling overhead, had attached his web to the paper, and raised that and the ring one inch. In the course of a week he raised it eight inches. He was then driven away by a small brown spider. Another black one afterwards attached his web to it, and in three days raised it to the height of fourteen inches from the table; when, by some means the web was broken. The weight of the paper and ring was twelve grains.—Lowell Courier.

FOR THE PATRIOT.

From the Protestant Herald.

RELIGION ESSENTIAL TO OUR GOVERNMENT.

In a country so vast as ours, requiring such a multitude for the management of its affairs, and especially the direction and disbursement of its fiscal concerns, it is utterly absurd to suppose that dishonesty can be prevented in any other way than by the power of moral sentiment. If we must have men to manage the revenue of the nation and of corporations—if we must necessarily place them in contact with the glit'ering temptations of wealth, they should be yielded by the inexorable rectitude of religious honesty. The divine authority must be felt. That great sentiment of moral government, "thou God sees me," operates alike in the darkness of night and in the blaze of noon. Let it take its presiding station in the heart, and we shall confidently predict a result, honorable to piety, and safe for the interests of all. But if the Church of God—we mean all evangelical denominations—is to let go her grasp upon the consciences of men—if she is to withdraw her hands from the pillars of our great political temple—if the thunders of her own fall are ever to roll their terrible echoes in the ears of the American people, they will be the harbingers of a catastrophe to which the world can afford no parallel. It is not that we ourselves should go down and disappear like an island in the sea, and "be found no more at all," but the same billows that shall overwhelm us, will sweep away the anchor of our hopes, will swell above the shores of the world and roll their destroying might over every continent of the globe. We know indeed that patriotic enthusiasm prompts the hope, and sustains the faith, that our goodly fabric will stand "while the earth bears a plant or the sea rolls in waves." Every American heart beats responsive to that beautiful sentiment. It is a delightful prophecy, though it be not the prediction of a seer. But its fulfillment can only be accomplished by the prevalence of moral principle. It is not for the ultimate success of republicanism that we shall ever fear. It is not for the settlement of the once dubious question, whether man is capable of self-government for our faith is strong as the base of the everlasting hills, that if the very frame work of our political architecture were shivered to atoms, and flying upon the winds of heaven, yet liberty is destined to survive its wreck and to triumph when its ruins have mouldered away. Though the Church of God should be expelled from our shores, and though wild and utter confusion should sweep o'er us like the destroying wrath of the tornado, yet wherever American Christianity shall plant its standard, the tendencies to liberty and republicanism will invigorate and expand until the thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and powers of despotism shall crumble before them. Our fears are not, therefore, that civil liberty will ever again finally leave or forsake the earth. For this can only be when our history shall perish, and when the memory of our Churches untrammelled by state polities or connection, shall cease to be. But our fears are that the day may come when our nation shall forget God. When the Sabbath and its sanctions—when the Church and its devotions—when the Bible and its authority shall be alike rejected and despised. And should that day of clouds and darkness ever come—which may God arrest—we cannot avoid the conclusion that the wild horrors and frantic wrath of atheistic revolution will come upon us like the overwhelmings of a mighty sea.

MODERN PHILOSOPHY.—The late Dr. Nesbit, celebrated for his profound erudition and ready wit, being asked how he would define modern philosophy, replied: "It consists in believing every thing but the truth, and that in exact proportion to the want of evidence; or to use the words of a poet, in making windows that shut out the light, and passages that lead to nothing."

Lord Bacon wrote strongly in favor of elegant gardening. He says, "God Almighty first planted a garden; indeed it is the greatest of human pleasures. It is the greatest refreshment of the spirit of man; without which buildings and palaces are but gross handy works."

The first step towards wisdom, is to be sensible of our own ignorance, if we would not be esteemed foolish in the judgment of others, let us cast off folly in being wise in our own conceit.

I must think forever;—would an eternal train of my usual thoughts be either worthy of me, or useful to me? I must feel forever; would an eternal reign of my present spirit and desires please me? I must act forever; would an eternal course of my habitual conduct bring happiness, or even bear reflection?—Phillip.

RELIGIOUS.

HOPE.

BY REV. HENRY MELVILL.

Religion gives a character to hope, of which otherwise it is altogether destitute. You will scarcely find the man, in all the ranges of our creation, whose bosom bounds not at the mention of hope. What is hope but the solace and stay of those whom it most cheats and deludes; whispering of health to the sick man, and of better days to the dejected: the fairy name on which young imaginations pour forth all the poetry of their souls, and whose syllables float, like the ærial music, in the ear of frozen and paralysed old age? In the long catalogue of human griefs, there is scarce one of so crushing a pressure that hope loses its elasticity, becoming unable to soar and bring down fresh and far-off domain, which itself creates. And yet, whilst hope is the great inciter to exertion, and the great soother of wretchedness, who knows not that it ordinarily deceives mankind, and that though it crowd the future with glorious resting-places, and thus tempt it to bear up awhile against accumulated disasters, its palaces and gardens vanish as we approach; and we are kept from despair only because the pinnacles and forests of another bright scene fringe the horizon, and the deceiver finds us willing to be yet again deceived?—Hope is a beautiful meteor; but nevertheless, this meteor like the rainbow, is not lovely only because of its seven rich and radiant stripes; it is the memorial of a covenant between man and his Maker, telling us that we are born for immortality; destined, unless we sepulchre our greatness, to the highest honor and noblest happiness. Hope proves man deathless. It is the struggle of the soul breaking loose from what is perishable; and attesting her eternity. And when the eye of the mind is turned upon Christ, "delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification," the unsubstantial and deceitful character is taken away from hope. Hope is one of the prime pieces of that armor of proof in which the believer is arrayed; for St. Paul bids us take "for an helmet the hope of salvation." It is not good that a man hope for wealth, since "riches profit not in the day of wrath," and it is not good that he hope for human honors, since the mean and the mighty go down to the same burial; but it is good that he hope for salvation; the meteor there gathers like a golden halo around his head, and as he presses forward in the battle time, no weapon of the evil one can pierce through that helmet.

It is good then that he hope; it is good also that he quietly wait. There is much promised in scripture to the waiting upon God. Men wish an immediate answer to prayer, and think themselves forgotten unless the reply be instantaneous. It is a great mistake. The delay is often part, and the best part of the answer. It exercises faith, and hope, and patience; and what better things can be done for us than the strengthening those graces to whose growth shall be proportioned the splendors of our immortality: It is good then that ye wait. "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength:—they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint;" and ye must, according to the phrase of our text, wait for God. "The Lord is a God of judgment; blessed are they that wait for him." And if the time seem long, and, worn down with affliction and wearied with toil, ye feel impatient for the full emancipation—remember ye—and let the remembrance check every murmur, that God leaves you upon earth in order that advancing in holiness, ye may secure yourselves a higher grade amongst the children of the first resurrection. Strive ye, therefore, "to let patience have her perfect work." It is yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come. Be ye not disheartened; for "the night is far spent, the day is at hand." As yet there has been no day to this creation, since the rebellion wove the sackcloth into the overhead canopy. But the day comes onward. There is that edge of gold on the snow-mountains of a long-darkened world, which marks the ascending of the sun in its strength.—"Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, the morning cometh, and also the night." Strange that morning and night should come hand in hand. But the morning to the righteous, as bringing salvation, shall be the night to the wicked, as bringing destruction. On then, still on, lest the morning break! ere hoping and waiting have wrought their intent. Who will sleep, when as he slumbers, bright things glide by, which, if wakeful, he might have added to his portion? Who will put off the armor, when by stemming the battle-tide he may gather every instant, spoil and trophies for eternity? Who will tamper with carnal indulgencies, when, for the poor enjoyments of a second, he must barter some ever-during privilege? Wrestle, strive, fight, as men who know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord. Ye cannot indeed merit advancement. What is called reward, will be the reward of nothing but God's work within you, and therefore, be a gift most royal and gratuitous. But whilst there is the strongest instituted connection between attainment here, and enjoyment hereafter, we need not pause upon terms, but summon you to holiness by the certainties of happiness. The Judge of mankind cometh, bringing with him rewards, all wonderfully glorious, but nevertheless, "one star differeth from another star in glory." O God, it were an overwhelming mercy and a magnificent portion, if we should obtain the least; but since thou dost invite, yea, command us to "strive for masteries," we will struggle—thy grace being our strength—for the higher and more beautiful.

THE MARTYRED MISSIONARY.

James Montgomery, Esq., the English poet, presided at the late annual meeting of the Sheffield Wesleyan Missionary Society. He remarked, that at the present time, all the friends of missions were deeply affected by a mournful circumstance in relation to an individual connected with one branch of the Universal Missionary Society, who had done more to call the attention of Christendom to the objects and results of the missionary enterprise, than any other man.—Mr. Williams, said he, had been barbarously murdered by the savage natives of an island to which he was anxious to give the word of life; they had slain, indeed, the greatest benefactor to their island, which their eyes had ever seen. In like manner, the missionaries in Labrador were seized and murdered; but the cause survived the fall of the first preachers, and had triumphed over the prejudices of the natives. He then adverted to the murder of a zealous missionary of their own, in the wilds of Africa. The Rev. Barnabus Shaw, "the apostle of Africa," had sent to him, (Mr. M.) one of the chapters of a work descriptive of the scenes and results of his labors, containing an account of the violent death of the Rev. W. Threllfall, and of the native converts, his companions, in Namacqualand, and requesting him to give a condensed sketch, in meter, commemorative of that fatal event. He had attempted the task; and, by the leave of the meeting, he would read them what he had written. Mr. Montgomery then recited, with much feeling, the following exquisite stanzas, composed in the circumstances and on the subject alluded to:

Not by the lion's paw, the serpent's tooth,
By sudden sun-stroke, or by slow decay,
War, famine, plague, meek messenger of truth,
Wert thou arrested on thy pilgrim way.

The sultry whirlwind spared thee in its wrath;
The lightning flashed before thee and passed by:
The brooding earthquake passed beneath thy path;
The mountain torrent shunned thee or ran dry.

Thy march was through the savage wilderness;
Thine errand thither, like thy blessed Lord's,
To seek and save the lost, to heal and bless
Its blind and lame, diseased and dying hordes.

How did the love of Christ, that like a chain,
Drew Christ himself to Bethlehem, from his throne,
And bound him to the cross, thine heart constrain,
Thy melting heart, to make that true love known.

But not to build, was thine appointed part,
Temple where temple never stood before;
Yet was it well the thought was in thine heart,
Thou know'st it now, the Lord required no more.

The wings of darkness round thy tent were spread,
The wild beasts' howling broke not thy repose;
The silent stars were watching overhead:
Thy friends were nigh thee—nigh thee were thy foes.

The sun went down upon thine evening prayer,
He rose upon the finished sacrifice;
The house of God, the gate of heaven was there,
Angels and friends had fixed on thee their eyes.

At midnight, in a moment, open stood
Th' eternal doors, to give thy spirit room;
At morn, the earth had drunk thy guiltless blood—
But where, on earth, may now be found thy tomb?

At rest beneath the ever shifting sand,
This thine unsculptured epitaph remain,
Till the last trump shall summon sea and land,
"To me to live was Christ, to die was gain."

And must, with thee, thy slain companions lie,
Unmourned, unsung, forgotten, where they fell?
O for the power the spirit of prophecy,
Their life, their death, the fruits of both to tell!
They took the cross, beneath it they lay down,
Woke, and the cross was changed into the crown.

O'er their last relics, on the spot where guilt
Slew sleeping innocence, and hid the crime,
A church of Christ amidst the deserts built,
May gather converts to the end of time:
And there with them, their kindred dust, to dust,
Await the resurrection of the just.

From the New York Evangelist.

ORGANIZED REBELLION.

The Universalists, having been completely routed from their common doctrine of no future punishment, so that they dare not preach it, now wish to be united and characterised by one grand feature—their opposition to the doctrine of eternal punishment.

Referring our readers to the exposure which Enoch is making of their creed in general, we will devote a little space to this cardinal point of union on which they choose to make their final stand.

We do this the more readily, because we are anxious to present before evangelical Christians in general, the true light in which his contest with Universalism is to be regarded.

The doctrine of universal punishment is a fundamental principle in the moral government of God. It expresses the magnitude and importance of the divine law—the infinite dignity and majesty of the authority by which it is sustained; and of consequence, the infinite baseness and moral turpitude of sin. It renders salvation impossible without an atonement; it renders the terms of mercy and the expostulations of the gospel self-consistent. It illustrates the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and makes the whole array of divine truth appear glorious in its majestic order and proportions.

It is against the justice of God, as expressed in this righteous penalty of his holy law, that the nutural enmity of the world and of the unregenerate heart is directed. Sinners are opposed to the precept of the divine law, because it prohibits the practices in which they delight, and they are opposed to the penalty, because it compels to an entire renunciation of these practices, or to an eternal, hopeless, remediless destruction. This hostility is an expression of that supreme selfishness, which, for its own gratification, would destroy the universe and dethrone the Almighty, rather than have his law maintained, both in its precept and penalty.

Universalism is the public embodyment—the organised avowal and vindication of this enmity against God. Its professors are to be considered as having publicly leagued together, for the purpose of waging war upon the divine government, aspersing the divine character, and resisting the divine administration.

As the church of Christ is the visible soldiery of his spiritual kingdom, so Universalism presents their most open, daring, and dangerous antagonists. Infidels have the same object, which they accomplish with less trouble. But they have not organized synagogues of Satan; they have not a regularly ordained ministry for the purpose of defending the arch-apostate against the penalty under which he suffers; they do not unfurl their banner around the very altars of God, and denounce his justice, while they appropriate his name and honors to an imaginary deity.

Since, therefore, Universalism is to be considered as the most daring form of organized rebellion against the divine government, all loyal subjects of the King of kings, are bound by their allegiance to him, to wage with it an exterminating war.—While we are called upon to exercise feelings of personal kindness and compassion towards its infatuated advocates, we are bound to express without measure, our utter abhorrence and detestation of their most treasonable, rebellious, and hideous system of doctrine. By all our regard for the being, the attributes, the name, the laws, the mercy, and the grace of the triune God, we are bound to declare its hateful nature, to expose its most malignant opposition to eternal truth, and to resist its progress on every side. By all our regard for the instruction, conversion, sanctification, and final salvation of our fellow-men, we are bound, as living witnesses of the truth, to warn all men against giving the least credence to its delusive sophistries, and its abominable falsehoods.

If the Universalist Press—if the Union and Messenger, of this city, wish to attack the doctrine of eternal punishment, as the proper penalty of the divine law, or as the certain final reward of all who wilfully reject the gospel, let them bring forth their strong reasons, and make the attempt. Let them lay aside their ridiculous quibblings about trifles, and their low personal abuse, and come up if they dare, to the help of fundamental falsehood, against the word and testimony of God. Let them vindicate themselves, if they choose, against the two-edged sword, as wielded by Enoch; or let them attack, if they can, the doctrine of endless misery as the certain portion of all who persist in resisting the overtures of gospel grace. If they will maintain their organization against the truth of God, let them show themselves men, and come out with an open front against the doctrine of eternal punishment itself. We can assure them that they shall have enough to do. We will meet all their arguments as well as we can. The evangelical press in general, will not, we presume, be backward to vindicate the insulted majesty of our common Lord.

At the same time we warn them even against the desperate attempt. We assure them, that they will be found therein fighting against God. We assure them, moreover, that they will meet with an overwhelming discomfiture. The consciences of this whole nation can be secured against them. They will soon sink into that obscurity which has already settled o'er the haggard form of avowed infidelity. It is dangerous, wicked, and ruinous business altogether—we mean the business of professing, preaching, or advocating in any form whatever, this double-distilled decoction of enmity against the Most High. All we mean to say is, if they will do it, let them do it as honorably and decently as they can, and they shall meet with argument that shall not stoop to personal abuse, and with words that shall not be liable to be misunderstood.

MR. EDITOR.—The very appropriate remarks which you have recently made in the Register upon the sin of irreverence in our approaches to God, called up in memory the following anecdote, which, to the knowledge of the writer, is fully authentic. A little boy in the village of C——, in this State, had been hearing a somewhat distinguished revivalist, whom every body was praising, but who, withal, was remarkable for the apparent familiarity of his public addresses to the throne of grace. Among others, the little boy was asked by some one his opinion of the preacher. He replied, "I don't like him a bit." "But why?" said the individual questioning him. "I don't like to hear him pray," said he, "because he is so saucy to God."—Baptist Register.

GRACE IN THE SOUL.

This is a beautiful passage, "the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men"—in the promulgation of it—"teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world."—Tit. ii. 11, 12. If the confession of such an influence of the grace of God be enthusiasm, I glory in it. Every one has, from his very nature, an inward intuitive principle, which will not permit him to act contrary to his feelings and inclinations. Self-preservation, for instance, is intuitive, and we wonder how any person can commit suicide. Now grace in the soul is also an intuitive principle. Our eyes and our faculties exhibit to us evils, and keep us from them. Thus, when we hear the gracious and needful command, "touch not the unclean thing," we have the inward principle as believers, which causes us distinctly to obey it.

I need not the dry morals of Seneca to teach me the nature of true virtue, for the gracious instilment of true piety makes the good man. If we were but "born again," we shall know our Father, and serve him; and, therefore, when I see persons living contrary to the nature of grace, I say they have it not. I pray God I may never be so cursed as to have the power of religion suspended in me, but may I always desire to live near him, and find him near to me. If we have our minds illuminated from on high, the inward light will shine forth in praise of Him who enkindled its glorious flame. The practice must correspond with the principle. Were we to try to make ourselves holy by our own feeble resolution, we should find that we are weak indeed in opposing the force of temptation, and should be overcome by it. But if the almighty power which works in them that believe, has come down into our hearts from God himself, our obedience will be of such a nature that we can never willingly do a single thing that is evil, for grace delivers us from the love thereof—Those birds which live much in the higher regions of the air, and to repeat their songs again and again, as their well-kept plumage bears them to the skies. But those creatures that grovel in the mud, are dirty and disgusting in their habits. Could you make a lark happy amongst animals so offensive? No; neither will the child of God, whose element is "in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," be otherwise than pure and spiritual in the holy habits of his regenerate mind.—Rowland Hill.

DECORUM IN THE HOUSE OF WORSHIP.—Attending a place of worship a few evenings since, I could not but notice the concluding manner of their exercises, which appeared to me peculiarly appropriate, and I wish it might be adopted in all our places of religious worship. After the preacher had pronounced the benediction, there was a perfect stillness for a few moments, as though the audience were silent sending up their petition that the blessing which had been invoked might descend and rest upon them. The pew doors were then opened, and the assembly quietly retired. What a contrast between this mode and that which has been seen in some of our churches!—The apparent haste which is sometimes exhibited by adjusting the apparel, putting on gloves, overcoats, and opening the pew doors before and while the benediction is pronounced, indicates thoughts at variance with that solemnity of feeling which we have a right to expect would be cherished and evinced in the house of God. I would have charity to believe that this conduct rather proceeds from thoughtlessness on the subject, and hope that the suggestion of its impropriety will influence those who are not aware of it, to pursue a course more consistent with reverential feeling.

THIS IS NOT YOUR REST.—This earth was never designed for the Christian's home. It is a field in which he is sent to labor. Here he spends the heat of the day, and cannot find his home until the evening comes and his work is ended. If this earth had been designed for the Christian's home, it would have been made a very different place. It would not have been filled with so many snares and miseries, but would have been rendered a peaceful, quiet, holy habitation. But now God has prepared for him a better habitation, where nothing shall ever enter to disturb his rest, and where he shall feel himself forever at home. The Christian has only turned in here, like a wayfaring man, to lodge for a night; but heaven is his home where he has an eternity to spend. Eternity! eternity! O the boundless thought! How can we settle down in the dust as though we were always to continue here? How can we feel otherwise than as strangers and pilgrims on the earth?—Griffin.

FOR MOTHERS.

PRAYING MOTHERS.

Samuel, who became a Prophet and a Judge in Israel, was early brought to the sanctuary, and dedicated to the special service of God, by a Praying Mother.

Timothy, who was an eminent minister of the New Testament, and exceedingly dear to Paul, and who from a child had known the Holy Scriptures; was blest with both a Praying Mother and Praying Grandmother.

John the Baptist, who was filled with the Holy Ghost even from his very birth, a greater than whom had never been born of woman, was the son of a Praying Mother.

The pious and excellent Doddridge had, long before he could read, endured impressions made upon his heart, by means of Scripture prints on the tiles in the chimney, which were pointed out and explained to him by a Praying Mother.

The Rev. John Newton, who, besides all the other good he accomplished, was instrumental in the conversion of those eminently and useful men, the Rev. Claudius Buchannan, and the Rev. Thomas Scott, was himself brought to Christ by means of truth, which had been taught him in early life by a Praying Mother.

I recently read of a whole family of children in America, who were all in a remarkable manner brought under the influence of the Gospel and of the Holy Spirit. But these children had received the caresses, and been brought up under the care and instruction of a Praying Mother.

A few years ago the students of a Theological Seminary felt interested in the inquiry, what proportion of their numbers had been favored with godly parents. And it was ascertained that out of one hundred and twenty students, who were preparing for the sacred ministry, more than a hundred were the offspring of Praying Mothers.

And—to mention but one instance more—St. Augustine, that sublime genius, that illustrious father and great Luminary of the Church, whose fame filled the whole Christian world in the latter part of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century, was till his 28th year, only "a bitterness to her that bore him." From his own subsequent confession, he was deaf to the voice of conscience, broke away from his moral restraints, and spent his youth amidst scenes of baseness and corruption. But, in all his wanderings, that depraved young man was followed by a Weeping, Praying Mother. Her tears on his account watered the earth, and her prayers went up as incense before God. "Is it not possible"—said a certain Bishop, in reply to her importunity that he would endeavor to reclaim her son—"Good woman is it not possible, that a child of such tears should perish." And at length the son himself carried to his Praying Mother the news of his conversion, and she received "the oil of joy for mourning," and "the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Not long after, as they were journeying together she said, "My son, what have I to do here any longer? The only object for which I wished to live, was your conversion, and this the Lord has now granted me in an abundant manner." Five days after, she was seized with a fever; and on the ninth her tears were forever wiped away. And wherever the name and writings of Augustine, the great Bishop of Hippo, have been known there also has been "told for a memorial of her," the story of the Praying Mother.—Mother's Magazine.

LITERATURE.

TO THE AUTUMN FOREST.

BY WILLIAM [illegible]

Resplendent hues are thine!
Triumphant beauty—glorious as brief!
Burdening with holy love the heart [illegible]
Till tears afford relief.

What though thy leaves be [illegible]
More [illegible] in beauteous [illegible]
Than when the notes of glad songsters [illegible]
From every greenwood [illegible]

[illegible]
Thou askest not the [illegible] thy paths to [illegible],
The dazzling radiance of those sun-lit bowers,
Their hues could not [illegible]

I love thee in the Spring,
Each crowning forest! when amid thy shades,
The gentle South-west waves her odorous wing,
And joy fills all thy glades.

In the hot Summer-time,
With deep delight thy sombre aisles I roam,
Or, soothed by some cold brook's melodious chime,
Rest on thy verdant loam.

But O, when Autumn's hand
Hath marked thy beauteous foliage for the grave,
How doth thy splendor, as entranced I stand,
My willing heart enslave!

I linger then with thee,
Like some fond lover o'er his stricken bride;
Whose bright unearthly beauty tells that she
Here may not long abide.

When my last hours are come,
Great God! ere yet life's span shall be all filled,
And these warm lips in death be ever dumb,
This beating heart be stilled,

Bathe thou in hues as blest—
Let gleams of heaven about my spirit play!
So shall my soul to its eternal rest,
In glory pass away!

From the Voice of Freedom.

A CONJECTURE.

It seems to me there is reason to believe that Western Asia will become the scenes of events deeply interesting to the civilized world. And there are events now in progress which cast their shade forward, and predict some mighty changes ni that region, once so famous among the nations. When the Turk called the Egyptians into Greece, to help to subdue that enslaved people, I suspect the long stagnant waters were beginning to move, and that Egypt would next break the Turkish yoke. So it has happened. And the great powers of Europe are combining together to stop the progress of the Egyptians, and preserve to the Turk a portion of his Asiatic dominions. Will they do it? We shall see. Two of the confederating powers, Austria and Prussia, have no direct interest in the contest. Not so the other two, England and Russia.—Long has the northern bear had his eye on Constantinople, and gradually has he been drawing towards his object, while one province of the Turkish empire after another has been seized upon and subjected to his power. And now he can smell his prey and has his paw upon his victim, will he recede and let the victim escape? He may if ulterior objects require delay, but let him once pour his troops into Asia Minor and drive the Egyptians from Syria, and who will drive him back to his northern den? England may wish to do it, but will she be able? Austria and Prussia may easily be quieted by another division of Poland; but who will divide Turkey?—England and Russia will have to settle that question. They may enter the country as allies, and fight together until the Egyptians are driven from Syria. Then what will they do? Will England withdraw her troops and leave the Russians on the road to India? Will Russia, when on the Euphrates, forget where the Persian gulf lies, and retrace her steps? or will they both withdraw their armies simultaneously? Let the armies of those rival powers once enter Syria, and Turkey must be at her disposal. The interests will clash. Russia will find it easier to reach India through Syria than through central Asia, and she will make the trial. The question of India must be settled on the plains of Syria. And those armies which entered as friends will meet as enemies. And we may see the king of the North and of the South meeting in deadly conflict. These rival powers may enlist the Jews on their side, and one or the other may attempt to re-settle them in their own land. Gog may bring his hands against them, and be cut off on the mountains of Israel, and the nations be convinced by his fall that the God of the Bible is the true God.

Without attempting to predict the final result, it seems to me that the Russians have caught the English napping, and that with the command of the Black Sea, and of Constantinople they will possess vantage ground from which they cannot be easily driven. The English by making peace with France, may command the Mediterranean, but the Russians will pour down from the north like a storm of hail, sweeping all before it. At any rate we may naturally look for events of the deepest interest in Western Asia. The waters are troubled, are in commotion, and the winds will lash them into fury, but I will not conjecture what will be the end of these movements. Of one thing we may be sure, that the stone cut out without hands, will break in pieces the kingdoms, and stand forever.

AN OLD MAN.

THE NORTHMEN.—A highly interesting discovery has been announced by the Danish Geologist, Dr Lund to the Northern Archæological Society, as made by him while excavating in the neighborhood of Ha[illegible] Bay. This discovery began with the fragment of a flag stone, covered with engraved Runic characters, but greatly injured. Having succeeded in deciphering several words, which he recognized as belonging to the Icelandish tongue, he extended his researches, and soon came upon the foundations of the houses in hewn stone, bearing a strong architectural resemblance to the ruins existing in the northern parts of Norway, in Iceland, and in Greenland. Thus encouraged, he went resolutely on, and at length, after several days' digging, found the Scandinavian God of Thunder, Thor, with all his attributes—the hammer, gauntlet and magic girdle. The society has commissioned Professor Rafn, who first established in an authentic manner, the existence of ancient relations between Iceland and North America, anterior to the discovery of that part of the world by Columbus, to report on the subject of Dr. Lund's letter, and to publish his report, with a view to direct the attention of the learned to this very interesting discovery, which would seem to prove that the ancients of the North had not only extended their maritime voyages to South America, but even formed permanent establishments in that country.—London paper.

LECTURE BY J. Q. ADAMS.

The Introductory Lecture, before the Society for the diffusion of Useful Knowledge was delivered by the Hon. John Q. Adams, last evening, before an immense assembly; and it was a gratifying scene that the lecture-room presented with its 'sea of heads,' each listening in rapt attention, to the venerable orator, as, with the fire of youth and the pure eloquence of the heart, he discoursed on the social nature of man, and its influence and effect on his moral condition.

Man, he said, stands alone in the wild Universe. Of all living beings he is first, created in the image of his Maker, but endowed with divine capacities according to his state in various ages. Primarily, man was governed by two laws—self preservation and procreation; the first regarded his physical condition solely; the second, the perpetuity of his species. From the earliest ages down to the present time, mankind had four modes of living. First, as hunters; secondly, as shepherds; thirdly, as tillers of the ground; and fourthly, as the civilized inhabitants of cities. The first was totally ineffectual towards the moral condition of man; the life was that of an individual independence; man cares nothing for his brother man: his time passes in hunting and war; in hunting beasts, and in war with his fellow man; he knows nothing beyond the illimitable forest, and its wild inhabitants; and only when the successes of the chase have depopulated one spot does he seek another. To the hunter, all nature is a thicket. He sees nothing in the aspect of nature to move him to meditate. Through the dark intersections of the forest he catches scarce a glimpse of the starry canopy or azure vault above his head. He lives for himself alone. He is the tyrant of his wife; and, in feeling as well as life, a savage.

Far different is the condition of man in the pastoral state. Besides the perils of the chase, the birds of the air, and the fishes of the sea are his delight and pleasure, and even the insects basking in myriads in the sunbeam, excite his mind to contemplation. Living on plains and vast savannahs, with the cloudless heaven above him, his mind is led to reflection; he observes the courses of the planets, and is led by them to the computation of time, and thus the pastoral life may be called the father of the science of astronomy. He chooses his favorite animals, chiefly bulls and sheep; and finally pitching a tent on the plain, he takes the first step towards a positive habitation. The laws of society, by permanence of abode, are multiplied and strengthened; woman ceases to be the slave, and becomes the choicest treasure of man. The bounties and beauties of nature are now observed with love and admiration; each mountain and river, the birds of the air and the insect hum, inspire him with ideas of the benificence of a wise Creator—and the pastoral life becomes the golden age of poetry. This is, however, an imperfect state of existence; the life is wandering, and polygamy is carried to excess among the people. Necessity, however, leads to still greater improvements, and we subsequently see man existing in the third state—as a tiller of the ground. We find him exemplifying the beauty and unity of things;—he builds him a house to dwell in; has but one wife; and acknowledges one omnipotent Creator, and God of all. Here we have the unity of permanent habitation, the unity of conjugal association, and the unity of religious worship; from these, proceed the law of prosperity and the right of inheritance, with that better feeling of patriotism, or love of country. Woman is not now as with the hunter—a slave; or as with the shepherd—a mere possession; she becomes a friend, companion, and solace, and the comforts of life are no longer dependent, but reciprocal. Attention is now directed to the mechanic arts, and then arises the true principle of divided labor—woman acts in her proper place, and man in his appointed sphere. The destructive evils of polygamy are fully felt, and the grand principle of unity, as essential to the designs of the supreme Creator is now carried into beautiful effect. The man is the husband of one wife, and the family is governed by the laws of love and justice.

Civilization, or the congregation of men into cities, is a consequence of agriculture and the arts to which it leads. Art leads to science, and invention to discovery—whilst navigation and ship-building in extended branches, are the great results.—Man's life is now one of action and meditation, and these lead to the progressive improvement of himself and others, of his country and his kind. Self-love and social intercourse are preserved in their beauty and utility. Polygamy is abolished, and man and woman live in pairs, as originally designed by an all-wise Governor of the Universe. This principle of living as recorded in history through all ages, can be clearly traced in the Holy Scriptures, and worldly theory is but a cobweb of the brain compared to the truths of the Bible. If there had never been a Revelation, what would man know of his true position in this life, or of his duty here, in relation to an hereafter? This world is but a great firmament of moral and intellectual light, which should serve to point us towards eternal glory in the life to come.

The above is a hasty and very imperfect abstract of Mr. Adam's Lecture, and it is impossible in such a sketch to do justice to the moral or biblical reasoning of the learned and devout Lecturer. He inculcated, in energetic forcible language, the virtue of chastity, and the necessity of preserving inviolate the conjugal tie—both as regards individual good and the well-being of society. The audience was transfixed by the eloquence of the venerable orator, whilst, with the strong rein of commanding words, he enforced the moral of his Lecture; and they were gratified with observing that the vigorous powers of the speaker, mental and oral, had not only been preserved through a brilliant meridian of life, but had calumniated in strength and activity towards a final close, presenting the sublime spectacle of

> "the immortal mind > Firm as the solid base of this great world," and resting safely on the Rock of Ages, as its sure foundation.—Boston Transcript.

The Highlands.—The Gardiner (Me.) Spectator contains the following extract of a letter to a gentleman in Gardiner, from Professor Renwick, one of the Engineers engaged in the boundary survey:

"I am happy to be able to communicate to you, that the result of my operations will probably leave no other basis for the British claim, than the quibble whether the Bay of Fundy be the Atlantic Ocean. I have discovered and explored a range of mountain extending from the Bay of Chaleurs, around the heads of the branches of the St. Johns to the Temiscoutata portage, so that even on the British ground that the Highlands are necessarily mountains they can be met to advantage. The height of these mountains I can only guess at, until I make up the calculations."

Eruption of Fishes.—Baron Homboldt gives an account of a wonderful eruption of fishes that sometimes take place from volcanoes of Quito. These fishes are ejected in the interval of the igneous eruptions in such quantities as to occasion putrid fevers by the miasmata they produce. They sometimes issue from the crater of the volcanoe, and sometimes from a lateral cliff, but constantly at the elevation of two or three thousand toises above the level of the sea. Millions are seen to descend from Cotopaxi with great quantities of cold and fresh water. As they do not appear to be disfigured or mutilated, they cannot be exposed to the action of great heat. Homboldt thought they were identical with fishes that were found in the rivulets at the foot of the volcanoes, and to which he assigns the name of Eimclodus Cyclopum.—Sailor's Magazine.

Length of Days.—A memoir addressed to the Academy of Sciences at Munich, by Dr. Tenzen, contains the following notice of the length of days in the principal cities of Europe. At Berlin and London the longest day has sixteen and a half hours, and the shortest seven and a half hours.—At Stockholm and Upsal, the longest has eighteen and a half hours, and the shortest five and a half. At Hamburg, Dantz and Stettin, the longest day has seventeen hours and the shortest seven. At St. Petersburg and Tobolsk, the longest has nineteen and the shortest five hours. At Tornea, in Finland, the longest day has twenty-one hours and a half, and the shortest two and a half. At Wordorbus, in Norway, the day lasts from May 21st to July 22d without interruption; and in Spitzbergen the longest day lasts three months and a half.

In Audubon's "Birds of America," published in 1835, we find the following notice of the "Saw-whet" owl:—

The little owl, known in Massachusetts by the name of the "Saw-whet, the sound of its love notes bearing a great resemblance to the noise produced by filing the teeth of a large saw. These notes, when coming, as they frequently do, from the interior of a deep forest, produced a very peculiar effect on the traveler, who, not being aware of their real nature, expects, as he advances on his route, to meet with shelter under a saw-mill at no great distance. Until I shot the bird in the act, I had myself been more than once deceived in this manner. On one occasion, while walking near my saw mill in Pennsylvania, to see that all was right there, I was much astonished to hear these sounds issuing from the interior of the grist mill. The door having been locked, I had to go to my miller's house close by to inquire if any one was at work in it. He, however, informed me that the sounds I had heard were merely the notes of what he called the screech owl, whose nest was close by, in a hollow tree, deserted by the wood ducks, a pair of which had been breeding there for several years in succession."

Navigation of the Red Sea.—It has been frequently asserted that the Red Sea is too stormy to abound either in shells or marine plants. Often too, has its navigation been compared to that of the Black Sea, in which many vessels are every year lost. None of these remarks, however, are just, for naturalists find a rich harvest of such treasures on its shores. M. Lefevre confirms the opinion of Lieut. Wellsted, and affirms positively that it may be navigated in all seasons without danger from its double line of reefs, which often facilitate the navigation by forming sheltered coves where anchorage may be obtained. Cossier, Gedda, the Archipelago of Dhalac, and the roadstead of Massowah, have already enriched the French explorers with scientific treasures."

Curious Result of Injury of the Brain.—There are instances, says Mr. Green in his lectures, at King's College, as reported in the Medical and Surgical Journal, where a whole class of words, nay a language, was completely obliterated from a man's memory. I remember seeing a patient in St. Thomas's Hospital who had an injury of the head. During his illness he begun suddenly to speak in a language which nobody in the ward could understand; very fortunately, in one of the most voluable moments of this patient, the milkman of the hospital was passing through the ward and listening to the sick man, who instantly recognized the Welch language. A freer communication immediately took place between the parties, and it appeared, according to the account delivered by the milkman, that the patient understood and spoke English very well, but that in consequence of the accident, the language had been fairly knocked out of his head.

Bursting of Stoves.—The Philadelphia Gazette relates an instance of the bursting of a stove from covering up the fire. It was a large common stove in the laboratory of a chemist, and had been partly filled with wet or damp anthracite coal, placed on ignited coal, and the whole covered with ashes. In an hour or so afterwards a tremendous explosion occurred, and on entering the laboratory the stove was found blown into pieces, and the pipe split asunder to the ceiling. The phenomenon is attributed to the accumulation of gas in the stove, before the fire burst into a flame, and when the flame touched it, the explosion followed. The case is mentioned as a warning to house-keepers.

The vaccine matter which was sent out from this country last Spring, was found on reaching Siam, to have lost none of its efficacy. Dr. Bradley had inoculated numbers of people, and in all cases it was found to operate favorably.

Entire devotion to interest, is an entire departure from principle.

De Ruyter, November 24, 1840.

AN EXAMPLE.

Some years since, an agent was employed by the Seventh-day Baptist Society, to travel and collect funds for missionary purposes. That year had been rendered memorable in the denomination, by the out-pourings of the Holy Spirit. Many sinners had been brought into favor with God.

One of the churches visited by the agent had recently received very large additions. Having freely received the blessing of God; they freely gave of their substance to send the Gospel to other perishing sinners. They threw hundreds and hundreds into the treasury of the Lord.

At such times, and under such circumstances, it would be natural to expect that Christians would take pleasure in devising plans and means for extending the Kingdom of Emanuel. This subject occupied much time in conversation in the numerous families where the agent visited. At the house of an esteemed and worthy brother, the duty and privilege of Christians in reference to the conversion of the world, was remarked on freely. A little girl in her seventh year, who was somewhat remarkable for her thoughtfulness on these subjects, was observed to take a deep interest in the conversation. When the agent had taken leave of the family and retired, the little girl was seen to be weeping, and going to her mother, she embraced her, exclaiming, O! Mother, I want to do something for the missionary cause. "My child," said the mother, "What can you give?" "O! Mother, I will give my nine-pence, and would freely give more if I had it." "But," continued the parent, "you may give it another time, and that will do just as well." "No mother, I want to give it now, for I fear if I do not give it now I shall die before I have another chance." At her urgent solicitation, the father of E. called to the agent who was just leaving the premises, and delivered the free-will offering of this noble child. The agent was much affected by this incident, and remarked to the father, "that child will be converted to God while young."

The Agent went his way, leaving little E. to enjoy the luxury of having given all the money she possessed on earth to aid the missionary cause, (though she had not yet given herself to the Redeemer) and her parents the satisfaction which such disinterestedness in a beloved child could not fail to inspire. Whenever he found difficulty in obtaining such aid as he thought the friends of Jesus might impart, he frequently found much advantage resulting from a relation of the circumstance of E.'s liberality. In many instances he could succeed in no other way. Thus this child, by giving what she could, was the indirect instrument of bringing other and greater offerings into the treasury of the Lord, and in this sense she did more than any other, even the rich. Her conduct should be regarded in the same light as was that of the "poor widow who threw in all she had, even all her living!" And this was done too before she professed to love God!

How does this compare with the policy of many professed Christians who are always receiving from God, but never give any thing for the promotion of his cause? Does their conduct prove that they are concerned lest they should not do what they ought seasonably? Are they not rather afraid they shall not get and keep enough of the wealth of this world? How many there are who possess means in abundance, who do less than this child?

How much wiser was she in thus giving for so good an object, than to have spent her money in purchase of toys? How many who read this, of different ages, will emulate this example and go and do likewise? Remember there is neither work nor device in the grave to which all are hastening; therefore, give now while you have, you may die before many opportunities of giving may transpire. One word in conclusion about E. She has now reached her fourteenth year, and a few months since united with the church. She has now given her heart to God. This is the most she could give, and without which no offering could be acceptable. How many of the young will imitate her example?

Missionary.—Brother James H. Cochran is employed to travel the present year through the denomination, to raise funds and labor to excite a deeper interest in the missionary cause. How will the friends of missions treat these important claims? There are, we know, many places in our own country, as well as in heathen lands, where labor is needed; and will christians allow that labor to be neglected, or unremunerated through a want of liberality in them? If we have not entirely misjudged the character of our people, there will be no cause of complaint when the appeal shall have been made to them. We hope they will not only give as they are able; but experience much satisfaction and spiritual advantage from the visits of our Brother.

To Subscribers.—We once more request our friends and patrons who live at a distance, to avail themselves of the provisions of the Post Office law, and transact their business relative to this paper, such as transmitting money, changing direction, &c. through the Post Masters. It can be not only lawfully, but honorably done. Will they remember it?

The Minutes of the Conference & Missionary Societies have been distributed. We are extremely mortified that there was an omission of a part of the manuscript, (and an important part too) of the Hebrew Missionary Society. This escaped our observation until the minutes were sent off. The mistake is supposed to have occurred through a change of compositors. We wish to make all possible amends, and therefore insert the omitted part in this day's Register.

Report was adopted.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

Messrs. Editors.—I notice in your paper of Nov. 17, a communication upon Cotillon Parties, alluding probably to the ones about to take place in our village. As I am to participate in the parties to which your correspondent doubtless alludes, you will permit me, I hope, to answer the communication. I would say, however, that this course is not resorted to with feelings of disrespect to 'Uncle William,' but with those feelings which are prompted by an honest difference of opinion. That uncle, who ever he may be, I doubt not was influenced by the best motives which actuates the human heart; but I would ask if he fully understands the character of the Parties which he denounces. From my experience in such assemblies, I unhesitatingly say that he is mistaken if his remarks allude to those contemplated in our village.

In answering the request of his fair correspondent, he tells her that her conscience is at variance with "smiling temptations," and that she only writes to ensure his aid in resisting that evil prompter which would lead her in the midst of danger, though it promised all sunshine, and happiness, and sociability to the elicited one; and I would ask him in what consists the danger? Is it pointed out in the definition which Webster has given him of Cotillon? Most certainly not. He tells her that we are to linger in the happy amusement until the morning light breaks in upon us, moving to the sound of the life-stirring violin. But I will tell her that they contemplate no such injury to the constitution—no such weakness and folly.

Dancing, he tells her, draws them together, and he seems to darkly intimate that this is a mere cloak for iniquity. He appears to regard the judgment of "His Beloved Niece" very highly who so loves to contemplate Milton, Cowper, Young, Pollock, and other worthies, and derive the benefit to be obtained from their perusal in advising her not to be deceived by names. How greatly "she & many an honest country mother," must be obliged to him for the compliment. He asks her if an enlightened mind can find pleasure in Cotillon amusements? and I would ask him if there has not been minds that have been clothed in the deepest rays of intellectual and moral greatness who have sanctioned and participated in this harmless and beautiful amusement? He requests her to reflect what good may be done by expressing her disapprobation of these assemblies. What this good may be, I am yet to learn. He says, 'if virtuous young ladies would decide against them, they would be utterly abolished;' and are we to have characters at our Parties that are not virtuous—whose breath would contaminate the pure air, and despoil the pleasure for the good that he thus cautions her? No, I answer emphatically, and that one who would so stigmatize us must be a dupe to ignorance, and superstition, and deprived of that generosity which learns ere it condemns. Has not the wisdom of Solomon said that there was a "time to dance"? Yes, and I doubt not, too, that he would have said, with "Uncle William," that dances may be made unprofitable, demoralizing, and productive of the evils which he imputes to them, and the same might be said of any other amusement. But does it necessarily follow from this that all such amusements should be done away with, merely because they are liable to be abused? I answer, certainly not.

But concerning the Parties contemplated in this village for the ensuing winter, I would say that they will be attended by none except by persons of the most unblemished character, possessing the highest sense of moral worth, and that they would shun the slightest attempt at indiscretion or deviation from the most rigid path of virtue, as they would shun the serpent whose kiss would be the kiss of death.

I hold, too, that these Parties have a direct tendency to soften the manners, add an ease of grace to personal appearance, while they give to the social an opportunity for an intercourse, while engaged in the amusement, which deprives them of the embarrassment which so often takes from the social circle its greatest charm.

I know, too, that there are no evils to be apprehended from an attendance, and I offer to any person the civilities of our room to examine our conduct, scrutinize our actions, and report from such a knowledge of whatever may be seen that tends to corrupt society, or injure reputation; and if true and correct reasons can be brought against them from such an examination, I, for one, will join with "Uncle William" to do away with them. But, till then, I must come to the conclusion that very much of the prejudice which exists relative to well-regulated Cotillon Parties, is formed by an old-fashed say-so "that nothing can be good that dances." Is there aught in the social dance, amid those who respect themselves, that can so nearly approach an injury to society as that fire-side circle, pretending to the highest claims of morality, who descant upon dances, and speculate upon character, to give themes for the envious, and noise to report! Let common sense answer, and religion decide. That which I have written, has been written honestly and candidly, hoping rather to gain friendly esteem, than to excite hostility of feeling.

Yours, respectfully,

A Young Man.

November 18th, 1840.

Messrs Editors:—An esteemed and valuable brother wishes me to give my reasons for holding the doctrine of the endless punishment of the wicked.—Some of these reasons I here present. If you please you are at liberty to insert them in the Register.

For the Register.

TO E M

Dear Brother:—You wish to know my reasons for believing that the punishment of the wicked will be endless. I cannot think you would make this request from any other than good motives, neither can I for one moment indulge the suspicion that your own faith is shaken in the truth and soundness of that doctrine. Doubtless the desire to possess such reasons is laudable, and that a worthy object is proposed by you in their attainment. I have no objection to giving my reasons, as far as practicable, for believing this or any sentiment I hold in reference to the economy of salvation or the responsibility of man to his Maker.

Before I proceed to answer your request, however, I must premise one thing, viz: That the Scriptures are a revelation from God, and whatever they teach we are bound to believe. If, therefore, God's word teaches the sentiment that the wicked shall be punished endlessly, this reason for believing so, is sufficient. That this is the fact, I cannot doubt.—Otherwise a great portion of the lively oracles would seem to be altogether destitute of meaning.

I shall introduce a few passages which appear to me to establish the doctrine, and which, if they are pertinent will as effectually settle the point in question, as any greater number of the same import. Those which immediately follow, are designed to prove that the wicked will be punished after death, and subsequent to the resurrection.

"The wicked is driven away in his wickedness." "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat." "If that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming, &c., the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and shall cut him asunder, and shall appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." "The king shall say unto them on his left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed." "He that believeth not shall be damned." "All that are in their graves shall come forth; [illegible] they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." "The rich man died, and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." "The wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God." "These were cast alive into the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

The above may be sufficient to show that punishment follows the impenitent in the world to come. There might be added numerous others, such as the destruction of the Sodomites, Korah, Dathan and Abiram with their companies, besides numerous suicides who have rushed unbidden into the presence of their Maker, and not a few infidels who have with their last breath testified that they were anticipating the anguish of those who die without God, and a good hope.

I now proceed to adduce a few texts to prove that the punishment of the impenitent in a future state is interminable. "Some shall awake to shame, and everlasting contempt." "Their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." "Depart ye cursed, into everlasting fire." "The inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." "They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power." "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation."—"[illegible] to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." "[illegible] the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture, into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone, in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever; and they have no rest." "The devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever." "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

If we allow that the Scriptures speak truly on this point, it really appears to me there can be but one conclusion drawn from their testimony, and that in favor of endless punishment.

I am aware of the efforts which have been made at different times by different persons to nullify or explain away the testimony of these (and a multitude of other) scriptures on this subject; but, next to the testimony of God which they contain, the depravity and perverseness evinced by these attempts, are among the most unrefragable proofs of the truth of the doctrine of endless punishment.

In connection with the above, I have other reasons for believing the punishment of the wicked will be endless. Among these is the fact that no mention is made in the Bible, of any other state of trial after the present life; on the contrary, there is the fullest reason to expect that every impenitent person may say at death, with the utmost truth, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved." They have long and carelessly, and perhaps wilfully, rejected Christ, who was a Lamb to atone for them. Now they shall find him a Lion to contend against and subdue his enemies. Their sufferings will not be emendatory. Their guilt will remain, nay, increase, so that they never will cease to be vessels of wrath, fitted, indeed, on earth, for destruction, by sinning, and the entire absence of holiness; they must remain monuments of wrath forever!

Another reason for believing this doctrine, is, that the preaching of the contrary sentiment, has never, to my knowledge, been instrumental in promoting the piety which the Bible requires; but generally, if not universally, the contrary. Neither Christ, the prophets, nor the apostles, ever preached it. Yet it appears to have been inculcated very early in time, but its tendency has never been to enlighten the sinner, and lead him to God for pardon, but to harden him in his wickedness, and strengthen him in his way, by promising him life. If the doctrine which opposes the endless punishment of the wicked, was preached in Eden, (and there seems to be strong evidence of the fact,) there is just ground for the inference, that similar effects have since attended, and will continue to attend the dissemination of it.

Another reason why I believe the punishment of the wicked will be endless, is the fact that those who deny the doctrine, make so little of Jesus Christ! This, you may say, is singular, but recollect, brother, the disparity between the sentiments of the opposers of this doctrine and those of the first preachers of the gospel, I had almost said of all evangelical preachers of it. Paul, and all true ministers of the gospel, have made Jesus Christ all to the believer; wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. But those who deny the endless punishment of the ungodly, make very little, nay, almost nothing of him in the work of salvation. It is true, they frequently speak of his sufferings and achievements; but this is probably done to accommodate themselves to the prejudices of their hearers—for, if I understand them, few of them admit that man was ever so fallen and depraved as to deserve eternal banishment from God! or that an all-merciful Jehovah would or even could consistently have cast off his erring offspring forever, whether Christ had died or not. Many openly deny that God could be just and punish the sinner eternally for sins committed in time, overlooking, probably, the fact that he would be punishing a refractory, unholy, rebel eternally.—Others contend that every sinner must suffer the full punishment due to his sins—punished he should be, till he submits to God, and loves his law, and becomes a new creature; and how can this be when he is forsaken of God, and the sentence is passed, "Let him be filthy still"! Therefore it would seem that Christ and his atonement and mediation may be dispensed with; he has nothing to do with or in the salvation of the sinner, on this hypothesis. Wo! to the man that teaches it! Wo! wo, to him that stakes his salvation on it!

Another reason why I believe the sentiment, is because the law of God should be vindicated, and righteously, too, though not an individual sinner should be saved. Those who despised Moses' law, died without mercy, and can those who all their life-time trample under foot the blood of the covenant, and refuse allegiance to Christ, and resist the demands of his law, wonder that God should avenge himself on the transgressors!

My last reason, to be assigned for the present, is, because the convictions of most of those who deny the doctrine are in its favor. It is not pretended that any man can know the heart of his fellow, but circumstances have elicited so much from those who deny the doctrine of endless punishment, as to justify the belief that very few steadily and firmly believe the contrary. But do you ask, What then are we to think of those who profess to disbelieve the doctrine? My reply is, we are to deplore that unbelief, and labor to counteract its influence by presenting the whole truth to the minds of our fellow men, that they may hear, believe, and be saved.—Meanwhile we must say of the propagators of opinions contrary to our own, to their own master they stand or fall. But do you ask, Are not many who deny this doctrine sincere! It is not for me to say whether they are, or are not sincere.—Paul's sincerity while he opposed Christ, did not excuse him, neither can it benefit any opposer of truth. "There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death."

Yours, &c.,

SEEK NOT HONOR OF MEN.

True humility is the harbinger, the concomitant and the glory of true greatness; the opposite of affectation, bigotry, and self-seeking. Its possessors have voluntarily placed themselves under the tutelage of him whose nature and character exhibited this quality in the utmost perfection. To conform to his instructions and example, is therefore the duty and the wisdom of his disciples. Every lesson from this greatest of Teachers to every learner in his school has tended to illustrate and enforce this important duty. Honor invariably attends the exercise of the grace of humility, and crowns its possessor at the last.

But what has ambition contributed to the accomplishment of the wishes and objects of its devotees! We might speak of armies vanquished—of wealth wasted—of monarchs dethroned—of nations conquered and annihilated—of empires subjugated—of the orphan's wail, and of the widow's tears—but have the desires of the conqueror, or the adorer of mammon been satisfied when the mighty have been made to bow submissively before them! or when they have received the applause of their fellows, or filled their coffers with shining treasures! Never! The same ambition which prompted them to deeds of daring, demands a repetition of carnage and conquest, & the obsequiousness of other and nobler vassals, and the admiration of the renowned of this world to feed its unhallowed fires. Regardless of the restraints imposed by the laws of humanity, as well as of the miseries inflicted on others as the consequence of the advancement of his purposes, the slave of ambition has fixed his eye so firmly on the high places of power, and a lofty seat in the temple of Fame, that increased success alone can prevent his contemplating the past with horror and self-disgust, and abandoning the pursuit of the phantoms which flit before him.

This principle is evil in its origin. It was conceived in the spirit of disloyalty to the Most High. It prompted Lucifer to sin, and threw rebel angels from their heavenly seats. When cherished by men, either as individuals or communities, its tendency has been to produce ruin and death. It wrought the destruction of the first human pair, by seducing them from the path of righteous simplicity and allegiance to their Maker. It was this which caused the first murderer to repine when the more excellent offering of his brother was accepted. It induced Israel to ask a king, and arraying the most heaven-provoking crimes in the guise of innocence, polluted the purest system of worship then on earth, aroused the divine jealousy, invited down a storm of vengeance on the people he had redeemed, and inscribed "Ichabod" on their national escutcheon. It moved a wicked courtier to secure the destruction of the chosen tribes for an imaginary deficiency of homage to himself. It has sought to inflict the severest punishment on the most devoted servants of Jehovah, for the performance of the most important and sacred duties, for refusing the commission of the foulest crimes—and denied fealty to the Lord Jesus, himself. This desire to be honored of men, as we have already remarked, is a most formidable barrier to union with Christ. We know it is attended with destruction to those who cherish it. This destruction, though it may seem tardy, is nevertheless sure. Those who have evinced the greatest thirst for worldly fame, such as Alexander the Great and Napoleon, afford proof of the truth of the above statement. Those who have lived the terror of their species, have carried their victorious arms through many countries, whose smiles were courted, whose frown was feared, and whose bidding was performed by myriads of their fellow men, have been made the monuments of Heaven's vengeance, like Herod, or have sunk to poverty, or been made to pine in exile, a prey to their own meditations, and the scorn of those whom they formerly oppressed—their transactions and fate presenting to every aspirant for the honor of men—a beacon of warning, that whoever slights the honor that comes from God, is guilty of the most unpardonable fool-hardiness. When the desire of honor from men is cherished by one who has vowed to serve Christ, and seek to promote his glory, it operates ruinously to piety, subverts every virtuous feeling, and arrays the servant against his Lord. He becomes the sport of the grand deceiver, and is abandoned to his own follies, in preferring the applause of mortals to the approbation of God—a sad prelude to the disgrace and misery which awaits him at "the resurrection of damnation"! Who that now seeks honor of men regardless of the superior honor that comes from God, can think to abide the great day of God Almighty? Merciful God! teach the writer and the reader the value of true Christian meekness, that when thou shalt come to judge the world, they may be found to honor and praise, and glory at thine appearing!

HOW SHALL AMERICAN CHRISTIANS MEET THEIR RESPONSIBILITIES!

Wherever Christians are, immense responsibilities rest upon them. Christians in England, in France, and at the various Foreign Missionary stations, are called to discharge duties similar, yet varied, being specifically modified by location, government, tendencies of the public mind, evils to be removed, &c.

Upon Christians in the United States of America there rests no small share of obligation. Claims press upon us numerous and weighty. How shall these claims be met? this is the question. I answer—

1. We must be willing to understand what they are in all their magnitude and number. Not unfrequently do persons try to turn their eyes and ears away from duty. This is not the part which we are to act. We must examine the two books which are open before us, God's book of Revelation, and his book of Providence. We must compare the one with the other, earnestly desiring to know all that God would have us do. The dutiful child inquires what his parents desire him to perform. As Christians say unto God, "Our Father," then let them conduct as obedient children.

2. We must resolve not to shrink from the performance of any duty that God requires of us. We must not say, Lord excuse me; but, "Here am I, send me," must be our response. The more self-denying the duty may be, the more ardently must we look to God for strength. We must stand prepared to do all that God requires of us, without attempting to select some parts of the work which we will engage to perform with uncommon zeal, if the Lord will exhonerate us from other parts. No compromise of this sort must be attempted. Lord, show me every duty, and each duty in all its parts and relations, must be our petition.—This request that our duty may be clearly made known, must be made for the purpose that we may fully perform it without preferring one part before another.

3. We must feel perfect confidence in the government of God. Our country must pass through trying scenes. Great events must soon take place; and however happy will be their sequel, all intervening time of trial must come. The furnace will be heated seven times. In the midst of it the church of God will be placed. Now, without unshaken confidence in the government of God, we shall be confounded and crazed amid the clashing elements that will gather around us. But with our eye fixed on the great truth, "THE LORD REIGNETH," we shall call upon the earth to rejoice, and we too shall rejoice. We shall feel that "He ruleth in the armies of heaven above, and among the inhabitants of this lower world." We shall know that his counsel shall stand, and that he will do all his pleasure. We shall be confident that the wrath of man shall praise him and that the remainder of wrath he will restrain. Such views of the government of God will invigorate us for calm, bold and effective action, and assist us to smile amidst the most furious tempest. It cannot be otherwise if we appreciate the sentiment, that > "God moves in a mysterious way

> His wonders to perform,
> He plants his footsteps in the sea,
> And rides upon the storm."

If we would meet our responsibilities, we must

4. Study the present aspect of God's providences towards this country, and the character of the American people. These two branches must be studied together, if we would discharge our duties as Christians in America, in 1840. The ball has begun to roll, and it will roll on until every form of legalized and systematized oppression shall be banished from this land, and freedom's flag shall wave over all our millions, irrespective of color, or of maternal origin. If the natural and full developement of the change which has already taken place, should not produce these desirable results, yet this change shall make way for another, and another, and if need be, another, until all that we can desire for the cause of civil freedom, shall be achieved.

5. We must regard all the specific objects of reform in which we are called to engage as subservient to the primary object of our life, viz—to propagate the doctrine of salvation through the atoning blood of Jesus Christ. Christ & his cross must be our theme. If we enlist our feelings for opposing by distinct organized action, licentiousness, intemperance, slavery, or any other evil, we must view all these departments of labor as varied branches of our work of disseminating the Gospel. If we occupy such a position, we shall be secured from all danger of sympathizing with any of those professed advocates of reform who array themselves against the church and the christian ministry.

6. We must make ourselves thoroughly acquainted with the history of our country, with its constitution and laws. These we must study with a christian spirit. As we examine our country's history, we must note the Providence of God as manifested in one event, and in a series of events, and in the relation of one event to another. If we study our laws, we shall see what statutes need to be abrogated, and what modified, and what enacted. By the study of the constitution, we shall understand what course we are to pursue for the accomplishment of these objects, and we shall be impressed with our high responsibility as American citizens.

7. We cannot as American citizens meet our responsibilities, unless we unite our efforts for the speedy and total abolition of American slavery. I say, unite our efforts; I mean as it respects the design to accomplish the object. We may differ respecting the best mode of accomplishing our purpose, but if we are united in desire, God in his wise Providence will yet mark out the way for our unanimous agreement in the use of the means. In this department of labor—(the removal of slavery)—there rests upon us a responsibility which is beyond my power to express. It is of no use for us to attempt to evade it; we must meet it.

8. In the last place, we must reflect how rapidly the character of our country is forming, and how short a time is allotted to us to use our influence in its formation. Soon our national character will be fixed. In the process of forming character, the United States now stand like a youth of sixteen. Let us be cautious what we do when we touch the springs of character, which is in such a momentous crisis of formation. What we do in this great work, must be done quickly. Soon the scenes of the Judgment will open upon us. Then must we answer the inquiry before assembled nations, and God the Judge of all—How did we discharge our duties as American Christians, who lived in the midst of the nineteenth century?

REVIVAL RECORD.

Clarence Church, Erie Co., continues to enjoy spiritual prosperity. The work of revival is progressing. Br. James H Cochran, in a letter to one of the Editors of the Register, says, "You have heard from Elder Hull respecting the work here. Four individuals who formerly observed the first-day, were added to the church by baptism, some three weeks ago, and there is a probability of more following their example." Brother Hull's account of the work, to which he alludes, made the number of hopeful converts at one protracted meeting, about 50. It is cheering to learn that the work did not stop when the meeting was ended, as is sometimes the case.—It will be remembered that Br. Cochran himself, commenced the observation of the seventh-day not long since, which is probably the occasion of his mentioning the above fact. Truth sometimes triumphs against great odds. It will ultimately prevail.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I copy below a few interesting lines from a letter from Br. A. J. ELLIS, which you are at liberty to insert in the columns of your paper. O.

"WEST LANSING, TOMP. CO., Nov. 9, 1840.

I have been for some weeks engaged in holding a continuous meeting in this place, in connection with Eld. Smith. We have been favored with an out-pouring of the Spirit of God. Some fifteen or twenty have professed a hope, and an unknown number of wanderers have been brought home to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls."

INTELLIGENCE.

THE NORTH RIVER STEAM BOAT MONOPOLY.

Stephen R. Roe and James Gibson were put on trial charged in an indictment with malicious mischief in running the steamboat Napoleon, with intent to kill the passengers of the said boat Napoleon, on the 13th of June last.

Gen. Sandford, Hugh Maxwell, and the District Attorney, appeared for the prosecution, and George Weed, Esqrs.

The case having been opened on the part of the people, Joseph W. Hancox, the captain and part owner of the Napoleon, was called to the stand. It appeared from the testimony of this witness that in the spring of the year a very hot competition was got up on the North River between the owners of the Napoleon and the Captains of the Utica, De Witt Clinton, and other boats belonging to the People's line. On the 11th of June the Napoleon came down from Albany with passengers, and found her berth, at the foot of Robinson street, in the occupation of some other vessels. She therefore had to seek another, and put in at the foot of Barclay street.—On the morning of the 13th, the same thing happened, and the Captain of the Napoleon with some difficulty landed his passengers at the Courtlandt street pier, that being the nearest wharf unoccupied, and even there he had to place planks over a boat-house, and to get his female passengers ashore with much personal inconvenience to them all. That night the Napoleon started from Courtlandt steet pier on her return trip, a little before 5 o'clock, a few minutes after the steamer Legislature had gone up. When opposite Dey street, they first saw the Dewit Clinton leave her station at full speed, and the Captian of the Napoleon ordered his helm to be put up that he might sheer over for the Jersey shore; before, however, that could be accomplished, the De witt Clinton ran aboard the Napoleon, causing her to carcene over on the larboard side untll the water was on a level with the guard, and so alarmed the passengers that several got on board the De Witt Clinton. At this time when the two vessels were foul of each other, the Captain of the Napoleon fired a revolving pistol three times at the pilot of the De witt Clinton, fortunately without hitting him.

There was testimony offered to show that some other aggressive attack had been made upon the Napoleon, and that rumors had got afloat of the intentions to run that vessel down; but the Court ruled that out.

The Court then took a recess, and on its reassembling the Recorder informed the Jury that an arrangement had been made to try the two indictments against these parties at the same time. The testimony taken therefore must apply to the case of the People vs. James Lewis and Joseph W. Hancox, indicted for maliciously shooting at the pilot of the De Witt Clinton.

Steamboat Lost.—On her passage from Brazos to the port of San Luis, in Texas, the steamboat Rodney foundered, and sunk in two fathoms water. The cargo consisted of two hundred and fourteen bales of cotton and a quantity of live oak. The loss of the boat is ascribed to her unseaworthy condition. The captain is exonerated from all censure or blame whatever for the accident. All the cotton was saved.—N. O. Bulletin.

Another Land Slide at Plaquemine.—The Iberville Gazette of the 17th inst. says, "About six arpents of levee and some of the public road in front of the town of Plaquemine, has been carried away by another slide of earth. The slide began about two hundred feet from the former one, so that there will be at least fifteen arpents of levee to be made to preserve the town and a great part of the parish on the right bank of the river from the danger of an overflowing. This second disaster took place on Friday last, and the ground still continues to settle. There now remains of the whole front of the town but a small point where boats can land, and if that slides, there will be no steamboat landing until high water.

Mortgage on Jerusalem.—It is now well authenticated that the Rothschilds hold a mortgage of the Holy City, a circumstance that gives extraordinary interest to the movements of the Jews and to the signs of the times.

Extraordinary Despatch.—The steam ship Britannia left Boston on the afternoon of the 1st October, touched at Halifax, landed and took in her mails and started on the 4th, arriving at Liverpool on the 15th. Left Liverpool on the 20th, and arrived at Halifax at noon on the 1st Nov. Left Hallifax at 8 o'clock on the same evening, and was at her berth in Boston at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 3d. Having been absent only thirty-two days.

Bishop Smith, of Kentucky, has addressed a letter to the ministers of the Kentucky Methodist Conference, advocating the union of the Episcopal and Methodist churches. As far as we have seen the proposal noticed in the Methodist journals, it will not, we judge, be favorably responded to.—Religious Herald.

The political contest is now over, and the excitement is fast subsiding. This is matter of devout gratitude, for so absorbing had been the canvass, that it occupied the thoughts and attention of thousands of our fellow-men to the neglect of settling a far more momentous question: What will it profit a man if he gain the whole world and loose his own soul? The presidential election having been decided, we trust the minds of our citizens will now be turned to those things which make for their eternal peace—and that they will now strive for themselves, as earnestly as they did for their favorite candidate, to make their calling and election sure. Surely the interests of eternity, with reasonable men, ought to be an object of as great importance as those of time.—Religious Herald.

Those who make candles will find it a great improvement to steep the wicks in lime water and salt-petre, and dry them. The flame is cleared, and the tallow will not run.

Oregon Mission.—The Methodists have several mission stations amongst the Indian tribes in the Oregon territory, chiefly on the Columbia river and its branches.—Schools have been established, particularly amongst the Flat Head Indians, which are in a flourishing state, and recent accounts from the missionaries convey the gratifying information, that the Holy Spirit has attended their labors, and that about 500 of the Indians have been converted, and united to the church, and that the work still continues.—Religious Herald.

CENTENNIAL HYMN.

[The following is one of the Hymns composed by Rev. Royal Robins, and sung at the centennial celebration in Farmington, the 4th inst. The other was inserted in the Observer of last week.]

Day bright in our annals, when God sped the band
Of Pilgrims who planted this rude darken'd land;
Beginning of days, that their course since have run—
The cycles are finished that bring back the sun.
Day, day—bright, bright day,
We hail thy return, while we pour thy glad lay.

How chang'd are the scenes! Where amid the wild gloom,
The Indian and panther fought each for his room,
The sunny fields smile, and gay plenty abounds,
Neat mansions arise, and the church-chant resounds.
Scenes, scenes—dear, dear scenes,
What heart but exults o'er these soft swelling greens!

Our stores are here garnered, where God gives us rest,
Here trained are our children, whom Jesus has blest;
Let those whom it likes, o'er the earth wildly roam—
We'll cleave to our fire-sides, our altars, and home.
Home, home—sweet, sweet home,
To you let the storms of dissention ne'er come.

Our sons through all ages, as like to their sires,
Shall feel the fond passion which country inspires;
Truth, knowledge, and freedom, the watch-word be given,
Those jewels of earth, and those raptures of heaven.
Heaven, heaven—blest, blest heaven,
May thine be our home, when from earth we are driven.

From the Church.

ON THE NIGHT-BLOOMING CEREUS.

"He shall grow up before him as a tender plant."—Isaiah liii 2.

A mantle of leaves had enshrouded the rose,
And slumber had hidden the tints of the bower;
When, lo! in the midst of this dewey repose,
As I wandered, I came to the night-blowing flower.

All others their robes and their odors forsaking,
Undistinguished were sleeping in slumber profound;
But this, this alone, in its beauty was waking,
And breathing its soul-filling sweetness around.

'T was a glorious flower! its corrola of white,
A pearl of Arabia 'mid jewels of gold,
And lonely and fair, through the shades of the night,
It beamed with a softness I loved to behold.

And methought, as I looked, what an emblem is this,
Thus blooming afar from the land of its birth,
Of him whose own land is a region of bliss,
Though he grew as a plant in this garden of earth!

'T was thus, while the world all around him was dim,
That he shone with love's purest and holiest ray;
'T was thus in the garden so honored by him,
That night through his fragrance, was richer than day.

Like the flowers, his disciples at midnight were sleeping,
And deep were their slumbers unconscious of care;
While He, in the blood of his agony weeping,
To his Father was breathing the sweetness of prayer.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Ladies' Companion, for November.

THE DYING BOY, AND THE GOOD CHEVERUS.

BY MRS. SEBA SMITH.

Young Edward Stevens laid down the life of the good Bishop Cheverus, and pressed his thin, pale hand to his eyes, for the tears were swelling thickly from beneath it. He was a child yet, scarcely thirteen, bright, good, and learned, for his years, but sickness lay with a heavy hand upon him, and the boy knew, that ere the autumn should have passed away, the dry leaf would rustle upon his grave.

His mother was by, and she gently removed his hand, wiped the tears from his eyes, and laid her cheek to his high, pale forehead.

"You go to a more beautiful world than this, my son, where is wisdom and knowledge and love. You do not shrink from suffering, my noble-minded child, for that appeals only to the body—tell me all that you fear—all that you feel."

Edward put his arms about her neck, and wept freely.

"I was thinking of how much the good can do in the world—and I shall do nothing—the world will be no better that I have lived in it, dear mother."

"Say not so, my own son. You have done much, very much good, already.—Have you not trained your own spirit to gentleness, and goodness—to faith in God, and submission to His holy will? This is a great work, my child—the greatest the human mind, even in long life, can achieve. Then (and she pressed him closer to her bosom) you have accomplished a great mission besides. You have called into exercise the sweetest and purest affections of your mother. You have taught me to pray as I never could have prayed but for you, Edward, and while talking with thee upon those exalted hopes that have not earth for their object, I have found my own faith deepened, my hopes purified, and a power imparted, of which once I could scarcely have dreamed. Say not you have lived in vain, my beloved, when so much has been done through your agency."

The eye of the young sufferer was meekly raised, he clasped his thin hands, and an unearthly smile played upon his lips.

"Father, I thank thee," he articulated; then reverting to the first object of thought, he said, "Let us talk, my dear mother; I am weary, and cannot read. The good pass from the earth, but not so the good they have done."

"No, my son, and though the great and powerful, with their deeds, fade from the records of man, a perpetual halo lingers about the memory of the good. The despised Nazarene, wandering about the mountains of Judea, his locks wet with the dew of the night, scoffed at, perverted and forsaken, seemed little likely to survive the ignominy of the great tragedy of Calvary. But think of the thousands who have since died, relying upon his promises, reposing upon his love, and think how the affections of the good, through all ages, centre about his name. So in a more limited sense it is with all the excellent that have lived.—They form a nucleus, gathering about them the sympathies of all the good that succeeded them. The humblest child with a pure and loving heart, may sway the feelings of a thousand."

Edward smiled gently; a flush passed over his pale forehead, and the blue veins dilated, as if stirred by exalted thoughts, and he whispered gently, "Go on, dear mother."

The mother brushed the tears from her eyes, but she was no weak and ordinary woman, to weep when good could be done, and she pressed the pale boy to her bosom and continued,

"Yes, the glitter that surrounds the conqueror, the great of the earth, merely, must pass away, but goodness is eternal. In the eyes of Him who seeth not as man seeth, the gentle, the prayerful and submissive child may have better fulfilled his destiny than the sage or the philosopher. It is the good only that win the affections; and we love them even as if present with them, ages after they may have passed away; and we love them because the elements of goodness are in our own hearts. You, my son, have thrilled with admiration in reading of the all but Christian philosophers, Socrates and Plato; and it is so, and will always be so, with every generous-hearted school-boy. This is why we love to read of such men as Rahmuhan Roy, and Oberlin, and Felix Noff, who were ready to sacrifice every thing in life, to truth and virtue. All that will, can make the same sacrifices. You, my son, I am quite sure, would have been ready to do as much as any of these, or as much as your favorite Cheverus, had it been the will of our father to continue here. But he graciously accepts the desire, for the performance of thework."

The mother's voice trembled, and tears came to her eyes. "Be comforted, my dear mother," said the sick boy, "all is for the best."

"Many talk of the sufferings, the trials, and privations to which the good are subjected in this life. But with men of such exalted virtue, these cease to be trials, for their glorious conceptions are fixed upon things too lofty to be moved by the petty vexations of this world. What are poverty and the contempt of little men, to him who is absorbed in the majesty of virtue—who regards the loftiness of goodness, rather than the tinsel of wealth? When the good Bishop Cheverus carried the wood, split with his own hands,, into the chamber of the sick wife of the sailor, did he feel degraded by the meanness of the service? No, for it was ennobled by the principle of benevolence. So when he broke his last crust amongst the poor of his flock, who came to him as to a common father, did he feel the pressure of poverty? No, for he gloried to be like his Divine Master in humility and poverty."

The records of man can afford nothing more truly noble, than the good Bishop, domesticated with the poor Indians, partaking of their ill-prepared fare, sleeping upon their rude skins, and visiting their wild wigwams in the midst of storms and cold, that he might reveal to them the hopes of a better faith, and win them to the knowledge of the true God. I can realize the whole merit of the sacrifices he must have made, for I once visited the very tribe where he labored so long and faithfully.—I witnessed their ill-constructed dwellings, their filthy apartments, and the poverty to be seen all around them, and was even paddled across the Penobscot in one of those frail canoes, that the weight of a finger might upset. It might have been the very one that conveyed the good Cheverus upon some of his errands of love. But in the midst of all their debasement and poverty, the influence of the good Bishop was plainly discernable. The only framed building on the island at that time, was the church, surmounted by the cross, and was kept neat and orderly. The dead body of a woman who had died seventy miles up the river, had been brought down to the common place of burial, and was reposing in a rude white coffin, with the crucifix at the head, waiting for the last rights of their religion.

When they went to the grave-yard to dig the grave, I observed that each was ornamented with a wooden cross. They spoke of their priest, Bishop Cheverus, with the greatest reverence and love. His word was a law to them. Nothing could be undertaken, unless first sanctioned by him.—Though of a different faith, we cannot but admire the devotion and Christian piety, which prompted such sacrifices and labors for the good of a poor and obscure tribe of men, at that time on the outskirts of uncivilization.

In poverty and trial, the good man is perpetually reminded "wherein his great strength lies," and he resorts constantly to God for support. But it is prosperity that tests the intricate excellence of character. So it was with the good Cheverus. He knew this, and shrunk from the honors ready to be heaped upon him. With a noble humility, he feared to hazard the test, and chose the works of benevolence, the labors of love, under the privations of a poor and humble diocess, in America, to the honors that awaited him in his native country.—But he needed not to have shrunk from the trial, great as it undoubtedly was, to one pure and self-distrusting, as was the good Bishop. His humility never forsook him. He still might be found in the cabins of the poor and the suffering, imparting relief, and speaking the language of hope and comfort. His sympathies were not with the great, the affluent, whose followers are many, but with the lowly, the outcast, the degraded, the suffering, to whom he might impart relief, countenance, and protection. The rich carpets of his palace were as often trod by the houseless beggar as the rich and powerful; for all knew that the good Cheverus had an ear for every tale of misery, and a heart and hand to afford relief.

Noble example of Christian love, and lowliness of heart. Blessed follower of the meek and loving Jesus, would that more would follow in thy footsteps!

Edward's eye kindled as his mother recited passages in the life of Cheverus.

"Oh, my dear mother, I will not weep that I cannot walk in the footsteps of the good Bishop, for God has been pleased to order otherwise. I shall pass from the earth only to live in Heaven. And yet mother, dear mother, the suffocation, the agony of the last moment, I do, do shrink from it. The mystery of death—it is terrible," and the sick boy pressed his mother's neck with a convulsive tenderness.

The mother fell upon her knees beside the dying boy, and prayed fervently, that these fears might pass from the spirit of her noble-minded child—that the gloom, resting upon the valley of the shadow of Death, might be dispelled by the glorious light of immortality. Calmly, and most fervently did that widowed mother pray beside the bed of her dying boy. When she had finished, a sweet smile was resting upon the lips of Edward, his blue eyes were looking up with an expression of holy contemplation.

"Thy prayer is heard, dear mother," he whispered; "death is but the rending of the veil. At the death of Jesus, the 'Veil of the Temple was rent' I see it now—the good, the beautiful are there."

His mother pressed his lips to hers; the blue eyes closed; young Edward had gone to his home.

TIME.—This is the most indefinite, yet paradoxical state of things; the past is gone, the future is not come, and the present becomes the past even while we attempt to define it, and like the flash of lightning at once exists and expires. Time is the measure of all things, but it is itself immeasurable, and the grand discloser of all things, but is itself undisclosed. Like space, it is incomprehensible, because it has no limits, and it would be still more so if it had. It is more obscure in its sources than the Nile, and in its termination than the Niger—and advances like the swiftest torrent. It gives wings of lightning to pleasure, but feet of lead to pain, and lends expectation a curb, but enjoyment a spur. It robs beauty of her charms to bestow them on her picture, and builds a monument to merit, but denies it a house; it is a transient and deceitful flatterer of falsehood, but a tried and final friend of truth. Time is the subtle yet the most insatiable of all depredators, and by appearing to take nothing is permitted to take all; nor can it be satisfied until it has stolen the world from us, and us from the world. It constantly flies, yet overcomes all things by might, and although it is the present ally, it will be the future conqueror of death.—Time, the cradle of hope, but the grave of ambition, the stern corrector of fools, but the salutary counsellor of the wise, bringing all they dread to the one, and all they desire to the other; but, like Cassandra, it warns us with a voice that even the sagest discredit it too long, and the silliest believe it too late. Wisdom walks before it, and repentance behind it; he that has made it his friend will have little to fear from his enemies, but he that has made it his enemy, will have but little to hope from his friends.—Lacon.

A German writer observes that in America there is such a scarcity of thieves, they are obliged to offer a reward for their discovery.

FOR THE FARMER.

TILLAGE.

"'Tis folly in the extreme to till
Extensive fields, and till them ill;
The farmer pleased, may boast aloud
His bushels sown his acres ploughed,
And pleased, indulge the cheering hope
That time will bring a plenteous crop;
Shrewd common sense sits laughing by—
For when maturing seasons smile,
Thin sheaves shall disappoint his toil.
Advised, this empty pride expel;
Till LITTLE, and that little WELL.
Of taxing, fencing, toil, no more
Your ground requires when rich than poor;
And more one fertile acre yields
Than the huge breadth of barren fields.

"NEAT BE YOUR FARMS; 'tis long confessed
The neatest farmer is the best.
Each bog and marsh, industrious drain,
Nor let vile balks deform the plain;
No bushes on your headland grow,
For briars a sloven's culture show.
Neat be your barns, your houses neat,
Your doors be clean, your court-yards sweet;
No moss the sheltering roof enshroud,
Nor wooden panes the window cloud,
No filthy kennels foully flow,
Nor weeds with rankling poison grow;
But shades expand and fruit trees bloom,
And flowering shrubs exhale perfume;
With pales your garden circle round;
Defend, enrich, and clean the ground;
Prize high the pleasing, useful rood,
And fill with vegetables good."

PROTRACTED VITALITY OF SEEDS.—Books contain an abundance of instances of plants having suddenly sprung up from the soil obtained from deep excavations, where the seeds must be supposed to have been buried for ages. Professor Henslow says, that in the fens of Cambridgeshire, after the surface has been drained and the soil ploughed, large crops of white and black mustard invariably appear. Millar mentions a case of Plantago Psylium having sprung up from the soil of an ancient ditch which was emptied at Chelsea, although the plant had never been seen in the memory of man. De Chandolle says that M. Gerardie succeeded in raising kidney beans from seeds at least a hundred years old, taken out of the herbarium of Tounefort. Raspberry plants have been raised from seeds found in a barrow in Dorsetshire, which seeds, from the coins and other relics met with near them, may be estimated to have been sixteen or seventeen hundred years old.

TO CORRECT DAMAGED GRAIN.—Musty grain, totally unfit for use, and which can scarcely be ground, may, it is said, be rendered perfectly sweet and sound by immersing it in boiling water, and letting it remain till the water becomes cold. The quantity of water must be double to that of the grain to be purified. The musty quality rarely penetrates through the husk or bran of the wheat. In the hot water, all the decayed or rotten grain swims upon the surface, so that the remaining wheat is effectually cleansed from all impurities, without any material loss. It is afterwards to be dried, stirring occasionally, on the kiln.—N. E. Farmer.

FOR PARENTS.

DUTIES OF PARENTS.

Why are cases so frequent in which the children of various parents grow up vicious and abandoned? There are many nice and delicate adjustments necessary to secure the highest and best results in the education of a child, but the principles necessary for tolerable success must be few and simple. There are two which we wish we had a voice loud enough to thunder in the ears of every parent in the country; the breach of one or the other of which will explain almost every case of gross failure on the part of virtuous parents which we have ever known. They are these:

1. Keep your children from bad company.
2. Make them obey you.

Habits of insubordination at home, and the company of bad boys abroad, are the two great sources of evil, which undo so much of what moral and religious instruction might otherwise effect. What folly to think that a boy can play with the profane, impure, passionate boys which herd in the streets six days in the week, and have the stains all wiped away by being compelled to learn his Sunday school lesson on the seventh; or that children who make the kitchen or the nursery scenes of riot and noise from the age of three to eight years, will be prepared for anything in after life but to carry the spirit of insubordination and riot wherever they may go. No! children must be taken care of. They must be governed at home, and kept from contaminating influences abroad, or they are ruined. If parents ask, how shall we make our children obey? We answer, in the easiest and pleasantest way you can, but at all events make them obey. If you ask, how shall we keep our boys from bad company? We answer, too, in the easiest and pleasantest way you possibly can, but at all events, if in the city, keep them out of the streets; and wherever you are, keep them from bad company. The alternative, it seems to us, is as clear and decided as any which circumstances ever made up for man; you must govern your children, and keep them away from the contamination of vice, or you must expect to spend your old age in mourning over the ruins of your family.—J. Abbott.

FOR THE BOYS.

THE BOY AND THE MAN.

A few years ago, there was in the city of Boston, a portrait painter, whose name was Mr. Copley. He did not succeed very well in business, and concluded to go to England to try his fortune there. He had a little son whom he took with him, whose name was John Singleton Copley.

John was a very studious boy, and made such rapid progress in his studies, that his father sent him to college. There he applied himself so closely to his books, and became so distinguished a scholar, that his instructor predicted that he would make a very eminent man.

After he had graduated, he studied law. And when he entered upon the practice of his profession, his mind was so richly stored with information, and so highly disciplined by his previous diligence, that he almost immediately obtained celebrity. One or two cases of very great importance being intrusted to him, he managed them with so much wisdom and skill, as to attract the admiration of the whole British nation.

The king and his cabinet seeing what a learned man he was, and how much influence he had acquired, felt it to be important to secure his service for the government. They therefore raised him from one post of honor to another, till he was created Lord High Chancellor of England—the very highest post of honor to which any subject can attain; so that John Singleton Copley is now Lord Lyndhurst, Lord High Chancellor of England. About sixty years ago, he was a little boy in Boston. His father was a poor portrait painter, hardly able to get his daily bread. Now John is at the head of the nobility of England; one of the most distinguished men in talent and power in the House of Lords, and regarded with reverence and respect by the whole civilized world. This is the reward of industry.—The studious boy becomes the useful and respected man.

Had John S. Copley spent his school boy days in idleness, he would probably have passed his manhood in poverty and shame. But he studied in school when other boys were idle; he studied in college when other young men were waisting their time; he ever adopted for his motto, "Ultra pergere" (Press onward,) and how rich has been his reward.

You, my young friends, who open this book, are laying the foundation for your future life. You are every day at school, deciding the question, whether you will be useful and respected in life, or whether your manhood shall be spent in mourning over the follies of mis-spent boyhood.—J. S. C. Abbott.

DRESS.

There can be nothing more necessary to health and comfort, than that the body should be protected from the inclemencies and vicissitudes of the weather, and kept in an atmosphere of a uniform temperature.

Among civilized nations, dress is worn as well from motives of modesty, as to afford the body a comfortable degree of warmth. But in adapting it to answer these purposes, other considerations are allowed to have an undue influence, and instead of consulting health, comfort, and convenience, we too often give way to the dictates of a way-ward fancy, or yield a servile obedience to the arbitrary rules of fashion. This may be well, provided it does not injure us—change being perfectly right, when we change for the better. But when fashion requires us to dress in such a manner that it is a source of discomfort, or ill health, or both, in respect to quantity or kind, considered in relation to the season of the year and a variety of other circumstances, it becomes necessary to call on our reasoning powers to stop the tide of disease that is sweeping myriads, more particularly of the female part of the Almighty's last creation, from the shores of time to fill an early grave.

Errors in female dress lay the foundation for numerous ills to which the other sex are strangers; but were health considered of as much importance as the fashionable clothing of the body, the long catalogue of diseases that are now deemed our inevitable inheritance would be much reduced.

The practice of "tight-lacing," from its great frequency as well as more fatal consequences, occupies a foremost rank in filling up the black catalogue of human woe. In no one particular is nature more sinned against than in this. It seems, by the common consent of refined people, that a small waist is indispensable to beauty.—This is the sine qua non; to accomplish which, at an early age they are incased in an apparatus of whalebone, wood, or steel, and inelastic and unyielding substances, which are retained, not only till adult life, but as long as life endures; a pernicious practice most injurious and destructive to health, and may indeed be reckoned as one of the chief causes, which consign so many interesting young females to a premature grave. By tight lacing the animal machine is injured, the organs, upon whose integrity and harmony health unceasingly depends, are deranged and interrupted in the performance of their functions, and disease is sooner or later the inevitable result.

Health and a fair complexion depend upon the quality of the blood; and the purity of this fluid again depends upon the free action of the air upon it in its passage through the lungs. Respiration, or breathing, is the process by which the blood is restored to a state of purity; and the integrity of the system must suffer just in proportion as this process fails to be freely accomplished. When the chest is compressed and rendered incapable of dilatation by the corsets, the lungs do not fully expand—too small a quantity of air is admitted—the blood is but partially renovated, and health is but imperfectly enjoyed.

When the constitution is naturally delicate, the unhappy female lingers out a life imbittered by disease, the cause of which she never suspects, and if correctly informed as to the origin, strenuously denies facts, until hovering on the verge of another world she is forced to an unwilling confession. Our nature, or rather the infirmity of nature is such that we will seek to gratify our passions and propensities at the risk, or even at the certain sacrifice of life. The soldier indulges his ambition by seeking a "bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth"; and females indulge their love of admiration by displaying what is in fact a deformed or transformed person. The soldier is nothing daunted by seeing his companions fall around him; his aspirations for glory impel him on to death or renown; so she whose passion is display, and whose glory is to be admired, still persists in her injurious practice, though she, too, sees her companions silently falling by a species of involuntary suicide.

Another great and prevailing error in relation to dress, consists in wearing too small a quantity of clothing to afford adequate protection against the sudden and frequent changes of weather in this variable climate.

We experience in this latitude as high a temperature in the summer months, as is generally felt in the tropical regions; but, unlike the weather within the tropics, where the nights are equally warm with the days, we experience cool, or even chilly nights. Therefore it is obvious that a dress which is comfortable and proper in a warm day, is decidedly improper in a cool night. Fashion has rendered it common for females to use but a slight covering, if any, for the neck and upper part of the chest; but why they should find it necessary to have this part of the body so little protected, while men require a proportionably great quantity on the same parts, is more than my imagination can discover. The partial immunities from suffering from this cause, which they do enjoy, may be mainly attributed to their early forming the habit of going but thinly clad; their system thus becoming accustomed to privation, makes a virtue of necessity, and learns to dispense with a supply of its most important wants. But this exposure of the neck and chest is not all. How often do we observe, in the dead of winter, females fitted up with silk or cotton stockings, of finest texture, over which is placed shoes, scarcely better than paper, to protect from wet and cold. With extremes so thinly clad, what wonder then, that the circulating fluids should be driven upon internal organs that are already suffering from undue pressure of the corset, and nature with all its healing efforts overcome. Disease seizes upon the vitals—ghastly consumption, with grasp unearthly, lays hold upon the abused frame—the machinery of life ceases to move—the spirit takes its flight, to answer at the tremendous bar of GOD for the deeds done to the body. Reader, must this be termed self-murder?

For the Register.

"RESIST THE DEVIL AND HE WILL FLEE FROM YOU."

Suppose you were extremely anxious to overturn a large building. You would in the first place consider what means would be most likely to be successful. You would then apply the power to such part of the building as would the most easily move it. If baffled in this, some more powerful means would be sought, and perhaps applied to some other part of the building. If you should fail in every artifice, and could think of no means by which you would hope to succeed, would you not give up the pursuit? And while the building remained strong and fully on its foundation, would you ever again try to overturn it?

But suppose on your first trial you could easily stir the building. If you could not overturn it by the first effort, would you not be encouraged to try some other way? If this should not fully succeed, would you cease your efforts? Nay, you would still try, in hopes that, at least, by degrees you could move it, and with props hold it to the place at which each successive lift had raised it, so that you would at length effect your object.

If however, all your efforts should prove unavailing, you would reluctantly cease trying. But would you not, now and then, look at the building with chagrin, and earnestly desire its overthrow? And suppose you could, at length, devise some plan by which to partly slide it from its foundation. Then you could overturn it easily.

Now Christians are "God's building." Satan plies them with his temptations. "He goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." With subtle, guileful art, he endeavors to seduce them to indulge in "the lusts of the flesh," in "the desire of the eyes, and the pride of life." Or, failing in these, he will try to move them from their foundation, which is Christ. Could he but partly succeed in this, his temptations would not be so firmly resisted as formerly, and "the enemy would enter at any point, however improbable, if it be left unguarded." So that with the weakening influence of indulging in carnal propensities, combined with the difficulty of standing while only partly on the foundation, Satan gets the advantage and they fall!

O then, Christian brother, or sister, steadfastly shun every temptation—abide firmly on the "Rock," Christ Jesus, and you shall joyfully realize the truth of the inspired declaration, "resist the Devil, and he will flee from you."

IMITATION OF THE DEITY.—There is one picture which a man should be drawing all the days of his life; which is that of God upon his soul; and though the resemblance must needs be extremely faint and imperfect, yet by a constant application and meditation upon the beauties of the original, he cannot fail, by divine grace, to make an admirable piece.—Howe.

RELIGIOUS.

EVANGELICAL PREACHING.

"To what extent are we bound to introduce the way of salvation through Christ in every discourse? Some would answer that no sermon is truly evangelical unless it contain a plain exhibition of what a sinner must do to be saved. But were it our duty so to order our ministry, that in every sermon, the way of salvation should be introduced,—not by force, but naturally, and by legitimate connexion with the main subject; not merely in a few sentences, too general to be understood by the ignorant, and too common-place to arrest the attention of any, but in a manner adapted to enlighten the mind and affect the heart;—then the preacher would be always confined to one neighborhood of subjects, and numerous subordinate ones that are 'profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness,' must be almost excluded, or receive at best, a very limited, occasional, and unsatisfactory consideration. Such is not the lesson obtained from the scriptures.—Christ is continually exhibited in the Old Testament annals. They contain the history of his Church as waiting or looking for his appearing. Christ is preached in the whole system of the Mosaic institutions, which were but a shadow of the good things to be found in him. The tabernacle, with its ark and mercy-seat, its altars and furniture, its offering and daily service, the priesthood, the pillar of cloud, the manna, the rock, the cities of refuge, all spake of Christ. 'To him give all the prophets witness.'—'The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.' How entirely every page of the New Testament is pervaded with the same, I need not say. But we do not see, in the New Testament or in the Old, such a confinement to the vicinity of the cross that no distinct subject is relinquished till it has led to some distinct exhibition of the way of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ. Every thing has a bearing that way, but does not fall directly into that line. Its course is bent, like the orbit of a planet, by the attraction of that centre; so that though it may never be turned directly, it is always inclined towards the latter, and rendering continual homage to its supremacy. The inspired writers, with one common centre, occupied a range of great extent and variety, while at every point they could receive light from the cross, and say, 'Behold the lamb of God.'

"I would say, therefore, that as no subject can be considered legitimate in the pulpit that does not contain an important bearing upon Christ as to some part of vital connection with sinners; so no sermon can be justly considered evangelical that does not faithfully exhibit and enforce such bearing, so as to assign to the Lord Jesus that position in reference to the whole discourse, which he holds in respect to the whole body of truth and faith of which he is the vital head. Some subjects have a much nearer and more direct relation to Christ than others. These, and especially such as contain prominently his death, an evangelical preacher will choose as very decidedly the favorite and the most frequent occupants of his pulpit. Others however, because more distant, are not unimportant, and should not be overlooked. 'The body' of Divine truth, 'is not one member, but many;' and no preacher may say, even to its feeblest extremity, 'I have no need of thee.' That which tests the evangelical character of a subject is the question—Does it bear witness to Christ? That which tests the evangelical character of a sermon is the question—Whether the testimony of Jesus, according to the truth as it is in Jesus, be its spirit and its tendency? That which measures the evangelical character of one's habitual ministry, is the more general question—Whether such testimony, in spirit as well as truth,, in the 'mind of Christ' as well as according to 'the oracles of God,' is its pervading, omnipresent characteristic.'"—Bishop McIlvaine's Charge to the Clergy of Ohio.

THE MISSIONARY'S WIFE.

Not through the quiet shadows of our vale
Have I pursued thy path—thy God's and thine;
Not where the violet rises on the gale—
Not where the green fields in the summer shine.
White was our little dwelling, and around
Were kindred, ancient friends, and countrymen;
Not often did it know a ruder sound
Than when a child-like brook laughed through the glen.
We left our country, and we left our home,
For other stranger lands beyond the sea,
Thou, at the bidding of thy God; to roam,
Strong in thy faith—and I to follow thee.
The wild woods heard our voices, and the name
Of the Redeemer, till that hour unknown—
Praises and prayers amid the desert came,
Stirring its depths with their eternal tone.
Men who till then had never known the voice
Which murmured at their hearts of awe and fear,
Now knew it called upon them to rejoice,
And felt the presence of their God was near.
Has not the rosy morning heard our hymn,
Heralding in the labors of the day?
And when the twilight's purple shades were dim
Our tasks were closed with words that praise and pray.
Be this the omen of all coming time,
To spread thy word from rise to set of sun—
Till the one God be known from clime to clime,
And the great work of Christian love be done.

FAITH.—Faith makes us draw all our comforts from a fountain that will never fail.—Halyburton.

From the Christian Watchman.

Mr. Editor:—Enclosed I send you a poetical extract, which was published seventeen years ago in the Columbian Star, at Washington, D. C., then under the editorial care of the late lamented Prof. Knowles. It was afterwards, by special request, republished in the same paper. Perhaps you may deem it worthy a place in the Christian Watchman.

AFFLICTION'S ANTIDOTE.

When sorrow, with a grasp which knows no mercy,
Fastens its vulture fangs within our breasts;
And holds us victims of his dire embrace.
Where can we fly for succor, for support?—
When disappointment tears away the joys
Which we most fondly cherished, when we knew
No days of sadness; when the grave contains
Our dearest earthly hopes, and we are left
To feel the anguish of a broken heart;
To what dear object can we cling? And where,
Where, in the wide extent of Nature, Art,
And Fancy, can we find a substitute?—
When storms and tempests, chill and pitiless,
Rudely assail our shiv'ring, aching frames,
Where can we find a welcome refuge? Where
Can the weary, fainting soul find rest?—
Alas! I knew not, once; but now I know—
———Example taught me . . . .

Some years have pass'd, since A— was woo'd and won
In early youth she gave her hand and heart
To one who knew her value. He had gazed
With dear delight upon her op'ning virtues;
And blest himself when he had made them his.
And well he might,—she was a treasure, such
As worlds of gold could never buy. And he Was worthy of her. Both had given to God
Their best affections; and as angels love,
They loved each other. Years went swiftly by
In smooth succession. And if indeed a cloud
Did overspread their sky, it soon again
Was blown away, and soon forgotten too.

Four blooming daughters and an infant son
Were pledges of their mutual love. They gave
Their offspring up to God and vowed them his.
They oft invoked his care—the bended knee,
And voice of supplication often proved
Their true devotion—and the cheerful heart
Told their delightful trust in man's best Friend.
But Nature has a voice which will be heard.

Once, at the setting sun, I saw this pair
Walking adown the vale, which, could it speak,
Would tell its sacredness to thoughts, to prayer,
And pious contemplation; bidding vice
And profanation not approach too near.
I saw them wandering slowly; and I heard,
(Ungenerous intrusion!) heard their free
And unrestrained communion—and I wept
With child-like weakness. 'Twas a tender scene.
In lovely helplessness, which seemed to speak
A volume large, A— leaned upon the arm
Which fondness loved to trust in. She had found
It always faithful, ready to protect
An air of melancholy threw itself
Across her softened features; and a wildness
Seized her beauteous eye; and faster still
She grasped her partner's arm, as she, in sighs,
Unbosomed to her friend her inward fears
"If Heaven," she cried, "should take thee from the world,
Should tear thee from these arms which now embrace thee,
What more could ever please me! I would wish—
Yes, I would throw me on the grave which held
My dearer self, and there sleep sweetly with thee.
I would not live, and know such bitter sadness—
And these dear babes which cling around our knees,
Those pledges of our love, whose infant smiles
Have chased away our sorrows—who would be
A father to them! Who would take them kindly
Home, and, with a father's care, instruct them!
Who would guard their virtues, feel their wrongs,
And clasp them to his heart, and call them his!"

Her partner was a Christian; and he learned
A pious resignation to the will
Of him who gives and takes away again.
"Can you not trust a wise and gracious God?"
This only he replied. The mild reproof,
So sweetly given, banished every fear,
And quell'd each rising murmur. Soon they left
The lonely, green retreat, and wandered back
To taste afresh the pleasures of their home. . . . .
. . . . The days of sorrow came. The bitterness
Of grief roll'd o'er them—for the dread, the dismal
Summons snatched away a tender lover,
Husband, father, friend; and hid him deep
Beneath the ground, in a cold bed of clay.
I saw the shroud—the bier—the new-laid sods—
And all the sable trappings of the grave.
I turned away, and wept; for the thought of orphans
Helpless, and a lonely widow's grief,
Demand the tribute of a falling tear;
And heartily I gave it. One there was,
Alone, who shed no tears, who murmured not,
Who spoke no words of sorrow. It was she,
The faithful, fond companion of his youth,
Who now is seen no more. A placid air,
Of sweet composure sat upon her brow,
Bespeaking inward peace. Oh, call it not
A cold and heartless apathy, which thus
Could lull to sleep the tumults of the breast!
Say not it was a stupor which despair
In mercy gave, to soothe the anguish'd heart!
This wretched consolation cannot smooth
The brow of care, or drive away the pain
Which gnaws with agony a heart like her's.
Ah; no! a better refuge is the grave.
But this she needed not—she raised her eyes
With pious, filial confidence to Heaven,
And in the language of devotion said,
"Thy hand inflicts the blow, most gracious God!
And art thou not my Father? I will bear
The stripes which fall upon me—and will kiss
The hand which deals them. Here I throw me down
In calm submission at thy feet, and trust
Thy promise. Thou art still the widow's God—
The orphan's Father, Judge, and faithful Friend.
Oh, heal the wound which thou thyself hast made—
Which only thou canst heal. To thee I cling,
My Savior, God! and learn thy will divine."

"HEREIN IS LOVE."

The great agent of our recovery was the eternal Son of God, who descended from the throne to the manger, and wrestled with unutterable agonies in our behalf. So God set his heart upon man, that for our rescue he spared not his own Son. Dear as he was to him, he spared him not. Dear in his humanity; for it was unstained with the original taint of fallen human nature, and through life, was sanctified to God in a course of perfect and cheerful obedience. Dear, for the generous manner in which that human nature consented, with the divine, to an obedience which was extended to death, "even the death of the cross"—Dear, as the temple of the divine nature, of the second person of the Godhead, and that person infinitely dear as his own, his proper Son—the Son of his love. Yet he spared him not! It even "pleased him to bruise him and put him to grief!" What words are these! The love of God to man surmounted even that natural anxiety to preserve an object so beloved as his own Son, from ignominy and grief, and deep and awful suffering. Herein, indeed, is love!—Where shall we go for the manifestations of the tenderness, the sympathy, the benignity of God? Go to the heavens, which canopy man with grandeur, and cheer his steps with successive light. Go to the atmosphere, which invigorates his spirits and is to him the breath of life. Go to the smiling fields, verdant for his eye, and rich for his sustenance. Go to every scene which spreads beauty before his gaze, which is made harmoniously vocal to his ear, which fills and delights the imagination by its greatness or by its glow. We travel with you, we admire with you, we feel and enjoy with you, we adore with you, but we stay not with you. We hasten on in search of demonstration more convincing, that "God is love." We press into the strange, the mournful, the joyful scenes of Calvary, and there, amidst the throng of invisible and astonished angels, weeping disciples, and the mocking multitudes—under the arch of the darkened heavens, and with the earth trembling beneath us, we gaze upon the meek, the resigned, but fainting Sufferer, and exclaim, HEREIN is love—herein, and no where else, is it so affectingly, so unequivocally evinced;—"not that we loved God, but that God loved us."

TRUE FAITH.

True faith is a great and sublime quality. It is greater, I am persuaded, than it is commonly accounted to be, much as it is exalted and lauded in religious discourses. It is sometimes lauded indeed, at the expense of reason. It is often so represented as if its sublimity consisted in its being a mystical quality, in its superiority to works, to the labors of duty, to the exercise of the quiet and patient virtues. To the hearer of such representations, it often seems as if this glory and charm of faith lay in a sort of visionary peace of mind, obtained without any reference to the culture of the mind or of the heart. But no, the very reverse of this is the truth. Faith is a great and sublime quality, because it is founded in eternal reason; because it is a patient and faithful inquirer, and not a hasty and self-confident rejector, not an idolizer of its own fanciful and visionary suggestions of doubt. It is great too, because it is moral; because, as an apostle declares, it works by love, and purifies the heart; because it is an elevation of the soul towards the purity and glory of the only and independently great and glorious Being. It is great, moreover, and in fine, because it is a principle of perpetual advancement. It does not write down its creed, as if it could never go beyond that; as if that were its standard and its limit; as if that were the sum and perfection of all that it could ever receive. No; it is a sublime principle, because it takes hold of the sublimity of everlasting progress. When it reaches a brighter sphere; when it no longer knows in part, but knows as it is known; when its contemplation has become actual vision, and its deductions have risen to assume the certainty and take the place of first principles; then will it, on the basis of these first principles, proceed to still further deductions. Still, and ever will the fields of inquiry lie before it—far and forever before it. Onward and onward will they spread beneath other heavens, to other horizons, bright regions leading to yet brighter regions, boundless world for thought to traverse, beyond the track of solar day,—where—where shall its limit be?—what eye can pursue its flight thro' the infinitude of ages?

EVIDENCE OF GRACE.—The going forth of the soul by faith unto Christ, as the anointed of the Lord, sent and sealed by the Father to undertake the great work of man's redemption, is a sure evidence of regeneration.—Cole.

DIVINE GRACE.—Grace is so free, that the mercy we abuse, the name we have profaned, that name of which we have deserved wrath, opens its mouth with pleasure for us. His name, while it pleads for them, mentions their demerits, that grace might appear to be grace indeed, and triumph in its own sweetness.—Charnock.

EFFECT OF REPENTANCE.—In true repentance the soul makes full and firm resolutions of new obedience and amendment of life, ready to issue forth into action, through the grace and assistance of the Divine Spirit.—Beverly.

SIN.—Bold sinning doth afterwards make faint believing.—Fleming.

FORGETTING GOD IN HEALTH.

The very common sin among all ages, of forgetting God in times of health and prosperity, is forcibly illustrated by the following incident:—

A little girl was telling her aunt about her father, who had just returned from Havanna, where he had been dangerously sick. "Aunt," said she, "I used to pray for father every day, when he was sick at Havanna, that God would take care of him, and make him well."

"Well," said her aunt, "do you not pray for him now he has got home, and is well?"

"O, no," said the little girl, "for he can take care of himself, now!"

But does not that little girl know that her father just as much needs the care of God to continue his health when at home, as he did to restore it when at Havanna? He cannot take care of himself. Should God withdraw his kind, protecting care from him an instant, or from any of us, we should cease to breathe—we should die. Perhaps the rose of health is now blooming on that little girl's cheeks; but should God leave her a moment to take care of herself, that rose would instantly fade away, and she would be pale in death. No infant so much needs the mother's watchful care, as we all need the constant care of God.

When in danger or sickness, we may—we ought to pray, as that little girl did, that God would take care of us, and restore us to health, and deliver us from danger; but when health is restored, and danger is past, we should not be so ungrateful, so wicked, as to forget him. O, no! Our hearts should then overflow with thanksgiving for his goodness, and ascend in earnest supplications for the continuance of his mercy and his loving kindness unto us.

MISERY OF THE LOST.—No suffering, even in this life, is so dreadful as that occasioned by the stingings of an insulted and enraged conscience, when roused by the recollections of past guilt. How many have pined away and died under her tortures! Sometimes you may hear the commencement of those wailings which are never to end. Conscience, "like the dying taper, which, before it expires, gives a brighter blaze," starts up and flashes conviction upon the stupid soul, which even here kindles the fire that never dies. "You told me," said a dying man to his infidel companions, "you told me there is no hell! I feel it in my bosom already!" "Oh," said another, "Oh for insanity—for any thing to quell memory, the never-dying worm that feeds on my heart!"

Such, sometimes, is the influence of memory in this life. But oh, who can estimate her power beyond the tomb! where the mind is untrammeled—where a whole life of sin and impenitence becomes the subject of solemn reflection! All that can be felt here, is only a slight foretaste of what lies beyond. There, unlike the taper, whose expiring blaze soon goes out in darkness, conscience burns on with ever-increasing and more insufferable brightness for ever. There the sinner must submit to her fearful sovereignty. There he must forever think, and every thought will be lightning.—Rev. Mr. Thompson.

SINFUL IGNORANCE.—Darkness in the minds of men, ignorance of God, his nature, and his will, was the original of all evil unto this world, and so continues.—Hereon did Satan erect his kingdom and throne, obtaining in his design until he bare himself as the God of this world, and was so esteemed by the most of mankind. As prince of darkness, he exalted himself, by virtue of that darkness, into the place of God, as the object of the religious worship of men. For the things which the Gentiles sacrificed they sacrificed unto devils, and not unto God. This is the territory of Satan, the power and sceptre of his kingdom in the minds of the children of disobedience. Hereby he maintains his dominion to this day in many and great nations, and with numberless individuals. This is the spring of all wickedness and confusion among men. Hence arose that deluge of abominations in the old world, which God took away with a flood of desolation. Hence were the sins of Sodom and Gomorrah, which he punished with fire from heaven. All the rage, confusion, cruelty, oppression, and villainy, with which the world is filled, and whereby the souls of men are hurried into eternal destruction, have arisen from corrupt ignorance of God.—Owen.

EXAMINE YOURSELVES.—Ah! how irrecoverable a woe is it to be beguiled in the affairs of eternity. What if I miss Christ's approving testimony, and be set among the goats? who have too much art to cozen my own soul and others with the flourish of ministerial holiness. I am afraid of prevailing security. We watch little; we wrestle little. It were safe to write over a new copy of our accounts; of the sins of nature, childhood, youth, riper years, and old age. If Christ have another written representation of me, than I have of myself, surely his is right; and if it contradict my mis-stating and sinfully erroneous account, where am I!—Rutherford.

From the New York Evangelist.

PREACHING WITHOUT NOTES.

There is no telling what a man can do, until he is compelled to make the trial. A truly benevolent clergyman of our acquaintance, whose whitened head gives evidence of long service in the Savior's cause, related to us an anecdote respecting his first extemporaneous sermon, which was not a little amusing.

It was in his younger days, when, as yet, like a good Presbyterian, he adhered to the venerable practice of reading his discourses that he was accustomed to officiate occasionally in a free meeting-house, somewhat distant from his own, which was chiefly occupied by a neighboring Methodist society. Belonging to that society was an aged Methodist lady, who delighted to attend upon his ministrations, but who often mourned to think that one who preached so well should still persist in using the manuscript, that almost spoiled the whole. The old lady was troubled with deafness, and was in the habit of standing near the good man, and sometimes of leaning her elbow on the pulpit, in order to receive the benefit of his scriptural instructions.

It should be particularly mentioned, that the said pulpit was a rude concern, being a kind of box elevated upon a platform of boards, the ends of which projected from the sides of the desk. On this platform the old lady took her reverential station.—The minister had turned over the sacred book, found his text, deposited his manuscript in its leaves, and left the Bible open near the corner of the desk, where the aged disciple stood to listen. The eye of the old lady had not failed to observe the precise location of the sermon. It was an easy matter for her to plant her elbow firmly upon that very corner of the book, and leaning upon her hand, become absorbed in the most serious reflections.

The minister was embarrassed. He was just about to announce his text, and being a polite gentleman, considered that should he take away the prop of his benevolent hearer, he should greatly endanger the security of her position. Suffice it to say, that such were the proprieties of the case, in the view of the young minister—and young ministers, you know, are sometimes a little embarrassed—that he judged it the better part of valor, to attempt a discourse independent of the manuscript. What the peculiar edification of the old lady must have been, as she enjoyed the double advantage of holding one sermon under her elbow, while, with ear attendant she listened to the other, it is easy to imagine. When she afterwards spoke to the good divine, "Don't tell me again," said she, "that you cannot preach without notes, for I never shall believe you." Some time after, when he told her the predicament in which her resolute elbow had placed him, the aged matron's eyes sparkled a little, but she did not condescend to give any explanations. For once, at least, if never again, she had enjoyed the privilege of hearing from her favorite instructor, a sermon without notes.

DAMASCUS.—Damascus stands where it stood in Abraham's time,—perhaps the most ancient, certainly one of the most interesting cities in the world. Lovely in position—renowned in the Old, distinguished in the New Testament—a holy city among the Mahometans—the seat of romance and poetry—still Damascus stands in unchanged—and, if the word may be allowed with reference to any thing earthly, it may at least be blamelessly employed—Damascus stands in unchangeable beauty.—The fierce spirit of its inhabitants, once so fanatical, has been moderated by a more tolerant and gentle influence. Jews and Christians mingle without mutual abhorrence, and our Dragoman, Joseph the Jew, was the guest of one of the most distinguished authorities of the city. Many of the Damascus Jews carry on an extensive commerce in foreign merchandize; they trade with Great Britain and with the ports of France and Italy. Among them are some of the richest men in Syria, possessing from one to two millions of piastres, of which one hundred make a pound sterling. They deal largely with the caravans which arrive from Mesopotamia, Persia, and all the regions of the East. Some of them traffic with the Arabs of the desert. In Damascus and Aleppo, commerce has much of a primitive and patriarchal character.—Multitudes of camels, asses, and trading travelers arrive—deposite their merchandize in the great khans or receptacles of the city—and when their commodities are sold or exchanged, they depart in a body to the places of their destination.—Dr. Bowring.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER.—This distinguished prelate died on Thursday, Aug. 27, at Broadstairs, after a short illness, at the advanced age of 72 years.—The Right Rev. divine had not been in the best health for some months; but during the whole of the late parliamentary session, was able to attend in the House of Lords. As a scholar, he had a few equals. Early in his career, he became a tutor to the sons of the late Sir Samuel Romily, through the interests of whose family and connections, aided by his own talents, it is supposed much of his prosperity was owing. He was appointed first Principal of King's College, London, where his biblical knowledge and excellent superintendance of that seminary of learning, were productive of the most beneficial effects. While holding that high and responsible office, he was earnest in his endeavors for its success, and untiring in promoting its exalted object. From that station he was, in 1836, called to one still higher and more honored, being then nominated Bishop of Chichester, succeeding Dr. Maltby, on the translation of the latter to the see of Durham. Though little more than three years have elapsed since Dr. Otter's appointment, numbers will remember his performance of its duties with affectionate regret and sincere respect for his superior character as a scholar and a Christian. The late Dr. William Otter was Senior Wrangler at Cambridge, in 1790. He was a member of the Senate of the London University.—London paper.

TO-DAY.—What do you amiss to-day, you may amend to-morrow, in this life. For as many suns as God maketh to arise upon you you have as many new lives; but you can die only once; and if you mar the business, you cannot come back to mend your work. No man sinneth twice in dying, for we die ill, or well but once. The number of your months is written in God's book; work then till the shadows of the evening come upon you. Fulfil your course with joy; for we take nothing to the grave with us, but a good or an evil conscience.—Rutherford.

TO-MORROW.—The wicked are driven away from all the means of grace, and all set beyond the line, quite out of all prospect of mercy. There is no more an opportunity to buy oil for the lamp. It goes out at death, and can never again be lighted. Offers of mercy and peace are made after they are gone; but not to them. There are no such offers made in the place in which they are found. Those offers are made only in that place from which they have been driven away in their wickedness.—Boston.

AN UNPROFITABLE MINISTER.—Some years ago, a clergyman, who was a widower, married the widow of a deceased minister of another denomination. She was a woman highly esteemed for her correct views of divine truth, and for sincere and consistent piety. She had not long accompanied her new companion in his public and social worship before she became pensive and dejected. This awakened the solicitude of her companion, who insisted on knowing the cause. At length, with trembling hesitancy, she observed, "Sir, your preaching would starve all the Christians in the world." "Starve all the Christians in the world!" said the astonished preacher; "why, do I not speak the truth?" "Yes," replied his wife; "and so you would were you to stand in the desk all day and say my name is Mary. But, sir, there is something beside the letter in the truth of the gospel." The result was a very important change in the ministerial efforts of this clergyman, after which his partner sat and heard him preach with great delight.

CHARITY.—Charity to the souls of men is undoubtedly the highest, the noblest, and the most important charity. No one knows how much good he may do by dispersing Bibles and books of piety, which may have a tendency to make men wiser and better. Who can tell but that with the expense of less than a shilling, you may "convert a sinner from the error of his ways, and save a soul from death? A worse doom than to be condemned to the mines, rests upon the soul who had rather hoard up his money than employ it in such a charity.—Cotton Mather.

FOR THE CHURCH.

THE WINE OF THE PASSOVER.—In answer to an inquiry from E. C. Delavan to M. M. Noah, Esq., as to the kind of wine used at the passover, Mr. N. made the following reply:

"I have your favor requesting to know how the wine is prepared for the passover. If you wish to make a small quantity for the communion table, (for wine will soon grow sour, having no alcoholic body,) take a gallon demijohn—a stone jug; then pick a few pounds of bloom raisins; break off the stems; put the raisins into the demijohn and fill it with water. Tie a rag over the mouth, and place the demijohn near the fire, or on one side of the fire-place, to keep it warm. In a week it will be fit for use—making a pure, pleasant, and sweet wine, free from alcohol. It may last from Sabbath to Sabbath, without getting sour or tart; but it is easy to make a small quantity for each time it is used. This is the wine we use on the night of the passover, because it is free from fermentation, as we are strictly prohibited (on that occasion) not only from eating leavened bread, but from drinking fermented liquors."

De Ruyter, December 1, 1840.

BAPTIST ADVOCATE.

The editor of this paper, in noticing our remarks in the 36th No. of the Register, relating to the convention in Boston to consider the claims of the first day of the week as a divine institution, &c, holds the following:

"SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.—The editor of this paper appears to have taken umbrage at our remarks regarding the novel convention called by certain men and women to consider the claims of "the Sabbath, the ministry, and the church to be regarded as divine institutions." He asserts that we "would not object to a discussion, relative to immersion as the true and only mode of baptism," and expresses his joy, that a spirit of inquiry in such matters is in progress.

Our brother has probably mistaken the character and purposes of the convention in question. Were it called by members of evangelical churches to determine some mooted question between them, we could not reasonably object. But from the very wording of the call, we apprehend, the purpose is, to sustain the views lately put forth from Boston against "every thing like an outward, visible church; to every thing that in the remotest degree partakes of the priest." That the Lord will overrule even this for the advancement of his glory, we firmly believe; but such a belief cannot make us rejoice in these demonstrations of enmity to His institutions.

The editor further asks us, "Whether the fourth commandment is still binding on Christians?" We express our opinion unequivocally in the negative. He further asks us, "Where is the appointment of the first day to be found?" We answer: In the recorded observance of the day by the apostles. Matthew xx: 19 and 26; Acts xx: 7; 1 Cor. xvi: 2, and elsewhere. Our views respecting the Lord's day, and the distinction between it and the Jewish Sabbath, have been freely imparted from time to time, more especially in our reviews of books written upon this subject.

We would in return be pleased to learn, whether the editor of the S. D. B. Register really approves the apparent purpose of those, who have called the convention, and what he thinks of the propriety of females calling such or any other convention for public discussion. We should like also to hear his views of Brownson's doctrines regarding religion."

The call of the Advocate for an expression of our views respecting "Brownson's doctrines regarding religion," is unexpected to us, since, in addition to our previously published opinions on those points, we stated in the article to which the Editor alludes, "we are confident that the institutions of the ministry, and the church will lose nothing by the severest scrutiny, and the assent of all honest persons will be yielded to the divinity of their origin. And if the first day of the week has been divinely appointed as the Sabbath under the gospel dispensation, a discussion could hardly fail to operate favorably on the subject and impress the public mind with the importance of observing it more strictly." As our views were either not understood by our brother, or were unsatisfactory to him, we now say that the peculiarities of "Brownsonism," to which he refers, are most abhorrent to us. The church is built upon the Rock; and neither men nor "women," nor even "THE GATES OF HELL" shall prevail against it.

To his question, as to the "propriety of females calling conventions for public discussion," we answer, that we wholly disapprove such a course, especially if females are to be actors in them. We dissent also from the practice of Baptist churches in some parts of the country, of encouraging females to participate in the transaction of ordinary church business. We deem them both unscriptural.

We did not "rejoice in demonstrations of enmity" to the "institutions" of God, but we were glad, and are still glad, that the claims of the first day to sanctification are attempted to be brought to a proper test. If they are valid, they will not suffer; if otherwise, let them plead for themselves. But why should our brother thus construe our remarks? If a convention of Pedo-baptists and Quakers or Friends, were called to discuss the claims of the ordinance of baptism, and immersion as the mode, would he not "be glad to see the spirit of inquiry extending"? and if he should so express himself, would it be just for a Pedo-baptist to charge him with rejoicing to see "demonstrations of enmity" to the ordinance of baptism, because he only wished that right views of it might prevail? [He thinks affusion no baptism, and we think the first day is no Sabbath.] Or, did Paul rejoice that some who preached the gospel, did so for "contention and strife"? He certainly did rejoice that Christ was preached; not that he was preached with unworthy motives.

The editor may judge correctly respecting the object proposed in the convention, and he may be honestly mistaken. In any event we do think that the evil will not be so easily cured by an attempt to prevent discussion. To attempt this, gives too much advantage to errorists, by exciting public sympathy in their favor. It would have been far better, in our judgment, to have met them, as we understood several respectable gentlemen, members of orthodox churches, intended to do, and show those who called the convention, and others, that the institutions in question were of divine origin. We believe our brethren intended to subserve the cause of truth in what they published respecting that convention, and if it turns out to have done so, we hope to rejoice with them in their success. Our desire is, that every doctrine and observance may be examined by the people for themselves, and so understood that the public mind may be well fortified against error in all its forms—and that even the most wholesome truth may not be held because some branch of the church teaches it, but because the Bible reveals it.

In reference to the Sabbath, there appears to be a new issue made between us and the editor of the Advocate. He labors to establish what he calls a "divine appointment," not upon any divine enactment, but on "a recorded observance." Having repudiated the law which requires the sanctification of the Sabbath, he places reliance on the practice of the church, to find both authority and example for the religious observation of the first day of the week!—What more, we ask, would the Papists wish than this? Is it not emphatically making void the commandment of God, to establish human authority and tradition? So it seems when the Advocate attempts to adduce proof for first-day keeping, we are to expect to hear not the excellent old Baptist expression, "Thus saith the Lord," but, Thus did the brethren! The scriptures to which he refers us for the "recorded observance," unhappily do not prove it, or that even one religious meeting was held on the first day, in the light part of it. That in Acts xx. 7, being a record of an evening meeting, and on the evening which followed the seventh day or Sabbath; and that early next morning Paul resumed his journey. Whenever, therefore, the religious "observance" of the first day did commence, it had not commenced then, for the APOSTLE PAUL traveled at this time on Sunday!—1 Cor. xvi. 2, makes no mention of any meeting or worship, and refers only to an examination of worldly matters and a preparation to bestow charity when the Apostle should arrive. We now ask the editor to show us, if he can, one instance of a religious meeting having been held on the first day of the week, in the day time, in the New Testament, except in cases where such meetings were held on every day, or a number of days in succession.

We wish our brother would examine this subject more critically; we trust he will find reason to change his views respecting it. Truth is the greatest treasure, and cannot be purchased at too dear a rate, though the dearest earthly treasures and relations were sacrificed for it.

We were most surprised at brother Wyckoff's assertion, that the fourth commandment was "not binding on Christians". We wish he had told us whether the remaining nine were binding on us or not. How, we ask, can he or his friends expect or need to interpose a barrier to Sabbath profanation, if there is no divine law in favor of any Sabbath? Will his supposed "recorded observance" of the first day answer the purpose? Let it be tried, and it will be seen how much morality or religion will survive the contest! If, as he thinks, the fourth commandment does not bind Christians to keep a day, what can do it? All that Brownson contends for, is conceded by our brother!* If the editor of the Baptist Advocate and his brethren wield their influence against this institution and weaken its hold on the public mind, it is no wonder if Brownson and other errorists succeed in worrying "the church and the ministry," and bringing both into disrepute. These will not long survive the Sabbath—and that is assailed most violently at present, and by those who have been thought to be its friends. What will our brother say on further reflection, about the abrogation of this law? What will the great and influential Baptist denomination say on the subject? and what will Christians generally and the Christian press say? The fourth commandment abolished! Did the talented editor of the Baptist Advocate pen that expression? If this is ever to be generally believed in this country, let the weeds of mourning be prepared for Zion! for with the Sabbath must perish all her hopes! We warn our brethren against this dangerous sentiment. We caution ministers and publishers against it. We pray that evangelical Christians of all denominations may unitedly rally around the Sabbath, and when the enemy comes in like a flood, may the Lord lift up an ensign against him! Once more we say, do away the fourth commandment and you uproot and destroy the Sabbath—and when this is done, the sheet-anchor of the nation's morality is gone! We assure our brother we took no "umbrage" at his article, and that our present remarks are in the spirit of kindness.

* We object not to the gathering together of the people one day in seven, to sing and pray, and to listen to a discourse from a religious teacher.—Brownson.

JESUS CHRIST THE ONLY WAY OF SALVATION.

Jesus Christ is the way which leads to God, to grace, and to glory. He is the way in which we should walk, the truth by which we should walk, and the life to which we should walk. He is the way without error, the truth without falsehood, and the life without death. The truth lies between the way and the life, to show that the way to life is through the truth, which all sound experience teaches to be so. To be in this way implies that we must be active in studying and practising truth for its own sake, as well as to live in expectation of life. We may reverse the matter and say there is no coming into this way, by the [illegible] of truth, neither with it if there be not an operation of the Spirit of Life through Christ Jesus. The way is elevated, yet the lowly, and they only, can attain to it. The truth is infinite in its height and depth, yet the feeblest and most ignorant may acquire a saving knowledge of it. The life is here opposed to death, and he who is "the Life," met and endured the death due to the sinner, that he might escape death and enjoy life everlasting.

CLARENCE CHURCH AGAIN.—By a letter from Brother N. V. Hull, we receive the cheering intelligence, that the work of the Lord is progressing in that quarter, that the church continues to receive additions, and that the peculiar sentiments of our people are receiving unusual attention. Will not Brother Hull give us a further and more particular account of the work? It has been our lot to publish so few accounts of revivals in our own denomination, of late, that we wish our brethren in those societies where there is any thing of peculiar interest to give us early notice thereof. We shall take great pleasure in spreading any thing of this kind before our readers. Shall we not hear from brother Cochran, our Missionary agent, soon?

TO OUR YOUTHFUL READERS we wish to say, that the season has now arrived when you can, by exercising prudence and economy, find much time for mental improvement. If you cherish a proper desire for the acquisition of knowledge you will hardly be restrained from the accomplishment of your object by the absence of privileges. Books are so plenty and so cheap that an acquaintance may be made with almost any subject which can be amusing or interesting to you. Should your reading be confined to newspapers alone, (which none in this day find necessary)—this means, if properly improved, in a few years would enable you to gain a respectable stock of general information. You would thus have acquired such a knowledge of events in other countries as to have become acquainted with their political and commercial standing and relations, as well as their social and religious character.—You would have become conversant with the views and usages of the different denominations of Christians in this and other countries, and have profited yourselves with the labors and wisdom of the great and good of different ages and countries. The information thus obtained would be so general in its character as to be useful in every employment—would facilitate the acquisition of any profession, and adorn it when obtained. It would afford themes of meditation and conversation to those who engage in agricultural pursuits, and form an important part of the knowledge of the statesman, and give energy and weight to character in every grade of Society.—Some of the greatest and best men who have graced this nation in the legislative halls, in the cabinet and on the field, have acquired the knowledge which was the secret of their greatness in the way above described. Of this number was Dr. Benjamin Franklin, the present chief magistrate of this nation, and many others who have rendered the most important services to their country. The Church has not been less fortunate in receiving to her embraces those who have availed themselves of these means of obtaining information. Perhaps no country on earth has a more industrious and useful ministry than the United States, and perhaps not one third of that ministry have had the benefit of a collegiate education. Yet very many of those who are self-educated at this day stand in the front rank of the learned. Clarke, and Fuller, and Carey, in the old world, with a host of others equally worthy, who commenced active life unlearned, died the brightest ornaments of the church militant, and by their writings have contributed more to the literature of the present age than many of the most favored. An active industrious mind will soon be a well informed one.—Such a mind, if religiously inclined, will gain such a knowledge of revelation as to be wiser than professed teachers who are less industrious.

READING.

WHY DO SOME PERSONS REMEMBER WHILE OTHERS FORGET WHAT THEY READ?

To this question there have been numerous answers, and indeed there [illegible] as many reasons as there are [illegible] this should be the case [illegible] very [illegible] for an [illegible] memory, others entirely [illegible] supposing that what [illegible] exist in the power of [illegible] to retain impressions [illegible] either from disease or from [illegible] of mental cultivation. But [illegible] is any original difference in this [illegible] not, it is obvious that [illegible] is a very great disparity, and it appears to me to be philosophical to [illegible] the principle of mental improvement [illegible] to this view of the subject the following remarks apply.

1. Hasty reading is calculated to [illegible] the memory, especially of the young [illegible] first knowledge is to serve as a [illegible] for further acquirements in after life. [illegible] so to speak, to be distributed over an empty mind so that there shall not be the least confusion or disorder. Each subject must be placed by itself and so placed that it can be called forth at any time to assist in the investigations of similar subjects and also that it may serve as a kind of [illegible] sort to other ideas which it [illegible] a tendency to suggest. Now as this [illegible] cannot be attained without a clear understanding of the different subjects we read, and as fast reading has a tendency to introduce ideas into the mind faster than it can digest or arrange them, it is not only an evident reason why we forget, but also a means of disarranging the operations of the mind, and consequently weakens its powers of retention.

Every man that has made any great advancement in knowledge, knows that when he commenced his career, it was necessary for him to spend more time in thinking than in reading; and where can the man be found who has been called profound in knowledge, who has not also been called a thinking man?

But while I am hinting against locomotive reading, I would not be understood to say that every subject should be read like moving a loaded vehicle up a long hill, but would contend principally for a clear understanding and correct association of what is read, whether it requires much or little time. I am aware that different pieces may be read with different degrees of despatch, nor is it to be expected that as much time should be spent in reading a biography as a philosophy. If, when we read, we would remember, that a man's knowledge is measured by the amount he holds at command, and not by the number of books or pages he has read, I think we should have less disposition to drive over the pages of a book or newspaper like a locomotive of latest date, and consequently less reason to complain of a poor memory.

2. As it is necessary for us to gain a correct idea of what we read in order to remember it, it is not only important that we read slow, but with attention. It is a principle of our nature that memory is strengthened by attention; and that in order to remember a subject, we must keep it in the mind by the power of attention, until we have quite surveyed it and learned its bearing. Now a person may be all day in reading one page of a common newspaper, and still not remember what he has read, from the fact that his attention was otherwise engaged and not applied to the subject. And I will here remark that the reason we learn some subjects with more ease than others, principally is, that we give them our more undivided attention.

But a person may read slow and with attention, and still not remember what he reads. This arises from a mistaken notion that the language of an author must be committed in order to retain his ideas, and hence the attention is directed more to the sound than the meaning of the words, and more to the manner in which the sentences are put together than to their import. Now [illegible] ideas thus gained and preserved [illegible] as the ideas are [illegible] longer than the words [illegible] to practice while the memory has [illegible] a task [illegible] and unnatural.

3. If we wish to remember what we read, we should reduce to practice or make some use of it. And should we happen to read something for which we have no particular use at present, it will be necessary frequently to call it up and reflect upon it, and if by this course we can neither interest our own minds nor benefit others we may as well forget it, for it is good for nothing.

THANKSGIVING.

"Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!"

[illegible] New England [illegible] which were especially designated to the purpose of publicly expressing thanks unto God for his mercies. But one inquires, Shall we not be thankful every day? Most certainly; and he who is most thankful every day, will most rejoice to avail himself of a favored opportunity to express his gratitude to the bountiful Giver, in the presence of all the people.

Are our arrangements made for the thanksgiving services of Dec. 17? In many places it is the practice for several congregations to unite in presenting their thank-offering. Where this is done, a little more attention must be paid to preliminary matters, than would be required were each to make their own appointment. To see that the several choirs fully understand the arrangement in due season, is no unimportant item. To have our hearts right, however, is the most important part.

The Proclamation recommends to us to remember the oppressed; let us not neglect that duty when we thank the Lord for our liberty.

Special petitions to Heaven in behalf of the captives of the Amistad, ought also to mingle amid our songs of thanksgiving.

A SON OF CONNECTICUT.

The following lines were written on the death of Miss SARAH ANN CRANDALL, which occurred in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y., a few months since. They are from the pen of Mrs. L. M. Carpenter, Preceptress of the Female Department of De Ruyter Institute, under whose care Miss Crandall, we believe, spent some months within two or three years past, as a pupil. They are a just tribute to the memory of an amiable female, and a humble and devout Christian. Miss C. embraced religion in the autumn of 1834, during the revival, which, though not so extensive as some which have been experienced in that region, we believe was inferior to none for the solidity and excellence of its character. She lived an ornament to religion, and died much lamented. Our sister possessed a good mind, which had been well cultivated for one of her years. She cherished a strong desire for the advancement of the cause of Zion, and contributed liberally to aid in the benevolent enterprizes of the day. She was soon to have been united in marriage to a pious and worthy young gentleman of the same town. Her death was what might have been expected, from a life remarkable for its constancy of communion with God.—Eds. Reg.

"WHEREFORE, WE PRAISE THE DEAD MORE THAN THE LIVING."

We praise the dead, the pious dead, whose all of earthly strife,
Has yielded to that weight of joy, the gift of endless life;
In their thirst, they never more shall drink, at Marah's gushing streams,
Or grasp at phantom forms of bliss, in this shadowy land of dreams.

We praise the good, the beautiful, the few whose earthly lot,
Was like the gem, whose brilliancy the earth-stain sullies not;
They have one by one been gather'd from the restless stream of time,
Amid the jewels of their King, forever more to shine.

O sigh not for the treasures ye have no right to claim,
For "he who gave hath taken them, and praised be his name"—
Ye may not ask, What doeth he! since "the Lord hath need of them"
As angels of his ministry among the sons of men.

Then praise for those who sweetly rest, and praise for her who goes,
In the brightness of her sunny days, like Summer's glorious rose—
With all her young heart's joyousness, its high and holy love,
From the garden of her early hopes, to a paradise above.

Those holy hopes, they perish not, as earth-born things decay;
Their fruit shall all be gather'd in the land that's far away—
Where the pious yearnings of her heart, a full fruition prove,
Nor grief, nor pain, one shadow cast, o'er the brow of her ye love.

THE FIFTEENTH PSALM.

Lord, who shall in thy tabernacle live?
Whose dwelling be within thy holy hill!
The man that upright walks, whose deeds are right;
Who from his heart, doth always speak the truth.
'Tis he who never backbites with his tongue,
Nor wittingly procures his neighbor ill,
Nor 'gainst his neighbor taketh up reproach;
And in whose eyes vile persons are contemn'd.
But yet he honors them that fear the Lord;
Who doth not change from what his oath requires,
Although performing it procures his hurt,
He that from sinful gain his money keeps,
Nor 'gainst the innocent will take reward—
He that performeth these shall not be mov'd.

INTERESTING FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE OF THE TIMES AND EVENING STAR.

LIVERPOOL, Nov. 4, 1840.

The Caledonia, which arrived here on Friday, in about eleven days from Halifax, returns to-day. The new steam ship, the Columbia, will not leave until this day month.

We have just passed through the turmoil of not one election in this town, but of sixteen—for so many municipal wards are here. Throughout the country, generally, the gain has been to the Tories.

There is no news relative to the Queen, except (which is not new,) that she continues in health. She has wholly given up equestrian exercise, but drives a great deal in the Great Park, at Windsor, in a poney phæton. Prince Albert sometimes accompanies her, but this is the sporting season, and he is out a good deal, pheasant shooting. They sometimes walk together at the Terrace, and as far as appearances show, are a very happy and affectionate couple.

From abroad we hear that Guizot has made a new ministry, and the Chambers meet at Paris to-morrow. The expectation is that Guizot will be able to command a majority.

Alexandria is blockaded, and Mehemet Ali, it is believed, has offered such concessions to the Porte as must terminate the war. In such case, he will have Egypt as an hereditary kingdom, but is likely to lose Syria. It is said that he is most indignant with Thiers for having misled him by saying, that if he, (the Pacha,) held out, France would make the Sultan grant him whatever he pleased. Thiers, by the by, is about going to Italy, there to finish his History of the Consulate and the Empire. This looks as if he did not meditate any opposition in the Chambers.

Admiral Fleming, last year appointed Governer of Greenwich hospital, died on Friday. This is a bonne bouche for ministers in the way of patronage. It is believed Sir Robert Stopford will have this lucrative post.

The election of High Steward of the University of Cambridge commences on this day week, and lasts three days. Lord Lyndhurst is opposed by Lord Littleton, a young man whiggishly inclined. 'Tis a trial of strength, in fact, though not avowedly, between Tory and Whig.

Mrs. Trollope, it is announced, is about commencing a novel in the 'Metropolitan Magazine. It is to be as satirical as she can make it—to cut up the lady authors of the day—and to be called "The Blue Belles of England." This is a promising subject, and as the writer is herself one of the craft, we may expect a little quiet fun. Mrs. Trollope's "Widow Barnaby" (certainly her best fiction) forms the new volume of the Standard novels. I believe Mrs. T. is now in Italy. Mr. Hervieu, the artist, is with her of course!

The poems of the late Lady Flora Hastings, are announcing as forthcoming, in one volume.

Roman Ochre—Discovery of a Mine.—The recent discovery of an ochre mine in Vermont, promises to be of great importance, in every point of view. The article is superior to any thing of the kind now known to be in existence. The best ochre now in use is obtained from Rochelle, France; but the Vermont ochre must eventually supercede this altogether. This Vermont ochre forms a surface of marble smoothness, which is entirely impervious to water, and is of course extremely durable. When saturated with oil, instead of shrinking and drying away, it swells and increases in bulk. It is found in a part of the Green mountains. It was discovered in a small stream of water, the superincumbent mass of earth or decayed vegetable matter having been washed away by the action of the stream. The attention of the discoverer, Mr. Miller, was attracted by the color of the ochre, and the absence of that scum or crust on the surface of the water, which uniformly accompanies oxyde of iron. The ochre is found in a rich layer near the surface of the ground, then follows a stratum of mica slate, and then another layer of earth. The mine is now worked at the rate of twelve barrels per day. A barrel weighs three hundred pounds, and the price ranges from nine to fifty cents per pound.

INTERESTING FROM FLORIDA.

The annexed letter was addressed to the Editor of the Army and Navy Chronicle, but not being able to give it immediate publicity through his own paper, he has politely transferred it to us.—Eve. Jour.

TAMPA, Nov. 3, 1840.

I have pleasure in announcing the arrival last night of the Western Deputation of Seminole Indians under the charge of Capt. John Page, of the United States Army. It consists of the two principal Chiefs Hola-toochee and Nolose Ohola, twelve other Indians, and two interpreters.

The party is in fine spirit and sanguine of success in their mediatorial mission.—They are happy and contented in their western homes; their corn-fields having been highly productive; their quiet undisturbed; and they carry the appearance of fine health and cheerful minds. Their arguments and persuasions must have weight with our Indians, with many of whom they are connected by the ties of consanguinity, and to all of whom they are known. They have fought side by side by many of them in the same cause, and have now come to show and convince them that they can make a happy exchange from the privations, harrassments and sufferings of a war from which they can have no other hope of relief, for a fertile country which, as they say, produces them more corn in one year than they consume in two, and the quiet, the comforts, and all the blessings of a lasting peace.

The parting of the deputation from their people, their kindred and friends, was an interesting as well as an affecting scene. Hola-toochee, and the other chief made parting addresses, in which they gave them confident assurances of being soon united with their Florida friends, and promised their most strenuous exertions to accomplish an object so desirable to all. The chief (Alligator,) formerly one of the most uncompromising as well as brave and successful among the emigrated Seminole warriors, then took the stand in behalf of the People, (with whom he remains) and in an animated strain conjured the members of the deputation to neglect no effort with their suffering brethren—bade them say that their friends, relatives, and all their people sent their eager and earnest wishes, and implored them by all the motives which could influence them as brethren of one family, by the advantages of strength, efficiency and respectability which would result from their re-union, to listen to wise counsels and earnest and sincere entreaties.

Captain Page represents the scene to have been deeply affecting. There was no acting there. A feeling of deep and pervading interest, strongly and unequivocally manifested, gave the fullest evidence of the sincerity of professions, urged with all the zeal and fervor of native eloquence.

The party has been one month and two days on their way, and reached here in the ship Harbinger from New Orleans; the harbinger, we hope, of better days for our afflicted territory.

Gen. Armistead, Capt. Paige and the Deputation, march this morning to Fort King, (100 miles) where the Tiger-tail and other hostile chiefs are to meet in council.

FROM FLORIDA.

Fort Holmes, E. F., Nov. 9, 1840.

Sir: Five Indian women and seven children were taken about the 1st inst., on the Wekiwa, by Lieut. Sibley, 2d Dragoons.—They are now at Fort Reid. The same officer about the 5th inst., with a party of 30 dragoons, was so close upon Coaco-chee (Wild Cat) and his party, near Lake Jesup, that the Indians, about 12 in number, were forced to abandon their packs, containing plunder, taken near St. Augustine, recently; the packs were taken by the dragoons, the Indians making good their escape. The plunder consisted of some fifty or more new clothes, dresses of all sizes and descriptions, children's clothing, silk hose and handkerchiefs, &c. The "great talk" with Tiger-tail and Artuc-tus-te-nug-gee and their bands, will take place at Fort King.

The Arkansas Delegation fourteen in number, have arrived at Fort King, under the charge of Capt. Page. It is said that they are prepared to make their real brethren a very favorable report of the country west of the Mississippi. Tiger-tail says that if Wild-Cat does not come into his measures, relative to the proposed treaty, that he will turn in and "lick him into shape."

Yesterday, three warriors arrived at Fort King and reported that his Majesty Tiger-tail would soon be in, and said that they were sent forward to announce his approach. Gen. Armistead is confident that the war is ended. Would to God it were so! We poor devils who have worked and slaved here for the last two or three years, would like once more to get a peep at the United States. Our experience has made us cautious and doubtful of the Seminole honesty—mais nous verrons! Yours, truly.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE.

Early on Monday morning last, a span of horses attached to the forward part of a lumber wagon, were discovered drifted on shore at Madison Barracks. An inquiry was instituted for the owner, but nothing was elicited until some time in the forenoon, when the Coroner was informed of the melancholy fact, that the lifeless bodies of two men had floated ashore on Navy Point. A jury was immediately called, and an inquest held, when it was ascertained that the bodies were those of Col. John Gotham, a respectable and wealthy farmer of Watertown, and an Irish laborer in his employ.

It appears that he had left home for the purpose of visiting some of the fishing stations in this vicinity, with the intention of exchanging some of the produce of his farm for fish. He arrived in this village on the evening previous, during a severe snow squall, having previously expressed his determination to cross over to Horse Island that night, the road to which, from this village, runs on the bank of the lake, in dangerous proximity, and from the circumstance of a part of the wagon, much broken, being found under the bank, and the track of the wheels distinctly traced to the spot, it is supposed that upon approaching the bank, being blinded by the sleet and deafened by the rushing storm, he drove directly off the precipice of some 30 or 40 feet into the lake. He has left a large family to mourn his untimely and sudden death, which like a warning voice, whispers in our ears, that in the "midst of life we are in death."

Important News from Texas.—We are informed, says the Courier, by Dr. Macauly, of Baltimore, who has returned to the United States in the Great Western, that at the very moment of his leaving London for Bristol, he learned from a source that can be entirely relied on, that on the night previous to his departure, Lord Palmerston and General Hamilton, the Plenipotentiary for Texas, agreed and concluded upon the project of a Treaty, recognizing on the part of Great Britain the sovereignty and independence of the Republic of Texas; the Treaty likewise provides effectively for the mediation of England, in procuring immediate pacification between Texas and Mexico, and for the establishment of a well defined boundary line between the two republics.

The Treaty would have come out in the Great Western if sufficient time had been allowed after agreeing to the preliminaries, to have engrossed and executed it. It was generally thought in London, if Gen. Hamilton procured the recognition of England, leading as it would, to a prompt pacification between Mexico and Texas, the negociation of the loan by himself and Mr. Burnley, would be quite certain as soon as the apprehension of European war or revolution in France was dispelled, both of which continued to exert a very depressing influence on the stock and money markets.—Times.

Death of Professor Davis.—A letter from Charlotteville to the editor of the Richmond Whig, announces the melancholy fact of the death of Professor Davis. He died on Saturday from the pistol shot he received on the Thursday previous. The letter referred to, gives the following particulars of his death: "The 12th of November is the anniversary of a celebrated rebellion which took place in the University some three or four years ago. On Thursday night last, the 12th, there were only two or three who could be found to commemorate the event. They went forth about 9 o'clock at night, armed with pistols and disguised with masks, &c.

After making a good deal of noise upon the lawn of the University, they approached Professor Davis' residence, with the design, as he believed, to insult him. He went out with the view of discovering who they were. He immediately came upon a very small person, who had a mask on, and who was otherwise disfigured. He approached him, and reached out his hand to unmask him. The individual, without uttering a word, stepped back one or two paces, and fired the fatal shot. Thus has been cut down, in the vigor of intellect and the prime of manhood, a gentleman who was an ornament to society, and the pride of the University.

"It is not yet known who was the perpetrator of this diabolical deed. A student was arrested yesterday, and after examining a great many witnesses, the case was adjourned over until to-morrow.

The evidence against him thus far consists of the vaguest sort of suspicion.

CANAJOHARIE IN RUINS!

We stop the press to announce the awful intelligence of the ruin of the pleasant village of Canajoharie, by fire last evening. It broke out about 9 o'clock in the stable of Henry Lieber deceased, and caught the building occupied by Wells & Baker, as a dry goods store, and Fero & Erwin as a grocery store, and the corner building on that side of the street.

The fire then crossed the street and took in the building occupied by H. & L. Barnes, as a tin and sheet iron store, where it spread with great rapidity (the wind being high) enveloped the two blocks of buildings extending to the creek east, which were entirely consumed with most of their contents. It then crossed the creek, taking the bridge in its course, and consumed all the buildings on the hill, as far as the red school house. The printing office of the Radii, with all its contents are destroyed.

About 40 buildings were burned. A little boy about 3 years old is missing, and it is feared he perished in the flames. The fire is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary. We have not yet learned the amount of loss, or insurance. Particulars hereafter.

Mexico.—The New-Orleans Bulletin says:—"Our Havana papers contain Mexican dates to a week or two into October. We learn from Vera Cruz, that the British Minister had made repeated complaints as to the delay of the government in replying to the several demands made upon the Mexican Government, (probably in regard to the imprisonment of men in California, and the internal duty,) and that unless a reply was made in a given time, he should [illegible] his passport. This important step [illegible] said to have occasioned a great [illegible] among the reflecting people. [illegible] that a petition was [illegible] lately [illegible] to Congress on the subject, [illegible] session of the Chamber of Deputies [illegible] held in consequence; and the Mexican paper observes, that a great many persons were dissatisfied at the result of their deliberations."

The Dutch Navy.—The navy of Holland is composed of the following vessels:—In commission—9 frigates, [illegible] corvettes, 12 brigs, 25 gun sloops, 4 steamers, 2 transports, and 1 vessel attached to the naval school of Medemblick. Not in commission—8 ships of the line, (none over 84 guns,) 12 frigates, 9 corvettes, 9 brigs, [illegible] gun boats. Of the vessels not in commission about one half are unfinished. The seamen, marines, and officers in active service are 5,855. This is the remains of that powerful marine which disputed the supremacy of the seas with England, in the days of Van Tromp. The Dutch have been the constant allies of England for a long time, and in the event of a collision between the great powers, their navy, such as it is, would probably go into the English scale.

Melancholy Catastrophe.—By a gentleman from Consecon, we learn that on Monday the 26th ult. seven persons went to fish on the fishing ground bordering on Weller's Bay, near Presque Isle: three of them were intoxicated when they left the shore, and they had a jug of whiskey with them. By some accident the boat was upset, and six of the seven sunk to rise no more. A young man named Terry succeeded in reaching the shore, after having remained on the bottom of the boat, (which had a slip-keel,) for 29 or 30 hours. Three of the unfortunate individuals have left families to mourn their premature deaths.—Kingston Herald, 3d inst.

Shipwreck and Loss of Life.—The schr. Love, Captain Godfrey, arrived to-day from Porto Cabello. On the 14th inst. lat. 35, long. 73, fell in with the wreck of the schr. Butterfly, Captain Kemstry, from hence, bound to Curacoa, and took from her John Bramels, Seamen, of Philadelphia, the only survivor out of 7. The B. left New York on the 5th and was capsized on the 6th at A. M. The Capt. one seaman, and the steward, were washed off and drowned on the 12th; next day Mr. Franklin, Mate, died in Bramels' arms. The same night J Cannion got delirious and washed overboard; next day the Love took Bramels off who has nearly lost the use of his legs, and feet, being very much bruised.

A Horrid Death.—A correspondent narrates the following facts concerning the unfortunate fate of Mr. Jonathan L. Hill of Coitsville, in this county:—

Mr. Hill was engaged in digging a well for a Mr. Young, of Weathersfield, and had sunk the shaft to the depth of fifty feet, with every appearance of being near water. To ascertain the fact he drilled a hole in the middle of the well, and heard a rumbling noise, but could not tell whether it was above or below him,—supposed, however, to be running water below. He, then ascended to the top to make preparations for walling up the well the next morning. The noise still continuing, about 7 o'clock in the evening he again descended for the purpose of bringing up his tools with him. When let down about twenty feet, the candle coming in contact with the carboretted hydrogen mixed with common atmospheric air, occasioned a powerful explosion, threw the windlass from its rigging, and enveloped the whole cavity in a blaze of livid fire.—The blaze shot up in the air to the height of thirty feet.

The windlass was righted as soon as possible, and a rope let down to the unhappy sufferer, who after falling thirty feet, was still struggling in the flames. He seized hold of the rope, fastened it to the bucket which fell with him, and was brought out of the well, literally burned up. His clothes, except the vest, were all consumed. He survived from Wednesday, the day on which the melancholy event occurred, until Saturday evening, at which time he died, leaving a wife and seven small children to mourn his untimely end.—Trumbull Democrat.

POETRY.

VESPERS.

BY FRANCIS BARBOUR.

The hour of prayer!
Within the crowded chancel, while the shroud
Of night comes down upon the poor and proud,
Low bended there.

Perchance there be
Some lowly worshipers at eventide,
Breathing their humble prayer on some hill-side,
By the deep sea.

Or in the drear
And rayless coverts of the pathless woods,
With scarce a gleam to glad the solitudes,
Or light to cheer.

And suppliant now,
At altars beaten by the tempest's shock,
At some rude cross upon the rifted rock,
They humbly bow.

A chastening power
Falls like the coming of an angel's spell,
O'er the calmed spirit, when the shadows tell
The evening hour.

Thus at the close
Of life's short day, may its receding light,
Which led us on, be beautiful and bright
As when it rose.

And may no fear
Upon our hearts a trembling record trace,
And may we go to our long resting-place
Without a tear.

CHRISTIAN MARINER'S HYMN.

BY MRS. SOUTHEY.

Launch thy bark, Mariner!
Christian, God speed thee!
Let loose the rudder-bands—
Good angels lead thee!
Set thy sails warily,
Tempests will come;
Steer thy course steadily,
Christian, steer home!

Look to the weather-bow,
Breakers are round thee;
Let fall the plummet now,
Shallows may ground thee.
Reef in the foresail, there!
Hold the helm fast!
So—let the vessel wear—
There swept the blast.

"What of the night, watchman?
What of the night?"
"Cloudy—all quiet—
No land yet—all's right."
Be wakeful, be vigilant—
Danger may be
At an hour when all seemeth
Securest to thee.

How! gains the leak so fast?
Clean out the hold—
Hoist up thy merchandise,
Heave up thy gold;
There—let the ingots go—
Now the ship rights;
Hurra! the harbor's near—
Lo, the red lights!

Slacken not sail yet
At inlet or island:
Straight for the beacon steer,
Straight for the high land;
Crowd all thy canvas on,
Cut through the foam—
Christian, cast anchor, now—
Heaven is thy home!

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PULPIT.

There is a greater variety of style in the pulpit, than in any other place of popular address. The bar, the legislative hall, the political rostrum, and the lecturer's desk—all have their peculiarities; but there is a sameness running through each of them that is characteristic, and cannot easily be mistaken. We speak not of matter but of manner; and we incline to the opinion that of public speakers, the preacher is, in general, most defective in this respect. If the object of a speaker is to convince, it is very evident that he who is most successful in his efforts has adopted the best style; and the question arises, which of the different varieties of pulpit oratory accomplishes this object to the greatest extent? Who, for example, most fully succeeds in promoting the great end of the gospel—the salvation of souls—he who reads his sermons, he who delivers it from memory, or he who speaks extempore, having first filled his mind with his subject, and acquainted himself thoroughly with the points he intends to discuss? We answer, unequivocally, in our opinion, the last.

Go to the lawyer. He is engaged in a cause of vast importance to his client, and one upon which the success of his own reputation depends. What does he do? He has taken ample notes of the counsel—he has carefully gathered around him the authorities which sustain his view of the case—he has turned down the leaves of many a volume, and now he rises to address himself to the jury, whose decision is to determine the matter. He who knows this; and he knows, too, that if he fails to convince them, his cause is gone. Has he his speech written out in full?—We never knew such an instance, except where the law particularly required it.—Wherever it is necessary, he reads from his notes of the evidence, or from the law-books around him; but he depends for his success, more upon the powerful appeals he makes, accompanied by a warm and energetic manner, than upon any other circumstance. And in this he acts wisely.

Go to the hall of legislation. You will see there a tall and slender man in the attitude of speaking; his whole frame indicates strong excitement; his eagle eye is piercing through some unlucky opponent, who withers beneath his glance; his long arm and extended fingers are shaking violently; his face is pale for a moment, but now the blood rushes into it, and although he has not spoken a word, numbers gather about him, and the spectators bend down from the crowded galleries, with almost breathless attention. But presently the words hitherto pent up, come rushing forth like a burning volcano, and bearing down every thing before them. Now, this man might read the same speech, and in expression and finish it might be even more correct; but the deserted galleries and empty benches would bear testimony to its inefficiency.

Have you ever been present at a political assembly? What would be the effect of a written address on such an occasion?—You would give but little for the chance of a candidate, whose friends adopted this method of electioneering.

In the medical hall, you will find those lectures best attended which are delivered wholly extempore, or as much so as possible. We have noticed this fact frequently, and believe universal experience will bear us out in this opinion. Of course it is understood that in the lecturers other things are equal.

It is true also of the pulpit. Who are these who have most distinguished themselves by the public efforts, and are surrounded by admiring multitudes? Who are those whose ministrations have been honored by the conversion of thousands? Not such as carry their discourses in their pockets. They may acquire the name of good writers, but will never be regarded as very successful preachers—they may instruct but will scarcely ever awaken. If St. Paul had appeared before Agrippa with his defence in his hand, he might have received from that king an acknowledgement of his superior learning, but he would never have extorted from him the confession—"Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Neither would his reasoning "of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," have caused Felix to tremble, if the arguments had been prepared and written out for the occasion. It was not only the truth that convinced, but it was the manner in which the truth was presented. So it was with Peter, and with the other disciples, on the day of Pentecost; and so indeed with all those who were instrumental in spreading the knowledge of Christ over the earth.

If Wesley had gone through England reading his sermons to the people, Methodism would not have survived him; and here was one great secret of his success, and the success of his fellow-laborers; while the established clergy were measuring out their discourses by the page, to drowsy congregations, the men of God, in the high-ways and by-ways of the land, were thundering forth the words of their commission to astonished multitudes, who flocked to their ministry, as doves to their windows, and were converted by hundreds and thousands. His followers in all countries have in this matter followed his example, and God grant they may ever do so; for if there is a subject that requires zeal, and earnestness, and power, it is the momentous subject of man's salvation.—While every other speaker is expected to throw his whole soul into his address, and speak as if he meant and felt what he said, shall he, whose message concerns the interests of thousands, alone be calm and unmoved? No! Heaven teaches no such doctrine.

There are times when a sermon may be read, perhaps, without any impropriety—such as the anniversaries of societies, but even then we like best to have it come warm from the heart. Men differ in these things; yet, for our own part, we prefer the preacher who takes hold of the sword of the Spirit with both hands, and lays lustily about him in all directions; he may make some awkward thrusts, but he will do a hundred-fold more execution among the hearts of his hearers, than he who aims altogether at, or above their heads.

Since writing the above, we have met with the following: "Dr. F. A. Cox, in his work entitled 'Baptists in America,' makes these remarks respecting the practice of reading sermons: 'While the people of New England, in the principal towns at least, approve, or their ministers believe they approve, and therefore practice the method of reading written sermons, those of New York demand a more popular address. In analysing the state of religion, we believe that it will be often found in a degree affected by the kind of ministerial instrumentality to which the people are most addicted, and that the unwritten style of pulpit discourse will be most productive of experimental religion, in connection with Christian activity. While the most finished composition may tend to refine the taste and instruct the understanding, those which have less pretension to accuracy, but come at once from the heart, if not unstudied, yet unpolished, seem conducive to the greatest moral effect.—Philadelphia Repository.

FOR TEACHERS.

EFFECTS OF KINDNESS.—At a common school convention in Hampden county, we heard the Rev. Dr. Cooley relate an anecdote strikingly illustrative of this principle. He said that many years ago, a young man went into a district to keep a school, and before he had been there a week, many persons came to see him, and kindly told him there was one boy in the school whom it would be necessary to whip every day; leading him to infer that such was the custom of the school, and that the inference of injustice towards the boy should be drawn whenever he should escape, not when he should suffer. The teacher saw the affair in a different light. He treated the boy with signal kindness and attention. At first this novel course seemed to bewilder him. He could not divine its meaning. But when the persevering kindness of the teacher begat a kindred sentiment of kindness in the pupil, his very nature seemed transformed. Old impulses died. A new creation of motives supplied their place. Never was there a more diligent, obedient and successful pupil. Now, said the reverend gentleman in concluding his narrative—that boy is the Chief Justice of a neighboring state. The relator of this story—though he modestly kept back the fact—was himself the actor. If the Romans justly bestowed a civic crown upon a soldier, who had saved the life of a fellow-soldier in battle, what honors are too great for the teacher who has thus rescued a child from ruin?—Common School Journal.

THE GOOD LITTLE GIRL.—A very little girl, who often read her Bible, gave proof that she understood her obligation to obey its precepts. One day she came to her mother, much pleased, to show some fruit which had been given to her. The mother said the friend was very kind, and had given her a great many. Yes, said the child, very indeed; and she gave me more than that, but I have given some away.—The mother inquired to whom she had given them; when she answered, I gave them to a girl who pushes me off the path, and makes faces at me. On being asked why she gave them to her, she replied, because I thought it would make her know that I wish to be kind to her, and she will not perhaps, be rude and unkind to me again. How admirably did she then obey the command to overcome evil with good.

A tear stood in the eye of little Charles, and he promised his mother to try and do so too. Will my little readers, under similar circumstances, "go and do likewise."

O. S. BARTLES, Corresponding Secretary.
WM. G. WEST, Recording Secretary.

After the election of Officers, the following resolutions were taken up and passed unanimously:

Resolved, That this Society be hereafter called the "AMERICAN YOUNG MEN'S TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY."

Resolved, That this Society proceed immediately to the employment of the means necessary to increase the number of its members, by obtaining names to the pledge.

Resolved, That every member contributing one dollar to the funds of this Society, shall become entitled to receive an engraved certificate of membership.

Resolved, That this Society respectfully urge the formation of auxiliaries in every portion of our country.

Resolved, That this Society recommend the holding of a National Convention in the city of New York in the month of May next: said Convention to be composed of delegates from all the Young Men's Total Abstinence Societies now formed, or which may be hereafter formed.

Resolved, That the Rev. Theobold Mathew, and other distinguished friends of Total Abstinence from abroad, be invited to attend the proposed Convention, and take part in its deliberations.

TO THE YOUNG MEN OF AMERICA.

The storm of a recent and deep political excitement is passing away,—the currents of thought and feeling are reverting once more to their accustomed channels—and moral enterprise for the time being thrust aside by the immediate, engrossing, and selfish interests of the hour, may again be made to resume its hold on the sympathies and feelings of the community. Disposed to avail themselves of this favorable disposition, for the purpose of forwarding the interests of the great cause in which they are engaged, and deeming that the time for enlarged and specific action on the part of the young men of our republic has now arrived, our society, as will be seen by a reference to its proceedings in the present number, have placed themselves in the attitude of a parent institution, and solicit the formation of Young Men's Total Abstinence Societies, auxiliary to themselves, throughout the Union. An institution of this character has been required, as a means of engaging and concentrating in the cause of temperance, the energy and enthusiasm of the young. We are in want of material, not to sustain our cause only, but to give it an onward impulse. Who so competent for this, as those who have just entered or are just entering upon the field of moral conflict, whose minds are unsophisticated, and their hearts unchilled by the complicated, absorbing and selfish interests of middle and declining life—who with armor burnished, spirits fresh, courage high, and strength unwasted by strife and toil, stand as a corps de reserve upon the confines of the battle field of temperance, where their united and brilliant onset must bring victory to its banner.

Among the objects had in view by our society in their recent proceedings, has been the assembling of a National Convention in May next. The necessity of a convention composed of delegates from the different states, is now very generally understood. The repeal of the License Laws has been and is still agitated by the leading temperance journals in our country, and when action is taken upon this subject it should be general through the State. The course of action to be pursued in reference to these laws, will necessarily become a leading topic in the deliberations of the proposed convention.

There are other questions of equal gravity and importance, which we have neither time nor space to enumerate or consider in this article. We shall aim to bring them specifically before the public in future numbers.

The time has come, and fully come, when there is no subject, nearly or remotely connected with the manufacture, sale or use of intoxicating drinks, that should not undergo the searching investigation of the people, and be visited with their sanction, or their reprobation. Should the proposition be submitted, whether the Asiatic Cholera or the Plague, or any evil of similar magnitude should be let loose upon society, would not our citizens feel themselves called upon to assemble and consider the subject? It requires no evidence not already existing to demonstrate that the evils which it is the object of the temperance reform to destroy, are of equal importance with those above mentioned. No one has yet pretended that there was any thing exaggerated or extravagant in the statement of Chancellor Walworth, that, "the time will come when reflecting men will no more think of vending intoxicating liquors, or of creating and renting grog-shops as a means of gain, than they would now think of poisoning the well from which their neighbor obtains water for his family, or of arming a maniac to destroy his own life or the lives of others,"—or that Judge Daggett was too harsh in asserting, that "those who make or sell ardent spirits for common use, are as wicked as those who make and sell poison for the same purpose. The blood of murdered bodies and souls will be required at their hands!"

The truth is, that the whole trade in intoxicating drinks is a murderous system. The manufacturer and retailer know it. The darkness of former times on this subject has passed away, and the true light now shines. All men have seen it, and are familiar with the reasons which justify us in denouncing the system as a murderous one. It is the apathy, the criminal, cruel apathy of the public, that suffers this business to exist among us unrebuked. It is the sinful inactivity of an enlightened people which allows the spirit dealer to come forth from his habitation of cruelty, and walk abroad among civilized men, honored and respected. We want, therefore, not argument so much as action—well-directed, energetic action. The great first principles with which the temperance reform commenced its career, are now settled: we need nothing but action. Our principles are set as a pole-star to guide us in our course, and we have only to urge onward to a triumphant and happy issue.

We invoke the young men of this nation, and all who see any good in this thing—and who does not?—to come up to the work, and to spend the coming winter in forming societies, in gathering statistics, appointing delegates, and in preparation for an expression of national feeling at the proposed Convention.

It will be the object of the parent society to send out as many agents as can be sustained, to be employed between this and the assembling of the Convention in forming auxiliaries, and in exciting those already formed to vigorous exertion. But wait not for the agents of the parent society to visit you—go to the work—and into the work, with determined hearts—and we trust that the six months to come, will tell more for the cause of total abstinence, than the six years that are past.

We hope to receive soon, some tokens of approbation from our brethren throughout the land. As the parent society can give publicity to the proceedings of auxiliaries through their weekly organ, the Olive Leaf, we trust every local society disposed to co-operate, will send us their responses and proceedings, as they will have a tendency to encourage ourselves and others.

The editors of our exchange papers, who may feel interested in the cause of total abstinence, will receive our grateful acknowledgements, by giving publicity to as much of the foregoing proceedings and appeal as they may think proper.

FOR THE BOYS.

A NOBLE EXAMPLE.

Many years ago, in an obscure country school in Massachusetts, an humble, conscientious, but industrious boy was to be seen, and it was evident to all that his soul was beginning to act and thirst for intellectual good. He was alive to knowledge.—Next we see him an apprentice on the shoemaker's board, with a book spread open before him. Next we see him set forth, on foot, to settle in a remote town in this state, and pursue his fortune there as a shoemaker, his tools being carefully sent on before him. In a short time he is busied in the post of county surveyor for Litchfield county, being the most accomplished mathematician in that section of the state. Before he is twenty-five years old we find him supplying the astronomical matter of an almanac, published in New York. Next he is admitted to the bar a self-qualified lawyer. Now he is found on the bench of the Superior Court. Next he becomes a member of the Continental Congress. Then he is a member of a committee of six to prepare the Declaration of Independence. He continued a member of Congress for nearly twenty years, and was acknowledged to be one of the most useful men and wisest counsellors of the land. At length, having discharged every office with perfect ability, and honored in every sphere the name of a Christian, he died regretted and loved by his state and nation. TOBACCO.

"Tobacco is a native of America; and although cultivated in Oronoco from time immemorial, and smoked nearly all over the Continent at the time of the Spanish conquest, the Spaniards first discovered it in Yucatan in 1520. It was transported to Europe in the beginning of the 16th century by Hernandez de Toledo, who went from Herida to Portugal. From thence the seeds were sent to Catherine de Medicis by Jean Nicot, an agent of Francis II., after whom it received its genuine name of Nicotiana; the specific appellation of Tobacco being taken from tabac, an instrument used by the native Americans in smoking 'the weed.'"—[Humboldt.]

Tobacco is one of the most virulent vegetable poisons; causing headache, nausea, vomiting, extreme prostration, cold sweats, convulsions, and death. The leaves when distilled yield an essential oil, upon which all its active properties depend; the poisonous effects of which are well illustrated by the use the Hottentots make of it in destroying serpents. Barrow, in his Travels in Africa, informs us that "a Hottentot applied some of it from the short end of his wooden tobacco pipe to the mouth of a snake while in the act of darting out his tongue. The effect was as instantaneous as the electric shock; with a convulsive motion that was momentary, the snake half untwisted and never stirred more; and the muscles were so contracted that the whole animal felt regid, as if dried in the sun."

Tobacco belongs to the Materia Medica, but the extreme prostration and deadly sickness which it produces, renders its effects so frightful that few practising physcians are bold enough to use it, except in the most desperate cases.

Notwithstanding its efficiency as a medicine, it is far less used as a remedial agent than as an article of luxury; and its general use, in its varied forms, may be adduced as an illustration of the perversion of taste, as well as the capacity of the human system to receive with pleasure what was at first disagreeable, and to bear with impunity what is constantly injurious.

The use of tobacco by smoking, was first introduced into England by Sir Walter Raleigh, and at one time became the almost universal practice of both sexes in the higher walks of life; but it is at present more confined to the lower class of the people. "It is a curious fact that in England an edict was published against its use, the reason of which was, probably, the apprehension thus stated by Camden: "that the English might become savage by indulging in savage customs." Urban VIII., anathematized those who used it in churches; and in Constantinople, where its use is now so general, the custom in the beginning of the 17th century was thought so ridiculous and hurtful, that "a Turk found smoking was conducted through the streets with a pipe transfixed through his nose."

Kotzebue says, in his "Voyage of Discovery," that since the introduction of tobacco into the Sandwich Islands by the Europeans, "it is so generally used that young children smoke before they learn to walk, and grown up people have carried it to such excess, that they have fallen down senseless, and often died in consequence."

"The most common forms of using "the weed" in this country, are by chewing, snuffing, and smoking. The practice of plugging is now happily exploded. This "consisted in twisting the leaves of tobacco in the form of a plug and stuffing it up the nostril." We are ready to sicken at the idea, that the ancients should delight in the odor of putrid fish, which was to them what the perfumed preparations are to us.—And, yet a noxious poison, the most disgusting and filthy in its operations, is seized upon by us with a gusto equalled only by the filthy Turkey Buzzard preying on a carcass already putrid.

It is a singular fact that man is the only creature that delights in tobacco and ardent spirit—he is the only creature that will even taste them; so far is he placed above, or so much does he sink himself below the brute creation. Very few ever learn to use tobacco without at first suffering the most distressing sickness. The general system never becomes roused to its deleterious qualities as might at first seem; as many who have, perhaps, for the space of forty years rolled "the weed" as a sweet morsel under their tongue, and who always carried the "cud" on the same side of the mouth, will be as sensibly affected by a change to the opposite side, as if they had never tasted it and by discontinuing its use for a length of time are readily made sick on resuming the use of this loathsome "weed."

But so strong do persons become attached to this poisonous article, that even when they become convinced that it is undermining their health, as spirit does that of the besotted rum-drinker, it is with the greatest difficulty that they break off from its use. Persons of the strongest minds, capable of performing the greatest intellectual labor, make themselves the slave of habit—they voluntarily submit to the yoke of bondage. Although great in other respects, he who cannot break off from the habit of using this foul and hurtful drug, under any circumstances, lacks one important characteristic of greatness—self command.

If tobacco is so poisonous as to destroy life instantaneously when applied to the tongue, no other argument is necessary to to prove its hurtful tendency to health when habitually used.—In naturally delicate constitutions and in those who lead a sedentary life, its ill effects are most conspicuous. Multitudes enjoy good health who freely use it, but they are the robust, the strong and the vigorous, who withstand many of the common causes of disease; but strong as they are, tobacco has a direct tendency to impair their boasted health and strength.

The use of this poisonous "weed" in the form of snuff, besides its extreme filthiness, induces pain in the head and eyes by producing a determination of blood to these parts, and also excites in the head numerous indescribable nervous sensations. It destroys the sense of smell, and obstructs respiration through the nose by thickening the lining membrane, thus obliging the more advanced snuffer to let fall the lower jaw in order to prevent suffocation. It gives a nasal twang to the voice, which discovers at once the disgusting habit, notwithstanding the box containing this precious powder is kept in the most secret place. The taste, also, as in chewing and smoking, is rendered almost useless, leaving them in a condition to find no fault with cook or butcher.

The luxurious practice of smoking is, of all methods of using tobacco, the most benevolent and philanthropic. Says Dr. Ticknor, "Here is manifested none of the contracted disposition to selfishness!—When a man smokes, he does it for the benefit of his friends, and all within the atmosphere of his influence. The inhalation of smoke from a rank cigar, or what is still better, a pipe grown old in service, is peculiarly grateful; and as rum-drinking and smoking often accompany each other, the fumes of tobacco mingled with the steam of rum, renders the enjoyment doubly exquisite. Smoking is an indication of manhood and gentility; this is evinced by the fact that we are regaled in the streets, particularly of an evening, by frequent puffs of tobacco smoke in the face, from those who, in the day-time, conceive themselves to be gentlemen. It is so very civil, and polite, and evinces so much real goodness of heart, to share any good thing with our neighbors, that the practice of smoking, especially in the principal streets, and public places where ladies resort, should be encouraged by all who lay claim to generosity or refinement. Besides, it adds so much to the dignity and personal appearance of a gentleman to transform himself into a walking volcano, that he should be seen as seldom as possible without a cigar in his mouth and a dozen or two in his pocket."

Chewing is, perhaps, the most injurious of the modes of using this nauseous drug, yet all these modes do produce a greater or less derangement in healthy action; and when that comfortable protean disease, vaguely termed Dispepsia, gets a fast hold, the enjoyment of the great luxury, tobacco, is inexpressible.

Why continue its use in any of its forms? The plea commonly made for its use is too flimsy to notice, as thousands of witnesses would testify, were it not that they found it convenient to have an excuse for this filthy practice, that not a tooth has been preserved, or a pain soothed, by the long-continued use of tobacco. L.

A minister, very liberal in his reflections on Mr. Wesley and his followers, being once in company with Mr. Whitefield, expressed his doubt to him concerning Mr. Wesley's salvation, and said, "Sir, do you think, when we get to heaven, we shall see Mr. Wesley?" "No, sir," replied Mr. Whitefield, "I fear not, for he will be so near the throne, and we shall be at such a distance, we shall hardly get a sight of him."—New Methodist Magazine.

RELIGIOUS.

From Bishop Reynolds, on Psalm cx.

THE GLORY OF THE GOSPEL.

The Gospel is a glorious Gospel, because it is the Gospel of the blessed God. There is a glory in all the works of God, because they are his; for it is impossible that so great a workman should ever put his hand to an ignoble work. And therefore the prophet David useth his "glory" and his "handiwork" promiscuously for the same thing; "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," to note that there is an evidence of glory in every thing which he puts his hand unto. And yet the prophet there sheweth that there is more glory in the "law" of his mouth than in the "works" of his hands. The Lord is better known by Sion, and his name is greater in Israel than all the world besides.

The more God doth communicate himself unto any of his works, the more glorious it is. Now there is nothing wherein God hath so much put himself, wherein he may be so fully known, communicated with, depended upon, and praised, as in his Gospel. This is a glass in which the blessed angels do see and admire those unsearchable riches of his mercy to the Church, which they had not by their own observation found out from the immediate view of his glorious presence. In the creatures we have him a God of power and wisdom, working all things in number, weight and measure. In the law we have him a God of vengeance, and of recompense; in the publication thereof threatening, and in the execution thereof inflicting, wrath upon those that transgress it. But in the Gospel we have him a God of bounty and endless compassion; humbling himself that he might be merciful to his enemies, that he might himself bear the punishments of those injuries which had been done unto himself, that he might beseech his own prisoners to be pardoned and reconciled again. In the creature he is a God above us; in the law he is a God against us; only in the Gospel he is Immanuel, a God with us, a God like us, a God for us.

There is nothing doth declare God so much to be God, as his mercy in the Gospel. He is invisible in himself; we cannot see him but in his Son; He is unapproachable in himself; we cannot come unto him but by the Son. Therefore, when he made himself known in his glory to Moses, he sendeth him not to Mount Sinai, but putteth him into a rock, (being a resemblance of Christ,) and then maketh a proclamation of the gospel unto him. Moses' prayer was, "I beseech thee, shew me thy glory." How doth the Lord grant this prayer? "I will make all my goodness to pass before thee," (Exo. xxxiii. 18, 19,) and then revealeth himself almost all by mercy. "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin." (Exo. xxxiv. 6, 7,) to note unto us that the glory of God is in nothing so much revealed as in his goodness, "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his people?" (Micah vii. 18.)

Besides, though the law be indeed from God, as from the author of it, so that in that respect there may seem to be no difference of excellency between that and the Gospel, yet, though God should not have revealed his law again unto Moses in the mount, much of the law, and, by consequence of God himself, might have been discovered by human industry; as we see by notable examples of the philosophers, and grave heathen. But the Gospel is such a mystery as was forever hidden from the reach and very suspicion of nature, and wholly of divine revelation. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the hearts of men, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." The apostle speaketh of the mystery of the Gospel; noting it is above the observation, or learning, or comprehension of nature so much as to suspect it; nay, the natural inquiry of the angels themselves could never have discovered it; even unto them it is made known by the church. (Eph. iii. 9, 10;) that is, if it had not been for the Church's sake that God would reveal so glorious a mystery, the angels in heaven must have been forever ignorant of it. So extremely desperate was the fall of man, that it wanted the infinite and unsearchable wisdom of God himself to find out a remedy against it.

We must not, then, look upon God only in Mount Sinai, in his law; but we must acquaint ourselves with him in his Son; we must know him, and whom he hath sent, together; there is no fellowship with the Father, except it be with the Son too. We may have a knowledge of his "hand," that is, of his works, and of his punishments, without Christ: but we cannot have a knowledge of his "bosom," that is, of his counsels, and of his compassions, nor the knowledge of his image, that is, of his holiness, grace and righteousness; nor the knowledge of his presence, that is, of his comforts here, and his glory hereafter, but only in and by Christ. We may know God in the world, for in the creation is manifest his "eternal power and Godhead."—But this is a barren and fruitless knowledge, which will not keep down unrighteousness; for the wise men of this world, "when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, but became vain in their imaginations, and held the truth of him," which was in the creation revealed, in unrighteousness. We may know him in his law too; but this is a killing knowledge; a knowledge which makes us flee from God, and hide ourselves out of his presence; and therefore it is called "the ministration of death," 2 Cor. iii. 7. But to know the glory of God "in the face of Jesus Christ," is both a fruitful and a comfortable knowledge; we know the pattern we must walk by, we know the life we must live by, we know the treasure we must be supplied by, we know whom we have believed, we know whom we may be bold with in all the straits and distresses: we know God in Christ full of love, full of compassion, full of ears to hear us, full of eyes to watch over us, full of hands to fight for us, full of tongues to commune with us, full of power to preserve us, full of grace to transform us, full of fidelity to keep covenant with us, full of wisdom to conduct us, full of redemption to save us, full of glory to reward us.

THE TIME FOR PRAYER.

BY GEORGIANA BENNETT.

With the first beams that light the morning's sky,
Ere for the toils of day thou dost prepare,
Lift up thy thoughts on high.
Commend the loved ones to His watchful care.—
Morn is the time for prayer!

And in the noontide hour,
If worn by toil or by sad cares opprest,
Then unto God thy spirit's sorrow pour,
And he will give thee rest:—
Thy voice shall reach Him through the fields of air
Noon is the time for prayer!

When the bright sun has set—
Whilst yet eve's glowing colors deck the skies;—
When with the loved, at home, again thou'st met,
Then let the prayer arise
For those who in thy sorrows share:
Eve is the time for prayer!

And when the stars come forth—
When to the trusting heart sweet hopes are given,
And the deep stillness of the hour gives birth
To pure, bright dreams of heaven,
Kneel to thy God—ask strength, life's ills to bear
Night is the time for prayer!

When is the time for prayer?
In every hour, while life is spared to thee—
In crowds and solitude, in joy or care—
Thy thoughts should heavenward flee.
At home—at morn and eve—with loved ones there
Bend thou the knee in prayer!

HAPPINESS IN A HOVEL.

Distant something more than a mile from the village of Desford, in Leicestershire, at the lower extremity of a steep and rugged lane, was seen an obscure and melancholy hovel. The door stood not wide to invite observation; the cheerful fire gleamed not through the casement to excite attention from the passenger. The low roof and outer wall, were but just perceived among the branches of the hedgerow, uncultured and untrimmed, that ran between it and the road. As if there were nothing there that any one might seek, no way of access presented itself, and the step of curiosity that would persist in finding entrance, must pass over mud and briars to obtain it. Having reached the door with difficulty, a sight presented itself, such as the eye of delicacy is not wont to look upon. It was not the gay contentedness of peasant life, that poets tell of, and prosperity sometimes stoops to envy. It was not the laborer resting from his toil, the ruddy child, exulting in its hard, scant meal, the house-wife singing blithly at her wheel, the repose of health and fearlessness; pictures that so often persuade us happiness has her dwelling in the habitations of the poor. The room was dark and dirty; there was nothing on the walls but the bare beams, too ill-jointed to exclude the weather, with crevices in vain attempted to be stopped by rent and moulded paper. A few broken utensils hung about the room; a table and some broken chairs were all the furniture, except what seemed intended for a bed, yet promised small repose. The close and smoky atmosphere of the apartment gave to it the last coloring of discomfort and disease. Within there sat a figure such as the pencil might well choose for a portrait of wretchedness. Quite grey and very old, and scarcely clothed, a woman was seen sitting by the fireplace, seemingly unconscious of all that passed around her. Her features were remarkably large, and in expression harsh; her white hair turned back from her forehead, hung uncombed upon her shoulders; her withered arm stretched without motion on her knee, in form and coloring seemed nothing that had lived; her eye was fixed on the wall before her; an expression of suffering, and a faint movement of the lip, alone giving token of existence.

Placed with her back towards the door, she perceived not the intrusion, and while I paused to listen and to gaze, I might have determined that here at least was a spot where happiness could not dwell; one being, at least, to whom enjoyment upon earth must be forbidden by external circumstance; with whom to live was of necessity to be wretched. Well might the listener in such a scene as this be startled by expressions of delight, strangely contrasted with the murmurs we are wont to hear amid the world's abundance. But it was even so. From the pale, shrivelled lips of this poor woman, we heard a whispering expression of enjoyment, scarcely articulate, yet not so low but that we could distinguish the words, 'Delightful,' 'Happy.'

As we advanced with the hesitation of disgust into the unsightly hovel, the old woman looked at us with kindness, and without emotion bade us to be seated, and till questioned, showed very little inclination to speak. Being asked how she did, she at first replied, 'Very ill;' then hastily added, 'My carcass is ill—but I am well, very well.' And then she laid her head upon a cold black stone, projecting from the wall beside the fire-place, as if unable to support it longer. We remarked that it was bad weather. 'Yes,' she answered—then hastily correcting herself—'No, not bad—it is God Almighty's weather, and cannot be bad.' 'Are you in pain?' we asked, a question that was scarcely needed, so plainly did her movements betray it. 'Yes, always in pain; but not such pain as my Savior suffered for me; his pain was worse than mine; mine does not signify.' Some remark being made on the wretchedness of her dwelling, her stern features almost relaxed into a smile, and she said she did not think so; and wished us all as happy as herself. As she showed little disposition to talk, and never made any remark till asked for, and then in words as few and simple as might express her meaning, it was slowly and by reiterated questions, that we could draw from her a simple tale. Being asked if that was all the bed she had on which to sleep, she said she seldom slept, and it was long that she had not been able to undress herself, but that it was on that straw she passed the night. We asked her if the night seemed not very long: 'No, not long,' she answered—'never long; I think of God all night, and when the cock crows, am surprised it comes so soon.' 'And the days you sit here all day, in pain, and unable to move. Are the days not long?' 'How can they be long? Is not he with me? Is not all up—up?' an expression she frequently made use of to describe the joyful elevation of the mind. On saying she passed much time in prayer, she was asked for what she prayed. To this she always answered, 'Oh! to go, you know—to go—when he pleases; not till he pleases.' To express the [illegible] she once said, [illegible] all laid out ready for her in [illegible]!' But time would fail us to repeat the words, brief as they were, in which this [illegible] expressed her gratitude to the Savior [illegible] for her; her enjoyment of the God who abode with her; her expectations of the heaven to which she was hastening; and perfect contentedness with her earthly portion.

To this that I have written, I could add much, having notes of all that passed during the protracted years of this devoted woman's life. But my purpose here was not to make a story. I have witnessed only to what I saw, and repeated only what my ear had listened to. And I have repeated it but to prove that the happiness which all men seek, and most complain they find not, has sometimes an abode where we should least expect to find it.—This is an extreme case; extreme in mental enjoyment, as in external misery. But it is true. And if it be so, that a being debarred the commonest comforts of life, almost the light and air of heaven, suffering and incapable even to clothe herself or cleanse her unsightly dwelling, could yet pass years of so much happiness, that her warmest expression of gratitude to her benefactors was to wish them a portion as happy as her own—what are we to say to those, who, amid the overflow of sublunary good, make the wide world resound with their complainings? How are we to understand it, that while blessings are showered around us as in the summer rain, there is so little real happiness on earth? Because we seek it not aright; we seek it where it is not, in outward circumstances and external good; and neglect to seek it where alone it dwells, in the close chambers of the bosom. We would have a happiness in time independent of eternity; we would have it independent of the Being whose it is to give; and so we go forth, each one as he best may, to seek out the rich possession for ourselves. Those who think they are succeeding will not list our tale. But if there being any one who having made the trial of the world, are disposed to disbelieve the existence of what they seek; if there be any among the young, who start at the repose, and shrink from the aspect of their already clouded prospects, we fain would have them hear a brighter tale. There is happiness upon the earth. There is happiness for the poor and for the rich: for the most prosperous and the most desolate. There is happiness but we will not have it.

The following lines were written by Bishop Henry White, while staying at an Inn:—

The world is like an Inn, for there
Men call, and storm, and drink, and swear,
While undisturb'd the Christian waits,
And reads, and writes, and meditates.
Tho' in the dark I oft times stray,
The Lord shall light me on the way;
And to the city of the sun
Conduct me when my journey's done.
There by these eyes shall he be seen
Who sojourn'd for me at an Inn;
On Zion's hill I those shall find
From whom I parted in the vale.
Why am I heavy, then, and sad,
When thoughts like these should make me glad!
Muse then no more on things below,
Arise, my soul, and let us go.

PRESENCE OF JEHOVAH.—Places or conditions are happy or miserable, as God vouchsafeth more or less of his gracious presence.—Sibs.

THE POWER OF A RIGHT-MINDED MINORITY.

Whence is it derived? And how is an influence to be accounted for, leading to results every way so note-worthy?

Power belongeth unto God. He is ever active, yet never wearied. His quickening and sustaining breath pervades all existence. He is our Creator. "In him we live, and move, and have our being." From him we derive the will to resolve, and the hand to execute. And his gifts are real, and not merely apparent endowments. They are ours; ours to employ under the eye and control of him from whose bosom we sprung, and to whom [illegible] we are hastening. For [illegible] less than will is essential to his constitution. Upon the whole sphere of his [illegible] reason shines; reason, whose every dictate has the authority of law; which is so essentially legislative, that no man, whatever may be his notions of freedom, can force himself to pronounce the absurdity that he is at liberty to be unreasonable. Now in every dictate of reason we have the voice of God. He is the Supreme Reason. Every expression of his will must be a form of reason. And his will is all-powerful.

In wielding their powers in a given direction, men may violate the laws of their own being. An awful mystery this, in whose depths we are lost and confounded; but so it is. And what they may do, men in this respect have done. Like lost sheep, they all have gone astray. They have joined hand in hand in doing wickedness.—They encourage and sustain each other in casting off a control which in their inmost souls they feel to be legitimate and authoritative. [illegible] form majorities in evil-doing. They combine their abused powers; and [illegible] contrive to confound, subvert, and destroy. Activity, with such results, they reckon success. But [illegible] such exertions, they must be cut off from [illegible] union with the Father-Spirit.—[illegible] are at variance with his. They [illegible] his authority. His handiworks they [illegible] and derange. The tasks, then, to which they apply themselves, they must perform in the presence of a frowning Deity. Their powers must wither beneath [illegible]

[illegible] God summons from the general mass of humanity [illegible] chosen vessels. Their distinctive characteristic consists in a cordial regard [illegible] authority which it is their native [illegible] privilege to honor.—[illegible] is accordant with the dictates of reason, and of course co-incident with the will of the Creator. Now they may be many, or they may be few. But, few or many, they have fellowship with Omnipotence. Will, by coincidence with will, [illegible] within the limits of human ability, secures a great increase of living energy to every individual so sustained and aided.—Hence the maxim, Union is power. The results of the union must correspond with the elements of which it is composed. It may be the union of one feeble spirit with another; or of strength with strength. In every case, there must be increase of power, but proportioned in degree to the living energies supplied by one individual and another, which are brought into combination and activity. But what if we have, not a vine clinging to an oak; not a child throwing his arms around a giant; not even a hero embracing an angel; but man in sweet fellowship with God! A little one has at once become a thousand. The distinction between few and many has lost its significance. Sustained and cheered by Omnipotence, what may not a single hand attempt, and with full assurance of complete success! the hour of triumph may be delayed; but come it will. And we may now anticipate and enjoy the glories which, when it arrives, will burst upon the waiting spirit.—Rev. B. Gr[illegible]

APPLICATION OF DIVINE TRUTH.—I want one point of selfishness, to convert the Word of God to my own use. All my reflections upon the pride, corruption, blindness, and deadly fall of man, upon the necessity of the daily cross, and deadness to the world, I bestow freely upon others; and am hindered by the deceitfulness of my own heart, and the artifice of the devil from turning the edge of them on myself.—The same failings, perverse tempers, and evil habits which I see, and justly abhor in others, I know to be in myself, and possibly in a higher degree; and yet in spite of my reason, judgment and conviction, in spite of all the efforts I can use, I do not see them in the same light in myself that I do in others to loathe and condemn them.

HOW TO SPEND TIME.—Spend your time in nothing which you know must be repented of. Spend it in nothing on which you could not review with a quiet conscience on your dying bed. Spend it in nothing which you might not safely and properly be found doing if death should surprise you in the act.—Baxter.

JOHN REEVE MORALIZING.—John Reeve was accosted in the Kensington Road by an elderly female with a small bottle of gin in her hand. "Pray, sir, I beg your pardon, is this the way to the work-house?" John gave her a look of clerical dignity, and, pointing to her bottle, gravely said, "No, ma'am, but that is!"—Bentley's Miscellany.

THE PARTING YEAR.

Thou parting year! Time, in his onward flight, has brought thee near thy close. And while others are presenting their offerings to the approaching New-Year, I would fain pay this trifling tribute to thy memory. Why roll round so quickly?—Hardly had thy course commenced, ere thou gave intimations that thy time was limited. Having reached the zenith of thy glory, wilt thou not pause and lengthen out the thread of man's existence? Nature, in all her changes, has proved constant to thee. No discord has prevailed in her wide dominion to mar thy beauty, and dishonor thy fair name. Bountiful harvests have crowned thee with plenty. The changing seasons, in their turn, have conspired to render thy name conspicuous among the long list which have gone before. Even in thy age thou art still lovely. Autumn has delayed its fierce winds and storms to a late period; and man, who like thee is passing away, would wish thy stay to be prolonged. But thou art waning; yet the moments that compose thy number flit by as swiftly as when at first thy course began. Thou art hastening onward to meet the New-Year, and when thy race is run, wilt thou not halt and welcome thy successor, and bid the world good night? Ah, no. Thou must obey Time's stern bidding, and retire to rest with the years before the flood; and oblivion would cover thy memory, were it not for events which have transpired in thy reign which will be recalled to mind.

Methinks thou art an apt emblem of frail, dying man. He glides rapidly down the stream of time, unconscious that life is bounded to a span. He looks forward with the hope of enjoying long years of pleasure here; and while delaying his purposes, Time hastens the hour of his departure, and he is laid low, and has done with all life's hopes and fears, and would be forgotten, were it not for kindly deeds which are cherished in some lone heart. And is it thus with all that appertains to earth? Are all as evanescent as the waning year?—Momentous truth! hardly understood by mortals. Autumn's leaves, which lie thickly strewn around, proclaim it. The bright flowers have faded from our view, and not a vestige of their former beauty remains.—Amid all the desolation of Nature, is there no hope? Will not Spring revisit earth, and vegetation again start to life and hide these emblems of mortality, and all Nature appear as gay and joyous as before? But what can recall to life loved ones that have forever faded from the earth? What can efface from memory's tablet associations which have gathered around scenes of either joy or sorrow? There is no change in the human heart like that of Nature; its hopes once blighted, it still wears the semblance of decay.

Thou dying year! were it not for considerations like these we would not regret thy exit. And while thou art on the eve of departure, it is natural to remember the changes thou hast wrought; and the mind strives to pierce through the vista of unborn years, when time will cast around the brow a silvery wreath and rests not, until it fixes upon that changeless home, where time is not measured by months and years. Is there beyond the flight of time, a home of unchanging felicity for the weary, where hope will be exchanged for fruition, and the duration of which is eternal? This reflection buoys the mind above the tumults of this fluctuating world, and has a tendency to prepare it for its high destiny. The contemplation of past years often proves salutary. The heart may sicken at the view of former follies; yet it may make it better. It may serve as a beacon-light to guide the wanderer into the path of rectitude.

Thou parting year! amid the revelry which will usher in the New-Year, thou wilt not be forgotten with the sound of the bell reminding us that thy days are numbered. Great events which will bear thy date have marked thy progress. The highest ambition has been gratified, and deeds of daring been accomplished, and perhaps some foul deed lies in embryo that will stain our country's honor and blacken the historian's page. Who will envy thy successor?—A deep mystery hangs over its noiseless course. Is there none well versed in ancient lore whose mind can penetrate beyond the dark shades which hide the future, and bring to light its hidden stores? Since it cannot be, and the mind is not satisfied to feed on the past, let us learn to improve the present moments aright, that when years have fled, none may have to exclaim—thou wasted year! gladly would I recall thy moments ere Time had damped the ardor of youthful feelings, and sin embittered my delights. THE BOSTON CONVENTION.

A Boston correspondent of the New York Observer, has given a pretty full account of the convention recently held in that city, to consider the claims of the first day of the week to be the Christian Sabbath, &c. Were it not for its great length, we should be happy to insert it entire; but want of room rendering this impracticable, we present such extracts as we judge will be most interesting to our readers.—The Convention assembled in the Chardon-street chapel, numbering near five hundred, and continued its sessions during three days, Edmund Quincy acting as Chairman. Previously to the organization, however, there was much desultory conversation relative to the propriety of any such regulation, some maintaining that, as no votes or resolutions would be passed, no presiding officer or secretary would be necessary. Those who held these views seem to have been in the minority.

"The Sabbath was selected as the first of the three topics to be discussed; and there was no little adroitness shown in the mode of bringing it forward. A resolution was introduced, asserting that the first day of the week is appointed, by the command of God, to be kept as holy time. It was put into this shape, for the sake of throwing the burden of proof upon the defenders of the Sabbath, and obliging them to take the lead, and say things which their opponents might criticise; and also for the sake of excluding every kind of proof, but the production of an express command, naming the first day of the week. But the advocates of the Sabbath were not so easily caught. They resolutely maintained that they had nothing to say, till some attack on the established belief of the Christian community had been made. Mr. Garrison accused them of 'professional tact,' and Mr. Phelps retorted the charge; both of them, as it seems to me, on good grounds.

"You may be surprised to learn that any friends of the Sabbath took part in the discussion; but you should know that it was a very mixed multitude.—There was Mr. Garrison and his partisans; there were the Unitarian Transcendentalists, such as R. W. Emerson, Parker, of Roxbury, and A. B. Alcott (the teacher,—not Dr. W. A. Alcott, the physiologist, and author of the Sabbath school books); there were 'Seventh Day Baptists' from Rhode Island and New Jersey; there were men who were taken to be members of the Society of Friends, till near the close of the meeting, some one said that no member of that society had spoken; there were social reformers of the O. A. Brownson school; and there were Orthodox Congregational and Baptist ministers, whose anti-slavery movements had brought them into such company, and who, perhaps, felt bound to resist the malign influence of leaders whom they had helped to build up before they understood their true character.

"After a considerable amount of manœuvering by the parties, the Rev. Dr. Osgood, of Springfield, led off the debate in earnest, by a set speech in defence of the Sabbath. Garrison and others replied, and the debate continued till the close of the meeting. I learned but few of the speakers' names. Garrison, however, was the chief of the assailants, and Dr. Osgood, Rev. A. A. Phelps, Rev. Mr. Colver, a Baptist and anti-slavery agent, and other ministers of various denominations, spoke in defense of the Sabbath. The Rev. Mr. Parker, of the Unitarian Spring-street church, Roxbury, who avowed his belief that Moses was inspired just as all great legislators are, and that 'Thus saith the Lord,' in the Pentateuch, is exactly equivalent to 'Be it enacted' in our Statute books, spoke eloquently in favor of the Sabbath as a very beautiful and useful institution, though not of Divine appointment, except as all good laws are so. Mr. Crandall, a Seventh Day Baptist, from New Jersey, made a powerful argument in favor of the Divine appointment and perpetuity of the Sabbath. and a plausible one in favor of the Seventh day. Others, of the same belief, spoke, apparently, with deep sincerity and religious feeling."

The writer then goes on to state, that some persons who were for "treating all days alike," addressed the meeting, who "showed the earnest workings of minds of considerable power, but deficient in common sense and mental culture."

"Several speeches in defense of the Sabbath were truly excellent. The Rev Mr. Himes, pastor at the Chardon-street chapel, spoke on that side, which was gratifying, as he had hitherto been ranked among the most radical of all radicals. He spoke truly and justly of those who are 'always pulling down Babylon, but know not how to lay a single stone in building the walls of Jerusalem.'"

A proposition was made to raise one thousand dollars to print a report of the proceedings, and finally waived.

"It belonged to Dr. Osgood to close the debate. He began, but as soon as he announced his topic, Mr Garrison said that if the Dr. spoke on that point, he should wish to reply. The Dr. took another topic, which met with the same fate, and then several others, but gave them all up for the same reason, and simply introduced Whiting's apology, which has been mentioned. Mr. Garrison noticed, as a remarkable fact, that none but clergymen had spoken in defence of the Sabbath, while all the laymen who had spoken, questioned its authority. Mr. Colver said that those on the other side claimed to be all priests, 'a royal priesthood;' so that, according to them, no laymen had spoken on either side. * * *. No vote was taken concerning the Sabbath. If one had been called, it would probably have gone strong against the party who are for abolishing every thing."

The matter has resulted precisely as we anticipated. The Sabbatical institution has been assailed by zealots who appear not to appreciate its design and importance, and defended by men of distinguished ability, who might have been unable to have obtained a hearing from those who need instruction respecting it, in the ordinary way. It is gratifying to know that there is enough interest felt respecting the Sabbath, to bring its friends up to its defense when assailed. This may be regarded, moreover, as a pledge that the Sabbath of the fourth commandment will soon receive more attention from the church at large, than it has hitherto received. It proves, too, that it is better to meet the enemies of truth on their own ground and defeat them, than to afford them an opportunity of acquiring additional strength and confidence in error. We admit that the friends of truth have a most humiliating duty to perform when they meet such opponents as some who participated in the late convention But shall duty be neglected because the performance of it may be somewhat unpleasant? We think not. We are friendly to discussion when temperately managed. Truth will lose nothing by full and free discussion.

We recollect an expression of Rev. Dr. Beecher some years since, on a similar subject. The Roman Catholics were about to build a college in the West and to send missionaries into the valley of the Mississippi, and the fears of many Christians were much excited on the subject. The Dr. said, "Let them build colleges and have schools; Protestants must build colleges and have better schools. Let them send on their missionaries! Protestants must employ more and better missionaries. This do, and the interests of religion have nothing to fear." So we say respecting error in all its forms. Let the friends of truth and order labor to fill the public mind with right views, and there will be less room for the introduction of wrong ones.

New Arrangement.—By an alteration recently made in the transportation of the mails on the road between Utica and Ithaca, we now have but three mails a week each way. This is unfortunate for us, since we shall, under the present regulation, receive no communication from the east from Friday morning till Monday morning. We shall be obliged to change our publication day, or forego the benefit of the principal sources of information for a whole week. From our knowledge of circumstances, we fear our subscribers will be sufferers as well as ourselves, if the present arrangement continues. In any event, it shall be our first care to render our paper as interesting as our means and abilities will allow, and to issue it with promptness.

☞ We commend the article on Bible Classes in another column, to the attention of our readers—to the young especially. It contains some useful and important suggestions. There are two classes of this kind in town, (and there may be others that we have no knowledge of,)—one in the Seventh-day Baptist congregation, which recites Sabbath morning before the commencement of divine service, the other at the Presbyterian church, on first day evening. Under this arrangement, would it not be mutually profitable and agreeable to these classes, to meet each other at both places as often as possible, and hear the recitations, and, as far as circumstances will allow, participate in the discussion of the important questions which may come under their notice? It strikes us that such a course would be advantageous on many accounts. Will not teachers and scholars consult together on this subject, and see what can be done to render these classes more interesting and useful! Proper efforts might greatly augment their numbers, and effect much good.

The friends of "Amanda," show a commendable solicitude for her welfare, and appearances indicate that we are to have a full discussion of the merits and demerits of Cotillon parties. So long as there is a prospect of shedding light on the subject, and of doing good, we have no objections to a continuance of the discussion. It will be seen that there has been an arrangement among the orphan's friends for "Uncle William" to be excused from the labor of further correspondence at present, on account of other important duties. By common consent it appears that a maiden lady of the family is to lead off in the argument. From the specimens we have seen from her writings, we think her fully adequate to the task. She wields a pen of rare powers for a female. Should the "Young Man" present further answers, we have the fullest confidence that they will be candid and respectful.

ERRATA.

The following errors in the article on the first page headed "TOBACCO," escaped our notice.

12th line from top, for "genuine" read generic.

39th line from bottom, for "Votszebue" read Kotszebue.

8th line from bottom, for "roused" read so used.

VILLAGE LECTURES.

Would it not be well for the different branches of the Church of Christ in this village, to designate some evening in the week on which we will unite to sustain a Village Lecture at our school house? I name the school house, because it is common ground—every body feels at home there. The ministers who preach in the several churches might each in turn supply a lecture; this arrangement would have a good effect upon them, and upon their congregations. I would not ask that this suggestion might have a place in the Register, did I not hope that it might be of some service to other villages which are in circumstances similar to ours. J. R. J.

De Ruyter, Dec. 2d, 1840.

In answer to the question of our correspondent, we say, in our opinion it would "be well," and the people have been encouraged to expect that such an arrangement would have been made by ministers of the different churches before this time. Several months since the ministers of three denominations, the Baptists, Presbyterians, and Seventh-day Baptists, consulted together and concluded to commence as soon as the evenings should be of sufficient length for this purpose in the autumn. First-day evening was named as the most suitable time, but the Rev. Mr. Howell (Baptist) removing from the place, the matter was allowed to rest till his successor and others should be consulted on the subject, as it was the original design "to unite all the denominations in the measure as far as practicable." There are, we believe, some circumstances now existing which render it more proper to have those lectures on some other evening of the week. They are these:—Rev. Mr. Pixley (Baptist) has a standing appointment on that evening, which might be interrupted by the appointment of the lecture, and Rev. Mr. Johnson, has, we are informed, a Bible class which recites on that evening. We would therefore suggest, whether the evening of the sixth day might not be a proper time for the lecture? That would interfere with no appointment, except it might be the prayer meeting of the students of the De Ruyter Institute, and we presume they would be quite willing to attend the lecture, and fix on another evening for the prayer meeting. We hope something will be concluded on before long, that the people may know what to expect.

"Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

We recollect reading in some publication many years since, a forcible, yet brief exposition of the words of the Savior above quoted. It was in verse, and contained only two lines. Here they are—

"Dove-like, that I may do no injury,
And serpent-like, that none may injure me."

This appears in accordance with the general scope of the Bible, and worthy the attention of all Christians. Innocence, although indispensably necessary to Christian character, cannot render it complete without that sagacity and vigilance so strongly recommended by Christ, and so necessary to enable the pilgrim to escape the snares which are spread by his enemies for his feet. The doctrines of the Gnostics, and Non-resistants, are alike antipodes to each other, and to the Bible. "What God has joined together, let no man put asunder."

The weather is quite severe, and appearances indicate the setting in of Winter.

BIBLE CLASSES.

The members of a Bible Class should be regarded as assistant lecturers. A portion of scripture is before the teacher, on which he lectures. The questions which are proposed to the class, and the answers which are given, aid the teacher to give variety, scope, and force to his lecture. If a Bible Class is conducted as it should be, sermonizing, lecturing, expositing, preaching, exhortation, the exercises of the inquiry meeting, and of the conference meeting, together with the freedom of that religious conversation which adorns with unsurpassed interest the intercourse of the pious domestic circle—are all harmoniously combined. The Sabbath is a good day for the Bible Class lecture. The Bible is God's own book; the Sabbath is his own day—the day of rest which he gave to Adam and Eve in Eden—the day which the Moral Law as promulgated on Mount Sinai, commands us to "Remember" and "keep it holy." To associate together on some portion of such a day to study such a book, seems to be treating the God of the Sabbath and of the Bible with reverence.—The lesson before the mind during the week, guards the mind from the vanities of the world; it disciplines it to think, to reason, to reflect, and fixes its thoughts on future and eternal realities. The Bible Class lesson is always a fit subject of conversation as the pastor (or teacher of the class, whether he be pastor or not,) visits from house to house. Bible Class instructions make a permanent impression. After the members of the class have been scattered abroad over the country and over the world, for many years, what was said in the Bible Class will come fresh to mind, as those passages of scripture are read, which were the subject of investigation. If we attend in a right manner to the exercises of the Bible Class, may we not expect that the Holy Spirit who moved holy men to write the Bible, and who guided them to write as they were moved—will grant his reviving and regenerating influences? That thus it may be, is the desire of A Pastor.

A SPECIAL PETITION.

For more than eleven months past, I have been an honorary member of a household, in which I have received as much attention as any gentleman could wish. But I see unequivocal indications that I am about to be ousted from place by a new comer.—Already do I see his bright face hither and thither about the house, and the family have a word to say to him. They continue to consult me, though it is often done with an air that says, "We are almost done with you, sir!" My request is, that I may not be handed over to the baby, to be mutilated at his pleasure, and crowded into his mouth; nor torn to pieces to put over the pies when the cook decides that the oven is too hot, as many of my honored predecessors have been served. But I humbly petition to be placed in some snug little corner, in which I may remain for years to come. Years hence you may be right glad to have a chat with me. Besides, I have in my possession statistics which may be of great use to you. The older I grow the more highly will you appreciate me.

Now do listen to the request of your good friend,

The Almanac of 1840.

Dec. 2d.

Aunt Mary to Amanda:

My Dear Niece:—I am highly gratified with your success in inducing your Uncle William to express himself freely respecting cotillon parties. Not another of all the dozens of his nieces or nephews could have managed the matter with him half as well as you have done. I observed that "A Young Man," in a paper dated Nov. 18, 1840, supposes that the reply to your note has special reference to some proposed parties in the village of his residence, perhaps the same one in which yourself and the only son of Esq. W—— reside; but the Fashionvilles are so numerous in our country, that I do not think that your uncle wrote for the exclusive benefit of any one of them. My opinion is, that his advice to you was designed to take a much wider range than merely to meet the occasion which called it forth; it was doubtless meant for the whole circle of our extensive relationship, and choice friends—yea, more, for "all whom it may concern," in whatever ville they may have the happiness to sing,

Home, sweet home.

"A Young man," sees something darkly intimated in the language of Uncle William. If he will look again, I am confident that he will discover that no such dark intimation is there. So far from representing that the dancing is a mere cloak for deep laid plots of iniquity, the sentiment is, that the dancing is the very charm that draws the youth together, and holds them "till morning light breaks in upon them."

I hope you will not fail to weigh the truth which your uncle presents to your mind, viz: That if virtuous young ladies would unanimously decide against the cotillon parties, they would be utterly abolished. Notice he says "unanimously"—implying that some virtuous young ladies had already decided against them, but that others of this character continued to countenance them; their vote he wished to secure. Uncle William well understood, I presume, that respectable young men would not think of joining in a dance with females of suspicious character, and he did not once dream that they would meet to spend evenings in dancing by themselves, having no ladies of any sort for company; therefore, he concluded that if virtuous young ladies would "unanimously" decide against the dancing parties, they must be abolished.—"A Young Man," in quoting the expression from Uncle William, omitted the word "unanimously," which omission gave quite a different aspect to the meaning of the paragraph. The general candor of the youth's production, forbids us to cherish the thought that the omission was intentional: it is presumed that it was a mere oversight.

As it respects attendance on cotillon parties, "A Young Man" asks,

"In what consists the danger?"

This is a fair question. and one which deserves a candid and definite answer.—Knowing that Uncle William has not time to attend to it, I design to make it the theme of my next letter to you.

Excuse this hasty note, and accept love from your affectionate Aunt Mary.

Uncle Perry to Amanda:

My Dear Niece,—I thank you for the two papers you had the goodness to send me by your Aunt Mary, containing the correspondence between yourself and your Uncle respecting the 'Cotillon Parties,' and the reply of "A Young Man." This explains the anxiety of your manner and appearance at the time you last visited us during the three days of Election in this State. I was satisfied you wished to consult me on some important subject, but supposed at the time that you deferred it on account of my ill health. In sending me the papers containing the correspondence, you seem to ask me, 'What do you think of this, Uncle?' I will tell you, Amanda.—All that I could have said to you on that subject is briefly said in that letter. I fully accord with the advice he has given you—I think the more of it, probably, because it is from a beloved brother whose long acquaintance with human nature, and whose deep experience as a Christian entitle his opinions to a respectful consideration, and because it affords proof that some men (and there are certainly too few such) do not forget other duties when they are called to attend to the affairs of the State.

Your Uncle William has always been rather remarkable for the laconic ease with which he writes, especially in epistolary matters. But it seems to me he has rather outdone himself in his letter to you respecting the "Parties." He has certainly done much better than I could have done at my time of life, and my present state of health. You know he is my junior by many years.

There are several points discoursed of in the communication of "A Young Man," concerning which I think he misunderstands both my brother and the subject.—Feeble as my health is, I would have written a short article for the purpose of pointing out those errors; but your Aunt tells me not to worry myself about that matter at present, and hints that the duty will be performed by some younger member of the family, as your Uncle William is so much from home. Certainly, no one could wish for kinder friends than we are blest with.—If none of the family write touching those points, I shall try to do so myself before long; and should my health improve, as I hope it may when the weather becomes more steady, I may feel it a privilege to write, even if others do. I shall feel bound however, to respect circumstances, and the advice of friends in this matter.

* * * * * * *

I will conclude this note by relating a short story which may be profitable to "Young" people who are in favor of "Cotillon Parties." Some years since a Theatre-going young Lady was traveling in a Stage Coach, in England, in which the pious Mr. Hervey, author of the 'Meditations," which always pleased your mother while she was living, and which you have shown so much interest in reading, was also a passenger. The lady was commending Theatres, and made a recital of the benefits she experienced in attending them. Among these were, 1st, The pleasure of anticipating them. 2d, The satisfaction enjoyed while there. 3d, The pleasing remembrance of them when past. When she had finished, Mr. Hervey said: "There is one thing you have not mentioned." "What is that?" said the lady. "The pleasure the remembrance of your theatrical career will afford you on a death-bed!" She said no more during the journey on that subject—left the Theatre—and became a Christian!

I remain your affectionate

Uncle Perry.

P. S. As there has been an alteration in the stage arrangements so that we only have our mails tri-weekly, instead of daily, Mr. ———, who has been several days in our place, will hand you this. U. P.

TEAR OF PENITENCE

The following lines were written on seeing a young lady weep at church, as the minister was giving an account of the sufferings of Christ.

Tear of pure and holy feeling,
Down the cheek of beauty stealing,
While the man of God explains,
Christ the Savior's dying pains.
Seraphs with joy behold, afar,
That chrystal gem, which, like the star
Of Bethlehem, smiling star of love,
Received its mission from above.
Sweet mourner, let it freely flow—
Your Savior, Jesus, felt the wo;
Then let the contrite tear be yours,
And his the love that still endures—
Till he shall bid your sorrows stay,
Till he shall wipe your tears away. H. C.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

LOSS OF THE PHENIX STEAM SHIP BY COLLISSION WITH THE BRITANNIA AT SEA.

A most distressing calamity has occurred since our last, in the loss of the above vessel at sea, from a collission with the Britannia steamer. The particulars are these:—The latter vessel, commanded by Capt. J. Stranack, is a powerful steam-ship, belonging to the General Steam Navigation Company. The Phenix, commanded by Capt. Lefort, is the property of a French Company, and was manned by a crew of Englishmen and foreigners. Both vessels traded between Havre and London. The Britannia left Havre for London at 7 o'clock on Saturday evening last, and the Phenix got under way from the Tower-stairs soon after nine o'clock on Sunday morning. The two vessels met at sea nearly off Dungeness Point, about 8 o'clock on Sunday night. The Britannia was keeping her course, and she saw the Phenix approaching and altered her helm. The Britannia at the same time altered her helm, for the purpose of going clear of the Phenix, which, however, still kept coming down upon the Britannia. As soon as the Britannia saw there was no possibility of avoiding the Phenix, the engines were stopped, and the order issued to back astern; but before this could be effected the collission took place, the Britannia striking the Phenix just before the paddle-box on the starboard side, and cutting her down to the water's edge. The Phenix immediately began to fill, and the boats of both vessels were lowered, and the whole of the passengers and crew of the Phenix were providentially saved, and brought to London in the Britannia. The Phenix went down in twenty fathoms water before the boats reached the Britannia. Among the cargo were two hundred and fifty casks of tallow, fifteen tons of block tin, bale goods, and other property, worth at least £15,000.

The Phenix was built at Havre, and was one of the handsomest steamships afloat. Her saloon and cabins were fitted up in a splendid and costly style. The Britannia had her stem knocked away, and a portion of her larboard bow stove in, by the collission. The hole was stopped up by blankets and tarpaulins. The Britannia was not deeply laden, or she would, in all probability, have shared the fate of the Phenix, and every soul on board the two steamers would have perished. The passengers belonging to the Phenix consisted of forty persons, and the crew, engineers, stokers, and firemen to thirty more, and a majority of them were below in their sleeping berths when the collission took place. The crash is described as tremendous, and the water immediately began rushing into the engine-room and cabins. The affrighted passengers ran upon deck in their night clothes, and were lowered into the boats. Captain Lefort behaved in a very cool and discreet manner, and was the last person to leave the vessel. After seeing every one into the boats, he called out the names of the crew, and, upon ascertaining they were all safe, he lowered himself by a rope into one of the boats alongside. Immediately afterwards the decks of the vessel blew up, some of the cabin windows were blown out and the vessel went down, nearly engulphing one of the boats. One lady passenger, while being lowered into a boat alongside, fell into the sea, and George Hasletine, one of the crew, whose duty it was to steer the vessel from Gravesend to the North Foreland, jumped overboard after her. They were both picked up.

Two French gentlemen who were asleep in their cabins were aroused with some difficulty by Dines, the steward of the Phenix. The water had nearly reached the top of the saloon table, when Dines pulled them out of their births, and forced them on deck, when they learned the vessel was sinking, and before they had time to recover from their fright, were lowered into a boat. Dines is a loser to the amount of £200 by this unfortunate calamity.

From intelligence subsequently collected, we understand that the loss sustained by the sinking of the Phenix, will be much greater than was at first supposed, and that the total value of the vessel, stores, engines, and machinery, together with the cargo, passengers' luggage, money and valuables, amounts to £50,000. Owing to the precautions taken on board the Brittannia, she was struck on the luff of the larboard bow, where she was better able to sustain a collision, and the bow was stove in about three feet above water-mark, and her stern shattered to pieces. Among the passengers on board the Phenix were Col. Bullock, his lady, and four daughters, and their loss is estimated at £500, including the carriage and luggage of the gallant colonel and family. The young ladies had nothing on but their night clothes, and were removed in a state of great terror and alarm to the boats. One of the Misses Bullock was the lady who fell overboard in the hurry of the removal. An Englishman who had come over to this country to receive £350, which he intended to invest in the French funds, lost every farthing, and others are considerable sufferers. The carriage and other property of M. Guizot, the French ambassador, was on board the Phenix when she went down. We hear it is intended to send down two or three of the large government chain lighters to Dungeness, for the purpose of attempting to raise some of the valuables from the wreck of the Phenix. If the decks could be removed, the tallow would soon float up, and property to a considerable amount be recovered. The Phenix was insured in France, and the loss to the underwriters will be a very heavy one.

Fatal Collision.—On Friday morning, at five o'clock, as the Commodore steam-ship was on her way from Glasgow to this port, when about eight miles from Douglas, Isle of Man, she came in collission with a small sailing vessel, the consequence of which was that the small vessel went down instantly, and the crew, four in number, were immersed in the water. The engines of the Commodore were immediately stopped, and two boats were lowered, manned, and despatched in search of the drowning men. They succeeded in rescuing two of the crew, but the other two, we regret to say, sank to rise no more. Both vessels had their lights burning.—Liverpool Albion.

China.—The intelligence from China is down to the 4th of July, from which it appears that the British Admiral Elliott, commenced the blockade of Canton on the 3d of July. It is said there are so many outlets and ways of escaping in the river, that it is questionable whether the thing can be done effectually. There is quite a large number of large and small vessels of war on the spot, and perhaps it may be maintained. But who can look at this mighty movement to compel the poor Chinese to receive an intoxicating and poisonous drug, from which they are anxious to be delivered, and not feel disgust and indignation at such glaring wickedness? The only consolatory reflection is, that God may overrule it for the extension of his kingdom.—N. Y. Bap. Register.

From the Courier and Enquirer.

Interesting From China.—By the ship ANN M'KIM, Captain MARTIN, from Canton, whence she sailed on the 25th June, we have received a Canton Register extra, of that date, from which we have made the extracts we give below. A portion of the English invading force, it will be seen, had arrived—contented itself with declaring Canton in a state of blockade, and had proceeded northward, its destination not known, but supposed to be the Island of Chussan or Chowsan. The remaining vessels and troops employed on the expedition, under the command of Admiral Elliot, had not yet made their appearance, but were expected in five or six days.

In our times, we can recollect no event that has occured, which presents itself in so interesting an aspect, as the collision we have now in view. Of its result we have little doubt, it will end in the complete success of civilized man. But how this will be effected, where and by what means the attack will be made, is beyond the pen of the unmitiated. The archives of the merchant Kings of India contain information, closed to the world, but by which their present hostilities are guided, and these will only gradually unfold themselves to the public gaze.

Capt. Martin learned at St. Helena, that the barque Fox, of this port had been there taken possession of by the British brig of War Dolphin, on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade, and sent to Sierra Leone.

Abolition of the Pilgrim Tax.—We learn from the Asiatic Journal that the draft of a regulation has issued from Legislative Council of Calcutta for the unqualfied abolition of the pilgrim tax at Allahabad Gya, and Juggernath. It repeals the acts providing for the continuance of the duties levied from pilgrims; and decrees that the superintendence of the temple at Juggernath, and its interior economy, shall be vested with the Rajah of Khoorda; that he shall not receive or allow to be received by any persons connected with the temple, any payment, other than such voluntary donations as may be freely offered, from any performance of religious ceremonies; and that he, and all priests, officers and servants belonging to the temple shall be liable to prosecution for any breach of trust, or extortion, or illegal violence. This draft was to be reconsidered at the first meeting of the Legislative Council of India, after the 14th day of April.

Loss of the Schr. Hermosa.—A letter from Capt. Chattin of the schooner Hermosa, dated at Nassau, N. P. Oct. 29th, announces the wrecking of his vessel. She struck on a reef of rocks near the east end of the Island of Abaco, on the night of the 19th of Oct., the wind blowing fresh at the time, after a run of four days and a half from Cape Henry. She was bound from this port to New Orleans, with a cargo of slaves (47 in number,) and tobacco.

She bilged immediately and is a total loss. The crew and slaves made their escape to the island, where the slaves were taken possession of by the civil authorities, and after being taken to Nassau, N. P. the Capitol of the Bahama Isles, were set at liberty by the Governor. The wreckers had saved a part of the tobacco in a damaged state.

The entire cargo we believe was insured. The slaves belonged to Messrs. Lumpkin & Co. of our city, and their liberation, will, we suppose, form another troublesome question for our minister at the Court of St. James to settle.—Richmond Compiler of Nov. 19.

Opening of the French Chambers—the King's Speech.—London, Nov. 6, (evening.)—The Morning Post has just published, in a second edition, the copy of the speech of his Majesty King Louis Phillippe on opening the French Chambers yesterday. It is firm in its tone, as it ought to be—it breathes a parental solicitude for the honor and dignity of France—it alludes to sacrifices made to uphold that honor and dignity in the face of Europe—and it expresses a willingness to make as many more as may be required for that purpose; but it is at the same time decidedly pacific. No offensive allusion is made to the conduct of the Four Powers, nor does the King take it for granted that any acts which may have simply for their object the restoration of Syria to the Porte, can constitute grounds for disturbing the peace of Europe.

The references to the present condition of Spain, betray the anxiety of the French government as to the permanence of the throne of Queen Isabella II. The greatest danger to that throne will be interference on the part of France to uphold it.

But from the whole tenor of this speech it is clear that the King and the Government entertain much stronger fears of the anarchists and Revolutionists at home than of the Four Powers. It is against the machinations of those disturbers of the tranquility of France that the Royal menaces are especially directed. And recent events have sufficiently proved that, to preserve order in France, strong measures must be taken to put down these raving Anarchists.

The Mother who sold her Daughter for a Necklace.—Capt. Clapperton went to a great many places in Africa, where fathers and mothers sell their own children to persons they never saw before. When he was at a town called Fallshee, a woman about 30 years of old, sold her only daughter, about fourteen years of age, for a necklace of beads. As they were about to drag her away from the hut, she clung to her mother as the wrecked sailor clings to a mast; she threw her arms around her knees, and looking up in her face, burst into a flood of tears, exclaiming in bitterness of grief,

"O mother! mother! what will become of me? Do not sell me! What will become of yourself in old age? If you suffer me to depart from you, who will fetch you corn and milk, who will pity you when you die? Have I been unkind to you? O mother do not sell your only daughter. I will take you in my arms when you are feeble, and carry you under the shade of the trees. When you are weary I will fan you to sleep, and when you are sleeping I will drive the flies away from you. I will attend you when you are in pain, and when you die, I will shed rivers of sorrow over your grave. O mother, my dear mother, do not push me away from you; do not sell your only dear daughter to be the slave of a stranger."

But in vain did she plead, for her hard-hearted mother only shook the beads in the face of her daughter, and the man who had bought her dragged her away from the place where she was born to see it no more! Children, shall we not help send missionaries to Africa to teach parents to love their children? O let us pray for them.—S. S. Mess.

The Mute's Appeal.—The printing establishment of the Radii was wholly consumed, together with the houshold furniture of its proprietor, by the recent conflagration at Canajoharie. By this calamity, a worthy industrious man, with an interesting family, are left wholly destitute. And the blow has fallen upon those whose infirmities commend them to our warmest sympathies.—Mr. Backus, the proprietor of the Radii, is both deaf and dumb! There was no insurance on their property, and nothing was saved! Need we say more to commend this case to the abounding benevolence of the community, than that the sufferers are emiently worthy of its sympathies and protection? Mr. Backus, by his industry, economy and intelligence, was obtaining a handsome support as the printer and publisher of a newspaper. His office and his home are a heap of ashes! He and his wife and their children are destitute. We present this case of suffering to our fellow-citizens with the fullest confidence that their bounty will soon enable the mute to resume his business.—Albany Evening Journal.

M'Loud Arrested Again.—An intelligent individual from Black Rock, says, M'Loud, supposed to be one of the murderers of the inoffensive and defenceless sleepers on board the steamboat Caroline, again ventured on this side of the Niagara, a few days since, and has been arrested, examined, new testimony obtained, and he now imprisoned in Lockport jail. He denies being the person implicated, but declares that if he was he should glory in it. The captain of the packet which arrived on Saturday, confirms that part of the statement which relates to M'Loud's confinement in jail.—Rochester Democrat.

The first arrivals of Members of Congress in this city that we are aware of, (says the National Intelligencer,) are those of Mr. Prentiss, Senator from Vermont, and Mr. Henry, Representative from Pennsylvania.

South Sea Islands.—The Chiefs of the Navigator's Islands, have adopted a set of Commercial Rules, some of which are directly in the teeth of what the French have claimed at the point of the bayonet, at the Sandwich and Society Islands. And yet to the copy before us are attached certificates of decided approbation by the British Vice Consul, and Lieut. Wilkes, commander of the U. S. Exploring Expedition. We copy three of the Rules, the two last of which, it will be noticed, exclude "French brandies," and—if the government pleases—Romish priests. Lieut. Wilkes pronounces these "just and proper," and the British Vice Consul "highly approves" them.

6. No work shall be done on shore, nor shall any native be employed on board vessels on the Sabbath day, under a penalty of ten dollars, unless under circumstances of absolute necessity.

7. All trading in spirituous liquors, or landing the same, is strictly forbidden.—Any person offending shall receive no more refreshments. And spirituous liquors found on shore shall be seized and destroyed.

Beach Grass.—We have before referred to this grass, and its peculiar properties as stock for the manufacture of paper. From repeated experiments, paste board, bandbox, hanging, and wrapping papers, of a superiorquality, have been made from it, which is preferable to the same papers made from common coarse stock, that costs, at least double what this grass can be procured for. It is estimated that from six to eight hundred tons of this grass grows annually on Cape Cod. No use whatever was made of it, till it was discovered by Mr. Sanderson that it was of a fibrous nature, and peculiarly fitted for the maufacture of the articles above named. Mr. S. has received three premiums from different Associations, for the discovery, and holds a patent, and, from want of means, wishes to connect himself with some one who can furnish a part of a capital to commence its manufaucture, on an extensive scale.—Boston Transcript.

Mechanics.—A few years since when all the world was running mad with speculation, the mechanics of Saint John, New-Brunswick, instead of buying mill sites and erecting saw mills, in imitation of their more wealthy neighbors, established a Whale Fishing Company. It was a great undertaking for men of small means, but it was accomplished, and the enterprise has proved to be of more value to St. John than all the saw mills that were built on the River about the same time.

This company purchased and fitted out the barque Royal William, as their first experiment. She made a successful voyage and was fitted out again. They also purchased and fitted out the ship Pacific.—The latter arrived at St. John on the 10th November, with 2,200 brls. sperm oil, worth $70,000. The Royal William has arrived at Rio Janeiro, on her way home from her second voyage, with a full cargo of oil and bone.—Boston Atlas.

Among the passengers by the British Queen arrived at New York from London, we notice the following names:

Mr. Hodgson, of Washington, from a mission to Berlin; Majors Baker and Wade, Captain Huge and Morducai, of the United States Army; and Professor Bartlett, of West Point.

These officers of the Army were sent to Europe last spring by the War Department as a commission to visit and report upon the military establishments of Europe.—They are understood to have been in England, France, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden and Russia. Their reception by the Emperor Nicholas is represented to have been particularly flattering. The day after their arrival in St. Petersburg, he was pleased to invite them to assist at a grand review of the Imperial guards at Czarkesselo, where they remained as his guest for several days.—National Int.

Correspondence of the Commercial Advertiser.

KEY WEST, Nov. 2d, 1840.

Gentlemen—Since the date of my last letter little interest to the commercial world has transpired in Key West, or upon the Florida coast. We have one small wreck on hand, which came in a day or two since, under charge of the wreckers. The schooner Saratoga, of Boston, Frederick, master, bound from Charleston to Mobile. She has been libelled, and her case sent for trial on Wednesday, the 4th instant.

The ship Suviah is nearly ready for sea, and will soon proceed on her voyage to Liverpool, with the residue of her cargo.

The British barque Casket, having disposed of all her cargo to pay salvage and other expenses, is now taking in ballast, and will leave in a few days for Glasgow—probably by way of Charleston.

A report has just reached us of another Indian massacre: A small schooner boat, of 15 tons burthen, belonging to Mr. Howe of Indian Key, some three weeks since went upon a turtling voyage, under the charge of Charles Stewart, with the assistance of one sailor. Having been gone longer than was expected, fears were entertained for their safety, and a small party went in search of them. The schooner was found in the vicinity of Cesar's Creek scuttled and sunk. No dead bodies were found, nor other evidences of their having been killed, yet no one doubts that they have fallen in the hands of our merciless foe.

Salt Trade.—During the year 1839, there were manufactured at the works in Onondaga county, 600,000 barrels of salt. Of this quantity, 183,500 passed through the Welland Canal, 142,500 through the Erie Canal via Buffalo and the residue—being 274,000 barrels—found a home market. This year the manufacturers commenced operations on the first of June, and continued for seventy-five days, during which time 400,000 barrels of salt were made.—Onon. Standard.

Ordination.—The Rev. Coleby Chew Mitchell having been accepted by the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions as a missionary of the Board was ordained at the second Congregational Church in New London, on the evening of the 3d inst. Mr. Mitchell's destination is western Asia.

Thanksgiving.—The Governor of Vermont has fixed upon Thursday, the 3d of December, as a day of general Thanksgiving in that State

The Bangor, (Me.) Whig, of Oct. 30th states that they have just experienced a violent storm and that the vessels in the bay and along the coast, must have suffered severely

Fire.—The tool-maker's shop and store occupied and owned by Mr. Peter Brooks, situated on the Boston turnpike in East-Hartford, together with its contents, were destroyed by fire on Tuesday night of last week. Insured for about $3,000.

The Bible on board Steamboats.—We have had occasion to make several journies, principally by steamboats, this autumn, and have been gratified to notice that where the passengers have had access to the Bible, there has been no card-playing, as in former years.

On board some of the boats, for the want of a little attention to the subject, the Bibles are kept out of sight, so that if one is wanted it must be inquired after, and a search made for it. Many will forego the pleasure of reading the sacred volume rather than make themselves thus conspicuous, while others are not aware that steamboats are supplied with the scriptures.

I was pleased to notice on board the Charter Oak, that there was no difficulty of this sort, for as soon as the cloth was removed the Bible was placed upon the table, and was attentively read both morning and evening.

A little attention to this subject on the part of captains, would soon remedy the evil, and confer a favor on many of their passengers.

If any boats are without the Bible, I understand the New-York Bible Society are ready to supply them without charge.—N. Y. Evangelist. H.

The Freewill Baptist Missionary Society has resolved not to receive into its treasury the offerings of any unrepenting holder of slaves.

The first steamer on the Mississippi was launched in 1811—now there are more than six hundred on that river and its tributaries. The first steamer passed on the lakes from Buffalo in 1818—now those inland seas are navigated by sixty-one steamships, some of them magnificent in their construction, and of the largest class.

A. N. Y. line of steam-ships between this country and Europe has been formed, which will soon lay the keels of four vessels of gigantic size—almost 2000 tons; engines of 800 horse power, and capable of making the voyage in ten days on an average.

The new Patent office has been opened at Washington. Its design is to arrange in a conspicuous manner, all the models for which patents are taken, and to preserve all the specimens of art and ingenuity which may be transmitted, for a National Museum.

The British Queen, on her last voyage, with praiseworthy effort, rescued from the wreck of the brig Margaret, five men, who had been lashed to the windlass for forty-two hours, and must soon have perished.

The Governor of Indiana has appointed the 19th Dec. as a day of Thanksgiving; the first, we believe ever observed in the State.

A convention of tobacco planters is to be held at Washington, December 15th, to devise means of increasing the profits of their disgusting business.

Monopoly.—A gentleman in London has just concluded a contract for the exclusive navigation of steamers up the river Amazon for forty-five years. The same person is now negotiating for the establishment of the line of steamboats between England and Brazil.

Two boys, going home one day, found a box in the road, and disputed who was the finder. They fought the whole afternoon without coming to a decision. At last they agreed to divide the contents equally; but, on opening the box, lo and behold! it was empty. Few wars have been more profitable than this to the parties concerned.

Greenville, S. C., Oct. 30.—Frost.—On last Sunday and Monday nights we were visited with heavy frost and ice, the first we have had this fall. For two or three days the weather was very cold, the thermometer standing at 35° on Tuesday at sunrise.

Our farmers have had a fine time for harvesting their crops of corn, which are unusually fine throughout the upper country, so far as we have heard. The cotton crop of the middle district is represented as being very light—not much more than one-half the usual yield.—Mountaineer.

Western Harbors.—The Canadian papers announce that the British government has directed a survey and report of the condition of all the harbors on Lake Erie, and roads leading to them, with a view to their improvement; and for the purpose of encouraging the trade on Lake Erie. The commercial policy of Great Britain is liberal towards its own citizens. She fosters their enterprise, and devotes the powers of government to the development of the resources of the whole empire. This is the policy of a monarchy, where it is supposed the interests of the people and lost sight of in the selfishness of the rulers.

MEDICINES! MEDICINES!! MEDICINES!!!

TO FAMILIES.

S. D DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public; for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

G. A. BARTHOLICK & Co.'s

MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser; and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an infinite amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given way to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

THE OBELISK.

Rise, lofty column!—in thy simple grace,
And to the stranger bark, that patient braves
Yon boisterous ocean, point the Pilgrim's land.
—Be the first herald to the mariner,
Who, homeward-bound, upon thy brow shall trace
His pictured hearth, and th' expecting group,
Who with flushed cheek, or out-stretched arms, and shout
Of heart-felt welcome, blot the weary past.
—Touch the electric spark which thrills the breast
Of the exulting patriot, who from pride,
Splendor, and regal pomp in foreign climes,
Returns with heightened love to Freedom's shore.
—Warn to thy base, when Spring's first violets peep,
Those beauteous groups, who gambol free from care,
In childhood's bliss. Perchance they there may meet
Some aged, way-worn man, who on his staff
Resting, doth view thee, with a soul entranced
'Mid long-remembered deeds. Haste to his side,
Ye bright-eyed, fair-haired ones, and ask to read
The history which years have graved so deep
Upon his furrowed brow. Then will he lift
The palsied hand, and point each fearful charge
Of the dread battle—where the cannon's flash
Was strongest, and the life-blood from men's breasts
Gushed reddest, till the kingly crest was bowed,
And Liberty, with new and wondering joy,
Assumed the victor's robe. But should you mark
The wan lip tremble, as he faintly sighs—
"There Warren fell!"—or trace the flowing tear,
For lost compatriots, on that withered cheek—
Bow down, ye tiny listeners, and revere
The holy zeal of men of other days,
And their heaven-girded might. So shall ye learn
A better lesson than the pyramids
Teach awe-struck Egypt, shadowing forth the might
Of tyranny—yet faithless to its hope,
And yielding to oblivion's mystery
Even their founder's name.
But be THOU true,
Recording Column, to thy sacred trust,
And the blest memory of that glorious race,
Who sought no guerdon save their country's WEAL,
Transmit to unborn ages.
———Humble hands
Would crown thy forehead, such as never reaped
War's laurels, nor the weight of empire poised—
But such as in their happy patience turn
The busy wheel beside the winter fire,
Guide the swift shuttle, or the needle ply,
Or rock the slumbering babe. Yet ne'er the less
Tower thou in majesty—nor fainter stamp
Thy outline on the clouds.
Brief man may pass
On with his generations to the tomb;
But wait thou till the dim decay of Time—
Yea, stand and gaze on Nature's dying throes,
See the skies shrivel, and the faint stars fall,
And the pale sun, like wounded Cæsar, fold
His mantel darkly round him—hear the shriek
Of old Creation, when dissolving fires
Envelop her—and so decline at last,
But with the solid globe.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WISDOM AND KNOWLEDGE.

BY CALVIN ELLIS STOWE.

"It has long been familiarly said, that 'it takes all sorts of people to make a world;' and in these days we may with great propriety add, it takes all sorts of people to govern a world! At any rate, all sorts of people appear determined to take their turn in governing this world; it seems the decree of Providence that all should have their turn; and it is certainly the part of wisdom to make the best of what cannot be avoided.

"Patriarchs and heads of families first governed, afterwards priests and men of learning—successful warriors have had their turn—hereditary sovereigns and nobles by aristocratic birth have held a long dominion—wealth and talent have forced their way to empire and seized it in spite of regal authority and oligarchy hostility—all have had their time of standing at the head, except the great mass of the people, those who are neither patriarchs nor priests, nor men of learning, nor warriors, those who have neither regal nor aristocratic blood in their veins, and no pretensions to distinction for wealth or talent—and their turn comes next, and they will have it.—Numbers is now the crown-prince and heir apparent to the throne by regular succession, the sceptre is already within his grasp; and those who mean to stand high under the new dynasty, are hastening to pay their most obsequious homage to NUMBERS.

"There is always inconvenience in passing from one dynasty to another; especially to those who have had the ascendancy and must lose it. It was deadly hard for the monarchs and nobles of the last era to acknowledge the power and submit to the mandate of vulgar wealth and talent unsustained by high birth—and it is equally hard for talent and wealth to give way before the might of mere numbers. But come it must, and all the indications of society show that this era is now at hand, or rather that it has already commenced.

"When an opulent family could hire servants at its own price, and control them by the power of dismissing them without character, and thus depriving them of employment elsewhere, it was very convenient for the family—and now that servants command their own price, and families cannot get another, unless the last in their employ has given them a good character for politeness and light work, it is very convenient for the servants. When the rich could procure dresses which were inaccessible to those less favored by the gifts of fortune, and in the promiscuous assembly could be distinguished from all others by the superiority of their external decorations, it was very gratifying to the pride of the gentlemen and ladies, who could live without work—and now that the richest articles of dress usually worn by the opulent, can be obtained by a few weeks industry and skill in almost any employment, and the public assembly can show but little difference in external appearance between the rich and the industrious, it is no less gratifying to the pride of the gentlemen and ladies who work for their living.

"And why should any one complain? Why should not the people have their turn of standing at the head? In the old world they have had a long and weary season of oppression and penury; and why in this new world, should they not have a chance to reign and be the sovereigns? They will probably treat their subjects as well as any sovereigns who have preceded them; indeed they can scarcely contrive to treat them worse. Yes, let worst come to worst, and the reign of Numbers can scarcely be more disgraceful to the sovereign or more disastrous to the subject than that of Charles II. of England, or Louis XIV. of France, and these, so far from being the foulest specimens of hereditary misrule; are but a fair medium between the best and the worst. The accession of Charles to the throne, is to this day annually celebrated with devout thanksgivings in the national Church of England, as an unspeakable mercy, and Louis is Le grand Monarque, of whom all France is proud. Sovereigns have human nature as well as other men, and seek their own happiness; and if the sovereigns are the great majority of the people, probably the greatest happiness of the greatest number will be more zealously sought after under this new dynasty, than it ever has been before. Even if they do not find what they seek, it will be no new phenomenon in the history of man. All states of society have their peculiar advantages; and happy is the man who has learned in whatsoever state he is in, therewith to be content. There are sometimes pleasant and improving things in a monarch, and a republic also has in it its conveniences and advantages."

HABITS SURVIVE THE BODY.—Men's passions do not only make them miserable in this world, but are a very considerable part of their torments in hell. The body now limits and restrains the soul; so that the flame either of virtue or vice cannot blaze in this life to an excessive degree; but when it is freed from that confinement, the passions become ten thousand times more furious; being let loose by Divine vengeance to torment the vicious soul; as every virtue is increased unmeasurably, to the infinite joy of the righteous. It is reasonable, that the inclinations of the soul to virtue or vice, at its departure from the body, are not changed after its separation, but exceedingly strengthened; so that it is indispensable, by Divine aid, to take sufficient time to endue it with habitual godliness, before it passes into eternity, where habits are not altered, but improved.—Howe.

THE INQUIRY.

Tell me, ye winged winds,
That round my pathway roar,
Do ye not know some spot
Where mortals weep no more?
Some lone and pleasant dell,
Some valley in the West,
Where, free from toil and pain,
The weary soul may rest?
The loud wind dwindled to a whisper low,
And sighed for pity as it answered 'No!'

Tell me, thou mighty deep,
Whose billows round me play,
Know'st thou some favored spot,
Some island far away,
Where weary man may find
The bliss for which he sighs,
Where sorrow never lives,
And friendship never dies?
The loud waves rolling in perpetual flow,
Stopped for awhile, and sighed, to answer 'No!'

And thou, serenest moon,
That with such holy face,
Dost look upon the earth
Asleep in night's embrace,
Tell me, in all thy round,
Hast thou not seen some spot
Where miserable man
Might find a happier lot?
Behind a cloud the moon withdrew in wo,
And a voice sweet, but sad, responded 'No!'

Tell me, my secret soul,
Oh! tell me hope and faith,
Is there no resting place
From sorrow, sin, and death;
Is there no happy spot
Where mortals may be bless'd,
Where grief may find a balm,
And weariness a rest?
Faith, hope, and love, best boons to mortals given,
Wav'd their bright wings, and whispered, 'Yes, in Heaven.'

CUNNING OF LUNATICS—The case of the lunatic who indicted Mr. Munro for confining him in his lunatic asylum, has often been cited. He brought an action against the Doctor at Westminster; and although the man was subjected to the most severe examination and cross-examination, his insanity could not be detected. The trial was on the eve of being concluded, when Mr. Simms entered the court, and knowing the man's peculiar delusion, he was requested to ask him a question. He did so, and his insanity instantly became apparent. He brought another action against Dr. Munro, in the city of London; and, knowing that he had before, by acknowledging his love for an imaginary princess, so remarkable a degree of cunning did he exhibit, that one of the severest examinations to which a man was ever subjected in a court of justice, could not induce the lunatic to disclose the delusion, under which he was known to labor. This curious feature of insanity must be taken into consideration in forming an estimate of the presence of derangement in cases of suicide, and we must not hastily conclude because insanity is not self-evident that it does not exist.—Anatomy of Suicide.

DEATH-BED REPENTANCE.

There is a serious hymn in common use in which the two following lines occur:

And while the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

These lines are commonly understood to mean, that, while the vilest sinner continues to breathe, there is reason to believe he may be converted. This sentiment is untrue; and it is very dangerous, for it tends to make the wicked feel, that, without taking any pains to live righteously, they can in the end make sure of heaven by dying righteously.

It is not true, that a sinner is at liberty to take his own time for it, and be converted when he pleases. There is a "last line of merciful forbearance," which some men pass before they die. When they pass this boundary, the influences of the Holy Spirit are "quenched;" they are "given over to strong delusion," and there is no longer any hope of their salvation.—They are "LET ALONE!" An invisible record declares them DOOMED; and henceforth they will continue insensible, or only awake to a "fearful looking for of judgment. This is one of the most solemn and startling truths of Revelation.

In view of this consideration, how daring and dangerous is it to presume you can just as well put off the work of conversion till you are about to die! If there ever was a man converted on his death bed, he did not live to show it; and we know that too often the anxieties of a dying sinner exhibit his remorse, and his fear of hell, but not his repentance. It is one thing to shrink in terror from the wages of sin, and quite another to repent of sin. Remorse is not conversion. Dread of an avenging retribution is not delight in religion for its own sake. It may be taken as a general rule, that men die as they have lived. There may be exceptions, but generally, when a man has lived in sin, he dies in sin. He does not "return." Then, dear reader, beware what you do. Choose religion now for its own sake, else you may have no angel present to brighten your last hours.

WHO OUGHT TO BE PUNISHED, THE DEVIL OR MAN?—The late John Thomas, one of the missionary brethren of Serampore, was one day, after addressing a crowd of the natives on the banks of the Ganges, accosted by a Brahmin as follows: "Sir, don't you say that the devil tempts men to sin?" "Yes;" answered Mr. Thomas.—"Then," said the Brahmin, "certainly the fault is the devil's; the devil, therefore, and not man, ought to suffer the punishment." While the countenances of many of the natives discovered their approbation of the Brahmin's inference, Mr. Thomas, observing a boat with several men on board, descending the river, with that facility of instructive retort for which he was distinguished, replied, "Brahmin, do you see yonder boat?" "Yes." "Suppose I were to send some of my friends to destroy every person on board and bring all that is valuable in the boat; who ought to suffer punishment? I for instructing them, or they for doing this wicked act?" "Why," answered the Brahmin, with emotion, "you ought all to be put to death together." "Ay; Brahmin," replied Mr. T., "and if you and the devil sin together, the devil and you will be punished together."

CHRIST THE SUM AND SUBSTANCE OF THE SCRIPTURES.—We view Christ as the soul which animates the whole body of our divinity, as the centre of the system, diffusing light and life to every part of it. Take away Christ—nay, take away the Deity and atonement of Christ, and the whole ceremonial of the Old Testament, appears to us little more than a dead mass of uninteresting matter. Prophecy loses all that is interesting; the Gospel is annihilated, or ceases to be that good news to lost sinners which it professes to be. Practical religion is divested of its most powerful motives, the evangelical dispensation of its peculiar glory, and heaven itself, of its most transporting joys.—Fuller's Letters.

STRABISMUS.—Doctor W. J. Duffie, assisted by Drs. Condie, Duffield, and several other professional gentlemen, performed two operations on Saturday last, for Strabismus, or what is usually termed squinting. The first operation was performed at eleven o'clock, upon a young woman in Tenth street, below Christian. The other was at twelve o'clock, on a child in Sixth street, near Fitzwater. Thus far the operations appear to be attended with success; how it will prove, time only can determine. These were both extreme cases, the eyes being so much turned in, as to nearly prevent the patients from distinguishing any objects. This operation has been but seldom if ever before performed in this city, and is considered one of the most difficult in surgery.—Philadelphian.

THE TEN WORDS.—The Jews call the ten commandments by the name of The Decalogue, which signifies The Ten Words. As the precepts cannot be learned in too many ways, we here give the substance of them in ten lines, which will help the memory to recollect them in full.

1. I am the Lord thy God—serve only me;
2. Before no idols bow thy impious knee;
3. Use not my name in trifles, nor in jest;
4. Dare not profane my sacred day of rest;
5. Ever to parents due obedience pay;
6. Thy fellow creature, man, thou shalt not slay;
7. In no licentious conduct bear a part;
8. From stealing keep with care thy hand and heart;
9. All false reports against thy neighbor hate;
10. And ne'er indulge a wish for his estate.

—Youth's Friend.

LITERATURE.

ANTIQUITY OF MECHANICAL SCIENCE.

We read in Genesis, that ships were as old, even on the Mediterranean, as the days of Jacob. We likewise read that the Philistines brought thirty thousand chariots into the field against Saul; so that chariots were in use 1070 years before Christ. And about the same time architecture was bro't into Europe. And 1030 years before Christ, Ammon built long and tall ships with sails on the Red Sea and the Mediterranean.—And, about ninety years after, the ship Argo was built; which was the first Greek vessel that ventured to pass through the sea, by help of sails, without sight of land, being guided only by the stars. Dædalus also, who lived 980 years before Christ, made sails for ships, and invented several sorts of tools, for carpenters and joiners to work with. He also made several moving statues, which could walk or run of themselves. And, about 800 years before Christ, we find in 2 Chron. 15, that Uzziah made in Jerusalem, engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal.—Corn-mills were early invented; for we read in Deuteronomy, that it was not lawful for any man to take the nether or upper millstone to pledge; yet water was not applied to mills before the year of Christ 600, nor wind-mills used before the year 1200. Likewise, 580 years before Christ, we read in Jeremiah 18, of the potter's wheel. Architas was the first that applied mathematics to mechanics, but left no mechanical writings behind him; he made a wooden pigeon that could fly about. Archimedes, who lived about 200 years before Christ, was a most subtle geometer and mechanic. He made engines that drew up the ships of Marcellus at the seige of Syracuse; and others that would cast a stone of a prodigious weight to a great distance, or else several lesser stones, as also darts and arrows; but there have been many fabulous reports concerning these engines. He also made a sphere which showed the motions of the sun, moon, and planets.—And Posidonius, afterwards made another which showed the same thing. In these days, the liberal arts flourished, and learning met with proper encouragement; but afterwards, they became neglected for a long time. Aristotle, who lived about 200 years before Christ, was one of the first that wrote any methodical discourse of mechanics.—But, at this time, the art was contained in a very little compass, there being scarce any thing more known about it than the six mechanical powers. In this state it continued till the 16th century and then clock-work was invented; and about 1650, were the first clocks made. At this time, several of the most eminent mathematicians began to consider mechanics; and by their study and industry, have prodigiously enlarged its bounds, and made it a most comprehensive science. It extends through heaven and earth; the whole universe, and every part of it, is its subject. Not one particle of matter but what comes under its laws. For what else is there in the visible world, but matter and motion? and the properties and affection of both these are the subject of mechanics.—Emerson.

ASSAULTS UPON DIVINE REVELATION.

At one period arose Geology, from the earth's depths, and entered into mortal combat with a revelation which pillard on the evidence of history, has withstood the assault. At another time, from the altitudes of the upper firmament was Astronomy brought down, and arrayed in hostile attitude against the records of our faith, and that attack has also proved powerless as the former. Then from the mysteries of the human spirit, an attempt has been industriously made to educe some discovery of wonderous spell, by which to disenchant the world of its confidence in the gospel of Jesus Christ. From lecture-rooms of Anatomy, the lessons of materialism [illegible] inculcated, and for the purpose of putting a mockery on all religion, and driving it, if possible, from the face of the earth. But the most singular attempt to graft infidelity on any thing purporting to be a science, has been made by those who associate the doctrines of Phrenology with their denial of the Christian Revelation, as if there were any earthly connection between the form of the human skull, and the truth or falsehood of our religion! The science of Theology has been made a sort of play-ground for all manner of inroads in regard to human speculation; but it is not without a peculiar evidence of its own unassailable position, and beyond the reach of external violence. The hammer of the Geologist cannot break that demonstration—the telescope of the Astronomer cannot enable us to descry in it any character of falsehood—the knife of the Anatomist cannot find the way to the alleged rottenness which lies at its core—nor by a dissecting of Metaphysics can the Mental Philosopher probe his way to the secret of insufficiency, and make exposure to the world, of the yet unknown flaw, which vitiates the proof of the Christian faith. All those sciences have cast their missiles at the stately fabric of our Christian philosophy and erudition, but they have dropped harmless and impotent at its base.—Chalmers.

FOR THE LADIES.

ADVICE TO WIVES.

BY J. A. JAMES.

Economy and order in the management of her personal and domestic expenditures, are the obvious duties of a wife.

You are to preside in the direction of household affairs, and much of the prosperity and comfort of the little community will depend upon your skilful and prudent arrangements. A showy, luxurious, and expensive taste, is almost universally cherished, and is displayed in innumerable instances, where there are no means to support it. Christian families are in the most imminent peril of worldly conformity in the present day; and the line of demarkation between the church and the world is fast wearing out. It is true they have no cards; they do not frequent the theatre or the ball-room; and perhaps they have no midnight routs; but this is all—for many are as anxious about their furniture, the fashion of their habits, the expensiveness of their entertainments, as the veriest worldling can be. Now a wife has a great influence in checking or promoting all this. It has been thought that this increasing disposition [illegible] show [illegible] is to [illegible] to female vanity. [illegible] gravates the misery [illegible] reverse takes place.—Then to be [illegible] to have it said that her extravagance [illegible] to ruin her husband; then to want that for bread which was formerly wasted on luxury; then to hear the whisper [illegible] of having injured others by her own [illegible] less expenditure. Avoid, my [illegible] these miseries; do not go on to [illegible] wormwood and gall to [illegible] the already bitter cup of adversity. Endeavor to acquire a skilfulness in domestic management, a frugality, a prudent [illegible] of order and neatness, a medium course between meanness and luxury, a suitableness to your station in life, to your [illegible] profession, and economy, which will leave you more to spare for the cause of God and the miseries of man. Rather [illegible] stimulate the taste of your husband for expense; tell him that it is not necessary for your happiness, nor for the comfort of the family; draw him away from these adventitious circumstances to the [illegible] ment, the mental culture, the [illegible] struction of children. Let knowledge, piety, good sense, well-formed habits, [illegible] ny and mutual love, be the sources of [illegible] the pleasure [illegible] furniture, or dress, or entertainments, [illegible] these!

FOR THE FARMER.

[illegible]

"The point which [illegible] tors will [illegible] by being fed [illegible] I am not aware that any one has [illegible] quiry as I happened to do in the [illegible] the last winter and the winter [illegible] acknowledged [illegible] every thing that eats, namely, that [illegible] plenty to eat, is warm, and [illegible] it is very likely to [illegible] ly was not aware, until by [illegible] periments I tested the truth of [illegible] that the same animals when placed [illegible] shade and kept warm, not only [illegible] rapidly, very much more rapidly [illegible] condition and weight than when [illegible] open air, but also that they [illegible] much smaller quantity of food. This I have tested both last year and [illegible] not the papers by me to refer to, but [illegible] as my recollection goes, it is this, that the quantity of food consumed was [illegible] third, and the increase of weight was fully one-third taking it in round numbers. At the beginning of the season I built a shed which will contain about eighty hogs [illegible] shed which will serve for cattle [illegible] and I merely put down a few rough [illegible] for the cattle, as I have found that [illegible] great advantage to have [illegible] for if they had straw [illegible] they would be liable to get the foot [illegible] I bought these [illegible] Christmas, and I found that [illegible] had elapsed, they did not eat [illegible] when they were out of the field [illegible] proportion of five to three. When in the fields they [illegible] eat fifty baskets [illegible] but when brought up they eat only thirty a day, therefore their improvement was in the inverse rate of their cost. Yet [illegible] great progress did they make, that [illegible] would have thought they had been [illegible] fifty baskets a-day when shut up [illegible] thirty when in the field. I gave [illegible] their turnips a little oil-cake, and [illegible] the size they grew to was so very [illegible] that at thirteen months old I sold them without their wool, for 37s. a piece—and I really believe that if the turnips be pulled and brought into the shed, they will go twice as far as when consumed in the field."

J. W. CHILDERS.

CLAYEY LANDS.—There are clayey soils that cannot be meddled with at certain seasons of the summer. When dry, they are flint like, and it is almost impossible to make the plough enter. And when wet, if we attempt to put in the plough, we plaster up the clay, and make it into mortar—the sun dries it afterwards, and it remains in hard lumps through the season. We must, therefore, plough these lands when we can, whether in June or in November, when they have just moisture enough in them to suffer the plough to enter, and not so much as to be made into mortar. In general, when we can choose our time, we should aim to plough when the soil has a quantity of green vegetable matter on it; and clayey soils are as much improved as any, by the rotting of the roots in the body of them, and the vegetable growth on the surface. The decomposition of this matter, breaks apart the tenacious lump, and renders it fit for the admission of new roots. These clayey soils may be broken to pieces more easily, by the rotting of the green crop, ploughed in, than in any other manner. These, with sand, or fine gravel, should both be used on a clayey soil, which may be made the most valuable of any in the country, when well managed.—Cultivator's Almanac.

WORLDLY CONFORMITY.

And be not conformed to this world.—ROM. xii. 2.

A minister of the Gospel, who we hope is now in heaven, was accustomed to remark, that the 12th chapter of Eccles.,—the 12th chap. of Romans, and the 12th of Heb. should be thoroughly committed to memory by every person. Where shall we find in so short a compass a more rich assemblage of the primary truths of practical religion than that with which we are furnished in the 12th of Romans?

How powerful is the reasoning—how melting the entreaty with which the chapter commences!—'I beseech you, therefore, brethren. by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.'

In this chapter prohibitory injunctions and positive requirements, are most beautifully blended, each class of truths impressively enforcing the other, and all more fully exemplified by a variety of inspired illustration. And be not conformed to this world—is the divine prohibition which arrests our attention at this hour.

It requires us to turn our thoughts to this theme, viz: Worldly Conformity.

I design to show, first, in what Worldly Conformity consists—and secondly show—That professing christians are in great danger of being conformed to this world.

I am to show,

I. In what worldly conformity consists.

That we may learn this, let us consider,

1. What Jesus Christ requires, summarily, of his followers.

He requires them to love him supremely. He puts them upon this test—If ye love me, keep my commandments. They must adopt his laws as the rule of their life.—They must not live for themselves, but for him. Whether they eat or drink, or whatsoever they do, they must do all for his glory. Of his displeasure they must have a holy dread. His approbation they must desire above all the praise of men. For him they must willingly bear the cross.—They must even rejoice to be counted worthy to suffer shame for his name.—Their hearts must be fixed on the extension of his kingdom. Thy kingdom come—thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven, is the prayer which they should offer without ceasing. To serve him sincerely, and ardently while they live, and to be prepared to praise and glorify him forever, should be the permanent and ruling desires of their minds. If this be a summary view of what Jesus Christ requires of his followers, let us contemplate,

2. The course which the unregenerate world pursue.

Unregenerate men love themselves supremely. They hate the Lord Jesus Christ. They set up rules in direct opposition to his commands. They live for themselves. Their influence aids the extension of Satan's kingdom. They love the praise of men more than the approbation of God. The maxims of this world are their compass. Its fashions, honors, emoluments and pleasures captivate their affections. Their eye is fixed on this terrestrial ball, and is closed against the light and beauty of heaven. To serve themselves while they live is the prevailing motive by which their actions are guided—and if they allow themselves to think of another world, their chief concern is to escape misery, and somehow be made happy, utterly regardless of the claims and honors of the Lord Jesus. From this contrast between what Jesus Christ requires of his followers, and the course of the ungodly world—it is evident,

3. That Worldly Conformity consists in forgetfulness of the claims of Christ, and in a consequent and proportionate yielding to the sway of the world.

The claims of the Savior and of the world are opposite. We cannot serve God and mammon. Christ says—Live for me, and for a crown of glory above. The World says—Behold my kingdoms, and the glory of them—make these thy prize.—Christ says—Deny thyself, take up thy cross, and follow me. The World says—Soul, take thine ease. Christ says to Christian parents—Train up your children for my service. The world says—Learn them to worship at my shrine. Christ says to men of business—Do not pursue any occupation which is inconsistent with your obligations to me; do not engage in any pursuit by which domestic peace shall be invaded—the public morals injured—and the immortal souls of your fellow creatures ruined.

The World says, Press on! Press on! If you are satisfied that by the course which you now pursue, you can increase your wealth, make no inquiry concerning the consequences of your actions to those around you. Seize, says the World, upon the boon which I offer you, and heed not the present and eternal interests of your fellow beings.

Christ says to Christian females—Adorn yourselves with modest apparrel.—The World says—Come decorate yourselves with my garlands; come glitter in my tinsel. Christ says to all—Let my meekest followers be your choicest companions. The World says—Here are my votaries—take them by the hand as your bosom friends.

Christ says—Speak for my cause as you have opportunity. The World says—Be cautious, and do not introduce such serious topics as will interrupt my mirth, and song, and dance. Christ says—Contend for the principles of holy truth, and eternal justice; contend for them with calmness, and love, but perseveringly and firmly.

The World says—Forbear, compromise. Do not persist in pressing your peculiar views.

To furnish still further illustration of the nature of worldly conformity, I will take the liberty to introduce a few paragraphs from the pen of another, if I mistake not, an Episcopal writer—He says: "When I see a professed follower of Jesus Christ more desirous of temporal than spiritual prosperity; more actively engaged in making wealth than in promoting the kingdom of God; more laborious to procure a coffer of gold, than a crown of life for his children, I want affectionately to say to him—Be not conformed to this world.

When I hear a professing christian conversing with animation and interest concerning crops, markets, politics, &c., and observe that he is silent and listless when religion is the theme of conversation, I want to remind him of this exhortation of Paul—Be not conformed to this world.

When I hear a professor of religion complain that the requirements of the gospel, as enforced by his pastor, are too strict, that they demand too frequently, and draw too largely upon his time and energies, I cannot but regard him as too much engrossed with earth, and I want with christian affection to say to him—Be not conformed to this world.

When I observe a professor of religion seeking and enjoying the society of ungodly men, more than that of the saints—more punctual and cheerful in his attendance at the convivial party, than at the prayer meeting and the sanctuary, I want to whisper kindly in his ear—Be not conformed to this world.

When I behold a professor of religion panting and grasping after the plaudits and honors of earth, eager to bind about his temples a fading wreath—climbing upon a pedestal in the temple of fame—I want to direct his eye to the exhortation—Be not conformed to this world.

When I see a christian female decorated with the gaudy trappings of fashion, eager to catch the gaze and admiration of the vain and thoughtless—imitating the glitter of the dissolute, and exciting the envy of the poor—I want to thunder so loudly in her ears as to startle and awake her conscience—Be not conformed to this world.

When I observe a christian mother sending her children to a ball-room, and the theatre, the fashionable assembly, and the festive party, among the profligate and licentious, to perfect their education! whilst I weep for her children, I want to repeat to the misguided parent the charge of Paul—Be not conformed to this world."

I am to show,

II. That professing christians are in great danger of being conformed to this world.

1. In our hearts we find a strong tendency to worldly conformity.

2. We are much exposed to worldly conformity in consequence of our necessary connexion with secular affairs.

3. We are in danger in consequence of the influence of our unconverted acquaintances and relatives.

* * * * * *

4. Satan ensnares us as much as possible with worldly conformity.

5. By reference to facts we may illustrate our danger.

* * * * * * *

REMARKS.

1. Our subject teaches us that we must guard against Worldly Conformity with much watchfulness and prayer.

We profess to be Christ's followers.—We sojourn in this world. We see in what worldly conformity consists. We see our danger. "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." We need not be morose and censorial in our treatment of the unregenerate—need not make to ourselves curses—need not affect singularites; but we must know that the friendship of the world is enmity with God, and that whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God. (James iv. 4.) We must learn to live above the world while we are in it—must set our affection on things above, and not on things on the earth—must confess ourselves to be strangers—having here no continuing city. but must seek a city which hath foundations. To do this, requires watchfulness & Prayer.

2. There can be no doubt that worldly conformity brings upon us as individuals much darkness of mind.

When earth gets between us and Jesus the Sun of the moral system, there must be an Eclipse of the soul.

3. Worldly conformity is one of the most formidable obstacles in the way of the outpouring of the Spirit among us. Just so far as christians are conformed to the world, the line of distinction between the church and the world is dimly seen. The impenitent are thus rendered easy and careless. The moralist grows satisfied with his morality, for the ungodly world is disturbed only as the standard of piety is elevated in the church—the worldly sinner is at ease, for he is so much like the church.

The fashionable sinner is comforted, for the church are coming over to him. If the church follow the multitude to do evil, the multitude will never be reformed. I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. As obedient children not fashioning yourselves according to former lusts in your ignorance; But as He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation—because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy. The voice of God to us is—Be not conformed to this world. Hear this voice Beloved—and be ye conformed to the image of His Son, who is the first born among many brethren. Let this be our character, then shall we teach transgressors the ways of holiness, and sinners shall be converted unto God. Amen.

RELIGIOUS.

HOW SHALL I SPEND MY SABBATHS PROFITABLY!

1. Rise early.—God requires one seventh part of your time. The Sabbath is just as long as any other day. If you indulge in sleep Sabbath mornings one or two hours later than usual, you rob your God and your own soul of so much holy time; and if you begin the day by robbing God, you cannot expect he will bless you.

2. Pray for your Minister.—He will then preach better, and you will be better prepared to profit by his preaching. He needs your prayers. He has taxed his energies to the utmost, to prepare two good sermons to interest and instruct you. Exhausted by the labors of the week, and trembling under his awful responsibility, he will be cheered and encouraged if he believes he is remembered in your prayers.

3. Pray that the preaching may be blest to your soul.—He is a foolish man who sows his seed before he breaks up the soil. You are more foolish if you expect a blessing without asking for it, or preparing your heart to receive it. If a blessing is not worth asking for, do not complain if it is not bestowed.

4. Do not indulge in secular conversation.—Many professing Christians spend the interval between the services of the Sanctuary, in talking about their business, or their pleasure, or politics. This is not remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy. If you spend your intermission in this manner, you must not wonder if in the afternoon you feel sleepy, and the preacher seems dull.

5. Banish worldly thoughts.—You must not on the Sabbath "think your own thoughts." If your thoughts are allowed to wander unrestrained over the business of the past week, or the plans for the week to come, you suffer for it. God will leave you in darkness. The Sabbath will drag heavily away; your love will be cold, your prayers formal, and you will be disqualified to engage profitably in the services of the sanctuary.

6. Do not criticise the performance of your Minister.—If he has preached a poor sermon make the best of it; if a good one, be thankful and improve it. Your praise or censure can do no good either to him or to yourself, but may do hurt to both. You will profit far more by praying over the sermon, and applying it to yourself, than by criticising it.

7. Spend every Sabbath as though it were your last.—Your last Sabbath will soon come. Perhaps the next will be your last. Spend it, then, as you will wish you had done when you review it millions of ages hence. If you knew it would be your last you would be much in prayer; you would banish worldly thoughts and conversation; you would read your Bible; you would meditate much on divine things, and examine the foundation of your hope for eternity. Do this and your Sabbaths will not be spent in vain.—Farmer's Cabinet.

THE GREAT PREPARATION.

"The sons of God are in the way of eternal glory, and under training for the heavenly state. Great preparations must be necessary here. Man in all his vileness is very unfit to enter into the holy temple above. Were some of the common people under invitation to visit the palace of an earthly prince, and to appear in the presence of the royal family, they would spare neither pains nor expense to train themselves, and be fit to appear in the court of kings. How, then, can creatures vile and filthy as we are, make our appearance before the King of kings on the throne of heaven! We must wash our robes and make them white in the blood of the Lamb. The wedding garment must be put on; should we appear before the Great Judge without it, he would order us to be taken away, to have our portion with hypocrites in the torments of hell. Know, sinners, that you are now in the way to meet your Judge on the throne, and while you live in sin, you are far enough from being ready to meet your God. He cannot but condemn you, for without holiness no man can see the Lord."

"All will confess that some preparation for the heavenly state is necessary. But men differ widely in their views on this material point. Most men think that very little preparation will do. To leave off a few gross vices, to reform the outward conduct, and to appear morally decent, is all they aim at, or think necessary. Some do not go as far as this. They think that a short prayer at the end of an ungodly life is quite sufficient. They give their whole hearts and lives to the world, and to Satan, and yet fully expect that God will receive their souls when they come to die, if they only cry in the dying hour "God be merciful to me." It frequently happens even that this short prayer, and this death-bed repentance, are wholly omitted. Some are hurried away in a moment, some are delirious, some are so hardened that they despair of mercy. All those who die in sin perish everlastingly. O sinners, awake, consider your latter end, and flee from the wrath to come; for who can dwell in everlasting burnings? And who would quietly lose the exceeding great and eternal weight of glory, reserved for the inheritance of the saints of light?—Rev. T. Jones of Creaton.

From the S S Treasury

"ONLY ONCE."

How often do children beg that their parents will let them do wrong. Their language is "let me go, or do something just once, and I will never ask again." They never stop to think that what they desire is sinful, and that their parents know better than themselves the consequence of wrong. This was true of a lad who removed from a pleasant country village with his friends, into one of our large cities, where there are many strong temptations to evil. His friends knew this, and wished to keep him away from vicious associates, and places of sinful amusement. He soon procured a very good place in a store, and his employer was very much pleased with his steady habits and fidelity. He had heard much said by his imprudent and thoughtless father about the theatre; and now as he walked the streets, read the handbills, and met with other boys who had much to say about this wicked place, he desired more than ever to go with them. His friends objected, and would not furnish him with money to pay for a ticket. At last he made a little money bag—hung it up in his room, and put into it every cent which was given to him.—A few weeks had passed away, and he had collected twenty-five cents,—a sum sufficient to pay for a ticket. Now he asked more earnestly than ever for permission to go, saying he wanted to go only once; he would not ask again. His friends reluctantly consented, thinking that once might satisfy him. He came home delighted with what he had seen, and his desire to go again was stronger than ever. He was now more unwilling to be denied than before. He had no money, but he was determined to go unbeknown to his friends. But he must have money, and to get it, he stole articles from the store, sold them to get the money, and in a short time an officer came to the boy's home and told his friends that he was in jail.

Can my young readers imagine the feelings of his brothers and sisters? They wept and blamed themselves that they had ever said that their brother might go "only once." If he had never gone, he might now have been in his store happy, and honored with a good name. He was such a good boy that his employer could not believe he had taken the things for a long time. But now he has lost his place. The man would not have him behind his counter. He has lost his good name. But what is more sad, he has committed sin against God. Oh, what would that boy give now, if he could be as he was before he begged to do wrong, before he went to that place of amusement, which leads to hell.

You see how dangerous it is to take one wrong step. When you have done one wrong thing, you will not stop without doing more. So it was with Adam and Eve, when they had once tasted the forbidden fruit. When your parents or teachers tell you what is sinful and dangerous, believe them; and never ask to do the wrong thing "just once." You never ought to do a wrong thing, but you should do a good thing or perform a good act as often as you can. Remember that [illegible] are always in the broad road which leads to eternal death.

THE BIBLE THE WORKER OF DOMESTIC COMFORT.—One of our country men residing in France, was not long since called upon by a lady who lived in the same town, but who was otherwise unknown to him. After an introduction, he was requested to furnish her with a copy of the Scriptures—'such as you have in England,' said she. 'Why,' said he, 'have not you a Bible?' 'No,' said she, 'we have not, we have an Abridgment of the History of the Bible, but that is not the Bible. I want the one which you Protestants have.' 'Why are you so anxious for it?' 'A friend of mine,' she replied, 'who was lately in England, has given me an account of the [illegible] happiness and tranquility which your country enjoys, and the comfort which is found in families; and I asked him to what he attributed it, and he [illegible] given the [illegible] his belief was, that it [illegible] of the Bible which [illegible] try, its being read in many households and in all the churches, and the possession of it by individuals and families, was [illegible] of that domestic happiness which is enjoyed in England above all other countries. And, sir,' she added, 'this is what I want; I want peace—I want domestic comfort, and therefore I come to you to [illegible] to supply me with the Bible.'—[illegible] Register.

[illegible]TORATES

Many things which we have read on this subject have served to amuse us, but we beg indulgence and further [illegible] if we express a definite opinion on the merits of the question. We have seen older and wiser men involved in sad dilemmas by too hasty an utterance of their opinions on this subject. They did not know what they themselves might come to, and felt somewhat perplexed, when they have found themselves saddled with a title which they had once pretended to hold in sovereign contempt; and yet it has been a matter of astonishment how soon they have been broken in, bearing the load of honors with all imaginable meekness, and patience. We could cite some curious cases. Some contemn all titles if they be conferred by colleges of a second grade; but they will think of it, if higher colleges should be disposed to remember them. Others refuse the title, because they believe in the purity of the clergy, and especially because so many beardless youths receive it as to render it a mark of no distinction. Rare humility! Still others decline the offer when proffered, because they had committed their opinions to print against the thing. [illegible] they had been so much in demand, [illegible] eral colleges were ready to dub them [illegible] they believed the whole thing unscriptural, and yet they had no objection to give their countenance to so unscriptural a matter, when it concerned others. We know others also who have very testily refused college honors, and yet, on their sober second thought, have quietly submitted, and would now regard the omission of the title to their name, as quite an indecorum. John Newton received a Doctorate from an American college; without blazoning the matter before the world, he put his diploma in the drawer, with the remark that he would never accept and wear the title until conferred upon him by some college in Africa, where he had been a miserable slave of sin. This was genuine humility, and who does not see that no title could have conferred dignity on such a man. We recommend his example, in the spirit of it to others. There is, in most cases, infinitely greater pride in refusing than in accepting the honor; as the former is made the occasion for newspaper prominence, and it is pleasant to hear every body say, "I see by the daily papers, that Mr. Blank has declined receiving the title of D. D." A quiet acceptance would not have brought to the gentleman one tithe of notoriety. To Doctors, we say, bear your honors meekly—perhaps you do not deserve them; and to others, we say, be not alarmed at a clerical title—it is a harmless thing—if you doubt it, try it.—Presbyterian.

CLEANLINESS.—Keeping the body clean is of great importance, since more than one-half what we eat and drink is evacuated by perspiration, and if the skin is not kept clean the pores are stopped, and perspiration consequently prevented, to the great injury of health. It is highly necessary to the health and cheerfulness of children; when it is neglected they grow pale, meagre, and squalid, are subjects to several loathsome and troublesome diseases. Washing the hands, face, mouth and feet, and occasionally the whole body, conduces to health and ease, and tends to prevent colds, rheumatism, cramps, the palsy, the tooth-ache, and many other maladies. Attention to cleanliness of body would also lead to cleanliness in regard to clothes, victuals, apartments, beds and furniture. A knowledge of the nature of the mephitic gasses, of the necessity of pure atmospheric air to health and vigor, and of the means by which infection is produced and communicated, would lead persons to see the propriety of frequently opening doors and windows to dissipate contaminated air, and to admit the refreshing breeze—of sweeping cobwebs from the corners and ceiling of the room, and of removing dust, straw, or filth of any kind which is offensive to the smell, and in which infection might be deposited. By such attention, fevers and other malignant disorders might be prevented, health and serenity promoted, and the whole dwelling and its inmates present an air of cheerfulness, and comfort, [illegible] seat of domestic felicity.—[illegible]

[illegible] which takes [illegible] affinity acts, is not [illegible] general result in [illegible] different bodies are [illegible] combination or [illegible] frequently we find that [illegible] properties of each body are totally [illegible] substances, from being [illegible] in their nature, become [illegible] harmless, and vice versa. [illegible] instance, that agreeable and useful substance, culinary salt, which is not only [illegible] wholesome and absolutely [illegible] to the well-being of man, is composed of [illegible] ingredients, either [illegible] when taken into the stomach proves fatal. [illegible] of these is a metal, and the [illegible] former is called sodium, [illegible] chlorine. When presented to each other the substance of their nature is [illegible] manifested by their immediate bursting out into flame, and instantly they are both deprived of their virulence. Can any thing be more striking than the change of properties in this case; and who could have supposed that culinary salt is composed of [illegible]? The medicine called Glauber's salt is another instance; it is composed of two caustic poisons of different kinds, one called oil of vitriol, and the other barilla or soda. There are also two substances known to chemists, which are disgustingly bitter liquids; one [illegible] nitrate of silver, and the other hyposulphate of soda: when mixed they form a compound of considerable sweetness. But the atmosphere we breathe is the most extraordinary of all instances: it must be surprising to those who are unacquainted with the fact, that atmospheric air, indispensable as it is to life, is composed of the same ingredients as that most violent and destructive liquid called aqua fortis, or nitric acid. This powerful acid being made to [illegible] sugar, the sweetest of all things, [illegible] intensely bitter to the [illegible] of all known substances, the most difficult to convert into vapor, [illegible] so hard that the conversion has [illegible] been effected effectually; it is also [illegible] substance; and diamond, which is nothing but crystallized charcoal, is one of the hardest bodies in nature. Sulphur [illegible] is also a hard substance, and [illegible] into vapor requires a [illegible] temperature. But when these two [illegible] and sulphur, are made to combine chemically, so as to form the [illegible] called bisulphuret of carbon, the properties are strangely changed. Instead of the compound being hard, it is a [illegible] and it is not known to freeze or solidify at any degree of cold that can be produced. Instead of the compound being difficult to vaporise, it is, of all liquids, one of the most evaporable. Charcoal is the blackest substance with which we are acquainted;—sulphur is of a most lively yellow hue; but the compound is as colorless as water. A new smell and taste are acquired, and, in a word, there is not one point of resemblance with the component. These facts are strikingly illustrative of the change of properties which follow on the exertion of chemical attraction between the ultimate particles of bodies.—Donovan's Chemistry.

CURIOUS WATCH.—We find mentioned made in the papers of a transparent watch. The account says:—A watch has been presented to the Academy of Sciences in Paris, constructed of very curious materials; the parts being principally formed of rock crystal. It was made by M. Robelier, and is small in size. The internal works are visible; the two-teethed wheels which carry the hands are rock crystal, the hands are rock crystal, and the other wheels are of metal, to prevent accidents from the breaking of the springs. All the screws are fixed in crystal, and all the axles turn on rubies; the escapement is of sapphire, the balance-wheel of rock crystal, and its springs of gold. The regularity of this watch as a time-keeper, is attributed by the maker to the feeble expansion of the rock crystal on the balance-wheel, &c. The execution of the whole shows to what a state of perfection the art of cutting precious stones has been carried in modern times.

POLITICS.

It has been our constant aim, as Editors of the Register, to avoid the least participation in party politics; but, though we have succeeded to our entire satisfaction, we have in a few instances been supposed to have deviated from our proprosed neutrality respecting them. The first instance of complaint, was respecting an article in which we insisted that it was improper to charge all the pecuniary distress of the country to the account of those who administer the government, and urged Christians to profit by these circumstances by withdrawing their affections and confidence from this world. We have considered it to be the duty of publishers as well as all good citizens, to refrain from speaking "evil of the rulers of the people," and, as government is a divine institution, so those who administer it, should receive the support and respect of the governed, so far as those offices are entitled to honor. This sentiment was thought by a very worthy friend, to favor an administration which he did not approve, and he therefore administered a reproof to us for having departed from a course which we had pledged ourselves to pursue. In this complaint we could see no justice, since our remarks had reference to government officers and not to partizans in a political sense. In one or two instances we have spoken in commendation of the industry and perseverance of the present Chief Magistrate of this nation as a scholar, by which he raised himself from obscurity to his present eminence in the world, with a view to encourage the young to imitate the example and to aim at such acquirements as would render them respectable and useful. This also caused a few friends to fear that we were taking sides with the national administration. Though in our opinion it is proper and even duty to commend what is laudable, wherever it may appear, yet we believe this can be done without affording any just ground for suspicion that any general policy is either approved or condemned.

On the other hand, complaints have been made in a few cases, that the Register sympathized with the opponents of the present national administration.—The only possible reason for such suspicion that we can conceive of, is the fact that the election returns from the different states have been published by us when they were received from authentic sources.—That the opponents of the national administration have succeeded, is not ascribable to our influence—but since it is so, we must either have said so, or said nothing. Had the results been otherwise we should have presented them with the same fidelity. If any of the patrons of the paper are of the opinion that it has taken any political stand, let them carefully re-peruse the file, and we think they will see good reason to give over that opinion. We have not intentionally meddled with this subject, neither shall we in future—but the Register will still be devoted to other and higher objects. We wish the friends of the paper to watch us closely, read every article, whether long or short, with care, and bear witness against us if we fail to redeem our pledges.

Revival at Cuyler.—We have been informed that a revival of religion is in progress in Cuyler, and principally in the Methodist society. About forty have been hopefully brought into favor with God. Among this number there are some who, it is said, were formerly much opposed to religion.

☞ To Correspondents.—"A Young Man," was not in season for this week. "Charles," is under consideration. Anonymous, declined. The notice of Mrs. Hamilton's death, was received a number of weeks since, and should have been inserted earlier, but was inadvertently omitted.

Thanksgiving.—It will be seen by referring to the article on our last page, that Divine Service will be held on the 17th inst., at the Presbyterian meeting-house in this village, commencing at 11 o'clock, A. M.

We are happy to inform the public that a Music Department is now connected with the Literary Institution in our village. Music should not be regarded merely as a polite accomplishment. Its proper aim is higher, nobler. It may be employed for the most devout purposes. It enkindles those lively and elevating emotions which have the happiest tendency on the moral feelings. It adds new charms to truth—for it disrobes it of its earthly habiliments. It gives new grace to virtue—for it presents it in its native simplicity and excellence. The teacher, Miss L. A. Rollo, comes well recommended. Young ladies wishing to take lessons can commence immediately.

We are under the necessity of leaving out several editorial articles this week to make room for other matter. Our paper will be published on the sixth day of the week in future.

NECESSITY OF KNOWLEDGE, AND MEANS OF ACQUIRING IT.

Rest and relaxation after exertion is a law of our nature that none may disregard with impunity. So delicate and so complicated are the springs of the body and the mind, that continual pressure deranges and destroys them, and to preserve them in their efficiency the weight of labor or of thought must be occasionally removed. To do this, to restore to the body its vigor, and to the mind its tension, idleness is not necessary, change only is requisite. In the proper arrangement of our employments, that disposition of our time which shall best subserve the great purposes of existence, much of our happiness and more of our usefulness is depending, and on this our capability of performing little or much during our lives is suspended.

Man cannot always labor in the field or in the work-shop, and it is equally true he cannot always keep his mind devoted to intense study; but when the body has become fatigued, it is not safe to infer that the mind is in the same condition, or since the first requires rest, the latter must have its activity suspended likewise. The labors of the field during the summer by the husbandman are usually succeeded by comparative ease in the winter, and this is doubtless necessary to restore the partially exhausted animal system to its wonted firmness and vigor: but the mind has shared comparatively little in the enervating process to which the body has been subjected, and now while the body is recruiting its wasted energies, it is in a proper state to add to the stores of Knowledge, and accumulate those materials for thought so essential to every one, but particularly so to a citizen of the United States; and the same remarks, with greater or less force, will apply to the mechanic, or to any one who belongs to the producing classes of our country, and is not content to have it said, he has only existed, not lived.

Next to the salvation of the immortal soul, is to be ranked the accumulation of Knowledge for the immortal mind; and the individual who is remiss or negligent in this point, is doing himself an irreparable injury. The hour not improved, in which some new truth might have been gained, some Knowledge convertible to the great purpose of human utility accumulated, or some valuable information imparted to others, may be said to be doubly lost; lost to ourselves, and lost to the world. Utility must be the grand point to which all labor and exertion tends, and even the rest of the body must be made subservient to the advancement of this great end.

Experience shows that to the man leading the only honorable life, a life of industry, the winter offers the best season for the acquisition of Knowledge, and one which should never be neglected. The long evenings, and in many cases the days which forbid employment without, offer an opportunity for improving the mind, he may in vain seek for to the same extent at any other season. By improving such hours snatched from stubborn toil, or the most laborious occupations, many men in our country have risen to eminence and fame, have qualified themselves for the most important stations of usefulness and responsibility. This course, more perhaps than any other, contributes to the formation of sound minds in sound bodies, and the ablest men of modern or ancient times, those who have left the deepest impress on the world, have not been those cradled in affluence and ease, but those who have been self-made men, accustomed in their youth to overcome obstacles, and rely on their own exertions for success. Such men are eminently practical ones; the Knowledge they acquire does not surfeit; it is like their food, digested daily and converted at once into substantial nutriment.

Fortunately for our country the means of acquiring Knowledge are most ample, and easy of access. In no part of the world is ignorance so clearly the fault of the individual as in this. The school-master is every where abroad, and in every neighborhood, the district school-house invites the poorest and humblest, as well as the richest and most influential, to obtain those rudiments of Knowledge that constitute the true germ of future greatness, and usefulness. Following the school comes the press, with its multitude of journals, political, literary, and religious, with matter adapted to the wants and the wishes of all, the grave and the gay, the smatterer in Knowledge, and the profoundly learned; matter to invite and encourage thought, and matter to unbend the studious brow, and give the mind relaxation and play. Although the newspapers of the country are not what they should be, and many of them exert a pernicious influence on the mind, still no one can doubt their power, or deny them much credit in extending useful Knowledge and enlarging the empire of mind over matter. No family can dispense with them; child or man, maid or wife, politician or philosopher, student or divine, the agriculturist and mechanic, the devotee of science, or the man learned in the school of Christ, all require and all have their papers to which they are accustomed to refer for information. The laborer reads his paper as a relaxation, and if well selected, few sources of general intelligence, or general Knowledge, are more valuable than the newspaper, or periodical journal. Cheap, new, and ever welcome, as the newspaper is, it furnishes to all classes in this country a source of Knowledge, powerful, as it is universal and valuable.

Books constitute another important means of acquiring Knowledge, and one in regard to which the citizens of this country are particularly favored. The most valuable books are here furnished at such prices, and in such quantities, that poverty scarce furnishes a bar to their possession. There may be, and doubtless is, many volumes issued, worthless and prejudicial; books that inflame the passions, present false views of men and things, corrupt the morals of the young, and for which both writer and publisher incur a fearful responsibility; yet such are not the great mass; such are not those a sound and well regulated mind will select; such are not the ones a judicious parent will commend for family reading, or from which he will expect the young to draw those lessons of wisdom so essential to their future respectability and happiness. And here it may be said with truth that one of the greatest advances in the diffusion of useful Knowledge yet made in any country, is to be found in the system adopted by New York and Massachusetts, of establishing Libraries of truly valuable books in every School district of these states. That the example so happily set, and thus far most successfully carried out, will be extensively imitated cannot be doubted, and libraries in every hamlet of our broad country will in a few years exist. As an almost perfect adaptation of means to the accomplishment of a great end, a reference may be made to Harpers' School District Library, and the question may well be asked, where in any other country, or in this country in any other way can so many volumes be procured at so cheap a rate, done in so beautiful a style, and embracing so many volumes of permanent value, and worthy of being read by every one and found in every Library, as in the series published by these individuals under the patronage and supervision of the Secretary of this State. The objection made against ponderous or costly works, does not lie against these, but they are such as may always be at hand, and always taken up with a reasonable belief that the hour devoted to them will not be lost.

There are many men and women who imagine, because they find it necessary to employ the greater part of their time in labor, that they are excused from the acquisition of Knowledge; that because they cannot employ days in reading, they are absolved from such an employment of their hours. Such it is presumed have never ascertained by an experiment how many good sized volumes may be read in a year by devoting to books one hour a day; and where is the individual that husbands his time properly that cannot have that, or even more for this purpose? The truth is, the inability is a moral not a physical one, want of inclination rather than want of opportunity. As a proof of the immense acquisitions that may be made by an individual in one of the most laborious occupations of life, we need only refer to Mr. Burritt of Worcester, better known as the learned blacksmith, who has made himself master of most known languages, and in classical, and bibliographical lore, has few equals in this or any other country. When the disposition to acquire Knowledge exists, the way will rarely be found wanting.

We would suggest a plan for family reading which has been practiced in some instances with the happiest effect. If books are well selected, if they are such as are calculated to interest and instruct all, and such may easily be found, if the family is trained to habits of order and propriety, the reading of a single volume may as well furnish instruction and amusement to a dozen as to one. While the family are gathered around the social, cheerful fireside, the abode of domestic happiness, let some one read aloud from a well chosen work for the learning of others. Perhaps there are few things better adapted to make good readers than such a course; and where any individual is permitted to suggest queries on what is read, or request explanation, as should always be the case, the interest rarely flags, and the author and subject stands a much better chance of being understood than when read in the usual manner.

The subject of the acquisition of Knowledge is a vast and important one; one of interest to all, and intimately connected with the perpetuity of our institutions, social, civil, and religious. The means are most abundantly provided through a kind Providence, for its attainment, and a fearful responsibility is resting on him who neglects or perverts the privilege. To know nature, to know man, to know God, constitutes the grand end and aim of human life, and that life is poorly spent in which progress is not made in these indispensable acquisitions.

Aunt Mary's second letter to Amanda:

My dear Niece:—The question "wherein consists the danger" of attendance on cotillon parties? I remember was not proposed by yourself, but by another; yet I think it proper to direct the reply to you, as I perceive that whatever is communicated to you on this subject, by any of our family circle, readily reaches all the gentlemen and ladies, far and near, who feel any interest in the matter. I shall mention but a few of the many dangers which are attendant on these parties, and perhaps others of your friends, uncles, aunts, or cousins may hereafter add to the catalogue:

1. The cotillon parties are adapted to impress upon the mind a false estimate of manners. "Be courteous, be kindly affectioned one toward another, in honor preferring one another; let each esteem other better than himself; let love be without dissimulation." This is the outline of the code of Christian manners, the most elevated and refined system of manners in the world. The dancing schools, balls, and cotillons, do not embrace this code. Perhaps I cannot better illustrate this truth than by giving you an extract from a letter which I yesterday received from your uncle Melville. He says:—"The next time you write to Amanda, please tell her from me, not to be decoyed to the cotillon parties by the idea of having her MANNERS improved. I admit that a sort of polish is received there, which assists a person to enter and leave a room with ease, &c., &c.,—several things of this kind; but all this may be acquired elsewhere, without imbibing that false estimate of manners, which the cotillon invariably gives, unless the mind be previously guarded by correct instruction. Tell Amanda that when I was a youth, I was induced to attend similar parties, because I was assured that they were excellent schools for the improvement of manners. But I soon found that I myself was setting at defiance one of the first rudiments of good manners by my attendance on the parties, for I had a pious mother who wept when I went. I well knew that decent manners required that I should 'HONOR my father and my mother.' But I saw others who were not under those maternal restraints which surrounded me, whose manners were not improved (as to any thing essential.) by the parties. When not in the presence of the ladies, they would use profane language, without a blush. This, I knew was not good manners; and I clearly saw that the restraints which were imposed while in the party—the smiles, bows, and compliments—were all a mere passing show, not arising from any deep-settled principle of doing right. I well knew that no rules concerning manners were worthy of my attention unless founded on such a principle. But those whom I saw most palpably deficient in this fundamental principle of manners, tho't themselves perfected in polite accomplishments, if they could give proof of proficiency in the mere tinsel display to which I have referred. So far as the influence of the parties must be reckoned, they met with nothing to correct this idea, but with much to foster it. I therefore saw that my good mother was much better qualified to teach me 'how to behave,' than any who met me at the cotillon." This, Amanda, your uncle Melville writes. What immense injury would he have received had he imbibed the false notions of manners which were current in the dancing parties!

2. These parties have a natural tendency to repel religious impressions. A mighty strong barrier against the renovating truth of the gospel, is found in every unrenewed heart; and this is rendered more potent still in those hearts where a love for dancing parties has found a lodgment. Hence, when a revival of religion has so far advanced as to include among its subjects the men of such parties, it is called a powerful work. To see the lovers of cotillon amusements sitting at the feet of Jesus, is to look upon special trophies of divine grace. This common conviction in the minds of the lovers of experimental piety, demonstrates that the Christian community are acquainted with the fact that dancing and its accompaniments fortify the heart against religious truth. This belief is not the result of prejudice; it arises from a knowledge of human nature, and is certified to be correct by individual experience, and careful and extensive observation. After having said this much, it may scarcely be necessary to add

3. If religious inquiries have already some hold upon the mind, there is danger that the amusements of the cotillon will expel them.

But the great danger of these parties, especially consists in this:

4. By attending them, the Holy Spirit may be so resisted, that he may take his everlasting departure. The Spirit presses the sinner to come to Christ. Every moment he refuses to comply, he resists the Spirit. If, when thus under the strivings of the Holy One, he turns his attention to vain amusements, he BOLDLY WAGES WAR WITH GOD HIMSELF. If he continues in this course, what can be expected but that GOD will leave him to fill up the measure of his iniquity? "He is joined to his idols, let him alone"—may be the dreadful sentence. He may flunat along amid the sounds of exhilarating music, combined with the captivating charms of the merry dance, DESPISING THE WAY OF SALVATION, till he wakes up from his reverie, to join his never-ending lamentation with the shrieks and doleful wailings of the lost! May God save you from such a doom, my dear Amanda.

From your affectionate

AUNT MARY.

Could I grave it with a pen of iron deeply upon every neglecting parent's heart—could I write it upon the walls of every parlor in letters of living fire—could I teach the playful lightning to chase it in form of letters along the black thunder-cloud, I would have it written in terms so palpable that none could shut it from their view—EDUCATE YOUR DAUGHTERS! At the present period of refinement, there is no subject calculated more strongly to elicit the regret of the Philanthropist than the neglect which is displayed in the tuition of the female sex; and when we consider the important station which woman occupies in society, how shall we account for this wanton carelessness? When we consider the influence of the mother in training the susceptibilities and directing the infant mind, how shall we account for the negligence which impairs the ability, and tends to disqualify the parent for the important and binding duties which devolve upon her! Yet unaccountable as it may appear, such is the lamentable fact that scarcely one female in a hundred is to be found possessed of that mental cultivation, and those habits of literary application, which will direct the infant mind in a proper channel, and instil into it an early ambition for the pursuits of science. Whence springs this apathy to a subject of such vital importance? It arises, in my opinion, from the manners of the age; and for the truth of my assertion, I appeal to the history of the past and the experience of the present.

The belle of the present day is born in the chamber of luxury, and commences her career by learning to chirp at the nurse's call of some soft name dug from the deepest mine of romance. As she advances in life, and begins to assume the fashion of woman's form, her native sprightliness, or cunning habits, or some other attraction about her little self draws forth the caresses and attraction of her parents, who before had consigned her to the sole direction of her nurse. Once the object of the mother's admiration, the little girl is trusted from her parent's sight. For a few months she is subject to the loathsome confines of a school; a few more months are spent in ornamental needle work; then comes the higher accomplishments of life, which swallow up in their importance every other study. Dancing and music then occupy all the time and attention of the rapidly-advancing Miss. What age shall we assign her after the achievement of so many great and important labors? We will call her twelve, and she is now dancing with all the grace of Venus, and singing with all the air and elevation of Signoria. The next summer she is hurried from Ballston to Saratoga, and after a tour of the Lakes and a visit to the Falls, finishes off with a finale at the Chalybeates. She then consumes the autumn in golden anticipations and endless plans for the next winter, which is to usher her into society femina facta, (Ætas 16) a woman finished to the very nails. Then she flirts and twists, and if she had the wit to do it coquettes away until seizes her little heart, and then she languishes and gets married. "O tempora! O mores!" This woman is to be the mother of Americans! Come, Sparta, from thy ancient grave, and shame us with the history of those who died at the pass of Themopylæ! But we need not go so far into the ages of antiquity to bring the blush upon the present generation. The last century in our own country presents a contrast with the manners of the present day which reflects litle credit upon the advancement of civilization and refinement. The march of female intellect has been a rapid retrograde. The steps which were taken have had a tendency to wrap rather than expand. The mind is absorbed in the vanity which is dealt out to it from the hand of folly and fashion, and is lost to all the endearing pleasure which the hall of Science could afford it.

> "The all-absorbing flame,
> Which kindled by another, grows the same,"

Did I profess the power to expose this matter more fully, and in all its naked banefulness, it should be to me a never-ending theme. Could I hope an answer to my invocation, I would call on some of those bright expectations which yet remain to tell us what the female mind can do to lend us their aid in a cause which must be equally dear and interesting to them.

MESSRS. EDITORS—In perusing the last Number of your valuable paper, I was somewhat surprised in noticing a series of letters on the subject of Cotillon Parties. I say I am surprised, and it is well that I might be. As a member of those Parties that are carried on in this place—and being so intimately connected with the families by familiar acquaintance, I considered myself under the necessity of making a reply.

The error that persons are often led into by a mere participation in trivial amusements is not, in my opinion, a sufficient basis for distrusting their moral reputation. When we look back upon the past, and compare it with the future actions of mankind, I cannot help but conclude that it is natural for every succeeding generation to follow in the paths of their forefathers.—Need I quote back to by-gone days, and call into mind the glorious achievements of our forefathers to sustain the young and rising generation in acts that are morally wrong? Need I ask Uncle William, Uncle Perry, and Aunt Mary to seriously reflect upon their past amusements as an excuse for the conduct of the young, who start at the note of the life-stirring violin? When we take into consideration the actions of young people, we consider that they are prompted onward in their jubilees by the same spirits as are manifested by those who are older and have become confirmed, that amusements like Dancing are not amusements for them.

In whatever situation a person is placed, and under whatever circumstance he is, it is a fact that amusements of some kind will be [illegible], which is the natural disposition of mankind.

When Uncle William speaks of the influence that [illegible] ladies would have upon these Parties, if they would only decline [illegible], I heartily concur with him, that it would be felt most seriously by those who engage themselves in amusements of this kind. But why does he call upon them now to take such an active part? Is there not other assemblies in which he would like to have them manifest their influence? Perhaps, of all associations, he considers these to be of the least importance; and, like Napoleon, in order to gain a victory, his motto was to commence at the weakest point. It is not so. He may call them Cotillon Parties, Dancing Parties, or whatever name he thinks would be most suitable—he cannot make any thing out of them but Parties; and his undertaking to do them away, would be like dissolving all unity in society. We must admit that the ladies have an influence over society matters that is not often accorded to their sex. And we, as young people, wishing to act a part for the enjoyment of ourselves, take the responsibility in all matters that we consider will be of the utmost importance to sustain that friendly intercourse that is necessary to extirpate the weeds of ignorance, and plant a gem of wisdom that ought to be nourished in the bosom of every Society.

[illegible], N. J. Nov. 30th 1840.

Dear Brethren:—Having business in Rhode Island and Connecticut, I took occasion to attend the late Convention in Boston, previously noticed in your paper, and having now returned home I send you the following remarks relative to the origin, character and proceedings of that Convention, which if you think proper, I wish you to lay before your readers, as it may be some of them will not otherwise see an account of it.

The Convention was originated, I suppose, among and by the friends of Abolition Nonresistance and general Reform, in and about Boston, though perhaps some who would not class themselves with those, took some part in bringing it about. It is well known that the Abolitionists of our country having met with strong and determined opposition from both civil and religious Associations, have been led to conclude that our churches have fallen from the purity and holiness required in the Scripture, and have become guilty of conniving at sin, in apologizing for the existence of, and attempting to justify the perpetuation of slavery. From such impressions it would seem they (Abolitionists) have been led to question the pretensions of the church and ministry, as having divine authority for what they do and teach in several particulars, and especially in maintaining that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath by divine appointment, and therefore to satisfy themselves more perfectly and correct the views of others, on that and kindred topics, they called the Convention to discuss them.

The character of the Convention became a matter of importance in my mind, from various rumors having been circulated about it, such as that it was the work of Infidels, ruthless professors of religion, &c. Accordingly, I was careful to be in attendance at the opening of the Convention, and to observe as closely as I was able, to see whether these rumors were correct or not; and from what I could learn, I am happy to say they were not well founded, notwithstanding, those who circulated them may have felt themselves justified in so doing. The worst feature in the Convention was, I thought, that a few persons in their religious zeal wished to lay aside, as useless and injurious, the usual forms of regulating conventional proceedings. But the President and members, generally, did themselves credit by patiently listening to what was urged on that point. And then, by a vote on the question, in which they proved themselves to be friends to order, they manifested, also, that they were in possession of what is so eminently useful in all investigations after truth, namely, sound minds—proceeded to elect officers—select a question for discussion, and settle the rules of debate. During the time of the discussion, there was something of that common annoyance of popular assemblies, the expression of approbation and disapprobation, by stamping, hissing, &c., though for the most part there was good order and attention. The number present has been variously estimated at from five hundred to a thousand. In point of respectability in appearance, I think the assembly would rank with religious congregations in general, either in the country or cities. Nor was there any disproportion in age or sex. Especially, I observed, a goodly number of venerable and gentlemanly appearing men, ranging from forty-five to sixty years of age, some of whom were active in the arrangements for, and in conducting the controversy. The subject which occupied the attention of the Convention, was substantially as follows: The first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath by divine appointment. I shall not attempt to give you the names or number of disputants, as probably you will find the most of them in some of your exchange papers, and if not, I hope the doings of the Convention will be published in pamphlet form, so that the deficiencies of this article will be altogether made up through that medium, if by no other. I will say, however, that the affirmative of the proposition was opened on the evening of the first day of our session, by the Rev. Dr. Osgood, of Springfield, Mass. The Dr. and his colleagues brought both learning and talents into requisition in defense of their views. 'Nor was there any lack of the same on the negative, excepting the views of our denomination, which formed a kind of middle position, were not so well represented, simply for the lack of ability, which we are confident is in possession of some of our more experienced brethren, who we were sorry not to see on the ground, yet, through the liberal spirit that characterised the Convention, we, who were present, had the pleasure of stating some of those reasons that lead us to observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath of the Lord, the Church, and the world by divine authority, while we object to the first day as having any just claims to such distinction. Probably when through the weakness of the arguments for the change of the Sabbath, the no-Sabbath sentiment shall have sufficiently extended itself, and christians learn the value of divine authority for their practices, and especially as a foundation for the Sabbath institution to rest upon, they will become willing to keep the day that God has appointed, rather than to be entirely without so great a blessing, enhancing the enjoyments of the present world, and tending to put us in the possession of all the riches of the world to come. Upon the whole, the time seems to be drawing near when the various questions about the Sabbath will be fully and fairly examined; and, indeed, the Boston Convention looked like the beginning of the work, and I hope we shall see it progress in more calls for the showing of truth upon the subject. On the morning of the third day of the Convention I left, though reluctantly, through the pressure of my engagements, feeling that much more might and ought to be done.

The Sabbath question continued under discussion during the day that I left, when the convention adjourned to meet in March, to examine a point relating to the ministry. If men are ever happy with God and each other, there will be a perfect unity of mind and will among them, which can never be till all know and love the truth; and that, whenever and by whatever means it may be supposed to be brought about, will only be effected, when they shall come to exercise their powers of investigation in all the simplicity and strength which their nature and circumstances will admit of.

PARTY POLITICS.

Start not, gentle reader, at the appearance of the above ominous caption in the columns of a religious journal. The writer does not design to enter into the merits or demerits of Party Politics. He has another object in view. But, he would barely remark, by the way, that in times of so great political excitement as we have witnessed for a few months past, it would not have been strange if an allusion had been made, even in a religious paper, in reference to the then approaching election, and the duty had been urged upon christians to exercise their judgment and discretion in the elective franchise. It would not, in my opinion, have been objectionable, if an Editor should have so far crossed the line of strict neutrality in politics at such a time as to have charged upon his piously-devoted readers the importance of casting their votes for their favorite candidates. I am aware that such has been the case, to some extent, with religious journalists during the pending political contest which has just closed. Even in the short range of my acquaintance with the religious press, for the six months past, I have noticed thrilling and heart-stiring appeals for Christians, even, to throw their influence into the Ballot-box, and leave the event with God.

But I had well nigh forgotten the object in view when I commenced this article.—I chanced to fall in company a few days since where party politics came up, and in the discussion a gentleman remarked (and perhaps he is a supporter of your paper) that "the Register was the most violent political paper which he had read for the year past," and that it "teemed with political articles which struck at the very foundation of our Government!" He insisted strongly that No. 17 contained articles of a deep political nature. I returned home somewhat surprised at the declarations of the gentleman and happening to have a file of the Register at my elbow, I perused them carefully and critically, expecting every moment to meet with the tremendous political article referred to. But my search has been vain; for, with all the sagacity of which I am master, not the remotest knowledge of such an article in No. 17, or in any other No. from the commencement of your paper until the present, can be obtained. The appellation of "Whig," "Democrat," or any other name applicable to any political party now in existence in this country does not occur in No. 17. The term "Conservatives" is once used in the No. referred to, and that is to be found in the Foreign intelligence relating to a conversation between M. Berryer and M. Thiers, as follows:—"On the one hand, a ministry taken from the extreme conservatives would be hissed down by the people and defeated in the Chamber, so as to render all government impossible—and on the other, a ministry formed only of the radical party would level the throne to the ground." Undoubtedly the gentleman had reference to the above occurrence of the term "conservatives," and on this he doubtless based his remarks in reference to the political character of the Register.

I trust that on a more mature reflection the gentleman will discover the great injustice of his remarks, and have the candor to acknowledge that he might have been deceived in the political bearings of the article in question.

I have been a constant reader of your valuable paper from its commencement, and I am happy to say, that it has kept aloof from the political turmoil which has agitated this country from the Alantic to the Rocky Mountains; nor is this more than I might have anticipated from the very fact that its proprietors were known to have different views in political subjects.

LATER FROM CHINA.

By the ship Globe, Canton papers to the 14th of July have been received. The news they detail is of but little importance. The blockade of Canton had taken place, but in a manner that indicated no decisive intention of war, as several vessels had been into that port and river, and the Chinese vessels laden with provision met with no obstruction.

A large part of the British fleet had proceeded up the Bocca Tigris northward, and were waiting the arrival of the remainder of the fleet. Rev. Dr. Peter Parker, American missionary was about to leave for this country;—a visit rendered necessary by the state of his private affairs. The operations of Dr. P. during the five years of his residence, have had the most important influence in giving to the Chinese favorable impressions of the design of the missionaries, and of American character. The hospital which he established has been the resort chiefly, of those afflicted with the diseases of the eye; and the number of the patients which have visited it, all of whom have been treated with kindness and care, and most of whom have received valuable assistance, without charge, is no less than 4575; besides those received at his own house, which would increase the number to 7000.

By the Tarquin, a correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, from St. Helena, states the arrival of the French ships, for the transportation of the remains of Napolean to France. The "Belle Poule," commanded by the French King's youngest son, is to bear them. The vessel is fitted up in a style of magnificence that corresponds to the glory of the service to which it is devoted; and bears several of the Generals and personal friends of the Emperor. The remains are to be taken on board, Oct. 25th, the very day on which Napoleon arrived at St. Helena, 25 years ago. The sarcophagus in which the coffin is to be placed, is of ebony. On board the ship, is a Chapel, fitted up for its reception, which is lined by black velvet, sprinkled all over with silver stars, festooned with silver cord and tassels. There is an altar, with a crucifix over it, at one end of the chapel. The sarcophagus is supported at the corners by four Eagles. On the top of it is to be placed an embroidered black velvet cushion, and on the cushion a Crown. Suspended to the ceiling immediately above the Crown a Ball, with a cross on the top of it, and under the ball the Emblem of Justice. In the Chapel are also four vessels to burn Incense; there is also a rich velvet Pall, which is said to have cost 25,000 francs, to cover the sarcophagus.

Later from Canton.—The ship Tarquin, Capt. Hunt, from Canton, July 6th, is yet a little later.

We learn from Capt. H. that there was a French frigate at St. Helena to take the remains of Napolean to France. The disinterment would take place on the 13th of October.

SUMMARY.

From Rio Janeiro.—By the brig Firm, Capt. Sands, arrived yesterday, we have advices to the 9th of October. The U. S. brig Enterprise, Capt, Gouldsbury, had just arrived from Bahia, with the prize brig Malek Adhel.

Advices from Buenos Ayres to the 2d, were generally considered favorable to the speedy raising of the blockade.

From Rio Grande the accounts were more encouraging, and the Government had decided on sending more troops.

An Old Indian Gone.—One of the Cumanche Indians in Texas, recently died at the advanced age of 118 years. On the week previous to his death, he was out on a hunting expedition with some of his tribe, and caught two wild horses with a noose.

Melancholy Shipwreck.—The schooner Butterfly, McKinstry from New-York, for Curacoa, was fallen in with 11th inst. lat 35 lon. 73, a wreck, and John Bromles, seaman, of Philadelphia, the only survivor, taken off. The others had either perished on the wreck, or been washed off.

Medical Students.—We learn from the Louisville Journal that the number of students at the Medical Institute in that city, is larger than at the same period last season, and there is every prospect that the class this winter will exceed two hundred. —N. Y. Express.

The Texian annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church is to be held at Rutersville, commencing on the 25th of December. Bishop Waugh is on his way to Texas to preside at the Conference. It will be the first conference held in that country.

The First Snow Storm.—There was quite a fall of snow in the City last night, and if it lasts, enough for sleighing.—N. Y. Express of Dec. 5.

The Rotunda of the Capitol, at Washington, has been recently ornamented by a new picture by Chapman. The subject is the Baptism of Pocahontas.

TWO MORE STEAMBOATS LOST.

We are sorry to announce the loss of two more steamers on the Mississippi, viz: the Flying Dutchman and the Elba.

The Flying Dutchman was on her trip from New Orleans to this city. She struck a snag at Deadman's Bar, about 35 miles below Natchez, at about 4 P. M., on the 17th ult.; her hatches were immediately removed, and three feet of water being found in her hold, she was immediately run ashore. She had about 40 tons of freight for Evansville, consisting of tin, nails, &c: 183 hhds. of sugar for Louisville, and 279 bags of coffee, 30 casks of liquors, 100 kegs of nails, and 50 boxes of tobacco, for E. Lawrence & Co. of this city. She was built at Cincinnati last May, at an expense of $18,000, and was principally owned by Capt. Phillips and Capt. Akerman. There was an insurance of $9,000 on her in this city.

The Elba sunk at Canadian Beach, on the Mississippi, about 150 miles below the mouth of the Ohio, from some accident that occurred while landing freight. She was on her trip from New Orleans to St. Louis, with only a moderate cargo. The Elba was built at Pittsburgh about a year since, at an expense of $22,000, and was owned in St. Louis. It is thought both boats are irrevocably lost. The Elba is wholly under water.

The Great Western Steam Ship Co. are building at Bristol, Eng., an immense iron steamer to run to N. Y., made of iron 7-8 of an inch thick, tightly joined with rivets, and with ribs and keel of iron, and divided into small compartments, so that if a hole be made, it will not fill the whole ship.

Positions of the British Navy.—Though there is now every reason to hope and believe that the peace of the world will not be interrupted, yet it may be interesting, to our readers to know how the British ships at present in commission are stationed, in order that they may be able to judge how far they would be available both for warlike purposes and for the defence of commerce, if a war should take place.

In the Mediterranean, where the great mass of the British forces is collected, there are 14 ships of the line, about to be increased to 18; 13 frigates or other sailing vessels, and 12 steamers; making a total of 36 British ships of one kind or another; about to be raised by reinforcements to 43. The number of guns of this force is about 1400, and this will shortly be increased to 1800. In the Chinese seas there are 3 ships of the line, 18 frigates and smaller sailing vessels, and two or three steamers, numbering in all over 620 guns. On the South American and Brazilian stations there are 16 frigates and small vessels, carrying from 16 to 50 guns each; and on the North American and West India stations, 15 frigates and steamers, carrying from 16 to 72. —New Yorker.

It is stated that the charitable donations of Joseph John Gurney, the distinguished Quaker preacher, during his recent visit to the United States, amounted to no less than $20,000.

Rev. Alexander Campbell, the founder of the sect of Campbellites, has been elected president of the Bethany College, a new institution to be commenced at Bethany, Va.

Texas.—The Austin Sentinel contains the annual message of President Lamar. According to the Message, some little progress has been made towards an adjustment of differences with the mother country, though the tardy policy of the Mexican Government does not appear to satisfy the expectations of the Texians. The Texian agent had been received and accredited at Mexico, and negotiations so far entered upon as to permit him to submit the propositions offered by his Government, as the basis of a treaty, which propositions were held under advisement at the latest advices. An intimation has also been given of a willingness on the part of the Mexicans to suspend hostilities for the present, by entering into an armistice.—N. Y. Express.

From Campeachy.—By the Columbian schooner Anna, Capt. Pressas, arrived yesterday, we have late accounts from Yucatan and Tobasco. One of the Texian corvettes, the Austin, and two of the Federal armed schooners, had returned from Tobasco, and were in the port of Campeachy when the Anna sailed. They reported that Tobasco was closely invested—that more than half of the town was occupied by the besiegers, and that the Central garrison would in all probability not be able to hold out long. The Central garrison, in the several fortifications, amounts to a strong force of ten to fifteen thousand men—but the besiegers are numerically stronger, and were strong in the belief that they would soon starve into submission, or drive out, the Bustamentinos.

The state of Yucatan was peaceful and prosperous. The Congress was in session; and propositions were under discussion for a free trade with all the world, and also for a full alliance with the Texian Republic.—N. O. Bulletin.

Havanna.—By the schooner Water Witch, we have Havanna papers to the 13th, one day later. They contain no political or commercial news. It is announced that improvements which have been going on in the old Grand Alameda of the city, are at length completed; and that a beautiful statute of Her Majesty the Queen ornaments the same—in the which, all classes rejoice.—N. O. Bulletin.

Census of the Northern District of New York.—By politeness of Hon. N. Garrow, U. S. Marshal for Northern District of New York, we are enabled to place before our readers the following statement of the population of the several Counties comprising such district:

There are in Cayuga two persons over 100 years of age.—Auburn Journal.

A "Bogus Factory" broken up.—On Saturday evening 21st ult., a gang of counterfeiters were broken up at St. Louis, Missouri, who had been operating extensively in the way of manufacturing the harder currency. The Police officers took the concern by surprise, arresting four characters, named Wm. Myers, John Richards, Wm McMillan and Samuel Griffith—and found all implements, ingredients, &c. necessary for the trade, scattered about in admirable disorder, together with a quantity of coin ready for circulation. The coin consisted of 68 pieces, on one side of which was stamped 'Carolina Gold—128g.—22 carats,' and on the other. "C. Betchler—A. Rutherf—5 dollars," and a few counterfeit half dollar pieces, and one Mexican dollar.—Nearly all the "gold" coin was found in a trunk; a few pieces of gold and the silver coin, with a couple of counterfeit $5 notes, on the Tanners' bank, N. Y. and the Commercial Bank of Tolland, Conn. were found on the person of Myers. A tolerable lot of raw material was found on hand, and it was presumed that several were constantly employed in coining. The house was occupied by Myers, whose ostensible business has been that of a gunsmith, or locksmith. There are some forty more of the same gang who are located in the neighboring counties. Among the papers seized by the Police were found receipts for mixing metals—certificates of membership to several churches, and even a license for Samuel Griffith, one of those arrested, to preach, as a methodist preacher, besides numerous other papers, letters, &c.—N. Y. Express.

From Chicago.—The Madison, Capt. McFadgen, returned from the upper lakes this morning with 1,500 bbls. of flour and beef, and a considerable number of passengers Capt. McF. left on the 18th, and experienced a heavy gale on the 21st which was followed the two succeding days, by unusually rough weather. By him we are pleased to hear that the fears felt for the Ben Franklin, are premature. She with the schooner Constitution having loaded at Chicago and left for this port about the same time as the Madison.

The brig Erie had gone to St. Joseph for a cargo and the Indiana to Michigan City for a similar purpose. Both would likely have a tedious time of it, as the gale must have overtaken them at that place. The Queen Charlotte was unloading, and would soon leave on her return trip. The schooner Amazon having on board a part of the goods left at Detroit by the Missouri some time since, was passed at Thunder Bay Island on her way to Chicago.

The Madison is the last boat we shall have from the upper lakes this season.—She leaves forthwith for her winter quarters at Erie, where the other six boats of Mr. Reed, are moored. The Chesapeake did not leave last evening in consequence of the gale, but is now "wooding up" for a start. She goes as far as Detroit and returns to Cleveland for the winter.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

The Boundary.—The St. John, N. B. Courier has the following paragraph on the movement of the British Commissioners of survey:

We learn that the Boundary Commissioners have finished their labors for the present season, having completed the survey of the due North line from the river St. John to the Beaver stream on the Metis. From thence, the Commissioners proceeded up the St. Lawrence to River Ouelle, with the intention of proceeding up that river and examining the highlands at its sources. They started the last week in October for that purpose, but heavy and continued snow [illegible] and they were [illegible] operations. Snow fell on the [illegible] depth of eight inches, but on the [illegible] the hills it was much deeper. From River Ouelle, the Commissioners proceeded to Quebec: from thence Lieut. Broughton, R. E., one of the Commissioners, proceeded to New York on his way to England. Mr. Featherstonhaugh, the younger, remaining at Quebec for the present, making up the returns and completing the plans. It is said to be his intention during the winter to examine the highlands about the heads of the Chaudiere and the Connecticut, with a view to settling the best mode of commencing a survey of them next year.

In the same paper we find the following respecting the carriage of the mails during the winter season between Halifax and Quebec:

We have a rumor here, however, respecting the steamer Unicorn's future destination which is likely to be correct; namely, that she will be employed the present winter in conveying a mail daily, between Digby and Annapolis and Saint John. The future route of the English mails between Halifax and Canada being through this city, by way of the Nerepis road to Fredericton, and then by the Temiscouata road, (on which a large party have lately been at work;) we think there is every probability that the rumor is correct.

Oneida Lake and River Improvement.—The Oswego County Herald notices the favorable progress this work is making under the auspices of the State. It is expected it will be completed during the coming season. "It opens," says the Herald, "to a new and wild extended region the benefits of steamboat navigation through the Oneida and Onondaga lakes, as low down as the village of Phenix, situate on the Oswego river and canal. By the enlargement or reconstruction of two locks with a lift of six feet each on the Oswego Canal, the steamboat navigation may be brought down to the village of Fulton, ten miles distant from this port. Thereby we can connect by ten miles of railroad from this village to Fulton, and steamboat navigation from thence through the Onondaga lake, with the Syracuse and Auburn railroad within three miles of the village of Syracuse.

To enable us to open this communication with the extended region of country bordering on the Oneida and Onondaga lakes and their outlets, and connect with the Syracuse raiload, the next legislature must authorise the construction on the Oswego canal of two lift locks between the villages of Fulton and Phenix"

Fires.—This morning, between three and four o'clock, a fire broke out in the three story brick house No. 371 Pearl street, which did considerable injury to the building and its contents. The lower part was occupied as stores by A. R. Thompson, watchmaker and W. B. Folger, engraver and printer. The upper stories were occupied by Mrs. Smith as a boarding house.

Mr. Thompson and Mrs. Smith were insured—Mr. Folger was not. The building is owned by Samuel Brown, who is insured sufficiently to cover his loss. The fire was first discovered in the roof, near the chimney, from some defect in which it is supposed to have originated. The Hall bell, we understand, did not strike the alarm for nearly an hour after the fire broke out.

After our paper went to press yesterday, the side wall of the store in Front street which was burned that morning, fell over into the house at the opposite side of Moore street, doing considerable damage to the premises and to the furniture therein.

NOTICES.

DIED,

At Seneca Falls, N. Y., on Sunday evening, Nov. 29th, after a protracted illness, Mrs. ADA PAYNE, wife of Mr. Joseph C. Payne, Æt. 39 years.

The latter part of the life, and the death of the above, exhibits a triumph of the Christian faith over death and the grave, which it is the lot of but few to experience. In the midst of a life of but half the allotted length, surrounded with endearments which too often captivate the heart and cause it to shudder at the thought of dying, she cheerfully surrendered them all, and considered it far better to be with Jesus. Her sickness was borne without a sigh or a murmur. She made arrangements for her funeral, and the disposition of her property, spoke with composure of the bereavement which awaited her family, selected her place of burial—and then, in the full possession of her mental faculties, calmly awaited the summons for her departure. She expired without a struggle or a groan, and sweetly fell asleep on the breast of her Redeemer.

"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." J. GAGE.

In Alfred, Sept. 1st, after a short illness, TACY, wife of Freeborn Hamilton, aged 50 years. She died—as she had lived—an example of confiding faith. Her funeral was attended by a numerous circle, who were addressed from words which had been a source of much consolation to the deceased. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your FAITH."

In Wirt, Nov. 24th, ELIZABETH, daughter of John Truman, aged 3 years, and 6 months.

In Wirt, Nov. 29th, WILLIAM, son of John Truman, aged 2 years, 1 month, and 25 days.

MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we [illegible] from the aborigines of our country, the [illegible] from which the Mother's Relief is [illegible] that time, we have contented ourselves [illegible] it as its own advertiser; and we would [illegible] adhere to the resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so [illegible] and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now sold at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to enquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an untold amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given way to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their [illegible] must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

POETRY.

[The Rev. John H. Pierpont has recently collected his works into a volume entitled "Airs of Palestine and other Poems," which has been published in Boston. Some of them, (says the N. Y. Eve. Post,) particularly the lyrical pieces, are very grand and striking. Take the following as an example.]

THE EXILE AT REST.

His falchion flashed along the Nile;
His hosts he led through Alpine snows;
O'er Moscow's towers, that shook the while,
His eagle flag unrolled—and froze.

Here sleeps he now alone; not one
Of all the kings whose crowns he gave,
Nor sire, nor brother, wife, nor son,
Hath ever seen or sought his grave.

Here sleeps he now alone; the star
That led him on from crown to crown,
Hath sunk; the nations from afar
Gazed, as it faded and went down.

He sleeps alone; the mountain cloud
That night hangs round him, and the breath
Of morning scatters, is the shroud
That wraps his martial form in death.

High is his couch; the ocean flood,
Far, far below, by storms is curled,
As round him heaved, while high he stood,
A stormy and inconstant world.

Hark! comes there from the Pyramids,
Or from Siberia's wastes of snow,
And Europe's fields, a voice that bids
The world he awed to mourn him! No!—

The only, the perpetual dirge,
That's heard here, is the sea-bird's cry,
The mournful murmur of the surge,
The cloud's deep voice, the wind's low sigh.

OUR COUNTRY.

"Breathes there a man of soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
'This is my own, my native land!'"

Every man of ingenious mind loves the country of his birth. Men may pride themselves on their being "citizens of the world," and affect an enlargement of soul that knows no preference for the land of their nativity; they probably misrepresent the better feelings of their own hearts. Or, if they indeed feel no peculiar love for the country whose soil has cherished and whose laws have protected them, and for the people whose blood they share and whose intelligence informs and elevates them, it is surely no just ground for boasting. Indeed, such an indifference to the relationships of our own country and kindred, would seem to call in question the moral health of him who professes it. Our relations, if not the source, are at least the measure of our obligations. The reasons which bind us to love men at all, increase in urgency as the subjects are nearer us in position more intimately related to us, and more within the reach of our kind offices.

Why is not patriotism generally numbered among the christian virtues? We applaud the love of country exhibited by men of the world, by the soldier and statesman; why not require it also as an element in the character of a saint? Is it incompatible with his dignity as a citizen of a heavenly kingdom, that he recognize his relations in this world and fulfil the claims and duties that arise out of them? The hero who jeopards his life for the hearths and altars of his native land, and the civilian who sinks his own in his country's aggrandizement, are characters to whom we accord the honors of a moral sublimity. And yet, through a strange perverseness, it is by some esteemed almost a virtue, to feel the least interested in the people with whom their relation is the most direct, and to whom it is practicable to do the most good!

The Christian, of all men, has most reason to be a patriot; for he has the truest apprehension of his country's dangers, and knows best what will avail for her salvation. He is taught, from on high, the origin and extent of her maladies, and knows that the truth of the God, that liveth and abideth for ever, is the only panacea. The body whose joints are dislocated, and whose blood is boiling with fever, he knows cannot be soothed into healthful repose by a mere change of position. When he looks upon the political convulsions of the land, and hears the loud promise of improvement, he knows that the evil lies deeper than the multitude imagine, and that a more radical cure is needed than can be effected by mere political reforms.

And yet, notwithstanding this conviction of the christian community, how strange that there should be so general an apathy on the subject of bringing the Gospel to bear upon the heart and conscience of this nation! When we say apathy, we do not intimate that efforts to propogate religion in this land are not, to some extent, appreciated and aided. But viewed in connexion with the magnitude of the subject, all that is done is but as the sport of childhood compared with the earnest and unremitting toil of men. The Savior has declared, that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light," and our countrymen illustrate this divine assertion. We see the very soul of the nation stirred within it, on the great questions of government now pending.—There may be, indeed, some demagogues, seeking only selfish ends; but the great mass of the people are sincere in the conviction, that the political salvation of the country depends on the success of the measures and the men, whose advocacy they respectively espouse. And they act in character; their efforts are in proportion to their estimate of the interest at stake. They spare no expense; myriads of publications are circulated; committees are appointed; meetings and conventions are held, at which the honorable and the gifted lay themselves out in all the power of argument and the arts of appeal. Men of business forsake their counting-rooms, and statesmen desert the halls of legislation, to arouse and direct the popular feeling. And if we grant that social disorders can be reached by mere political remedies, all this is perfectly consistent and proper. But while every Christian knows that the Gospel alone is the conservative principle of communities, where do we see "the children of light" putting forth such strength and talent, and encountering such pecuniary cost, to bring the whole land under its power? On the contrary, how are our organizations already existing for the spread of religion, crippled in their efforts and stinted in their growth, because they are fed with such a sparing hand. Instead of plans enlarged to correspond with the widening fields and louder calls of Providence, our Home institutions are compelled to study how they may hold the ground already gained; and that with the fact before them, that the agencies of evil are all the while at work with ceaseless and increasing activity.

Does any one inquire, what we would have the christian public do in this matter? We reply, we would have them awake to the magnitude of their danger and duty, and then do all that their quickened conscience, and intellect and enterprise shall suggest. What might be done, were the community in general, alive to a sense of the mighty moral processes that are now going on, forming the character of these millions and their successors! We would have every man of influence, every thinking man, look at the neglected spots in his own vicinity; then extend his observation to remoter districts, to the new and destitute parts of the country: and in view of all the work spread out before them, we would have the entire church arise to the serious attempt of subjecting this whole land to the sway of the Gospel. We would have them, at once, and as the least that can be done, sustain the ministry somewhere above the point of suffering for want of the necessaries of life, and relieve our infant colleges and seminaries from embarrassment and threatened destruction. We would have the missionary treasury so replenished, that multitudes of preachers now held back from the West by the fear that the wants of their families cannot be supplied, might be sent at once into the ripening harvest field. Meanwhile the church should prosecute with renewed energy, all practicable measures to insure a future supply of labors for her increasing wants. We would have the church know the time of her visitation, and the things which belong to her peace, and the more than golden value of the present moment, to gain this land for Christ! We would have her contemplate the alternative to which she must submit if this victory be not achieved—look upon the portentious clouds that gather upon her western horizon, charged with the combined elements of Atheism, licentiousness, Popery, fanaticism, recklessness of law and the lust of power and gain—a storm that threatens one day to burst in desolation, even upon the East. Much has been done by the church within ten years past to save our country; but has not Satan done more and worked faster to destroy it? Has not the increase of population outstripped that of the means of moral culture? And yet, we have a most animating conviction that there is no country on the globe where the improvement of society is a more hopeful work than in ours. Here are the subjects of effort—men free to think, and to act as they think—men on the right level, neither above nor below the natural line of pious endeavor; here too are the elements of character—the leaven of Puritanism, the spiritual views of truth; here are the means—the christian literature, the physical and intellectual resources, the untrammeled churches and favoring laws. And here too, we trust, full proof will be made of these great facilities, and our land become "Immanuel's land, a mountain of holiness, and a habitation of righteousness!"

YANKEE TRICK.—During the revolutionary war two brothers, from one of the eastern ports, were commanders of privateers; they cruised together, and were eminently successful, doing great damage to the enemy and making money for themselves. One evening being in the latitude of the shoals of Nantucket, but many miles to the eastward of them, they espied a large vessel, having the appearance of a merchantman, and made towards her; but to their astonishment found her to be a frigate in disguise. A very high breeze prevailing, they hauled off in different directions. One only could be pursued, and the frigate gained rapidly upon him. Finding he could not run away, the commanding officer had recourse to stratagem. On a sudden he hauled down every sail, and all hands were employed in setting poles, as if shoving his vessel off a bank! The people on board the frigate amazed at the supposed danger they had run, and to save themselves from being grounded, immediately clawed off and left the more knowing Yankee "to make himself scarce," as soon as night rendered it prudent for him to hoist sail in a sea two hundred fathoms deep.

ROWLAND HILL AND SPIRITUALIZING.—The celebrated Rowland Hill could not bear the habit of spiritualizing every text of scripture, as was the custom with certian preachers in his day. On one occasion, when a flippant minister undertook to spiritualize the history of Esther as follows; —By Ahasuerus is meant God the Father; by Mordecai is meant God the Son; by Esther is meant the church; and by Haman is meant the devil;" he replied, "As to myself, I rather doubt the justice of this interpretation; for, if we abide by it, that the devil was hung, upwards of 2300 years ago, (though he certainly deserved it,) it is impossible to suppose that such a dreadful deal of mischief could have been done by a dead devil ever since."

BUSINESS.—Engage yourself in no more business than what you find yourself able to go through with; the want of this caution has made the life of many a man uneasy and unhappy, and involved his family and friends in numberless troubles and perplexities. If very much business unaviodably comes at once upon you, be not discouraged, for that will make you negligent, but consider how to put it in the best order that one thing may be done after another, or without hindering another. Be always a good manager of your time, and lay hold of each opportunity that offers for the doing of what is necessary to be sometimes defeated in a good purpose; but it is your duty to attempt it whenever you find a reasonable probability of success.

THE BENGALI GIRL.

[The Indian tribes on the Eastern shores of Hindostan are called Bengalis, or the Western Malabars.]

"O sweet grows the lime and the orange,
And the apple of the pine;
But a' the charms o' the Indies
Can never equal thine." Burns.

So pure thy olive-tinted brow thy soft soul sparkles through,
Like young moon through the virgin palm bedecked with silver dew,
The bird might flutter through the gauze that robes thy bosom fair,
Floating like golden vapor light upon the evening air;
The palm fresh bathed in summer shower, is not more pure than thou;
Thy cool bath is the forest well 'neath the Natchouli bough;
The odor of the sandal-wood, which yields its rare perfume
To the first wind that warbles by, breathes through those lips of bloom;

Oh! who hath seen thy profile fine, thy long-veiled raven eye,
Those glossy locks as richly dark as swallow sporting by,
Which shaken out might fold us both as in a silken net,
Thy spreading smile, thy stolen look—and could thy charms forget!
The yellow Plantain's melting gold, the Cocoa's mellow cream,
The Manguesteen, the fairest fruit that drinks the dewey beam,
Or handful of the snowy rice, might be thy daily food,
Prepared for thee by Nature's hand deep in the Banian wood.

Upon thy mat of Vaquois leaves thou sittest all day long,
Enriching every passing breeze with passion-kindling song;
But why that tear-illumined smile, O stately orient flower?
Dream'st thou of childhood's golden hours spent in thine Indian bower!
These woods are not so richly grand as those that rise afar,
Where Ganges pours its sacred wave beneath the morning star,
Where many a rich pagoda shines, and many a minaret;
But drink of love!—like Deeva's fount, 't will teach thee to forget.

Wert thou the Gloriosa bright that blooms amid the wild,
And I the blue-winged butterfly, the zephyr's wayward child,
Into thy silk-soft folds I'd creep, and there, with burning lip,
Inebr'ating each throbbing sense, thy honeyed dews I'd sip.
Oh, come!—amid yon savage crags we'll seek some peaceful rest,
Where the vine festoons its purple gems upon the warm rock's breast.
For thee a little cot I'll rear where gentlest waters meet,
Fruits, flowers of glorious hues all spring beneath thy feet!

Oh! come afar 'mid whispering boughs and be my green-wood bride,
Far from the cold world's prejudice and its disdainful pride;
There, there our days shall glide in love, till death our souls shall free,
To sport with birds that follow Spring o'er the bright, sparkling sea.
—She listened, seated on her mat—half closed her eyes in pleasure,
Dreaming such joy while throbbed her heart to love's tumultuous measure;
But, stretching wide her canvas sails before the sweeping wind,
Our bold bark left the isle next morn, and Love's warm dreams behind. W. F.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF OBEDIENCE.

Next to the acknowledgment of God's existence, is the duty of a cordial and unrepining submission to his will.

If it would be our duty to give ready obedience to the arrangements which our earthly sovereign makes, for the security and general happiness of his little state, in some season of peril, though it involve the sacrifice of many of our personal comforts —to quit, perhaps, our peaceful homes, and expose ourselves to the inconveniences and dangers of a protracted warfare; or to send to the same perilous conflict, those whose life of rising virtues is the only earthly thing to which we have been accustomed to look for the happiness of our declining years; if we should feel it guilt and disgrace to withhold the offering, when the happiness of a single State is the object, and when he who requires it is a fallible being like ourselves; how much greater guilt and moral disgrace must it be to hesitate in making those sacrifices, or to repine when they are made, which are demanded by the wisdom which is incapable of error, for the purposes which our own hearts have declared must be proposes of benevolence. Shall the warrior rejoice in dying in battle for his country, or even for his prince, and shall we feel no joy in finishing a life that has been accordant with the divine will, in whatever manner the same divine will may require it of us? "Shall others say, O beloved city of Cecrops," exclaims Marcus Aurelius, "and shall I not rather say, O beloved city of our God!"

These views of the Divinity—the habitual love of his perfections, and ready acquiescence in the dispensations of his holy will, are no more pleasing to God, than productive of purest delight to him who entertains them. They distinguish the Christian from the rest of mankind, in serenity of happiness, as much as in the purity of heart from which that delightful serenity is derived.

"He sees with other eyes than theirs:—where they Behold a sun, he views a Deity!
What makes them only smile, makes him adore.
Titles and honors, if they prove his fate,
He lays aside, to find his dignity:
Himself too much he prizes to be proud;
And nothing thinks so great in man, as man.
Too dear he holds his interest, to neglect
Another's welfare, or his right invade.

Their interest, like a lion, lives on prey;
They kindle at the shadow of a wrong:
Wrong he sustains with temper, looks on heaven,
Nor stoops to think his injurer his foe.
Nought but what wounds his virtue, wounds his peace;
His joys create, their murder future bliss:
To triumph in existence his alone;
And his alone triumphantly to think
His true existence is not yet begun!"

The true existence of man is, indeed, scarcely begun on earth. There is an immortality awaiting him; and all which is most worthy of being prized in the short period of his mortal life, is the relation which it may have to those endless ages that are to follow it.

THE FOUR BOYS.

It is twenty short summers ago this day, that four happy boys were seated upon a bueatiful hill in New-England. The services of the Sabbath were ended, and they had gathered there to gaze upon the setting sun. They looked with pleasure at the golden clouds which lingered in the west, but little did they think those clouds were emblems of themselves. I remember with what fond anticipations each one of them looked into the future. Before their feeble visions, everything was bright and full of promise. One, a dark-haired, noble boy, said he would "be a sailor." He left his home to roam upon the sea; but the voice of the tempest does not disturb him now, for his body is beneath the wave. Another said he wished "to be an opulent merchant." He also left his home and friends, and became a man of wealth, in a distant clime, among strangers; but in the prime of manhood he was called to die, and the cypress now sighs above his grave. Another said, he "longed for the applause of men." Ambition urged him onward, and the world did for a time, listen to the magic of his name; but alas! he too is among the forgotten dead. These three, the dearest friends of my boyhood, have gone to the world of spirts, and the fourth, the most unworthy one of all, is still in the land of the living. Strange and mysterious indeed are the workings of Providence! In thinking upon a great city, I have often wondered at the carelessness with which its inhabitants look upon a passing funeral. They are so much occupied with temporal pursuits, so anxious to become great, and rich, and powerful, that they seem to be ignorant that they all must die. It is strange indeed that men should be so heedless of that hour, when the soul leaves the body and wings its flight to Eternity.—Mentor and Fire-side Review.

CHILDREN, YOUR TEACHERS LOVE YOU. —'The one I love is sick,' were the words of a sabbath school teacher. And who do you think was sick? His mother? No. His brother? No. But it was his beloved scholar.

Dear children, repay your teachers love by obeying them, and they will have the satisfaction of knowing that they do not labor in vain.

THE PRAYING SCHOLAR.—A sabbath school scholar, aged about seven years, was known for some time after getting up in the morning, to go into a garret at the top of the house. His mother (who was a widow) called him one day to come down to breakfast; her son not answering, she went softly up stairs, and when she got near the door of the garret, she heard her child fervently praying that God would pardon his sins, bless the sabbath school, &c. When he came down, his mother asked him whether he had a book; he burst into tears, and said—'No mother, but I go up and pray every morning.

WAY TO HEAVEN.—A superintendent, in addressing his Sabbath School, said, 'Were I to inquire of you the way to the next town, you would no doubt be able to tell me. But should I inquire of you the way to Heaven, what answer would you give me?' He paused; when a little girl, having climbed upon the bench, said, 'Jesus Christ, sir, is the way.

THE MISSONARY LANGUAGE.

The students in the Missionary Seminary at Basle, call the English language the missionary language; and well they may. —The present population of the British empire, including its kingdoms, colonies, and dependencies, 150,000,000, comprising 4,457,000 square miles. The area of the Roman empire, at the summit of its glory, is estimated by Gibbon at only 1,600,000 square miles. What a comparison might this fact suggest, between the field of missionary enterprise now, and that of the world in the time of the apostles? Among the whole of this vast population the English language is sprinkled at intervals; it prevails to a great extent in the British possessions in India, and on the continent of New Holland; the two mightiest Protestant nations of earth speak it as their native tongue—the two nations more prominent than all others for their missionary exertions, which, indeed, is the grand fact pointed at in that destination of the missionary language; in South Africa, and on the western coast of it is found almost without exception, wherever there is a missionary station, in the world. It is like a great wall of intelligence running round the whole circuit of the missionary field, with strong towers rising up at intervals, so that in truth the watchmen see eye to eye: they shall lift up their voice, with the voice together shall they sing, when the Lord shall bring again Zion. Whatever the multitude of different dialects to be encountered, this one missionary language in a manner encircles them all.

We cut the following from the Christian Watchman, published at Boston. By making a few slight alterations so as to render it applicable to this state, we deem the article a very appropriate one for the occasion, and quite as much to our purpose as any thing we could say on that interesting topic. Divine service will be held at the Presbyterian church in this village to commence at 11 o'clock on the 17th, where the different ministers and their congregations, as well as the public generally, are respectfully invited to attend. The above place is mentioned because it is the most spacious and convenient as well as the most central. An indiscriminate invitation is given, because the occasion is one in which it is desirable that as many of our citizens as may be disposed, should unite in rendering thanks to the Giver of all good for the numerous mercies received. On ordinary occasions, the different Christian societies meet in their respective places of worship, and enjoy the instructions of the teachers of their choice. This is well, but we are impressed that a thanksgiving opportunity may be rendered increasingly profitable by the union of the several congregations and the united efforts of ministers.

THANKSGIVING

This annual festival, a standing record of the piety and wisdom of our forefathers, is again at hand, in the state of New York. The Proclamation of our respected Governor has already been read, and many excellent sermons will be preached on the occasion, so we will not attempt either a proclamation or a sermon, but simply offer our congratulations to our friends, with the addition of our cordial good wishes for their happiness and profit during this [illegible] season. May they all surround their [illegible] with plenty, and may health, good [illegible] and smiling friends contribute [illegible] of their value to the occasion, and [illegible] the overflowing of grateful hearts give double value to the blessings.

And while they give thanks to the God who has crowned their boards with plenty, and filled their hearts with food and gladness, may they remember the poor; while they exult in their social, intellectual, and religious elevation, may they not forget the untaught and the outcast; while they gaze on their unbroken family circles, may they sympathize with the bereaved; and when they exult in that liberty wherewith Christ has made them free, may deepest compassion be moved for those who are bound in the cords of sin and grinding in the prison-house of Satan. And may that God whose eye will be on every heart on that day, read more true gratitude, and more holiness of purpose, than on any previous occasion.—We will give way to our poetical friend, "W. A.," who museth thus on the all-inspiring theme, THANKSGIVING:—

In sacred shrine, or homestead dear, with none to make afraid,
A gathering of grateful hearts this festive day [illegible]
And while his hand is recognized who [illegible] gave,
O, let us give a glance to those—our fathers' [illegible] grave.

As Fancy on the past looks back two [illegible] and more,
And with her pliant pencil paints the [illegible]
How into life the picture starts—and [illegible] acted o'er,
And we stand where our fathers stood—[illegible] the Sagamore!

What firm resolve! what purpose true! inspires that pilgrim band,
Who yielding up the sweets of home forsake their father land;
Who in the waste of wilderness for conscience' sake have sought
A place where they might give to God their free, unshackl'd thought.

'Mid trials and perplexities which history's page may tell,
'Mid famine dire and pestilence, the war-whoop cry, and yell,
Our fathers felt they blessings had, e'en where the savage trod,
And in those dark and bitter days sent up their thanks to God.

O, if in times that truly tried the very soul of man,
The grateful voice was heard to rise from that devoted clan,
With ten-fold power their children should their praises swell to-day,
For what they owe unto their God, two centuries rolled away.

No Indian now, with stealthy step, is prowling round our door,
Bent on some scheme of deep revenge he never will give o'er;
No council fire sends up its smoke of dark and lurid hue
To pale the face of firmest men and fondest mothers too!

But, sitting on a thousand hills, Peace lets her mantle fall,
Upon the dear delights of home, dispensing good to all;
She singeth loud the harvest hymn, the garner filleth full,
And tuneth man to look to God—the Good—the Bountiful.

Socrates was a great philosopher.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Fellow Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Our devout gratitude is due to the Supreme Being for having graciously continued to our beloved country, through the vicissitudes of another year, the invaluable blessings of health, plenty and peace. Seldom has this favored land been so generally exempted from the ravages of disease, or the labor of the husbandman more amply rewarded; and never before have our relations with other countries been placed on a more favorable basis than that which they so happily occupy at this critical conjuncture in the affairs of the world. A rigid and persevering abstinence from all interference with the domestic and political relations of other states, alike due to the genius and distinctive character of our government, and to the principles by which it is directed; a faithful observance in the management of our foreign relations, of the practice of speaking plainly, dealing justly, and requiring truth and justice in return, as the best conservative of the peace of nations; a strict impartiality in our manifestation of friendship, in the commercial privileges we concede, and those we require from others; those accompanied by a disposition as prompt to maintain, in every emergency, our own rights, as we are from principle averse to the invasion of those of others, have given to our country and government a standing in the great family of nations, of which we have just cause to be proud, and the advantages of which are experienced by our citizens throughout every portion of the earth to which their enterprising and adventurous spirit may carry them. Few, if any, remain insensible to the value of our friendship, or ignorant of the terms on which it can be acquired, and by which it can alone be preserved.

A series of questions of long standing, difficult in their adjustment, and important in their consequences, in which the rights of our citizens and the honor of the country were deeply involved, have, in the course of a few years, (the most of them during the successful administration of my immediate predecessor,) been brought to a satisfactory conclusion; and the most important of those remaining are, I am happy to believe, in a fair way of being speedily and satisfactorily adjusted.

With all the powers of the world, our relations are those of honorable peace.—Since your adjournment, nothing serious has occurred to interrupt or threaten this desirable harmony. If clouds have lowered about the other hemisphere, they have not cast their portentious shadows upon our happy shores. Bound by no entangling alliances, yet linked by a common nature and interests with the other nations of mankind, our aspirations are for the preservation of peace, in whose solid and civilizing triumphs all may participate with a generous emulation. Yet it behooves us to be prepared for any event, and to be always ready to maintain those just and enlightened principles of national intercourse, for which this government has ever contended. In the shock of contending empires, it is only by assuming a resolute bearing, and clothing themselves with defensive armor, that neutral nations can maintain their independent rights.

The excitement which grew out of the territorial controversy between the United States and Great Britain having in a great measure subsided, it is hoped that a favorable period is approaching for its final settlement. Both governments must now be convinced of the dangers with which the question is fraught; and it must be their desire, as it is their interest, that this perpetual cause of irritation should be removed as speedily as practicable. In my last annual message, you were informed that the proposition for a commission of exploration and survey promised by Great Britain had been received, and that a counter project, including also a provision for the certain and final adjustment of the limits in dispute, was then before the British Government for its consideration. The answer of that government, accompanied by additional propositions of its own, was received thro' the minister here, since your separation. These were promptly considered—such as were deemed correct in principle, and consistent with a due regard to the just rights the United States and of the state of Maine, concurred in; and the reason for dissenting from the residue, with an additional suggestion on our part, communicated by the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox. That minister, not feeling himself sufficiently instructed upon some of the points raised in the discussion, felt it to be his duty to refer the matter to his own government for its further decision. Having now been for some time under its advisement, a speedy answer may be confidently expected. From the character of the points still in difference, and the undoubted disposition of both parties to bring the matter to an early conclusion, I look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the negotiation. Three commissioners were appointed shortly after the adjournment of Congress, under the act of the last session providing for the exploration and survey of the line which separates the state of Maine and New Hampshire from the British Provinces; they have been actively employed until their progress was interrupted by the inclemency of the season, and will resume their labors as soon as practicable in the ensuing year.

It is understood that their respective examinations will throw new light upon the subject in controversy, and serve to remove any erroneous impressions which may have been made elsewhere prejudicial to the rights of the United States. It was, among other reasons, with a view of preventing the embarrassments which, in our peculiar system of government, impede and complicate negotiations involving the territorial rights of a State, that I thought it my duty as you have been informed on a previous occasion, to propose to the British Government through its Minister at Washington, that early steps should be taken to adjust the points at difference on the line of boundary from the entrance of Lake Superior to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, by the arbitration of a friendly Power, in conformity with the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent. No answer has yet been returned by the British Government to this proposition.

With Austria, France, Prussia, Russia and the remaining Powers of Europe, I am happy to inform you, our relations continue of the most friendly character. With Belgium, a treaty of commerce and navigation, based upon liberal principles of reciprocity and equality, was concluded in March last, and, having been ratified by the Belgian Government, will be duly laid before the Senate. It is a subject of congratulation that it provides for the satisfactory adjustment of a long standing question of controversy; thus removing the only obstacle which could obstruct the friendly and mutually advantageous intercourse between the two nations.

A messenger has been despatched with the Hanoverian treaty to Berlin, where, according to stipulation, the ratifications are to be exchanged. I am happy to announce to you that, after many delays and difficulties, a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and Portugal, was concluded and signed at Lisbon on the 26th of August last, by the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments. Its stipulations are founded upon those principles of mutual liberality and advantage which the United States have always sought to make the basis of their intercourse with foreign Powers, and it is hoped they will tend to foster and strengthen the commercial interests of the two countries.

Under the appropriation of the last session of Congress, an agent has been sent to Germany for the purpose of promoting the interests of the tobacco trade.

The commissioners appointed under the convention for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States upon Mexico, having met and organized at Washington in August last, the papers in the possession of the Government, relating to those claims, were communicated to the board. The claims not embraced by that convention are now the subject of negotiation between the two Governments, through the medium of our Minister at Mexico.

Nothing has occurred to disturb the harmony of our relations with the different Governments of South America. I regret, however, to be obliged to inform you that the claims of our citizens upon the late Republic of Columbia have not yet been satisfied by the separate Governments into which it has been resolved.

The charge d'affairs of Brazil having expressed the intention of his Government not to prolong the treaty of 1828, it will cease to be obligatory upon either party on the 12th day of December, 1841, when the extensive commercial intercourse between the United States and that vast empire, will no longer be regulated by express stipulations.

It affords me pleasure to communicate to you, that the Government of Chili has entered into an agreement to indemnify the claimants in the case of the Madisonian, for American property in 1819; and to add, that information has also been received which justifies the hope of an earlier adjustment of the remaining claims upon that Government.

The commissioners appointed in pursuance of the convention between the United States and Texas, for marking the boundary between them, have, according to the last report received from our commissioner, surveyed and established the whole extent of the boundary north along the Western bank of the Sabine river, from its entrance into the Gulf of Mexico, to the thirty-second degree of north latitude. The commission adjourned on the 16th of June last to re-assemble on the 1st of November, for the purpose of establishing accurately the intersection of the thirty-second degree of latitude with the western bank of the Sabine, and the meridian line thence to Red river. It is presumed that the work will be concluded in the present season.

The present sound condition of their finances, and the success with which embarrassments in regard to them at times apparently insurmountable, have been overcome, are matters upon which the people and Government of the United States may well congratulate themselves. An overflowing treasury, however it may be regarded as an evidence of public prosperity, is seldom conducive to the permanent welfare of any people; and experience has demonstrated its incompatibility with the salutary action of political institutions like those of the United States. Our safest reliance for financial efficiency and independence has on the contrary been found to consist in ample resources, unencumbered with debt; and, in this respect the Federal Government occupies a singularly fortunate and enviable position.

When I entered upon the discharg of my official duties in March, 1837, the act for the distribution of the surplus revenue was in a course of rapid execution. Nearly twenty-eight millions of dollars of the public moneys were, in pursuance of its provisons, deposited with the States in the months of January, April and July, of that year. In May there occurred a general suspension of specie payments by the banks, including, with very few exceptions, those in which the public moneys were deposited, and upon whose fidelity the Government had unfortunately made itself dependent for the revenues which had collected from the people, and were indispensable to the public service. This suspension, and the excesses in banking and commerce out of which it arose, and which were greatly aggravated by its occurrence made, to a great extent unavailable the principal part of the public money then on hand; suspended the collection of many millions accruing to merchant's bonds; and greatly reduced the revenue arising from customs and the public lands. These effects have continued to operate, in various degrees, to the present period; and, in addition to the decrease of the revenue thus produced, two and a half millions of dollars have been relinquished by two biennial reductions under the act of 1833, and probably as much more upon the importation of iron for railroads, by special legislation.

Whilst such has been our condition for the last four years in relation to revenue, we have, during the same period, been subjected to an unavoidable continuance of large extraordinary expenses necessarily growing out of past transactions, and which could not be immediately arrested without great prejudice to the public interest. Of these the charge upon the Treasury, in consequence of the Cherokee treaty alone, without adverting to others arising out of Indian treaties, has already exceeded five millions of dollars; that for the prosecution of measures for the removal of the Seminole Indians, which were found in progress, has been nearly fourteen millions; and the public buildings have required the unusual sum of nearly three millions.

It affords me, however, great pleasure to be able to say, that, from the commencement of this period to the present day, every demand upon the Government, at home or abroad, has been promptly met. This has been done, not only without creating a permanent debt or a resort to additional taxation in any form, but in the midst of a steadily progressive reduction of existing burdens upon the people, leaving still a considerable balance of available funds which will remain in the Treasury at the end of the year. The small amount of Treasury notes, not exceeding four and a half millions of dollars, still outstanding, and less by twenty-three millions than the United States have in deposite with the States, is composed of such only as are not yet due, or have not been presented for payment. They may be redeemed out of the accruing revenue, if the expenditures do not exceed and amount within which they may, it is thought, be kept without prejudice to the public interest, and the revenue shall prove to be as large as may justly be anticipated.

Among the reflections arising from the contemplation of these circumstances, one, not the least gratifying, is the consciousness that the Government had the resolution and the ability to adhere, in every emergency, to the sacred obligations of law; to execute all the contracts according to the requirements of the constitution; and thus to present, when most needed, a rallying point by which the business of the whole country might be brought back to a safe and unvarying standard—a result vitally important as well to the interests as to the morals of the people. There can surely now be no difference of opinion in regard to the incalculable evils that would have arisen if the Government, at that critical moment, had suffered itself to be deterred from upholding the only true standard of value, either by the pressure of adverse circumstances or the violence of unremitted denunciation. The manner in which the people sustained the performance of this duty was highly honorable to their fortitude and patriotism. It cannot fail to stimulate their agents to adhere, under all circumstances, to the line of duty; and to satisfy them of the safety which a course really right, and demanded by a financial crisis, may, in a community like ours be pursued, however apparently severe the immediate operation.

The policy of the Federal Government, in extinguishing as rapidly as possible the national debt, and subseqently, in resisting every temptation to create a new one, deserves to be regarded in the same favorable light. Among the many objections to a national debt, the certain tendency of public securities to concentrate ultimately in the coffers of foreign stockholders, is one which is every day gathering strength. Already have the recources of many of the states, and the future industry of their citizens, been indefinitely mortgaged to the subjects of European Governments, to the amount of twelve millions annually, to pay the constantly accruing interest of borrowed money—a sum exceeding half the ordinary revenue of the whole United States. The pretext which this relation affords to foreigners to scrutinize the management of our domestic affairs, if not actually to intermeddle with them, presents a subject for earnest attention, not to say of serious alarm. Fortunately, the Federal Government with the exception of an obligation entered into in behalf of the District of Columbia, which must soon be discharged, is wholly exempt from any such embarrassment. It is also, as is believed, the only Government which, having fully and faithfully paid all its creditors, has also relieved itself entirely from debt. To maintain a distinction so desirable, and so honorable to our national character, should be an object of earnest solicitude. Never should a free people, if it be possible to avoid it, expose themselves to the necessity of having to treat of the peace, the honor, or the safety of the Republic, with the governments of foreign creditors, who, however well disposed they may be to cultivate with us in general friendly relations, are nevertheless, by the law of their own condition, made hostile to the success and permanancy of political institutions like ours.

Most humiliating may be the embarrassments consequent upon such a condition. Another objection, scarcely less formidable to the commencement of a new debt is its inevitable tendency to increase in magnitude and to foster national extravagance. He has been an unprofitable observer of events who needs at this day to be admonished of the difficulties which a government habitually dependent on loans to sustain its ordinary expenditures has to encounter, in resisting the influences constantly exerted in favor of additional loans, by capitalists who enrich themselves by Government securities for amounts much exceeding the money they actually advance—a prolific source of individual aggrandizement in all borrowing countries, by stockholders, who seek their gain by the rise and fall of public stocks and by the selfish opportunities of applicants for appropriations for works avowedly for the accommodation of the public, but the real object of which are, too frequently the advancement of private interests.

The known necessity which so many of the States will be under to impose taxes for the payment of the interest on their debts, furnishes an additional and very cogent reason why the Federal government should refrain from creating a national debt, by which the people would be exposed to a double taxation for a similar object. We possess within ourslves ample resources for every emergency, and we may be quite sure that our citizens in no future exigency, will be unwilling to support the Government with all the means asked for the defence of the country. In time of peace, there can, at all event be no justification for the creation of a permanent debt by the Federal government. Its limited range of constitutional duties may certainly, under such circumstances, be performed without such a resort. It has, it is seen, been avoided during four years of greater fiscal difficulties than have existed in a similar period since the adoption of the Constitution, and one also remarkable for the occurrence of extraordinary causes of expenditures.

But, to accomplish so desirable an object, two things are indispensible: first, that the action of the Federal Government be kept within the boundaries prescribed by its founders; and, secondly, that all appropriations for objects admitted to be constitutional, and the expenditure of them also, be subjected to a standard of rigid, but well-considered and practical economy. The first depends chiefly on the people themselves, the opinion they form of the true construction of the constitution, and the confidene they repose in the political sentiments of those they select as their representatives in the Federal Legislature; the second rests upon fidelity with which their more immediate representatives, and other public functionaries, discharge the trusts committed to them. The duty of economizing the expenses of the public service is admitted on all hands; yet there are few subjects upon which there exists a wider difference of opinion than is constantly manifested in regard to the fidelity with which that duty is discharged. Neither diversity of sentiment, nor even mutual recrimination, upon a point in respect to which the public mind is so justly sensitive, can well be entirely avoided; and least so at a period of great political excitement.

An intelligent people, however seldom fail to arrive, in the end, at correct conclusions in such a matter. Practical economy in the management of public affairs can have no adverse influence to contend with more powerful than a large surplus revenue; and the unusually large appropriations for 1837 may, without doubt, independently of the extraordinary requisitions for the public service growing out of the state of our Indian relations, be, in no inconsiderable degree, traced to this source. The sudden and rapid distribution of the large surplus then in the Treasury, and the equally sudden and unprecedentedly severe revulsions in the commerce and business of the country, pointing with unerring certainty to a great and protracted reduction of the revenue, strengthened the propriety of the earliest practicable reduction of the public expenditures.

But to change a system operating upon so large a surface and applicable to such numerous and diversified interests and objects was more than the work of a day.—The attention of every department of the Government was immediately, and in good faith, directed to that end; and has been so continued to the present moment. The estimates and proportions for the year 1838 (the first over which I had any control) were somewhat distinguished. The expenditures of 1839 were reduced six millions of dollars. Those of 1840, exclusive of disbursement for public debt and trust claims, will probably not exceed twenty-two and a half millions; being two ro three millions less than those of the preceding year, and nine or ten millions less than those of 1837. Nor has it been found necessary, in order to produce this result, to resort to the power conferred by Congress, of postponing certain classes of the public works, except by deferring expenditures for a short period upon a limited portion of them: and which postponement some time since, at the moment the Treasury Department, by further receipts from the indebted banks, became fully assured of its ability to meet them without prejudice to the public service in other respects.

Causes are in operation which will, it is believed, justify a still further reduction, without injury to any important national interest. The expense of sustaining the troops in Florida have been gradually and greatly reduced, through the persevering efforts of the War Department, and a reasonable hope may be entertained that the necessity for military operations in that quarter will soon cease. The removal of the Indians from within our settled borders is nearly completed. The pension list, one of the heaviest charges upon the Treasury, is rapidly diminishing by death. The most costly of our public buildings are either finished, or nearly so: and we may, I think, safely promise ourselves a continued exemption from border difficulties.

The available balance in the Treasury on the first of January next is estimated at one million and a half of dollars. This sum, with the expected receipts from all sources during the next year, will, it is believed, be sufficient to enable the Government to meet every engagement, and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, if the remedial measures connected with the customs and the public lands, heretofore recommended, shall be adopted, and the new appropriations by Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates.

The new system established by Congress for the safe keeping of the public money, prescribing the kind of currency to be received for the public revenue, and providing additional guards and securities against losses, has now been several months in operation. Although it might be premature, upon an experience of such limited duration, to form a definite opinion in regard to the extent of its influences in correcting many evils under which the Federal Government and the country have hitherto suffered—especially those that have grown out of banking expansions, a depreciated currency, and official defalcations, yet it is but right to say that nothing has occurred in the practical operation of the system to weaken in the slightest degree, but much to strengthen the confident anticipations of its friends. The grounds of these have been heretofore so fully explained as to require no recapitulation.

In respect to the facility and convenience it affords in conducting the public service, and the ability of the government to discharge through its agency every duty attendant on the collection, transfer, and disbursement of the public money with promptitude and success, I can say, with confidence, that the apprehensions of those who felt it to be their duty to oppose its adoption, have proved it to be unfounded.

On the contrary, this branch of the fiscal affairs of the Government has been, and it is believed may always be, thus carried on with every desirable facility and security. A few changes and improvements in the details of the system, without affecting any principles involved in it, will be submitted to you by the Secretary of the Treasury, and will, I am sure, receive at your hands that attention to which they may, on examination, be found to be entitled.

I have deemed this brief summary of our fiscal affairs necessary to the due performance of a duty specially enjoined upon me by the constitution. It will serve, also, to illustrate more fully the principles by which I have been guided in reference to two contested points in our public policy, which were earliest in their development, and have been more important in their consequences, than any that have arisen under our complicated and difficult, yet admirable, system of government. I allude to a national debt, and a national bank.

It was in these that the political contests by which the country has been agitated ever since the adoption of the constitution, in a great measure, originated; and there is much reason to apprehend the conflicting interests and opposing principles thus marshalled, will continue as heretofore, to produce similar, if not aggravated consequences.

Coming into office the declared enemy of both, I have earnestly endeavored to prevent a resort to either.

The consideration that a large public debt affords an apology, and produces, in some degree, a necessity also, for resorting to a system and extent of taxation, which is not only oppressive throughout, but likewise so apt to lead, in the end, to the commission of that most odious of all offences against the principles of republican government—the prostitution of political power, conferred for the general benefit, to the aggrandizement of individual cupidity—is alone sufficient, independently of the weighty objections which have already been urged, to render its creation and existence the sources of bitter and unappeasable discord.

If we add to this, its inevitable tendency to produce and foster extravagant expenditures of the public money, by which a necessity is created for new loans and new burdens on the people; and finally, if we refer to the examples of every government which has existed, for proof, how seldom it is that the system, when once adopted and implanted in the policy of a country has failed to expand itself, until public credit was exhausted, and the people were no longer able to endure its increasing weight, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion, that no benefits resulting from its career, no extent of conquest, no accession of wealth to particular classes, nor any, nor all its combined advantages, can counterbalance its ultimate but certain results—a splendid government, and an impoverished people.

If a national bank was, as is undeniable, repudiated by the framers of the constitution as incompatable with the rights of the States and the liberties of the people; if from the beginning, it has been regarded by large portions of our citizens as coming in direct collision with that great and vital amendment of the constitution, which declares that all powers not conferred by that instrument on the general government are reserved to the States and to the people; if it has been viewed by them as the first great step in the march of latitudinous construction, which, unchecked would render that sacred instrument of as little value as an unwritten constitution, dependant, as it would alone be, for its meaning, on the interested interpretation of a dominant party, and affording no security to the rights of the minority; if such is undeniably the case, what rational grounds could have been conceived for anticipating aught but determined opposition to such an institution at the present day?

Could a different result have been expected, when the consequences which have flowed from its creation, and particularly from its struggles to perpetuate its existence, had confirmed in so striking a manner, the apprehensions of its earliest opponents, when it had been so clearly demonstrated that a concentrated money power, wielding so vast a capital, and combining such incalculable means of influence, may, in those peculiar conjunctures to which this Government is unavoidably exposed, prove an overmatch for the political power of the people themselves; when the true character of its capacity to regulate, according to its will and its interests, and the interests of its favorites, the value and production of the labor and property of every man in this extended country had been so fully and fearfully developed; when it was notorious that all classes of this great community had by means of the power and influence it thus possesses, been infected to madness with a spirit of heedless speculation; when it had been seen that, secure in the support of the combination of influences by which it was surrounded, it could violate its charter, and set the laws at defiance with impunity; and when too, it had become most apparent that to believe that such an accumulation of powers can never be granted without the certainty of being abused, was to indulge in a fatal delusion?

To avoid the necessity of a permanent debt, and its consequences, I have advocated and endeavored to carry into effect, the policy of confining the appropriations for the public service to such objects only as are clearly within the constitutional authority of the Federal Government; of excluding from its expenses those improvident and unauthorized grants of public money for works of internal improvement which were so wisely arrested by the constitutional interposition of my predecessor, and which, if they had not been so checked, would long before this time have involved the finances of the general government in embarrassments far greater then those which are now experienced by any of the States; of limiting all our expenditures to that simple, unostentatious and economical administration of public affairs, which is alone consistent with the character of our institutions; of collecting annually from the customs, and the sales of public lands, a revenue fully adequate to defray all the expenses thus incurred; but, under no pretence whatsoever, to impose taxes upon the people to a greater amount than was actually necessary to the public service, conducted upon the principles I have stated.

In lieu of a national bank, or a dependence upon banks of any description, for the management of our fiscal affairs, I recommend the adoption of the system which is now in successful operation. That system affords every requisite facility for the transaction of the pecuniary concerns of the government, will, it is confidently anticipated, produce in other respects many of the benefits which have from time to time expected from the creation of a national bank, but which have never been realized; avoid the manifold evils inseparable from such an institution; diminish, to a greater extent than could be accomplished by any other measure of reform, the patronage of the Federal Government; a wise policy in all governments, but more especially so in one like ours, which works well only in proportion as it is made to rely for its support upon the unbiased and unadulterated opinions of its constituents: do away forever all dependence on corporate bodies, either in raisng, collecting, safe-keeping, or disbursing the public revenues; and place the government equally above the temptation of fostering a dangerous and unconstitutional institution at home, or the necessity of adapting its policy to the views and interest of a still more formidable money-power abroad.

It is by adopting and carrying out these principles, under circumstances the most arduous and discouraging, that the attempt has been made, thus far successfully, to demonstrate to the people of the United States that a national bank at all times, and a national debt, except it be incurred at a period when the honor and safety of the nation demand the temporary sacrifice of a policy which should only be abandoned in such exigencies, are not merely unnecessary, but in direct and deadly hostility to the principles of their Government, and to their own permanent welfare.

The progress made in the developement of these positions, appears in the preceding sketch of the past history and present state of the financial concerns of the Federal Government. The facts there stated fully authorize the assertion, that all the purposes for which this Government was instituted have been accomplished during four years of great pecuniary embarrassment than were ever before experienced in time of peace, and in the face of opposition as formidable as any that was ever before arrayed against the policy of an administration; that this has been done when the ordinary revenues of the Government were generally decreasing, as well from the operations of the laws, as the condition of the country; without the creation of a permanent public debt, or incurring any liability, other than such as the ordinary resources of the Government will speedily discharge, and without the agency of a national debt.

If this view of the proceedings of the Government, for the period it embraces, be warranted by the facts as they are known to exist; if the army and navy have been sustained to the full extent authorized by law, and which Congress has deemed sufficient for the defence of the country and the protection of its rights and its honor; if its civic and diplomatic service has been equally sustained; if ample provision has been made for the administration of justice and the execution of the laws; if the claims upon public gratitude in behalf of the soldiers of the Revolution have been promptly met and faithfully discharged; if there have been no failures in defraying the very large expenditures growing out of that long continued salutary policy of peacefully removing the Indians to regions of comparative safety and prosperity; if the public faith has at all times and every where, been most scrupulously maintained by a prompt discharge of the numerous, extended and diversified claims of the Treasury; if these great and permanent objects, with many others that might be stated, have, for a series of years, marked by peculiar obstacles and difficulties, been successfully accomplished without a resort to a permanent debt, or the aid of a national bank; have we not a right to expect that a policy, the object of which has been to sustain the public service independently of either of these fruitful sources of discord, will receive the final sanction of a people whose unbiased and fairly elicited judgment upon public affairs is never ultimately wrong?

That embarrassments in the pecuniary concerns of individuals, of unexampled extent and duration, have recently existed in this as in other commercial nations, is undoubtedly true. To suppose it necessary now to trace these reverses to their sources, would be a reflection on the intelligence of my fellow-citizens. Whatever may have been the obscurity in which the subject was involved during the earlier stages of the revulsion, there cannot now be many by whom the whole question is not fully understood.

Not deeming it within the constitutional power of the general government to repair private losses sustained by reverses in business having no connexion with the public service, either by direct appropriations from the treasury or by special legislation designed to secure exclusive privileges and immunities to individuals or classes in preference to, and at the expense of, the great majority necessarily debarred from any participation in them, no attempt to do so has been either made, recommended or encouraged by the present Executive.

It is believed, however, that the great purposes for the attainment of which the Federal Government was instituted have not been lost sight of. Intrusted only with certain limited powers, cautiously enumerated, distinctly specified, and defined with a precision and clearness which would seem to defy misconstruction it has been my constant aim to confine myself within the limits so clearly marked out, and so carefully guarded. Having always been of opinion that the best preservative of the union of the States is to be found in a total abstinence from the exercise of all doubtful powers on the part of the Federal Government, rather than in attempts to assume them by a loose construction of the constitution, or an ingenious perversion of its words, I have endeavored to avoid recommending any measure which I had reason to apprehend would, in the opinion even of a considerable minority of my fellow-citizens, be regarded as trenching on the rights of the States, or the provisons of the hallowed instrument of onr Union. Viewing the aggregate powers of the Federal Government as a voluntary concession of the States, it seemed to me that such only should be exercised as were at the time intended to be given.

I have been strengthened too in the propriety of this course, by the conviction that all efforts to go beyond this tend only to produce dissatisfaction and distrust, to excite jealousies and provoke resistence. Instead of adding strength to the federal government even when successful they must ever prove a source of incurable weakness, by alienating a portion of those whose adhesion is indispensible to the great aggregate of united strength, and whose voluntary attachment is, in my estimation, far more essential to the efficiency of a government, strong in the best of all possible strength—that confidence and attachment of all those who make up its constituent elements.

Thus believing, it has been my purpose to secure to the whole people and to every member of the confederacy, by general, salutary and equal laws alone, the benefit of those republican institutions which it was the end and aim of the constitution to establish, and the impartial influence of which is, in my judgment, indispensible to their preservation.

I cannot bring myself to believe that the lasting happiness of the people, the prosperity of the States, or the permanancy of their union, can be maintained by giving preference or propriety to any class of citizens in the distribution of benefits or privileges, or by the adoption of measures which enrich one portion of the Union at the expense of another; nor can I see in the interference of the federal government with the local legislation and reserved rights of the States, a remedy for present, or a security against future dangers.

The first, and assuredly not the least important step towards relieving the country from the condition into which it had been plunged by excesses in trade, banking, and credits of all kinds, was to place the business transactions of the Government itself on a solid basis; giving and receiving in all cases value for value, and neither countenancing nor encouraging in others that delusive system of credits from which it has been found so difficult to escape, aud which has left nothing behind it but the wrecks that mark its fatal career.

That the financial affairs of the Government are now, and have been during the whole period of these wide-spreading difficulties, conducted with a strict and invariable regard to this great fundamental principle, and that by the assumption and maintenance of the stand thus taken on the very threshhold of the approaching crisis, more than by any other cause or causes whatever, the community at large has been shielded from the incalculable evils of a general and indefinite suspension of specie payments, and a consequent annihilation, for the whole period it might have lasted, of a just and invariable standard of value, will it is believed, scarcely be questioned.

A steady adherence on the part of the Government, to this policy which has produced such salutary results, aided by judicious State legislation, and, what is not less important, by the industry, enterprise, perseverence, and economy of the American people, cannot fail to raise the whole country, at an early period, to a state of solid and enduring prosperity, not subject to be again overthrown by the suspension of banks, or the explosion of a bloated credit system. It is for the people, and their representatives, to decide whether or not the permanent welfare of the country (which all good citizens equally desire, however widely they may differ as to the means of its accomplishment) shall be in this way secured; or whether the management of the pecuniary concerns of the Government, and, by consequences, to a great extent those of individuals also, shall be carried back to a condition of things which fostered those contractions & expansions of the currency, and those reckless abuses of credit, from the baleful effects of which the country has so deeply suffered—a return that can promise, in the end, no better results than to reproduce the embarrassments the government has experienced; and to remove from the shoulders of the present, to those of fresh victims, the bitter fruits of that spirit of speculative enterprise to which your countrymen are so liable, and upon which the lessons of experience are so unavailing. The choice is an important one, and I sincerely hope that it may be wisely made.

A report from the secretary of war, presenting a detailed view of affairs of that department accompanies this communication.

The desultory duties connected with the removal of the Indians, in which the army has been constantly engaged on the northern and western frontiers, and in Florida, have rendered it impracticable to carry into full effect the plan recommended by the Secretary for improving its discipline. In every instance where the regiments have been concentrated, they have made great progress; and the best results may be anticipated from a continuance of this system.—During the last season, a part of the troops have been employed in removing Indians from the interior of the territory assigned them in the west—a duty which they have performed efficiently, and with praiseworthy humanity; and that portion of them which has been stationed in Florida, continued active operations there throughout the heats of summer.

The policy of the United States in regard to the Indians, of which a succinct account is given in my Message of 1838, and of the wisdom and expediency of which I am fully satisfied, has been continued in active operation throughout the whole period of my administration. Since the spring of 1837, more than forty thousand Indians have been removed to their new home west of the Mississippi, and I am happy to add, that all accounts concur in representing the result of this measure as eminently beneficial to that people.

The emigration of the Seminoles alone has been attended with serious dificulty, and occasional blood-shed—hostilities having been commenced by the Indians in Florida, under the apprehension that they would be compelled, by force, to comply with their treaty stipulations.

The execution of the treaty of Payne's Landing, signed in 1832, but not ratified until 1834, was postponed at the solicitation of the Indians, until 1837, when they again renewed their agreement to remove peaceably to their new homes in the West. In the face of this solemn and renewed compact, they broke their faith and commenced hostilities by the massacre of Major Dade's command, the murder of their agent, General Thompson, and other acts of cruel treachery. When this alarming and unexpected intelligence reached the seat of government, every effort appears to have been made to reinforce Gen. Clinch, who commanded the troops then in Florida. Gen Eustis was despatched with reinforcements from Charleston—troops were called out from Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia; and Gen. Scott was sent to take the command, with ample powers and ample means. At the first alarm Gen. Gaines organized a force at New Orleans, and without waiting for orders landed in Florida, where he delivered over the troops he had with him to Gen. Scott.

Governor Call was subsequently appointed to conduct a summer campaign, and at the close of it, was replaced by Gen. Jessup. These events and changes took place under the administration of my predecessor. Notwithstanding the exertions of the experienced officers who had command there for eighteen months, on entering upon the government I fonnd the territory of Florida a prey to the Indian atrocities. A strenuous effort was immediately made to bring those hostilities to a close; and the army, under General Jessup, was reinforced until it amounted to ten thousand men, and furnished with abundant supplies of every description. In this campaign a great number of the enemy were captured and destroyed; but the character of the contest only was changed. The Indians, having been defeated in every engagement, dispersed in small bands throughout the country, and become an enterprising, formidable and ruthless banditti.

General Taylor, who succeeded General Jessup, used his best exertions to subdue them, and was seconded in his efforts by those under his command, but he, too, failed to protect the territory from their depredations. By an act of signal and cruel treachery, they broke the truce made with them by General Macomb, who was sent from Washington for the purpose of carrying into effect the expressed wishes of Congress, and have continued their devastations ever since. Gen. Armistead, who was in Florida when Gen. Taylor left the army, by permission assumed the command, and after active summer operations, was met by propositions for peace; and, from the fortunate coincidence of the arrival in Florida, at the same period, of a delegation from the Seminoles who are happily settled west of the Mississippi, and are now anxious to persuade their countrymen to join them there, hopes were for some time entertained that the Indians might be induced to leave the territory without further difficulty.

These hopes have proved fallacious, and hostilities have again been renewed throughout the whole of the territory. That this conquest has endured so long, is to be attributed to causes beyond the control of the government. Experienced generals have had the command of the troops; officers and soldiers have alike distinguished themselves by their activity, patience, and enduring courage; the army has been constantly furnished with supplies of every description; and we must look for the causes which have so long procrastinated the issue of the contest, in the vast extent of the theatre of hostilities, the almost insurmountable obstacles presented by the nature of the country, the climate, and the wily character of the savages.

The sites for marine hospitals on the rivers and lakes, which I was authorized to select and cause to be purchased, have all been designated; but the appropriation not proving sufficient, conditional arrangements only have been made for their acquisition. It is for Congress to decide whether these conditional purchases shall be sanctioned, and the humane intentions of the law carried into effect.

The navy, as will appear from the accompanying report of the Secretary, has been usefully and honorably employed in the protection of our commerce and citizens in the Mediteranean, the Pacific, on the coast of Brazil, and in the Gulf of Mexico.

A small squadron, consisting of the frigate Constellation and the sloop of war Boston, under Commodore Kearney, is now on its way to China and Indian seas, for the purpose of attending to our interests in that quarter; and commander Aulick, in the sloop of war Yorktown, has been instructed to visit the Sandwich and Society Islands, the coast of New Zealand and Japan, together with other ports and islands frequented by our whale ships, for the purpose of giving them countenance and protection should it be required. Other smaller vessels have been, and still are employed, in prosecuting the surveys of the coast of the United States, directed by various acts of Congress; and those which have been completed will shortly be laid before you.

The exploring expedition, at the latest date, was preparing to leave the Bay of Islands, New Zealand, in further prosecution of objects which have, thus far, been successfully accomplished. The discovery of a new continent, which was first seen in latitude 66 deg. 2 min. south, longitude 154 deg. 27 min. east, and afterwards in latitude 66 deg. 31 min. south, longitude 153 deg. 40 min. east, by Lieutenant Wilkes and Hudson, for extent of eighteen hundred miles, but on which they were prevented from landing by vast bodies of ice which encompassed it, is one of the honorable results of the enterprise. Lieutenant Wilkes bears testimony to the zeal and good conduct of his officers and men; and it is but justice to that officer to state that he appears to have performed the duties assigned him, with an ardor, ability, and perseverance, which gives every assurance of an honorable issue to the undertaking.

The report of the postmaster general, herewith transmitted, will exhibit the service of that department the last year, and its present condition. The transportation has been maintained during the year to the full extent authorized by the existing laws; some improvements have been effected, which the public interest seemed urgently to demand, but not involving any material additional expenditure; the contractors have generally performed their engagements with fidelity; the postmasters, with few exceptions, have rendered their accounts, and paid their quarterly balances with promptitude; and the whole service of the department has maintained the efficiency for which it has for several years been distinguished.

The acts of Congress establishing new mail routes, and requiring more expensive services of others, and the increasing wants of the country, have for three years past carried the expenditures something beyond the accruing revenues; the excess having been met, until the past year, by surplus which had previously accumulated That surplus having been exhausted, and the anticipated increase in the revenne not having been realized, owing to the depression of the commercial business of the country, the finances of the department exhibit a small deficiency at the close of the last fiscal year. Its resources, however, are ample; and the reduced rates of compensation for the transportation service, which may be expected on the future lettings, from the general reduction of prices, with the increase of revenue that may be reasonably anticipated from the revival of commercial activity, must soon place the finances of the department in a prosperous condition.

Considering the unfavorable circumstances which have existed during the past year, it is a gratifying result that the revenue has not declined, as compared with the preceding year, but, on the contrary, exhibits a small increase; the circumstances referred to having had no other effect than to check the expected income.

It will be seen that the postmaster general suggests certain improvements in the establishment, designed to reduce the weight of the mails, cheapen the transportation, ensure greater regularity in the service, and secure a considerable reduction in the rates of letter-postage—an object highly desirable. The object is one of general interest to the community, and is respectfully recommended to your consideraiion.

The suppression of the African slave trade has received the continued attention of the government.—The brig Dolphin and schooner Grampus have been employed during the last season on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of preventing such portions of that trade as was said to be prosecuted under the American flag. After cruising off those parts of the coast most usually resorted to by slavers, until the commencement of the rainy season, these vessels returned to the United States for supplies, and have since been despatched on a similar service.

From the reports of the commanding officers, it appears that the trade is now principally carried on under Portuguese colors; and they express the opinion that the apprehension of their presence on the slave coast has, in a great degree, arrested the prostitution of the American flag to this inhuman purpose.

It is hoped that by continuing to maintain this force in that quarter, and by the exertions of the officers in command, much will be done to put a stop to whatever portion of this trafic may have been carried on under the American flag, and to prevent its use in a trade, which, while it violates the laws, is equally an outrage on the rights of others and the feelings of humanity. The efforts of the several governments who are anxiously seeking to suppress this trafic, must, however, be directed against the facilities afforded by what are recognized as legitimate commercial pursuits, before that object can be fully accomplished.

Supplies of provisions, water-casks, merchandize, and articles connected with the prosecution of the slave trade, are, it is understood, freely carried by vessels of different nations to the slave factories; and the effects of the factors are transported openly from one slave station to another, without interruption or punishment by either of the nations to which they belong, engaged in the commerce of that region. I submit to your judgments whether this government, having been the first to prohibit, by adequate penalties, the slave trade—the first to declare it piracy—should not be the first, also, to forbid its citizens all trade with the slave factories on the coast of Africa, giving an example to all nations in this respect, which, if fairly followed, cannot fail to produce the effective results in breaking up those dens of iniquity.

NEW YEAR'S SERMON.

Proper employment for the MERRY, is selected as the theme of a discourse, which, by leave of Providence, will be pronounced in the house of worship belonging to the "De Ruyter Religious Society," (usually called the Presbyterian house,) on the first day of the week, 11 o'clock, A. M., Jan. 3d, 1841.

J. R. JOHNSON.

De Ruyter, Dec. 16, 1840.

THE BAPTISTS AND SLAVERY.

That a great conflict would succeed the diffusion of so much light on the subject of slavery, we have not doubted for a long time; but it is now likely to commence in a quarter that we had not anticipated. The Baptist denomination, wielding an influence second to no other in this country, is divided on this question. Those located at the north, are generally inclined, we believe, not to continue in their fellowship those who are concerned in the traffic of human flesh, or are holding their fellow men in bondage.—There are many who take exceptions to the action of the leading Baptists on the subject of slavery entirely, and others whose opinions coincide with those who have taken ground against slavery, who, notwithstanding, think the time has not arrived when such measures are demanded. Some of the regular Baptists are determined not to co-operate in missionary affairs with those whose offerings to this cause are either the price of men or the avails of their unrequited labor. The Free-will Baptists have adopted the same policy, and are resolved not to connect their efforts or funds with those of slave holders. The southern Baptists are indignant at this policy, and demand, as the condition of their continued fellowship and concert of action with their northern brethren, that several leading men should be discarded.—Resolutions have been passed to this effect by numerous associations and other bodies, and, in some cases, the language held by them is too full of menace and defiance. Both parties are thus fully committed; and there appears to be no room for a compromise, unless either the north should agree to fellowship that system which appears to them utterly unscriptural, anti-republican and wrong—sacrifice virtually such men as Galusha, Grosvenor and others, and receive at the hands of their southern brethren the injunctions of everlasting secresy on the subject of slavery—or, the south must wink at the doctrines of the abolitionists, and tacitly admit their correctness, and thus endorse the sin and impolicy of the institution of slavery. We do not expect to see either of the parties make such concessions. The north cannot do it, and the south will not do it. Whatever the final result may be, we are glad that the prominent actors evince, to some extent, a pacific disposition, and employ kind language while they are firm in their purposes. Though the division of so influential a branch of the church militant is to be regretted, yet, a great and good purpose will, doubtless, be answered by it, which is beyond human comprehension.

From the Cincinnati Observer and the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, we see that the Bethel and Sabbath Convention, a notice of the call for which we published in the Register some time since, was numerously attended by Christians of different denominations. The importance of a proper sanctification of the Sabbath, appears to have been the principle topic which occupied the attention of the convention. The speeches are said to have been very fine, and the meeting, on the whole, quite interesting. We may give some further particulars at another time, if convenient. We hope the church of Christ will take right ground on this subject, and maintain it with firmness.

The following is from the New York Evangelist, and reflects honor upon the writer by the ingenuousness and truly Christian spirit it evinces. It is the best description of the views of the denomination to which it relates, that we recollect to have seen for a long time. Frequently this branch of the Christian church fails to receive justice from the hands of their brethren who undertake to publish their views respecting the Sabbath. Attempts have often been made to fix on them the charge of Judaizing, because they contend that the fourth commandment, as well as the other nine, is in full force, and binding on Christians at the present day. We ask for the article a candid perusal.

De Ruyter, Mad. co., Nov. 20, 1840.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

There are about fifty churches of this denomination in the United States; more than thirty of this number are included in the State of New-York. They have a respectable congregation located in this village, and its immediate vicinity. Here, also, is a literary institution, under their control; the principal of which is Mr. Solomon Carpenter, A. M. Their press, which issues the "Seventh-Day Baptist Register," (their only periodical) is likewise at De Ruyter.

Having resided in this place for a little more than a year, I have been favored with an opportunity of becoming acquainted with this class of Christians. I esteem them highly, as a part of the family of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. On the claims and perpetuity of the moral law, their views are clear and strong. They delight to study the Decalogue. As they understand the fourth commandment, they feel themselves most sacredly obligated to observe the same day of the week as the Sabbath which is there designated. They find no divine authority for the change of the day; and their conviction is, that any attempt to change the observance of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, is, in its legitimate tendency, prejudicial to the stability of the moral law, and consequently hostile to the perpetuity of the Sabbatical institution. Hence, they keep the seventh day, not because they have an inward inkling for judaism, or that they wish to assume singularity by opposing other branches of the Christian church; but because they love the Sabbath; and wish to be found walking in strict obedience to the commands of God. Such fixedness to the commands of God, and such ardent attachment to the Sabbath, demand our respect, our love; and this deserved tribute should not be in the least diminished, because we differ from those brethren respecting the specific application of the holy principle which they espouse. On the original institution of the Sabbath, its incorporation with the moral law, the primary designs of the institution, and its perpetuity to the end of time, the Seventh-Day Baptists and the Presbyterians are fully agreed. So far as I have opportunity to compare our views on the Sabbath, we differ on this question,—Which day of the week, the seventh, or the first, does the Lord of the Sabbath now require us to observe as sacred to himself?

It will be readily seen, therefore, that on the Sabbath question, we are much more in union with the seventh-day brethren, than we are with any of those who unite with us in observing the first day of the week; but who do not like ourselves, consider the day as a perpetuation of identically the same Sabbath institution which was established in Eden, and promulgated on Sinai.

STARTLING DEVELOPEMENT.

Monday, P. M., Nov. 23.

The preceding article respecting the Seventh-Day Baptists was penned on Friday last. In writing its concluding paragraph, I had in view the fact which has been pressed on my attention while reading some discussions on the Sabbath, between the seventh and first day Baptists, viz:—that the first day Baptists did not, in their argument, give that prominence to the fourth commandment which I felt that the cause of truth required. But I was not prepared for such an announcement as I find in the Baptist Advocate of the 21st inst. The editor, in commenting upon an editorial which he had noticed in the S. D. B. Register, says: "The editor further asks us, Whether the fourth commandment is still binding on Christians? We express our opinion unequivocally in the negative." Can this be the sentiment of the Baptist denomination? I trust it is not. Will our brother Wyckoff please re-examine his opinion? Unless we have now a Sabbath which rests on the fourth commandment as its basis, we have none at all. If we invalidate that part of the moral law, what will become of other parts? Where is moral obligation itself? Were I to enter upon such a path, I should not know how to stop short of "Brownson's doctrines regarding religion."

SUNDAY.

Why do we, who observe the first day of the week as the Sabbath, continue to call it Sunday? By giving it this appellation we diminish the impression of the sacredness of the day. If we think it is the Sabbath, let us call it Sabbath, or "Lord's day."—The only exception that I would make is, that when speaking of that day to those who conscientiously observe the seventh day, we might use the common term, first day. When thus situated, were we to say Sabbath, or Lord's day, we might sometimes wound the feelings of our Christian brethren; and to say Sunday, would yield too much on our part, leaving the impression on the minds of those with whom we converse, that we feel ourselves destitute of the true Sabbath.

J. R. J.

BAPTIST ADVOCATE.

The Editor of this paper in noticing our last article in reply to his queries, remarks as follows:—

"SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.—The Editor of this paper, in reply to our questions, declares 'that the peculiarities of Brownsonism, to which' we refered 'are most abhorrent' to him; that he disapproves of women calling conventions or being actors in them, even of encouraging them 'to participate in the transaction of ordinary church business.' He merely wished the question concerning the validity of the claims of the first day to sanctification to be brought to a proper test.

He thinks that we have formed a new issue, and that, if the fourth command be not binding, he knows not how we can expect to interpose a barrier to Sabbath profanation. He asks us distinctly in italics to show him, if we can, one instance of a religious meeting being held on the first day of the week in the day-time except in cases where such meetings were held on every day or a number of days in succession.

We had always supposed the narrative, Acts xx: 7, to refer to transactions occuring on the first day of the week. Our friend believes them to refer to the evening after the seventh day, which would involve this incongruity. The disciples are said to have come together on the first to break bread. If they held their religious worship on the Sabbath, which commenced on Friday evening and closed at the commencement of Saturday evening, did they afterward assemble to break bread? Was not this a part of their service appropriate to the day of worship, or do our Seventh Day friends, hold their communion upon a week day?

We have not copied the article from the Register, because of its length, and of there being no request of the kind attached to it. If our friend thinks that injustice is done to him in this respect, we will endeavor to find room for the whole in a future number".

In regard to the 'incongruity' which he thinks our views of Acts xx. 7, involve, if he will give the subject a little more attention, he may possibly find the 'incongruity' is in his own system, and not in ours.—We did not deny the meeting in question to have been held on the first day of the week properly: But as it was an evening meeting, it must have been on the evening following the seventh day to have been on the first day of the week. Had it been the evening after the first day, then it would have brought the celebration on a "week day," according to the present mode of commencing the Sabbath at midnight by first day people, as well as on the ancient and truly scriptural mode of commencing it at sunset. He will observe that the preaching continued "till midnight," and the communion service (if that was the breaking of bread alluded to) must have been performed after midnight, and consequently not on the same day on which they had worshiped, even if they had observed the evening following the day. It was, therefore, as certainly on a "week day" when Paul broke bread on his scheme as on ours. It was, doubtless, an occasional meeting; and if it commenced immediately after the Sabbath ended, as we doubt not it did, then Paul travel[illegible], as we said before, on the first day of the week in this instance. Of course it was no Sabbath then, and consequently NONE NOW? If it was the evening after Sunday that the meeting commenced, then the "breaking of bread" took place certainly on Monday. How [illegible] BROTHER WYCKOFF [illegible] SETTLE THIS POINT?

We will not offer the editor an indignity by supposing [illegible] ancient time the evening after the Sabbath day was a part of the [illegible] of every other day; and [illegible] the Jews, but many Christians [illegible] on the same principle at this [illegible] he knows this already, and he doubtless knows that the Lord's Supper was [illegible] by the church for a long time in the evening, according to its original institution.

He asks us, "[illegible]" &c. "did they [illegible] assemble to break bread?" It would seem [illegible] whether they had done the same [illegible] cases or not, we can easily account for its having been done at this time, when we [illegible] that Paul was to have no other interview with them during his visit there.

We heartily thank the Editor of the Advocate for his very kind offer to insert our article, if we thought injustice was done us. We are not so anxious about "injustice" being done us, as we are concerned lest justice should not BE DONE TO THE TRUTH.

We respectfully ask, therefore, that the article may be inserted in the next number of the Advocate, if he can do so without serious inconvenience. We expect, of course, he will take up and answer us on the several points embraced in the article. We are not quite satisfied with what he has said, i. e., we do not consider it a reply. Our friend will see that the subject is one of the utmost importance to the cause of religion and morality, and we sincerely hope he will bring such reasons as may convince us of our error if we are wrong. This point settled either way, Br. Wyckoff, and we are ONE PEOPLE. Let us, in this matter, adopt the sentiment expressed by Balaam, "If Balak would give his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God to do less or more," and act upon it as Christians, and all will be well.

THE CINCINNATI OBSERVER, is hereafter to be published weekly instead of semi-monthly, as formerly. We should think such a paper as the Observer would be liberally supported by the friends of religion and morals in the west. It is a large sheet, ably edited—handsomely printed—and ranks among our most valuable exchanges. It is "devoted to the promotion of experimental religion—the maintainance of essential truth—and the advancement of the benevolent enterprises of the age."

NEW EXCHANGES.—We have recently added to our exchange list, the following:

The Christian Watchman, published at Boston, Mass., an old and ably conducted Baptist paper, which is soon to enter upon its twenty-second volume.—Terms, $2 50, if paid within six weeks from the time of subscribing, and $3 00 if payment is delayed till the end of the year. Subscriptions received at this office.

The Baptist Banner and Western Pioneer, published weekly at Louisville, Ky., a large sheet ably conducted by editors residing in four states and being the principle organ of the Baptist denomination in the south-western states. The Banner is about to be enlarged. Terms, $3 00 per year, $4 00 if payment is delayed longer than twelve months.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. S. Baker. We think the Chronicle an important acquisition to the list of Baptist publications.

The South-Western Christian Advocate, published at Nashville, Tenn., J. B. McFarren, Editor. Terms, $2 00 per annum, if paid in advance, $2 50 in six months, or $3 00 at the end of the year.

Revivals.—In two school districts between the villages of Homer and Summerhill, there is a cheering work of grace in progress. Also at Summerhill Christians are waking up, and wounded sinners are inquiring for the healing balm.

We also learn from Bro. James R. Irish, that a blessed and extensive revival is in progress in Friendship, Allegany county, N. Y. The particulars are not given.

By a letter from Bro. H. H. Baker to a friend of ours, we understand that the revival which commenced in Pinckney, some time since, under the labors of Brother E. S. Bailey, is extending and increasing in interest and power. Shall we not hear something more of the details soon!

Geological Cabinets.—Josiah Holbrook, founder of Lyceums in this country, is now engaged in preparing geological cabinets, for the use of families, lyceums and schools. The Cabinet is said to be portable, tastefully got up, and contains twenty-five specimens, intened to serve as an introduction to the study of this interesting science. The Cabinet is a starting point, from which, in leisure moments, with a good text book, any person, so disposed, can make himself acquainted with the geology of his town, county, and state, thus affording food for the mind, while the body rests from the toils of the day. That these cabinets would make a valuable addition to the common-school library, as a mean of diffusing useful knowledge cannot be doubted.

THANKSGIVING.

> "I respectfully recommend to my fellow citizens, to abstain from all secular occupations on that day; to gather themselves in their solemn assemblies; to render to our heavenly Father the homage of hearts softened and warmed by his unbounded goodness, to commit to his tender care the poor, the neglected and the oppressed, and to supplicate a continuance of his favor to the people throughout all generations."—Governor's Proclamation.

Come to the festival! ye favor'd ones,
Attune your hearts to this brief jubilee,
And raise one general song; be it the deep,
The thrilling music of a nation's soul—
That harp of many tones. But let its chords
Be struck in unison, while every string
Sends up its own sweet harpings, wasting not
The gently echo of its trembling notes
On individual bliss, but blending all
Into one hymn of universal praise.

Come to the festival! but first put off
Earth's weary thraldom. Bid thy spirits lay
Those sandals by, with which 'tis wont to walk
The dusty avenues of life's poor mart;
Thou comest now to tread on holy ground;
See thou mar not its excellence, or lay
Upon this altar an unhallowed gift.

Come to the festival! but enter first
Into the secret chambers of thy soul,
And scan its hideous cells, the springs that move
Its vast machinery; then ascend, and look
Abroad upon its labors. Ask thyself,
Of the intent, the deed. Then turn thine eye
From that blest sanctuary, thy peaceful home,
Upon the arena of a changeful world.
Dost thou see aught of wretchedness, and does
The sigh of woe, rouse thee to pitying mood,
And pity prompt to acts of kind relief!

Then come thou to the festival! and share
The blessings which the merciful receive,
While thy heart swells beneath its fervent weight
Of gratitude, that thou art not of those,
The outcast, the down-trodden. Yet while thou bearest
The comeliness of praise for many gifts—
For that strong Refuge, which has shielded thee
From midnight terrors and the noonday scourge—
For harvest treasures, and the rapid swell
Of arts o'erflowing tide—while all demand
The tribute of thy praise (O praise the Lord,)
Let the strong pleadings of thy heart go up,
For blessings on the suffering. Then go forth
In faith's strong armory, and to the work
Of love betake thee. Raise the bowed down,
Let the sick share thy healthful ministry;
The broken-hearted soothe; the captive free,
And bid thy erring brother go in peace!
So shall thy grateful offering ascend
With sweet acceptance. L. M. C.

☞ The Philadelphia Mirror.—We published the prospectus of this paper for a long time, and expected we had complied with its conditions, so far as to obtain an exchange; but, though we have sent on repeatedly for the Mirror, it has never been received. ☞ Our subscribers will please observe that in changing our publication day, we have anticipated the time of issuing our paper three days, instead of delaying three days longer. This happening just at this time, we are able to present our readers with the President's Message, so much earlier than we could otherwise have done.

Union.—The Casket and Gentleman's Magazine have been united in the hands of Mr. George R. Graham, Philadelphia. The number before us indicates ability and taste in the arrangement of the work. Those who wish a work of this kind will doubtless be pleased with the Magazine.

☞ In consequence of inserting the President's Message entire in this number, we are under the necessity of deferring a number of other articles; besides being deficient in our usual variety.

To Correspondents.—"A friend of Amusements" is informed, that as he proposes to "show the benefits of Cotillon Parties" next week, we thought it best to reserve his article this week, and make this announcement.

The Ladies' Companion, for December, has come to hand. From the cursory examination we have been able to give it, we think the present to be a valuable number. Among its contents are "Our Library," by Mrs E. C. Embury. "The Unsummoned Witness," concluded, by F. W. Thomas. "The Young Destructive," illustrated, by Robert Hamilton. "The Virgin's Vengeance," by Henry W. Herbert. "Sketches in the West," by Professor Ingraham. "The Cross," by F. S. Osgood. "Life of Man," by Rufus Dawes. "The Rescue, an Incident of the Revolution," by R. Hamilton, &c., &c.

A beautiful engraving, designed expressly for the Companion.

To Uncle William:

My Esteemed Friend.—I would like to write you a long letter, but I must content myself with writing a short one for I can seize only upon a leisure moment, and I know you have no time just now to read long epistles; and if I touch upon a single point, I can say what I have to say in a few words.

The following from the pen of "Esq. W.'s Son," must have arrested your attention:—"He may call them Cotillon parties, dancing parties, or whatever name he thinks would be most suitable—he cannot make any thing out of them but Parties; and his undertaking to do them away, would be like dissolving all unity in society." As a "word to the wise is sufficient," this frank disclosure of the sad effects upon society which your anti-Cotillon epistle is adapted to produce—should your accomplished niece and her associates be influenced by it—doubtless has already led you to nullify, rescind, veto, or expunge that celebrated letter. You notice that I employ words which have long been familiar to your ears; my simple intention is to say, that all your friends presume that you will now make haste to send Amanda a second epistle, in which you will unsay every word which you said to her in reply to her honest query.

I know that you love "unity in society" too well to allow yourself to knock the whole foundation out by a single stroke of the pen. I presume my good friend did not dream what direful disasters he was about to bring on society, when, to the surprise of us all, he allowed himself to turn aside from the great subjects of national concerns which usually absorb his attention, to write a letter to his niece on Cotillon dancing!

All "unity in society" based on the perpetuation of parties of pleasure—where dancing shall be the prominent amusement! Uncle William, do consider what you have done! You have made a thrust at the foundation of all our social arrangements! If these are destroyed, Where will our civil institutions find refuge? Literary or religious organizations must next go by the board! Uncle William, Retract! Retract!! Terrible! Terrible!! as J. Q. Adams once exclaimed in Congress, when a dissolving process was there eloquently portrayed.

Yours, &c. IRONIA.

SUMMARY.

FROM MEXICO—MASSACRE OF THE TEXIAN VOLUNTEERS.

From Tampico, advices to the 17th of November have been received, and from Vera Cruz to the 4th. They give an account of an act of treachery which ended in the massacre of a large number of volunteers from Texas. The following is the account given:

"On the defeat of the federal army at Morelos in March last, Canales, Molano and Cardenas escaped to Texas where they were hospitally treated. Failing to engage the Texian government in their plans in Mexico, they persuaded a number of the youth of Texas to join them in an invasion of the country, holding out the hope of an easy march to the city of Mexico, then in a state of revolt. On arriving at Rio Grande, it was ascertained that the revolution in the capital had proved a failure. This produced a secret consultation among the federal chiefs, to buy peace with the dominant faction at home by an act of perfidity to their foreign allies.

"They were consequently decoyed into the interior as far as Victoria, and delivered over to Gen. Montego. Here, on the 23d, the Texians were abandoned to the enemy, five times their number. They were slaughtered with arms in their hands, fighting heroically to the last. One hundred and fifty of them were thus butchered. At Matamoras, the inhabitants celebrated this victory with bells and cannon."

A subsequent account says, that the battle between the Texians and their assailants lasted about nine hours. The Texians had chosen a fortunate position and made great slaughter of the enemy; four hundred of whom were killed. It then became dark and they were enabled to make their escape.—N. Y. Times.

From the N. O. Bee.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

Slaughter of the Murderers—and Escape of the Texian Patriots.

Since our publication of yesterday, in which the accounts from our correspondent at Matamoras left more than a hundred young Texians at Saltillo, about to be sacrificed at the shrine of cowardice—we have conversed with a passenger from Texas by the New York, Mr. Ed. Dwyer, of San Antonio, who has communicated to us some new and heart cheering facts. Mr. D. was only 6 days from San Antonio to Houston, and on the journey put up at a house where Col. Jordan, (the commander of the 114 Texians whom the Mexicans had planned to murder,) had just before stopped for refreshment.

Mr. Dwyer learned, and has no doubt of the correctness of the information, that when the Texians became convinced of the intentions and treachery of the Mexicans, they retired by themselves to a walled enclosure in the vicinity, determined to face the worst. At this time the citizens of the place, considering the contest at an end, opened their houses and shops and gave the soldiers whatever they wished to eat or drink. The consequence was, that the bulk of them got beastly drunk; and in this situation they were ordered by their commander to attack the outlaws, (as the Texians were termed.) The battle commenced about 2 P. M. and lasted near 9 hours. The Texians were well protected from the fire of the assailants—and were moreover well armed and abundantly supplied with ammunition.

The result was, that the ignorant and intoxicated cowards who assailed them, incapable of inflicting injury, were slaughtered on all hands. At this juncture, the besieged sallied forth and captured three pieces of artillery, which they turned upon the enemy and mowed them down like grass. More than FOUR HUNDRED of the treacherous foes were left lifeless on the ground on that night, by this small branch of the Anglo Saxon race.

The Texians, having cleared the field, supplied themselves with apparel (of which they were much in want,) and other spoils of victory, and commenced their march homeward, and pursued their way without molestation—having lost only four companions killed in the fight, and one who died from disease.

Providential Escape.—The National Intelligencer of yesterday, says that the members of Congress who arrived at Washington on Tuesday from the south, bring information of one of the most extraordinary accidents and hair breadth escapes ever heard of, which occurred to General Waddy Thompson, the distinguished representative in Congress from South Carolina. The scene of it was on the rail road, a few miles south of Petersburgh, in Virginia. General Thompson, with several other members, weary of the tedious progress of the train of steam-cars, which made their way with great effort and difficulty through the snow, had got out of the cars and walked ahead along the track. The motion of the cars becoming freer, they came down more rapidly upon him than he expected, and, the engineer not being able to check them, they struck General Thompson, knocked him down, and the whole train, engine, cars, and all, passed over him! Every one will suppose, of course, on reading this, that the accident was fatal in its consequences. On the contrary, we are happy to say that if bodily injured at all, it was not to such an extent as to leave any alarm as to the consequences on the minds of his friends, one or two of whom staid behind him at Petersburgh.—Baltimore American December 10th.

Resumption of Specie Payments.—There seems hardly room to doubt that a very general resumption of Specie Payments, by the Banks South and West of us will take place in the course of the ensuing month. An arrangement has been effected between the Banks of this City and Boston on one hand and those of Philadelphia on the other, by the terms of which the former lend the latter some two or three millions on their post notes at s per cent, to aid and secure the resumption. The Northern banks thereby change a dead balance of so much against Philadelphia into an interest bearing debt to be shortly paid, while they at the same time greatly diminish the existing inequality of Exchanges. It seems to be an advantageous operation for all parties. As an immediate consequence, the rate of exchange on Philadelphia has improved from three to four per cent. to 1 1-4 a 1 1-2. We look for a farther reduction soon, and a corresponding improvement in all Southern Exchanges. The legal limit of the suspension in Pennsylvania is the 15th of January, but we presume the practical resumption will not be so long delayed. The Legislature of Georgia appears to be nearly unanimous in favor of enforcing (if need be) a prompt resumption.—New Yorker.

FROM FLORIDA.

The following appears in the 'Globe.' It will be seen that the Commanding General is vigorously pushing his operations against the Indians, though he is at the same time seeking every opportunity of negociating with them for the peaceable termination of the war, and their emigration to the homes of their brethren in the west.

Head Quarters, Army of Florida,
Fort King, Nov. 24.

The whole army is now, and will remain in pursuit of the enemy. Every inducement is, however, held out to them to treat. The bands of Halick Tustenuggee and Tigertail are pursued by a detachment of the 2d Infantry. The 7th is now in the field. The Dragoons, of which six companies are on the upper St. Johns, are actively employed in that section. The 8th regiment leaves this morning for Tampa, scouring the country on the route, embracing the Waboo and the other hiding places on the Withlacoochee. The 6th regiment is in the country between the Hillsborough and Withlacoochee. The 1st regiment is scouting along the Gulf shore below Tampa, with boats, accompanied by a steamer and two schooners.

I have deemed these movements necessary, as the entire bands of the enemy have confined themselves to the swamps and along the coast, whence they make predatory excursions; and it is there, and there alone, that they can be most annoyed.

To the north of Fort King they make occasional inroads, but to bring them to a sense of what they ought to do, their families and strong holds broken up.

The delegations are in utter astonishment at the manner in which Haliek Tustenuggee and his party left them, as they had given me and the party repeated assurances of their determination to emigrate. This want of faith has not deterred me from using exertions to communicate with the Seminoles, and I have dispatched three of the delegation, with their consent, to hold intercourse with their relations and friends.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, W. K. ARMISTAD,
Brig. Gen. Com. Army of Florida.
The Hon. the Secretary of War.

There is in the last "Investigator" a letter from that gray haired apostate of infidelity, Abner Kneeland—in which he still lifts his voice in favor of universal doubt. In conclusion, he thanks the proprietors for a copy of the paper he formerly edited, stating his inability to pay for it. Had he been true to his God, and the religion of his fathers, he would not have been left thus pennyless in his old age. On what will his mind rest for support, as he sinks to the grave, under the weight of years! Certainly not on those hopes which he so forcibly held out to others, when he acted in his younger and better days as a minister of religion. Who can but pity the dying infidel!—To him, as well as us, annihilation must have its horrors; but alas! he must take the dreadful leap in the dark,—and may God have mercy on his soul.—Olive Branch.

New Alloy of Metals.—A curious and valuable discovery has just been made in the alloys of metals. A manufacturer of Paris has invented a composition much less oxidable than silver, and which will not melt at less than a heat treple that which silver will bear. The cost of it is less than 4d an ounce.

Another improvement is in steel: an Englishman in Brussels has discovered a mode of casting iron, so that it flows from the furnace pure steel, better than the best cast steel, and almost equal to that which has undergone the process of heating. The cost of this steel is only a farthing per pound greater than that of cast iron.—U. S. Gazette.

Charity.—'I fear,' said a country pastor to his flock, 'when I told you in my last charity sermon, that philanthrophy was the love of our species, you must have understood me to say, specie, which may account for the smallness of your contributions.'—You will prove, I hope, in your present contribution, that you are no longer laboring under the same mistake.'

Ice in the Delaware.—The steamboat Bolivar, Capt. Whitlin, on her passage down this morning from Burlington, was prevented from landing at that place, owing to the accumulation of ice in the river near the wharf. Some persons walked from the shore in company with a small boat, which they intended as a safe-guard against the accident of falling through, but the ice firmly sustained them until they reached the open channel, where having launched the boat, they safely reaced the steamboat.—Phil. Gaz.

An Arrival.—About noon to-day, the steamboat North America, Whitaker, master, with a cargo of flour, entered from Detroit. The North America came in a crippled condition, having her larboard shaft broken off close to the centre.

Following the North America came the schr. Franklin and Constitution, with 1200 barrels of flour to G. Davis & Co. Both the latter draft loaded at Chicago, and have been absent several weeks.

Capt. Dorr of the brig Erie, came passenger and reports his vessel with 1,400 bbls, flour laid up at Detroit. The Indiana is harbored for the winter at St. Josephs, and the Queen Charlotte is in winter quarters at Chicago, Capt. Whitaker, remains with his boat here during the winter.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

Census of Michigan.—Returns of the census from every county in the State, with the exception of Saginaw, a very small one, have been received by the Marshal. The entire population of the State is not far from 212,000 inhabitants. If the number necessary for a member of Congress is not fixed at a higher number than 60,000, Michigan will consequently have three Representatives. According to the present regulation she would be entitled to four and to six Electoral votes, so great has been her increase since her admission into the Union.

New Brunswick, Monday, 3 P. M.

Mr. Abraham Suydam, the President of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of this city, has been missing since Thursday last and the greatest apprehensions are entertained for his fate, by his family and friends. He is reported as a gentleman who has never heretofore left his family for a few hours of an evening, without apprising them of the cause of his absence, and where he was going. His fate is a mystery, and excites great speculation.

We have made enquiries in every quarter where we thought information could be obtained, but have been unable to learn any thing reliable in addition to the above

From the Detroit Daily Advertiser.

A WHOLESALE LAND PIRACY IN OAKLAND COUNTY, MICHIGAN.

The most wholesale and daring robbery and outrage which has disgraced our State, took place in the town of Highland, Oakland county, on Sunday week. Phineas L. Davis, Esq., of this city, has a farm in that town. Mr. D. had been at a heavy expense to stock it with the best breeds of cattle, hogs, &c., and had succeeded in securing one of the best stocked farms in the county. But, in a single hour, by the plunderings of a ruthless band of daring scoundrels, the acquisitions of years have been destroyed.

It appears that on Sunday morning of last week, before day-light, twenty-five men, armed with knives and other missiles, came to the farm in wagons, and without any ceremony, proceeded to the barns and outhouses, and killed some 20 hogs—drove off some 20 or 30 others—four fine horses—one double wagon and harness—1 bull—23 sheep—600 bushels of oats—300 bushels of corn—besides several harrows, ploughs, and other farming utensils; and worse than all, ripped open several fine breeding sows of the Berkshire breed, by which brutal act between 60 and 80 pigs were destroyed!

Immediate information of this wholesale robbery was brought to Mr. Davis, who at once proceeded to the scene of plunder; and, after several days of persevering effort, succeeded in arresting nineteen of the thieves—all of whom were indicted by the Grand Jury in session at Pontiac. The residue of the gang will probably soon be arrested.

Such a daring robbery as this, is well calculated to excite alarm. It is so glaringly outrageous as to be almost incredible. Indeed, had we not the clearest evidence of the truth of the facts we have given, we should conceive it impossible that they could have occurred in a civilized community.

The Schoolmaster Wanting.—In the county of Rockingham, Virginia, as shown by the late census, there are 1394 white persons, over 20 years of age, who can neither read nor write!

DIED.

On the 26th ult., at Lost Creek, Harrison county, Va., Mrs. ELIZABETH HOFFMAN, at a very advanced age, after a most distressing illness of sixteen hours. The deceased was held in high estimation by her acquaintances, and had been a member of the Seventh-day Baptist church on Lost Creek, between thirty and forty years. In her last moments her mind was stayed on the Redeemer, and she conversed with her friends with great composure, telling them not to mourn her loss, but to prepare to meet her in heaven. May the departure of this mother in Israel, teach others the necessity of being ready, also, for their change. Comm.

Medicines! Medicines!!

TO FAMILIES.

S. D. DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public, for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

G. A. BARTHOLICK & Co's

MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made. Since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser, and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an untold amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given way to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TALE OF THE REVOLUTION.

SUGGESTED BY THE LATE CELEBRATION AT BUNKER HILL.

BY MRS. M. L. GARDINER.

"Oh! is not this a favored spot,
'Tis the high place of Freedom's birth;
God of our fathers, is it not
The holiest spot of all the earth!"

I said, as I gazed on the immense multitude which crowded Boston heights, on the late memorable and glorious celebration. It was a day of uncommon loveliness; a morning without clouds. The sun, as if exulting on the occasion, appeared in his most brilliant attire, and cast a flood of the purest light over the whole heavens. The air was soft and balmy; the atmosphere exhilarating; as if filled with the wild harpings of martyred souls, who hovered around, and chimed their sweet response to the many thousands there congregated. Amid that immense throng, my attention was particularly arrested by an aged man, who supported himself, partly by the fence on which he leaned, and partly by his staff. He gazed around upon the multitude; then raised his eyes to the noble spire, which towered in all the majesty of American glory; and, covering his face with his hands, wept, in the fullness of his soul.

I approached him with caution and deep respect; for there was a sacredness in his tears, which inspired me with awe, as I gazed upon his venerable form, bent with infirmity, while over his sunken temples the silvery locks flowed carelessly in the breeze. After the throng had dispersed, and the noise and shouts of the populace had ceased, although surrounded with loveliness and beauty, (for never were brighter eyes seen, in this land of song, than sparkled that day on that consecrated ground) I tore myself from the fascination of their charms, and followed the aged veteran, determined, if possible, to learn the cause of his emotion. He was among the last who left the enchanted spot, when, casting his eyes upward, he exclaimed, "Stand thou there, thou noble spire, a lasting monument of our nation's glory, and a terror to every foreign foe! Lay your foundations deep, for the soil on which you stand was moistened by the choicest blood of my country." He tottered under the mingled emotions of his heart, and would have fallen had I not caught his arm; for in his enthusiasm he had raised his hand, and the staff on which he leaned had dropped. I picked it up and presented it to him. He received it with gratitude—and as he walked along, I accompanied him.

"This is a proud day for America," I remarked, "and the excitement will be long felt by those who witnessed the interesting scene."

Looking upon me with surprise, he replied, "A proud day, indeed. I can remember well, when a foreign foe paraded through these streets, and brave-hearted colonists met the points of their bayonets."

"You are weary," said I, "and if you will permit me to convey you to your home, I will order a carriage, and take you there."

"You are near my home," said he, pointing to a neat white house, but a little distance from the road, "and if you will enter my humble dwelling, I will tell you a story which will ever be fresh in my mind, and which this day's scene, old as I am, has rendered vivid in my remembrance."

He was received at the door by an intelligent looking woman, who politely invited me to enter, which I did. Seated in his easy chair, surrounded by myself, Mrs. ——, and two fine lads, who, with their cheeks glowing with health and beauty, had just returned from the all-absorbing monument, he related the following narrative:

"My name is Sedney; my forefathers were among those who were treated with rigor and cruelty during the reign of Elizabeth, Queen of England, and in the commencement of the reign of James, the First, fled from the kingdom to Holland. After remaining there a few years, they sailed for America, and in 1620, arrived in Plymouth, where the first permanent settlement was made in New England. The colony then was small; they landed amid all the perils and privations of a barren shore, and labored under various difficulties in erecting habitations for their wives and children. At the time Gov. Winthrop and others came over, they brought the charter of the colony and founded Boston. My grandfather at that time became a resident of this town; he suffered much on account of the hostilities of the Indians, and lived through those days of terror and oppression which tried the patriot spirits of our fathers. He had but one child, Frederick Sidney, who was the father of three sons, James, Henry, myself, and one daughter. He inherited all the energy of his father, and was one of the bravest men of the colony; he was among the first who rose up against the taxation imposed upon the colonies. The stamp act he deprecated; and helped muffle the bells, when the knell of freedom was tolled in this place.

"He was determined with others to resist the enforcement of British laws, and when the bill was repealed in England, by our bold defender, William Pitt, he assisted in firing the cannon, and aided in all the festivities of joy; was one of those fearless ones, who disguised in their Indian costume, poured the tea into the ocean, and came home rejoicing. My eldest brother, (who was married to one of the most lovely of women,) accompanied him. I can remember well, how my father spake to my mother as he entered, 'Come, Isabel, make me some toast, and bring me some pure cold water; I had rather drink it until I die, than submit to British task masters.' And I can remember how she spread that oaken table with a cloth, white as the pure snow of heaven, and with what pleasure she listened to his relation of that daring attempt, as the tears fell from her eyes, on the head of my young sister, who stood by her side. On the 5th of Sept. 1774, my father was among the delegates, who met in Congress, at Philadelphia. Their session continued eight weeks. Many and long were the speeches there made; theirs was burning eloquence, their patriotism was pure, flowing from hearts firm in the cause of freedom. Their sound reasonings and ardent vindication of their rights, caused many of the British parliament to favor their cause, particularly Mr. Pitt, who spake in the highest terms of the Congress. My eldest brother, James, was a captain in the militia, my brother Henry was a bold, intrepid lieutenant, and I was 18 years of age. Great was the excitement among us. We began to train ourselves to the use of the sword and musket, and were among the 12,000 men who stood ready to march at a moment's warning; determined not to submit, but maintain our rights against the most powerful nation in the world.

"At this time, the Colonists had collected a quantity of provisions and military stores at Concord, which Gen. Gage resolved to destroy. This news spread like electricity, and bells and signal guns gave the alarm.—My father and brother were at the battle of Lexington, and heard Maj. Pitcairn exclaim, 'Disperse, you rebels.' Well I remember when Col. Ethan Allen demanded the surrender of Ticonderoga, and took it without resistance. And why? Because he demanded it in the name of the great JEHOVAH! who fought our battles, and gave us the victory! Yes, the victory!"

Here the old gentleman paused, and, raising his eyes, exclaimed, "O, Liberty! Liberty! how dearly thou wert purchased!—For thee, the brightest flowers were withered that ever bloomed in this western Arcadia. For thee, men fell, whose hearts were firm as thine own mountains. For thee, mothers' cheeks became blanched, and the young, and the lovely, wept over their heart's first love, beneath the moon's pale beams, and mingled their soul's deep symphonies with the breeze of evening. Congress again assembled in May, 1775, when John Hancock was chosen President, and voted that an army of 20,000 men should be raised, under the command of the immortal WASHINGTON. Many a night have we sat in close debate, and many and fervent were the prayers offered under my paternal roof. My brother's wife, as I have before mentioned, was truly lovely, and she was ardently attached to her husband. Often have I seen her twine her affectionate arms around his neck, the tears flowing like rain from her beautiful eyes, and exclaim, 'I love you, James, and I love my country; be faithful to its cause, and when Peace spreads her soft banner over us, may we with our sweet little one rest in calm security beneath its flowing banners.' My mother possessed a true Roman spirit, while her heart was filled with the finest sensibilities of woman. How often have I seen her weep as she wiped the dust from our muskets, and smile through her tears as she gave them to us, saying, 'Never for sake your cause; be firm—be faithful!' The evening preceding the eventful battle on Bunker Hill, we sat around our table, for the last time, together. We gazed uqon each other in silence. My mother spoke not, but her countenance was voluminous with feelings too deep for utterance.—My sister, paler than the mountain lily, looked upon her husband with intense affection, as the tears fell fast on her sleeping babe, which lay cradled on her bosom; she rested her head upon her hand, waiting for the usual blessing to be implored. My father attempted to speak, but could not: the solemnity of death reigned in that peaceful dwelling, broken only by sighs from the heart's deep fountain. At length, my aged grandfather, lifting his trembling hands, and raising his trembling eyes to heaven, prayed that 'God would give us the victory over our enemies, bless us together, bless us when separated, and finally, gather us, an unbroken band in heaven.' It was our last meal, and it was a cheerful one; like the Israelites of old, it was eaten with bitter herbs. The hour of separation had come! My father and brothers were to leave immediately, and commence operations on Breed's Hill, at midnight. We separated amid sobs and groans! As the door closed on those beloved ones, my mother sunk beside my aged sire, and buried her face in his knees; he laid his clasped hands upon her head, and bowed his silvered brow in silence, and incense, pure and holy, ascended from their souls' deep orisons! As I received from the arms of my sister her sleeping babe, her blue eyes opened from her tranquil slumbers amid this scene of anguish, as the light of heaven gleams forth amid the darkness of the gathering tempests. Oh! 'twas a night of thrilling interest, one I shall never cease to remember!" exclaimed the old man with excitement.—"The morning was ushered in by the roar of artillery, and every house-top, hill, and street, was crowded with anxious spectators. I need not tell you how nobly they fought, how repeatedly they vanquished the foe; I need not say how they retreated, overcome by numbers. There the brave Warren fell—and with him—my two brothers!"—

But never were my feelings more strongly excited, and my heart more deeply touched, than while listening to the narrative of the descendant of those who fled from the cruel rage of oppression, and found an asylum—

"Where the star-spangled banner in triumph doth wave, O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave!"

SAG HARBOR, L. I., Oct. 24, 1840.

RUNAWAY POND.

This is a name given to a place in the town of Glover, Orleans county, Vt.; not where there is now a pond, but from which, as the name intimates, a pond once ran away. The facts in regard to this spot were published in 1810, but may by many be forgotten. There was a pond of water about three miles in length, and half a mile in breadth, from which issued a small stream running to the south, and mingling in its course with the waters that flow into the Connecticut river. There was another small stream taking its rise a little to the north and west of this pond, the waters of which were discharged to the north, falling into Barton river, and finally finding their way through lake Memphremagog into the St. Lawrence. On this stream there was a mill; and the owner having viewed the make of the ground to the north end or head of the pond, and finding its elevation so small as to oppose but a trifling obstacle to its running in that direction, conceived the idea of turning its course to the north, so as to aid in the operations of his mill. Accordingly on the 4th of July, himself and a number of others, went with spades and shovels and commenced digging. They very soon found that a few inches from the surface there was nothing but quicksand, and the moment the water began to run in that direction, this gave way very rapidly, cutting a channel, and the whole water of the pond soon appeared to run to that point—the banks of the new stream, caving in, were swept on by the flood, so that the party were only able to escape with their lives. The owner of the mill seeing at once that there might be more water than he desired, and that his mill might be in danger, very judiciously made a rapid movement in advance of the water, and arrived just in time to apprise his wife of her danger, and enabled her to escape from the mill which she was attending in her husband's absence. As the flood moved onward, it bore down every thing that opposed its progress, taking along trees, earth, and rocks, and in narrow places in the valley, the moving mass would rise often to the height of fifty or sixty feet and again reaching a broader place would spread out and leave immense masses of timber, stones, and earth, which, after a lapse of 28 years, are still visible.

The beholder, who was not apprised of what had been done, was struck with absolute amazement, as the water, the moving cause, was wholly invisible. He saw trees, of all sizes, and every other substance, which could be accumulated, rolling onward; roaring and crashing and shaking the hills, and leaving perfect desolation in its course—the forest and the morass were both obliterated, the hills were laid low and the valleys were exalted. It swept in this way some 20 miles, the whole distance to lake Memphremagog, where, finding nothing to resist its course, it gradually mingled its placid waters, having erected at every step the most enduring monuments of its resistless power.

The width of the track of this flood was from six or eight rods to near half a mile. When the mighty torrent, rolling onward, stuck the mill, for whose benefit this "letting out of waters" was crushed into atoms, and so completely obliterated that not a vestige has ever been found. There was only here and there a solitary tree left to show that a forest had been there. In one of them a fish was found 20 feet from the ground.

Among the extraordinary and almost incredible exhibitions of the power of this flood, is the fact that a rock was moved about half a mile, the estimated weight of which was fifty tons!

The pond lay between the mountains, occupying the whole space, and on being drained it was found to have been seventy feet in depth. Through the bed of "Runaway Pond," the whole three miles, there is now a road leading to Montpelier. The town of Glover has been greatly benefitted by the opening of this road. A delightful little village now occupies ground that was made by the flood. It may be asked what was the fate of the inhabitants below?—The answer is, that 29 years ago there was not a house and no building except the mill, in the track over which the flood passed. Runaway Pond will long continue an object of much curiosity, and the history of its unceremonious exit will continue to be told in generations yet to come.—Boston Weekly Magazine.

A THRILLING STORY.—A thrilling story is going the rounds of the papers, taken from the "Naval and Military Magazine," which, stripped of all embelishment, is to the following purport: On the day of the ever-memorable battle of Waterloo, Captain Walter Leslie's young bride, Helen, with feelings more easily to be imagined than described, took her seat at a window overlooking the field of that dreadful conflict; but being within reach of random shot, she, with the other inmates, retired to a barn as a place of more safety, and there remained in anxious suspense during the whole day. Some time in the night Capt. Bryan was brought to the barn, badly wounded. Helen, with the necessaries which her forebodings had suggested, tenderly dressed young Bryan's wounds, and after his revival, ventured to enquire after her Walter. Bryan's evasive answer but too fatally portended the worst. She begged him to tell her the circumstances, for she knew her husband was dead. Bryan then stated that just before going into action, Capt. Leslie thrust a small Bible into his bosom, charging him that if he fell in action, faithfully to deliver the sacred relic to his beloved Helen. But few moments elapsed before he did fall. After learning from Bryan the spot at which Walter fell, she went alone in the night, lantern in hand, into the field of the dead and dying, amidst the plunging of wounded horses and other frightful sights, in search of the remains of her beloved. On the point of returning, in despair of finding the object of her anxious search among such a mass of carnage, her attention was drawn to an outstreched hand, on which was found the well known ring of her husband, who was partly buried beneath a pile of other bodies. Whilst alone engaged in the release of the object of her affection, two soldiers, sent by Capt. Bryan, came to her assistance, and bore "Acastor's dear remains" to the same room with the wounded Captan. The Surgeon, applying a glass to the lips of Leslie, declared that he yet lived. The shock of joy was too great for the delicate system of Helen; one vacant stare, and she fell lifeless on the floor, several hours being spent in restoring her to sensibility, and the embrace of her fond Walter. The small Bible was presented to Leslie by Helen on their wedding day; neither of them dreaming that the Holy Book was to be the salvation of the Captain's temporal life. The ball aimed at his bosom spent its force in the folds of the Bible, which is now religiously preserved in the family, as a perpetual memorial of that extraordinary Providence.—Raleigh Register.

RELIGIOUS.

MARTIN LUTHER'S LAST PRAYER.

Among the impressive memorials of the great German Reformer, Martin Luther, the prayer inserted in his last will and testimony, is equally characteristic and edifying. It is found in Melchior Adam's history, and the translation of it which I now send will be acceptable to all true Protestants.

LUTHER'S DYING PETITION AND TRUST.—"O Lord God, I thank thee that thou wouldst have me to be poor and a beggar upon the earth. I have no house, land, possession, or money to leave. Thou hast given me a wife and children. To thee I return them. O! nourish, teach, and save them, as hitherto thou hast me, O Father of the fatherless, and Judge of the widow! O my Heavenly Father, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the God of all consolation, I thank thee that thou hast revealed thy Son Jesus Christ to me, in whom I have believed, whom I have professed, whom I have loved, whom I have celebrated; and whom the Pope of Rome and all the wicked do persecute and reproach. I pray thee, O Lord Jesus Christ, now receive my soul! My Heavenly Father, although I am taken out of this life, though I must now lay down this body; yet I certainly know that I shall dwell with thee forever, neither can I by any power be plucked out of thine hands. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.—John iii. 16; x. 28. The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me.—II Tim. iv. 6–8. Even so; come Lord Jesus. Amen."

It may not be known to some of your readers that a lineal descendant of the great Reformer Luther is now a citizen of New York; and that his phisiognomy is very much like the family portrait of that dauntless Boanerges, who defied the "Devil, Pope, and Pagan," with his immortal declaration—"Ich stehe hier! Ich kann nicht anders! Gott hif mir!—"Here I stand! I cannot otherwise act! God help me! Amen."—This prayer was answered in shouts of victory.—Religious Intelligencer.

OUR BEST PRAYERS.—It is possible that those very prayers of ours of which we are most ashamed, are the most pleasing to the Lord, and for that reason, because we are ashamed of them. When we are favored with what we call enlargement, we come away tolerably satisfied with ourselves, and think we have done well. A thought of that sort, so contrary to the brokenness and abasement of spirit which becomes a pardoned dependent sinner, may be more justly offensive to the Lord, than all that darkness, confusion, and wandering, which we bewail, but cannot remedy. What is the proper attainment of an advanced and veteran believer, which distinguishes him from a young convert? Is it that he has a greater command of his own thoughts,—that he has at length acquired some kind of sufficiency to maintain a spiritual frame of mind, and to stand proof against surrounding temptations? Or is it not rather that, from what he has seen and felt in the course of his experience, he has acquired a quicker and more abiding sense of his own nothingness, and the desperate deceitfulness and wickedness of his heart, than he could possibly be possessed of at his first setting out; and therefore has made a nearer approach to the character of a broken and contrite spirit, which the Lord speaks of as his peculiar delight?—It seems to me that they are the greatest Christians who are most sensible of their own weakness—are brought most into the spirit of a little child, and to whom, of course, Jesus, in all his characters and offices, is more immediately necessary and precious. When we are thus weak, we are strong. In this way we die to self; and instead of being impatient and uneasy (as we once were,) that we have neither wisdom, strength, nor righteousness of our own, we are glad to be nothing, that Christ may be more illustriously manifested to be All in All. Surely, had I only needed him now and then to help me (as we say) at a dead lift, I could not have felt myself so much indebted to him, as by having found myself unable to take one step, or to think one thought aright, without him from first to last.—Rev. John Newton's Twenty-five Letters.

A LEARNED MINISTRY.—The late Rev. John Griffin of England said,

"There cannot be a greater mistake, than to suppose that Christianity has any thing to fear from learning. Thirty years ago, I was afraid that the increase of knowledge would lead to an increase of scepticism; but I have learnt, by more extensive reading and reflection, that all the knowledge we have obtained from astronomy, geography, the manners and customs of the East, languages, and history, has only contributed to establish the truth of the Scriptures.

I feel four times a week preaching to be hard work. I write more, and study my sermons more than I ever did. I feel I must. The people are now, in a measure, instructed. The young people as it were, are now in the prime of life, of fancy, memory, and judgment; and it requires fagging to keep ahead of them.

The ministry of an uneducated preacher is generally partial. He is in danger of being governed by his feelings, more than by an enlightened and comprehensive judgment; and of so admiring one class of doctrines and truths, as, if not to obliterate, yet very much to obscure others equally important. He is in danger of making of undue weight and importance some favorite themes, and he will be liable to despise other ministers and authors who do not take and give the same partial views of subjects. A partial ministry is generally defective."

He complained, in his late years, that "the compression of so much matter into each discourse, as his close previous study and his comprehensiveness of thinking had induced, and then the taxing of the memory to produce its stores in the pulpit, tended to impede the free exercise of the other faculties, and to obstruct that spontaneousness of feeling and address, which is the very life and soul of preaching; that in adding so much to the weight of instruction, he lessened his power of impression. The mass of thought with which the mind was filled, interfered too much with the agility of its movements. The quantity provided was too great for use. "Keep a channel open," he would say to young ministers, "for the current of your feelings, and do not be afraid to let them flow out."

To a person who regretted to the celebrated Dr. Samuel Johnson that he had not been a clergyman, because he considered the life of a clergyman an easy and comfortable one, the doctor made this memorable reply: "The life of a CONSCIENTIOUS clergyman is not easy. I have always considered a clergyman as the Father of a larger family than he is able to maintain. No, sir, I do not envy a clergyman's life as an easy life, nor do I envy the clergyman who makes it an easy life."

FOR THE FARMER.

THE CORN CROP.

For a great number of years there has not been a finer season for Corn than the past. Every where the eye is greeted with the cheering sight of golden ears, a prospect than which there is none more grateful to the heart of the husbandman, or speaking more conclusively of abundance for man and beast. Some apprehensions were entertained, in a few places, that the corn would suffer from drouth; but we are convinced such instances will be rare. The proportion in which corn suffers from wet and cold, compared with injury from heat and drouth, is as ninety-nine to one hundred. Corn is a plant that without great heat never arrives at maturity, and clouds and rains are invariably productive of low temperature and soft corn. The third week in August, averaged a greater degree of heat than any week since we commenced our tables, and corn ripened with a rapidity that demonstrated how congenial such a temperature was found. Nearly all kinds of corn have ripened here at the north, and the earlier kinds gave ears for roasting and boiling by the time in which they have been generally received from Delaware or Long Island. Unless we are much mistaken, very great yields of this fine grain will be this year reported. The seasons for two or three years have been rather unpropitious to the large eared corns, such as the Dutton and large white; but never have we witnessed finer specimens of corn than the former now exhibits in many fields of this section of the United States. Of all the crops cultivated by the American farmer, there is not a richer looking one than the well cultivated corn-field presents, when during the dry and balmy air of the Indian summer, the husks fall from the ear, and thick standing corn gives the semblance of fields of waiving gold.

Last spring we procured from Gov. HILL, of New-Hampshire, a bushel of the celebrated Brown corn, which is such a deserved favorite in that region, and of which such large crops have been there frequently, within a few years, grown. This corn we divided with two of our farming friends, and we are gratified to state that with all it has fully sustained its high reputation. It is a capital corn and no mistake. Owing to some delay in the transmission, the corn did not reach us until so late a period that many fields planted with the common varieties of corn were fit for the first hoeing. Under these circumstances, the corn had the best chance that could be given at a period too late for any extra preparation. In forty days from planting, some had showed its tassels; in fifty it had silked, and it came forward to maturity with such rapidity, that notwithstanding the lateness of the planting, the corn will be of excellent quality. Our experience the present year has convinced us, had additional proof been required, that there is little use in planting corn on ground not thoroughly manured, or that is not in a good state of dryness and pulverization. Much is depending on the start which corn gets at its first germination. If the ground is rich, dry, and warm, the corn springs quick and vigorous, the roots strike quickly, and it escapes many dangers to which it is exposed, when it germinates slowly, comes up weak and sickly, and appears as if hesitating between life and death.

We have again seen the value of manure from the hog-pen tested in comparison with others, and its superiority is as apparent as heretofore. The man who wastes the manure of his hog-pen, or who does not, by giving them weeds, stable grass, or fresh earth, furnish the means of increaing it as much as possible, is sadly neglectful of his own interest. Attention to this point will materially add to the gains of fattening pigs.

Considered in reference to the whole United States, it will be found that the corn crop is very little, if any, inferior in importance and value, to the wheat crop. It furnishes to New-England a large part of its bread, and the south relies upon it almost wholly. In the former, the culture of wheat is considered too uncertain to be profitable; and in the south the weevil destroys the berry after harvest, or the heat sours flour so quickly, that corn alone can be depended upon for bread. As food for animals, it is unrivalled; and though good pork can be made without corn, every farmer knows that with it, it can be made much quicker, and of a superior quality, than without it. Such a crop, then, of Indian corn as we are favored with the present season, furnishes abundant cause for gratulation in many respects.—Cultivator.

ECONOMY.—There is now a rich man in the county of Monroe, N. Y., who was once a poor apprentice-boy at the blacksmith trade. Though he has spent very much time in preaching the gospel freely, and given much for benevolent purposes, he has always succeeded well in his temporal concerns. He once remarked to the writer, "I will tell you how I have succeeded. I never pay a sixpence for any thing which I do not absolutely need, nor purchase that which I can make or provide for myself in a leisure hour. Nor do I ever allow a sixpence to be lost which I can save. For example," said he, "twenty-five years ago I saw a man nail up a small piece of upper leather and rub the flesh side of it smartly with a pewter spoon, and then use it for a razor strop. Ever since, I have found it the best strop for putting an edge upon a razor or a knife, and thus I have saved some one or two dollars. In this or a similar way I save much, which is always on interest."

Now, if all Christians would always study to use strict economy in all things, how much they might save annually to advance the Kingdom of Christ. "Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost," was the direction of the Savior.—Morning Star.

THE DYING THIEF.

PARAPHRASED FROM THE GERMAN OF THOLUCK.

Is it possible, you may ask—can the last gasping breath of the profligate who is but just able to cry out for mercy—can this ward off the punishment of transgression, and silence the loud cry of guilt to heaven for vengeance? Is it then so, that there are no sins—spots so dark that they cannot be washed away by the solitary tear that falls from the eye of the dying transgressor? Happy then am I in the ways of self-indulgence! Deep will I drink of the cup of pleasure at the brim, of which I have hitherto only moistened my lips. Ardently will I grasp after gold and greatness of which I have sometimes been afraid, lest they should eat my soul as with fire. Blessed thought! that I may have my portion in both worlds—the joys of sin here, and salvation hereafter! Eagerly then will I first grasp this world!—Eagerly will I first pluck the sweet poison-flowers of time, and then, when I have done with these, it will be time enough for the spotless lillies—the unfading flowers of eternity! But stop presuming mortal! you are too fast in thus changing the brightness of heaven which gathers round the dying and penitent thief, into what would make it, to yourself, the lurid reflection of the flames of hell! It is true, indeed, that the gospel teaches that in the very interval of death—between, as it were, its lightning's flash and stroke, there is time to secure salvation. It is true that the Savior declares, Whosoever cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." And all this, so far from being a wonder, is the very essence and glory of the gospel. It is but the divine teaching of that faith, no matter when exercised, is the sure means of salvation—that it opens the heart to the Redeemer that justifies, and to the Spirit that sanctifies, so that eternal life is sure. And yet in the wide history of the Bible, there is but one recorded case like this—but one death-escape from sin and wrath. There is one that none may despair, and but one, that none may presume. Dare not, then, to build upon it! Like the lottery-chance, it may feed your hopes for a little while, but in the end it will blight them, and ruin you.

"The blind man, who, as he rushes towards the precipice, is suddenly restored to sight, and who with lifted arms and joyful heart springs back with untold thankfulness from the abyss," seizes and overwhelms with tears of rapture the good hand that opened his eyes, and will never let it go. But will you make no distinction between this blind man, and one that knows the precipice is before him, though he may not see precisely where, and who will not receive the kind hand that would open his eyes, but thrust it away in neglect; perhaps in contempt till a more convenient season? And how do you know; blind man that hand will ever come again to you? Do you dream that it will come just when you want it—whenever you may resolve to become penitent—to shed a few tears of sorrow—to try to exercise faith? Ah! blind man! that hand is not in mortal keeping. Its comings and goings are not at human control. Those tears of penitence, the sweetest and holiest of all tears, they do not flow whenever your will may. Have you not heard that God's spirit may be grieved, and that then the heart may be glazed to feeling, and the eyes to tears? Have you not heard of those that abuse the grace of God, that they are given over to hardness of heart, and to a reprobate mind? Believe it, and tremble as you do; believe it, "in the inward life of the sinner to whom God would have given the sighing of repentance and the blessed trust of faith, and he would not receive the gift, to him there will come hours of heedless slumbering," when the breast shall no more sigh, and the eye shall no more weep, and "the hands though they may fold themselves convulsively, shall not be able to extort a prayer." Agonies of conviction, deep as those of crucifixion, may be upon him, but like the thief on the left, he shall not be brought by them to repentence. Wishes may grope through the universe, and find nothing on which to fasten. The anchor of longing desire shall be thrown out, but it shall find no ground beneath the waves on which to fix, even when hope is shipwrecked and the soul is lost! Be not, O! be not deceived. God is not mocked! The Holy Spirit moving you to repentance is a tender spirit. Once driven away, it comes reluctantly, rarely, perhaps never again! Remember it is written of those who do evil that good may come, that even their damnation is just. Beware, then, of delay in the matter of your soul's salvation.—Chase not the fleeting shadows of time, when you know not where you may spend your eternity! Beware of putting off repentance, lest yours be the end and the doom, not of the thief on the right, but of the one on the left.

MASSILON.—Louis XIV. said one day to Massilon, after hearing him preach at Versailles: "Father, I have heard many great orators in this chapel; I have been highly pleased with them; but for you, when ever I hear you, I go away displeased with myself; for I see more of my own character." This has been considered the finest encomium ever bestowed upon a preacher.

Knowledge, you must remember, is the fruit of patient observation and study, not of spontaneous growth.—Litchfield.

From the Cincinnati Observer.

REV. MR. WALKER:—At your request I send you an extended account of the Bethel and Sabbath Convention. To prevent wrong impressions, I wish the reader to take special notice of the following particulars:—

1. What I give, is not a report of the speeches, but only the leading opinions of the speakers expressed in their own words so far as I could recollect them. I am no stenographer, and some of the speakers, Dr. Beecher, for instance, can no more be reported than Whitefield's thunder-storm could be published.

2. There would often happen a little moving, etc., in the house which prevented my following a speaker through. This was the case with Mr. Mills, who spoke briefly but with much justness and weight.

3. I have taken small pains to write out the observations of those who read reports to the Convention, which reports will be published. This was the case with Dr. Stowe, Powell and Stillman.

4. I have written out the remarks of Mr. Sawyer, Mr. Rankin, and myself, nearly as they were delivered. Because the sentiments uttered in them seemed to me specially important, merely, I suppose, because they corresponded with my own views.

This information was necessary lest the reader should do injustice to the speakers in this Convention, which Dr. Beecher said he regarded as the most important ever held in Cincinnati; and Rev. Mr. Brooke thought it contained more religious influence concentrated, than any he had ever attended in the West. Yours in Christ,

J. BLANCHARD.

BETHEL AND SABBATH CONVENTION.

This Convention met as called in the 1st Presbyterian church in this city, Nov. 19, 1840. A larger number of delegates attended than was anticipated by its friends, from Virginia, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York. For particulars as the roll and appointments of officers, committee, etc., see the official report.

While the committee were out, a discussion was had on the general question of Sabbath observance, under a resolution proposed by W. Slocum of Marietta, in favor of establishing a line of Sabbath-keeping boats on the Ohio.

Rev. Mr. Grundy, of Maysville, Ky., observed that the great obstacle in the way of the reform contemplated, was the traveling on that day by professed Christians. He felt deeply on the subject—hoped there would be a free and full expression of views by delegates, and that something efficient would be done.

Rev. Mr. Chamberlin, of Decatur co., Ia., said that the Sabbath was a fundamental institution; that all other valuable institutions must stand or fall with it. That it was not to be concealed that church-members—that even ministers sustaining their standing in presbyteries broke that holy day by traveling when abroad, and were received, and never questioned by their respective churches for the violation, when they arrive at home. A change of public sentiment was imperiously demanded, and must be had if Sabbath desecration ever ceased. Its violators must be put out of the pale of the church, or nothing would be done to purpose. For no sin could ever be removed from the community which was tolerated in the church. (Mr. Chamberlin spoke at some length with much warmth.)

Rev. S. Holmes, Agt. Bible Society,—Had understood and doubted not that the hands of the Western clergy had been weakened, by ministers and members of churches traveling on the Sabbath on coming West. He would say, however, that there were many difficult practical questions arose in aiming to keep the Sabbath. That he had himself traveled by steam-boat upon the Sabbath, in passing from Cincinnati to Maysville. The boat being stranded upon a bar, was got off after dark Saturday night—a wilderness was on either bank—that he might have "sat down under a juniper tree if he had gone ashore—but though painfully agitated as to his duty, he kept the boat, and was landed at Maysville on the Sabbath. He made these observations to take off the edge of some observations which might seem a little harsh as they fell from Rev. Mr. Chamberlain.

Rev. S. W. Lynde, Pastor of 9th st. Baptist church,—Was glad to hear the proposition to address ministers. But he thought we ought to be careful how we approach them. The minds of many people were not fully instructed on the subject of the Sabbath; and we should be careful not to close their minds against the truth by hasty or intemperate measures. He was struck with an anecdote told him by Judge Holman of Indiana, of a Baptist member with whose use of strong drink the church bore near three years, and at the first church meeting after his reformation, he introduced a resolution to expel all who continued in the use of strong drink! He had reflected much on this anecdote, and thought we might all learn wisdom from it.

Rev. Dyer Burgess, West Union, O.,—Thought that society needed a thorough reformation on the subject of the Sabbath, and it should begin with clergymen. He thought that men with black coats ought, by church discipline to be compelled to keep the Sabbath; and that the men with black skins ought to be permitted to keep it.

——— Armstrong, Esq., of Ky.,—Hoped they were not to be taunted with negroes in that Convention. Did any one suppose there was a Christian in all the land who compelled his black people to labor on the Sabbath?

Rev. Mr. Sehon, M. E. church, Cincinnati,—Concurred in the sentiments last expressed. He, for one, could not consent to be considered a member of a convention where such subjects were to be lugged in.

Rev. Mr. Johns, Episcopal church, Cincinnati,—Should feel himself constrained to withdraw from the convention if these subjects were forced upon their consideration.

Rev. T. A. Mills, Presbyterian church, Cincinnati,—Said that the law of the Sabbath was not explained and urged on the minds of the people as it ought to be. We had presented it too much as a matter of expediency, and men had neglected to observe it when they thought it expedient to do so. We could never accomplish the desired reform till men came to regard the subject as a divinely appointed institution.

Dr. C. E. Stowe, Lane Seminary,—Wondered that those employed on our lines of public conveyance, retained as much intelligence and correct principle as they did; shut out, as by their calling they were, from the means of moral and religious instruction. And what shall become of this land, when there existed no force to compel men to social order, filled, as in process of time it must be, with men who had no chance of enjoying that culture which restrains the selfish and corrupt passions of men. It was a circumstance greatly aggravating, that our public men, by their example and official station gave sanction to the ruinous practice of Sabbath-labor. The stage, running by his house, rested one day in the week, but that day was not the first. The drivers and grooms had no Sabbath.—Petitions, signed by hundreds along the route, and by some of the postmasters, had been sent up to the head of the Department imploring a change in favor of the Sabbath, but they were unnoticed—entirely disregarded.

W. Slocum, Esq., Marietta,—Referring to the observations of Rev. M. Holmes, said, I also have in my life traveled on the Sabbath, but I mention it to my shame. I ought to have stopped and so had that brother. He suffered the same excuse to prevail, (difficulty of going ashore,) and was landed at the place of destination on the Sabbath; but he entered the town feeling very much as he should suppose a man would, if he had a stolen sheep on his back. It seemed as if every inhabitant of the place were gazing on him. No one who ever suffered as he did would do the like again. On the contrary, he had kept the Sabbath at the apparent hazard of being delayed on his journey three weeks, but always found and fully believed that the Lord would so order in his providence, that none should suffer by resting on that holy day.

Mr. Greene, Esq., Cincinnati,—Thought the Convention had misapprehended the true point of the Sabbath question—they had overlooked the main question, and were discussing unimportant details. He did not think it important whether a steam-boat traveled on that day. He could keep the Sabbath as well while the steam was on the boat as when off, and the boat was lying still. The boats in his opinion never could or would be stopped. He would recommend that Sabbath worship should be set up on every boat—that the engineers and firemen should ply their tasks, turn about, and each of them get a little of the preaching. That this class of persons were generally so corrupt, that it was useless for the boat to lie by to give them a Sabbath, as they would likely spend it at cards, &c.—But the attempt was impracticable. It was of no manner of use to think of stopping a boat on the Ohio.

Dr. Beecher replied,—No wonder the gentleman said he felt like a stranger. He was a stranger to the sentiments and feelings of members of that Convention, or he never could have uttered such opinions in their hearing. He was amazed that the gentleman should talk of the impracticability of stopping these Sabbath-desecrating conveyances, and yet propose to set up preaching on every steam-boat all over the West and the world. How would the multitudes upon multitudes which the future increase of our country's products and manufactories would turn into the carrying trade—how would the thousands upon thousands on the water, and on the shore, dragging their goods to and from the boat; how were all these to be taught the word of life, or instructed in the civil duties of law-abiding men? We had no power, nor did we desire it, to compel a steam-boat to stop. But the power of principle must do it, or we might as well employ a million of grave diggers to bury our nation's hopes, as the army of laborers on our lines of public conveyance, exiled from the conservative influence of the Sabbath, and the knowledge of the Word of God.

Evening Session.

Rev. J. Blanchard,—Thought there were but two questions presented by the subject in debate. 1. Does God require the keeping of a Sabbath? 2. What acts and practices are consistent, and what inconsistent with Sabbath-keeping?

There is no question of expediency and inexpediency, convenience and inconvenience to be settled, nor even of practicability and impracticability. The committee ought to use special care to keep these points in view. If they recommend the Sabbath chiefly because of its promised advantages or threatened disadvantages, every man will judge of his own convenience and profit. What if Sabbath-breaking will destroy this country?—What cares the bankrupt speculator for country if he must be a pauper in it? No. He wishes to replace the ten thousand dollars he has lost, and nothing will keep him from violating the Sabbath in his business, but the fear of offending God. Let us, then, receive those principles of truth by which God will compel human interests to revolve in their orbits where he designs they shall move. Let us take those doctrines which will shape human society after the model approved by God, and cry, "O earth, earth, earth! Hear ye the word of the Lord!" And men will hear, and the cap-stone of our temporal and eternal salvation from all sin shall speedily be brought forth with shouting.

Rev. Mr. Gillett here addressed the Convention to a resolution which he offered.—He was followed by Rev. Mr. Howell, Chamberlin, Wood, but the reporter was necessarily absent. When I returned, there was some discussion upon the propriety of a minister of the Gospel continuing upon a Sabbath-breaking boat, for the purpose of preaching to those on board, in which Messrs. Gillett, Powell, Beecher and Shipman took part; when,

Rev. C. Cook, Editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, said he thought it important that in relation to this subject just principles should be established. We should ascertain the right ground, and then maintain our position, kindly, yet firmly.—For himself, he believed that the silent influence of a minister of Christ leaving the boat on the Sabbath, in obedience to the command of God, would have a better influence upon the minds of the crew and passengers, than any sermon he might preach, should he remain on board.

Rev. Mr. Powell introduced a resolution, purporting that the success of Western Bethel effort was encouraging as to further and enlarged efforts; which he sustained by many important and interesting facts.

Our efforts, he observed, are only incipient. The boatman leaves, perhaps in early life, his home. He may travel twenty thousand miles on the Western waters and find but one Bethel inviting him to Sabbath rest and Sabbath worship. That station was here at Cincinnati.

(Mr. Powell continued for some time advancing the most important and convincing facts and arguments which will doubtless appear in the printed reports adopted by the Convention.) Adjourned.

WORLD WITHOUT END.

"World without end!" Children, did you ever consider the meaning of these words? Many of you hear them, over and over again, every Sunday; but there are few, perhaps, who try to understand them, or give to them a moment's serious thought.

"World without end!" Not the world in which we are living now, for the Bible tells us that it shall be destroyed in the great and terrible day of judgment: it is the world to come, the life that is after death, which shall last for ever and ever.

To the young, it seems a very long period when they look forward to ten or twenty years; while the old, who have experienced the rapid flight of time, will say that twenty years have passed over them like a dream. But neither young nor old can calculate the duration of eternity. The mind is lost in thinking of the thousands and thousands of years that will roll on, and yet when they are gone, eternity will be only just beginning; and tens of thousands and tens of millions will follow, but still eternity will be the same. It is from everlasting to everlasting, world without end!

Reader, through all those long, long years, and through ages after them, which you cannot count, your souls must live, either in a state of perfect bliss, or of hopeless, endless woe. For which are you now preparing? Have you been to Christ for the pardon of your sins? Do you pray for his Holy Spirit to change your heart, and make you a child of God? If not, your soul is in exceeding danger, for there is no other way by which you can be saved. Then seek the Savior without delay: for this life will soon be over, and unless you join God's people here, you will not hereafter be admitted into the happy number who shall surround his throne in heaven, there to unite in the song of praise and glory to the Lamb, world without end, for ever and ever.—London Child's Companion.

LOVE TO MOTHERS.

CHRIST LOVED HIS MOTHER.—The last thing I have to say about the character of Jesus Christ is, he loved his mother. The Savior was nailed to the cross; the whole weight of his body was suspended from his lacerated limbs; and here he had to hang, hour after hour, till life actually sunk under the power of suffering; but even here he did not forget his mother. He gave, in the most touching manner possible, his dearest friend a charge to be kind to her, to protect her, to take care of her as long as she should live. He did this, however, almost by a word; for under such circumstances it was torture to speak. "BEHOLD THY MOTHER." That was all; but it was enough. Now let me ask each one of my readers, whether young or old, who has a mother still in life, as you shut this book at the close of this paper, to go and devise some act of kindness and affection for her in imitation of the dying example which the Savior set us. Do something to cheer and comfort her; even if it is no very substantial act of kindness, it will bring gladness to her heart, as a memorial of your kindness and affection.—Abbott.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

History tells us, that Augustus, having twice witnessed the ingratitude of one of his subjects, softened him when a captive rebel, and changed him into a friend by a third time bestowing peculiar favors on him. Thus the emperor's treacherous friend was soon won to him; but man is not so soon won to God. The father has manifested forbearance; has uttered in his word entreaties and invitations; has borne with provocations, ingratitude, and insult; and yet is forgiving. To complete all, he gave his best beloved, the "brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person." He sent his Son; and thus, as it were, by one gift exhausted the treasurers of infinite benevolence: for further displaying love how could even God advance! The strange and matchless love thus manifested, he manifested also in the design he contemplated. He gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have eternal life. He would have manifested love, if he had consigned a world of rebels to non-existence; if when indignation and wrath had been merited, he had permitted the sinner to forget his guilt and its punishments in everlasting nothingness, and rendered death, what infidels would like it to be, an eternal sleep. But such was the father's love, he would, through the death of his Beloved, give life. And not a life like Adam's, lengthened to almost ten centuries, or ten thousand times as long, but eternal life: and delighting in the happiness of the pardoned rebels that becomes partakers of his salvation, he calls them to his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, and will bless them with eternal freedom from sorrows and from sins. O wonderful love of God! and wonderful wickedness of infatuated man, that slights and disregards such patient and unbounded love!

SURRENDER OF THE SOUL TO GOD.

Faith rolls the soul over on God, ventures into his hand, and rests satisfied concerning it, being there. And there is no way but this to be quiet within, to be impregnable and immoveable in all assaults, and fixed in all changes believing in his free love. Therefore, be persuaded to resolve on this, not doubting whether I shall believe or not. Shall I think He will suffer me to lay my soul upon him to keep so unworthy, so guilty a soul? Were it not presumption? Oh, what sayest thou? Why dost thou dishonor him, and disquiet thyself? If thou hast a purpose to walk in any way of wickedness, indeed thou art not for him; yea, thou comest not near him to give him thy soul. But wouldst thou have it delivered from sin rather than from trouble? yea, rather than from hell? Is that the chief safety thou seekest, to be kept from iniquity, from thine own iniquity, thy beloved sins? Dost thou desire to dwell in him, and walk with him? Then whatsoever be thy guiltiness and unworthiness, come forward and give him thy soul to keep. If he should seem to refuse it, press it on him. If he stretch not forth his hand, lay it down at his feet, and leave it there, and resolve not to take it back. Say, Lord, thou hast made these souls: thou callest for them again to be committed to thee: here is one. It is unworthy, but what soul is not so? It is most unworthy, but therein will the riches of thy graces appear most in receiving it. And thus leave it with him, and know he will make thee a good account of it. So should you lose goods, or credit, or friends, or life itself, it imports not; the main concern is surer if so be thy soul is out of hazard. "I suffer these things for the Gospel," says the apostle; "nevertheless I am not ashamed"—Why?—"for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day."—Leighton.

PLEASING GOD IN THE CLOSET.—Whenever we feel a want of secret prayer, or a reluctance to engage in it, we ought to ask ourselves at once, How should we like God to become reluctant to hear our prayers, or the Intercessor to grow weary of presenting them before the throne? And if this question do not bring us to our senses at once, and thus send us willingly to our closet, we ought to follow it up by asking, What should we think—feel—do—were the Father to shut his ears on our prayers, the Son to exclude them from the golden censer of his incense, and the Spirit to withhold all his help in future? The bare idea is horrible! And were such a dread reality possible in our own case, how should we pray to be allowed to resume and continue the habit and spirit of secret prayer! How should we agonize in terror and suspense, until we felt again the Holy Spirit helping our infirmities, and pouring out on us the grace of supplication.—Christian Library.

"BE YE WARMED AND FILLED."—A missionary writes: "I shall venture to make a draft for the first six months in a few days. I am greatly in need of some funds. My whole receipts this year, up to the present time, of every kind, have not amounted to fifty dollars. The consequence is, I am getting very much in debt, after planning every way I can think of to avoid it. The regular meetings of our Presbytery and Synod, take place now in a few days, but I shall be compelled to remain at home, because I have not decent clothes. I have not a coat in the world, but is either patched or in need of it. I have nothing to buy new clothes with. I could go in debt for them, but whether I ever should be able to pay for them is uncertain. It is with painful emotions I make this statement; but I must make it to you privately, as a friend. If your society cannot aid me I must go elsewhere, or do something by which to get a living. I have no charge to make against my congregation; were they able to support me they would willingly do it; but they are not."—Home Miss.

GOD PROVIDES FOR CHILDREN.—A friend once said to the Rev. Moses Brown, "Sir, you have as many children as the patriarch Jacob." "True," answered the good old divine, "and I have also Jacob's God to provide for them."

FOR THE MINISTER.

From the Cincinnati Observer.

"Thy watchmen—shall see eye to eye."—Isa. lii. 8.

Gospel ministers are watchmen placed on the walls of Zion, and the time will come when they will be so numerous as to be able to see eye to eye; that is, they will be placed so closely together, that they will see from station to station. They will be able to watch over the territory committed to their care, so entirely, that no enemy will be able to enter in to disturb the peace of Zion. All the violent and wicked classes of men, of which ravenous beasts of prey are fit emblems, shall be tamed and rendered harmless by the word and spirit of God. Isa. xi. 6, 9. "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Such will be the result of multiplying faithful ministers until they become so numerous as to be able to attend to every soul, and instruct every human being in the knowledge of God. The spirit will be poured out for the conversion of the whole world, and then shall the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

This happy state of things is not to be accomplished by miraculous interposition; but by ordinary effort. Pious young men of sufficient talent must resign all worldly prospects, & devote themselves to the work of the ministry. They must cease to waste their time in useless studies, and apply themselves with diligence to those branches necessary to qualify them for preaching the Gospel. None should enter the work but those who are willing to forsake [illegible] for Christ's sake. They [illegible] honor, wealth or ease, are not [illegible] ministers of Christ. [illegible] Lord of glory became poor for our sakes, [illegible] the cross and despised the shame, and surely, we ought to be willing to be poor and despised for his sake. Let pious young men imitate his holy and lowly example, and enter the ministry expecting to endure incessant labor and poverty in preaching the Gospel to the poor. A poverty-enduring ministry is indispensable to the conversion of the world. All pious young men of competent talents should feel it their duty to consecrate themselves to the work of the ministry. The pressing need of ministers is a call of Providence upon all who are capable to enter into the sacred office, and labor to build up the Savior's kingdom. Let this call be obeyed and every land shall be so closely planted with faithful ministers, that every human being shall be taught the way of life, and then "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve him.

THE DEFENSE OF TRUTH.—On every conflict of principle, it is at the line of demarkation that the battle must be fought, and that the battle is terminated. Should the charm and the sacredness be broken, by which the margin of an else inviolable territory is guarded, the whole length and breadth of the sanctuary lie open to spoliation; and unless the assault be repelled at the breach, all the goodliness within may at once be trodden under foot of the invaders. What is true of nations in the gladiatorship of arms, is true of principles in the gladiatorship of argument. Should a hostile army plant one footstep within the landmarks of a kingdom, this is enough to arouse a sensitive and high-minded people in vengeance on the aggressors; and that, though no part of the country is seized upon, but the boundary is passed. And so in the controversy before us. It is the part of Christians to rise like a wall of fire around the integrity and inspiration of Scripture; and to hold them as intact and inviolable, as if a rampart were thrown around them, whose foundations are on earth, and whose battlements are in heaven. It is this tampering with limits that destroys and defaces every thing; and therefore it is precisely when the limit is broken, that the alarm should be sounded. If the battle-cry is to be lifted at all, it should be lifted at the outset; and so on the first mingling, by however so slight an infusion, of things human with things divine, all the friends of the Bible should join heart and hand against so foul and fearful a desecration.

The seraphim need no law to guide their fervor, and attune their songs; but we require "line upon line, precept upon precept." And our Lord and Master has defined and established the method of secret prayer.—Rev. W. Hamilton.

HUMILITY.—Lowliness of mind is a flower that grows not in the field of nature, but is planted by the finger of God in a renewed heart, and learned of the lowly Jesus. Matt. xi. 29.—Boston.

Quick believers need broad shoulders.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, December 23, 1840.

NEW YEAR'S SERMON.

Proper employment for the MERRY, is selected as the theme of a discourse, which, by leave of Providence, will be pronounced in the house of worship belonging to the "De Ruyter Religious Society," (usually called the Presbyterian house,) on the first day of the week, 11 o'clock, A. M., Jan. 3d, 1841.

J. R. JOHNSON.

De Ruyter, Dec. 16, 1840.

CHRISTMAS SERMON.

There will by divine permission be a discourse delivered by Rev. J. R. Johnson, on Christmas eve, 24th inst., in the Seventh-day Baptist Meeting House. Service to commence at half past 6 o'clock. A general invitation is given to the community to attend.

ORDINATION.

The Baptist church of Christ in De Ruyter, have unanimously resolved to call Bro. J. B. Pixley to ordination as Pastor of said church, and have named Wednesday, the sixth day of January, 1841, as the day on which to have him examined publicly, and set apart, if thought proper, to the work of the gospel ministry, at their meeting house in this village.

By order of the church,

Dec. 19, 1840.

James C. Fuller, late a delegate to the World's Convention, London, (Eng.,) is expected to be in this village on the evening of the 30th inst., and proposes to lay before this community a succint statement of the doings of that body.

The following is from the Baptist Advocate, and alludes to an article copied into the Register last week from the New York Evangelist. As we published the article from that paper, we insert this as a matter of justice. There are a number of points in the article which we think exceptionable, but as we expect an answer to our article from the editor of the Advocate next week, we forbear making any comment on this at present. Should he fail to adduce satisfactory proof of the correctness of his views on those points when he shall notice our article, we may, in a future number, take some further notice of this.

THE LORD'S DAY.—The question proposed to us upon the present obligation of the fourth commandment, and our prompt reply, have, as we anticipated, given rise to various remarks. A correspondent of the Evangelist, alluding to our words, even ventures to assert, "Were I to enter upon such a path, I should not know how to stop short of Brownson's doctrines regarding religion."

We had supposed that the numerous instances, in which we incidentally expressed our views on this subject, in the review of books, would preclude the necessity of a specific article. But those, who seek occasion to censure, will find it, and will not always find the answer or refutation of their censure. It is sometimes necessary, as upon the present occasion, to place it directly in their way. We, therefore, here repeat, without the accompanying arguments, the sentiments on this subject, which have been scattered over different pages of the Advocate. The obligation to keep most religiously and reverently one day in seven, we not only admit, but most cordially cherish, and have frequently sustained in argument both by tongue and pen. The command to keep the seventh day, which we understand to be the fourth commandment, we do not think obligatory, because the apostles observed the first, and we are bound to imitate their example. We see, as we have elsewhere observed, in our Lord's resurrection on the first day, and his entering into rest, and in other associations connected with it, numerous and most delightful reasons, why that day should be sacredly observed by his followers.

The arguments, by which some identify the Jewish Sabbath, and the Lord's day or Christian Sabbath, never produced conviction in our mind; nor have we ever been urgent, as some reasoners upon the subject, to identify the latter with the day set apart at the creation. Yet we never troubled ourself to dispute with those who entertained either opinion, because almost all of them came to the same result with us, though by different roads, namely: that the first day of the week is to be exclusively devoted to religious purposes; that on that day, we are not at liberty to engage in any merely secular employment whatsoever.—Moreover, we have frequently remarked, that, when this day is not so kept, religion languishes or entirely dies. As to the weight of obligation, we suppose that the Christian requires only to know what is his duty, and that his neglect of this, is sin. We see no reason why the man who thinks himself bound to observe the first day of the week, should not feel as deep compunctions in violating it, as the Jew could possibly feel in violating his Sabbath. It is not said in the ten commandments, that a man shall not have two wives, nor is the reasoning which deduces the prohibition from Scripture, so clear to our mind by half as the obligation to keep the first day of the week; yet we can never hesitate to denounce bigamy, nor do we regard it as a less sin, than if it had been particularized on the tables of stone.

But these views do not, in our estimation, relax or diminish the obligation to observe the first day of the week: they rather enhance it. Although we dissent from the identity of the original Sabbath and the Jewish Sabbath with the Lord's day, still by citing the examples of the Old Testament dispensations, we can and do prove the importance attached by our Maker to the observance of one day in seven. Nay we go farther, and employ the argument of Paul to the Hebrews, and comparing the laws given by Moses with the gospel dispensation of Christ, show the increased iniquity of those who despise or neglect any part of the latter.

Winter has come upon us in earnest. The snow is about fifteen inches deep, and sleighing fine.

THE SECRET DISCLOSED—AWFUL MURDER.—The public mind is at length relieved of anxiety and doubt respecting the disappearance of Mr. Suydam, President of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, New Brunswick, mentioned in our last. Circumstances transpired which fixed suspicion on a Mr. Peter Robinson, a house carpenter in that city; a search was instituted, and the body of Mr. Suydam was found buried in the cellar of said Robinson's house, bearing marks of inhuman violence. The deceased is supposed to have been drawn to the house of Robinson for the purpose of receiving a payment on a mortgage held against the prisoner, and it is thought he received the fatal blow which broke his skull, while computing the interest on the obligation. Robinson, previous to his arrest, had stated that he had paid the mortgage and that he did not present it to the Clerk, for fear of being suspected of the murder of Suydam. He was observed to have an unusual amount of money in possession; had left the watch of the deceased in pledge at Newark, and had been to New York since the murder was committed, and purchased lumber. No doubt exists of his guilt. He was fully committed, as was also his wife and brother, under suspicion that they were participators in the awful deed. Great excitement prevailed in New Brunswick respecting the murder. The N. Y. Spector mentions, as an extraordinary coincidence, that Mr. Suydam was married to his first wife on a thanksgiving day—that he buried her on a thanksgiving day—and was murdered on a thanksgiving day. The sum for which he appears to have been murdered, was only sixty dollars.

A request has been made for a council to inquire into the expediency of the organization of a Seventh-day Baptist church in Watson, Lewis county, N. Y. One of the ministers to whom that request has been sent, will be there, by divine permission, in the former part of the month of January.

CHRISTIAN INDEX.—The senior editor and proprietor of this paper Mr. Mercer, has generously given the Baptist Convention of the State of Georgia, the office of the Index, with all the furniture and a new set of types never yet used. It is hereafter to be published at Penfield, Ga., and will be edited by Rev. W. H. Stokes, under the supervision of a Publishing Committee. The first number of the next volume will be issued on the 31st of the present month.

THE FRIEND OF MAN.—The publication of this paper has been temporarily suspended.

THE AMERICAN CITIZEN, published at Perry, Genesee co., N. Y., and devoted to the cause of Temperance, Human Rights, the Interests of Agriculture, Commerce, and the News of the day, is to be enlarged to the size of the Albany Argus, and published simultaneously in the city of Rochester and Perry, on entire new type, and superior paper. The "Citizen" has been a very valuable paper heretofore, and always welcome to our table; but, with its present facilities and prospects, we anticipate that its sphere of usefulness will be greatly enlarged. We wish the publishers all that success which their intelligence, industry, and enterprise so richly deserve. We regret that we have not room for the insertion of their Prospectus. Terms, $2 a year, in advance. The "Citizen" can be examined at this office by those wishing to subscribe.

THE REVIVAL IN PINCKNEY, Lewis co., still continues. Br. William Greene baptized fourteen there about two weeks since. He writes that a number have lately commenced keeping the Sabbath of the fourth commandment there, and he thinks more will soon unite with the church.

REVIVAL IN SCOTT.—Br. Bailey who has spent the last few days at Scott, informs us that a very good state of religious feeling exists in the Seventh-day Baptist church in the above place, and that at a meeting recently held there a large number manifested a deep anxiety for the salvation of their souls. The instrumentality of Bro. Alexander Campbell has been blest in producing the above result.

The following is an outline of a discourse delivered on Thanksgiving-day, in this village, by the Rev. J. R. Johnson. We are aware that it would have been more interesting, could the extemporaneous remarks which were interspersed through the whole been inserted. As it is, we think it worth preserving, and having been permitted, at our request, to give it to our readers, we do so in the hope that it may be profitable to those who may read it, as it certainly was to those who heard it.—[EDS. PS. cxxxvi: 26. O give thanks unto the God of Heaven: for his mercy endureth forever.

The Psalms abound with praises to God. It was David's delight to offer songs of thanksgiving. In such employment his heart grew warm, and the strongest emotions of his soul were kindled into an ecstacy of holy joy. The text calls upon us to give thanks unto the God of Heaven, because his mercy endureth forever. In this Psalm the command is expressed or implied by numerous repetitions, and it is urged upon our attention by the same cogent and affecting reason, twenty-six times repeated—"His mercy endureth forever."

By the ever-during mercies of Jehovah, we are required to raise to him this day our tribute of gratitude. If we perform this duty in accordance with the spirit of the sweet Pslamist of Israel, we shall manifest a holy veneration for the character of God, and with a deep sense of our dependance upon him, and obligations to him, we shall feel that he is the "God of Heaven."

In this fallen world, filled with iniquity, transgression, and rebellion, and sending forth in complaining sighs and impatient murmurs, its base ingratitude to God—it is cheering to behold even one of the human family rejoicing to pay a thank-offering to Him from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift.

This satisfaction is greatly augmented, when we behold as on the present occasion, a congregation devoutly performing this duty. The remarks which I shall offer on this occasion, will be arranged under the three following divisions:—

I. Publicly to render thanks unto God is proper.

II. It is an indispensable duty.

III. It is USEFUL to observe designated days of public thanksgiving.

I. Publicly to render thanks unto God is PROPER.

We know that there is propriety in making public confession before God, in view of our sinfulness as a class of beings who are the subjects of his holy government. Reason teaches that there is equal propriety in rendering public thanks unto Him who causeth his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and who sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. If, as communities, we participate in common blessings, is it not proper that in the capacity of communities we should unite in giving thanks?

II. Publicly to render thanks unto God is our indispensable duty.

The Bible settles this question. Look at some of its testimony:—And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with praise. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him and bless his name. In Neh. xi. 17, we are informed that "the son of Asalph, was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer." When the Ark was returned to the camp of Israel; a day of thanksgiving was observed. And David appointed certain Levites to minister before the Ark of the Lord, and to record, and to thank and praise the Lord God of Israel.

(See 2 Chron. xvi. ch.) Then on that day David delivered first this psalm, to thank the Lord, into the hands of Asalph and his brethren. This psalm is composed of extracts from several psalms. How powerfully its energetic appeals move us to join in public thanksgiving:—Give thanks unto the Lord, call upon his name, make known his deeds among the people. Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him, talk ye to all of his wonderous works. Glory ye in his holy name. Give unto the Lord, ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name. In the 34th verse of this psalm as it stands recorded in the 16th of 2 Chron. we find the sentiments of the text, expressed in almost its identical words. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good: for his mercy endureth forever.

III. It is USEFUL to observe designated days of public thanksgiving.

If to render thanks unto God publicly is proper, if it is our indispensable duty, we may expect that it will be useful to observe such days as are specifically designated for this purpose.

To illustrate the utility of such observance, permit me to suggest,

1. It cherishes the memory of our ancestors, and enhances the value of our national character. It is impossible to observe such a designated day without remembering the Pilgrim fathers. The mind naturally reverts to those days of thanksgiving and praise, in which they participated.

When thus employed, how can we avoid reflecting, what a debt of gratitude we owe those ancestors for their example, and for the foundations which they laid for our civil and religious liberty? Blessings on the memory of such men! That the value of our national character will be enhanced by cherishing the memory of such valued men, no patriot or christian can doubt. National observances exert a powerful influence in forming and perpetuating national character. The public celebrations of heathen nations rivet and perpetuate their superstitious dogmas and practices. Ask our missionaries, and they will furnish us with abundant and powerful evidence of this fact. The appropriate and public commemoration-days of christian nations, exert their happy influence on national character. We cannot too highly estimate the amount of right influence, which the annual observance of a day of public thanksgiving by the American people, will bestow upon American character to the latest generation. [On this idea the speaker freely enlarged by extemporaneous remarks.—Ed.

2. Assembling on occasions like this will refine the sensibilities of our nature, and strengthen the bonds of friendship.

Our bonds of union are cemented while we come as children of our common Father, to thank him for paternal gifts. We are liable to become entrameled by narrow, selfish feelings; uniting in public thanksgiving is adapted to banish those feelings. In such exercises the heart glows with benevolence toward all our fellow creatures. If neighbors and fellow-townsmen meet for public thanksgiving with a right spirit, sectional jealousies, party animosities, local prejudices, and evil surmising, will sink, where they ought to sink, into oblivion.

3. Such occasions give proper expression to our sympathetic emotions. The emotions of sympathetic gratitude are of great price.

4. Occasions like this remind us of our dependence on God, and increase our gratitude to him.

5. They prepare us the more highly to appreciate our blessings.

6. They aid to increase our interest in behalf of the destitute, and the afflicted.—As, in the midst of the congregation assembled for that very purpose, we thank the Lord for food, raiment, shelter, reason, education, LIBERTY and the GOSPEL, our hearts go out after those who enjoy not these favors. When the chief magistrate of the State of New York, in his late excellent Proclamation for thanksgiving, recommended to the people of this favored state—"To gather themselves together in their solemn assemblies, to render to our Heavenly Father the homage of hearts softened and warmed by his unbounded goodness"—his Excellency most happily added, "To commit to his tender care the poor, the neglected, AND THE OPPRESSED."

This is truly a suitable occasion on which we may commit to the tender care of our Heavenly Father, the more than two millions of oppressed—enslaved Americans, who now groan under cruel bondage, while we rejoice in the blessings of liberty. To thy "tender care," Father in Heaven: do we commit them!

7. If we rightly observe designated days of public thanksgiving, we may through Christ, procure the continuance of favors, and the supply of others which we need.

"In every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God"—do thus as individuals, as families, and as congregations, and your daily bread shall be granted you, with the daily benediction of the Giver.

I cannot allow myself to close this discourse, without annexing a few thoughts which the subject and the occasion suggest to us.

1. It is a matter of joyful congratulation, that the practice of annually observing a day of public thanksgiving is gaining favor among the people of the United States. One source of this extended feeling may be, New-England emigration. But whatever are its causes the knowledge of that fact cheers us.

2. Let us inquire—Do not many affecting reminiscences crowd upon our mind at this hour? To those of us who came from the New-England states, the remembrance of the thanksgiving days of our childhood and youth, is overpowering.

Where are those beloved ancestors of ours around whose generous tables we gathered to partake of the 'thanksgiving supper,' after we had been instructed by our venerable pastor's thanksgiving sermon? Ah! that endeared circle of relatives hath been thinned by the shafts of death! Some of those loved ones have gone to join thanksgiving anthems in Heaven.

3. A word to the students may naturally be expected.*

We are happy to meet you here to-day. Be thankful unto God for the blessings of education which you enjoy. * * * *

4. Numerous and rich are the blessings for which we ought to render thanks to-day. [Many blessings were here familiarly noticed.-Ed.] Especially—that as a village we were saved from the continued ravages of that distressing sickness among our juvenile population which, for a season, afflicted us last spring. Amid the judgments of God, his mercies appeared the more conspicuous. As we look back upon that scene of distress, let our songs of praise ascend unto the Lord, for the blessings of health that now pervade this community.

In view of this and manifold mercies, let our inquiry be—"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?" Let our response be—"I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people." "I will offer the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people." * * * *

Well—we must separate.

"Let past ingratitude
Provoke our weeping eyes,
And hourly, as new mercies fall,
Let hourly thanks arise."

"Giving thanks always for all things, unto God and the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."

In our thanksgiving songs let our chorus be—"Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."

"O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

"O give thanks unto the Lord: for he is good: for his mercy endureth forever. O give thanks unto the God of gods: for his mercy endureth forever.

"O give thanks unto the Lord of lords: for his mercy endureth forever.

"To him who alone doeth great wonders, who by his wisdom made the heavens, and stretched out the earth above the waters: to him that made great lights, the sun to rule by day, and the moon and stars to rule by night—

"Who smote Egypt in their first born, and brought out Israel from among them, with a strong hand, and with a stretched out arm—

"To him who divided the Red Sea into parts, and made Israel to pass through the midst of it, but overthrew Pharaoh and his hosts—

"To him who led his people through the wilderness—smote great kings—slew famous kings—Sihon, king of the Amonites, Og, king of Bashan—and gave their land for an heritage, even an heritage unto Israel his servant: for his mercy endureth forever—

"Who remembered us in our low state, and hath redeemed us from all our enemies: for his mercy endureth forever.

"Who giveth food to all flesh: for his mercy endureth forever.

"O give thanks unto the God of Heaven: for his mercy endureth forever." Amen.

For the Register.

My dear Uncle.—You have doubtless read the correspondence which my note to you respecting the Cotillon parties and your answer have elicited. I did not think at the time that so much would grow out of that affair, but since it is so, I wish to give you a short history of the exercise of my mind on that subject and the influence of your letter in making my decision respecting the course I am to pursue in regard to the parties in our village. Before writing my first note, I had not consulted any of my friends on the subject, though it was my intention to have asked uncle Perry's advice while on my last visit there, and I had arranged it in my mind so that I thought I could converse with him (the oldest of my uncles) without embarrassment; but the delicacy of the subject, the immense political excitement and the great interest of the whole family to hear cousin Palemon's account of southern affairs who has spent a number of years in G——, as a teacher, and had then just returned (I am happy to say that his views respecting slavery have undergone no change during his residence at the south, except that his detestation of the system has increased) together with my own fears that it would be wrong and the firm yet benign expression of uncle Perry's countenance, which seemed to convey as effectual reproof as though he had wholly anticipated me. These considerations prevented me from fulfilling my design. I thought of the influence my decision might have on my future prospects, but I confess while among such kind friends who felt so intensely for my welfare, and when the prayers of my deceased parents for my salvation from sin and wo were brought afresh to my mind, I formed what I then thought an unalterable resolution to return to the gentleman who had solicited my company at the parties a negative answer. But how unstable are the purposes which mortals form in their own strength! A few evenings afterwards, while at a social party at Gen. H.'s, the conversation turning on Cotillon Parties, several expressed their approbation of such amusements, and Mr. B., and the accomplished Miss D., from W——, observed that the soirees and balls in their city were attended by members of churches of several denominations, and no notice was taken of it. Knowing that I had been invited to attend the parties in our village, and observing that I said nothing, they rallied me for what they were pleased to call my religious air. My resolution was severely shaken, and I thought, if professed Christians do so, what harm can there be in MY attending, who have never made any pretentions that way? Thinking, however, it would be rudeness in me to take such a step without consulting my friends, I sent the note to you, asking your advice. I found the whole of the family rather favorable to your views, which made my conflict between inclination and duty more severe. I then reviewed the whole subject. There was on one hand my naturally volatile disposition and love of amusement, together with the solicitation of my former associates to attend the parties—on the other hand the decided wishes of my best friends—the thoughts of my responsibility to my Maker—the necessity of a proper improvement of time, &c. When I thought there is a time to DANCE, it would immediately occur to me, there is also a time to DIE—and are you PREPARED? When I thought youth is the time for merriment, it came forcibly to my mind, it is also the time to "Remember the Creator." When I thought religion might be deferred for the present, at least, I was rebuked with "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." But when I said, others attend them, it would come forcibly to mind, "What is that to thee, follow thou me."

On the whole, I found if I attended the cotillon parties, I must have continual war with conscience—I must be guilty of a criminal waste of time—I must forego the privilege of attending many interesting lectures on scientific subjects, and neglect, to a considerable extent, the improvement of my mind—I must be guilty of ingratitude to my friends, and to God; I should be guilty of exposing my health, needlessly, by going to the parties and returning in inclement weather and at unseasonable hours; I should also evince too much disregard for the religion of Christ and the salvation of my immortal soul; and I might thereby encourage others to procrastinate repentance to their own undoing! My duty was plain—the conclusion is made—I SHALL NOT ATTEND SUCH PARTIES ANY MORE!

Since I have concluded to remain at home this winter, and have been thinking how I can most advantageously employ my time, I have thought best to review my former studies, astronomy, natural philosophy, Italian, French, and music. This proves an agreeable recreation. I am attending the singing school, where the young people are making commendable proficiency in that [illegible] and beautiful science. Cousins Laura and H[illegible] who have resolved on attending [illegible] much rather [illegible] a part of [illegible] the violin. [illegible] has just opened the R[illegible] the article from Esq. W——'s S[illegible] says he thinks I shall be [illegible] much [illegible] the [illegible] my present [illegible] I should have done by attending the [illegible].

Th[illegible] piano which uncle Albert [illegible] presented me when my mind was so depressed at the loss of my dear parents is certainly more useful to me than ever before, except at that particular time. I have taken several lessons of Miss ——, who says I improve very fast. I wish you could know how much pleasure I take in singing and playing

Home, sweet home.

I have read during a leisure evening, the "M[illegible] in a Flower Garden." Truly they afford an intellectual feast. We have had no good sleighing here yet; but uncle Melvin and aunt Jane say we shall probably have good sleighing about the time uncle William is expected home, which will be the latter part of January, and then myself and as many of my cousins as can leave home have permission to visit you.

I think of you more frequently than ever. The entreaty to 'give my heart to the Redeemer,' occupies my thoughts very much. I now renew my request that you would pray for me.

I see Esq. W——'s Son is interested in the parties, and I now feel that "I'll never envy them again" who engage in such amusements; and it is my desire that none of my young friends in our village may continue the pursuit of shadows till it is too late to repent! Your unworthy,

AMANDA.

To Uncle William,
W——.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I have noticed in some of the late numbers of your paper several communications on the subject of Cotillon Parties, and, as a friend of social amusement, I avail myself of the kind offer you have made of a free discussion of the merits and demerits of such parties. I am pleased to see the friends of Cotillon Parties in this place manifest so ready a disposition to enter into the discussion.—Heretofore, such discussions have been carried on almost exclusively by their opponents. Cotillon Parties have been frequently denounced from the pulpit and through the columns of religious papers, while on the other hand, little or nothing has been said in their vindication. I perfectly concur in the remarks made and the positions taken in the communication of "A Young Man," and, like him, I was at a loss to understand some portions of Uncle William's letter, as the tenor of his letter was such that I think a person might reasonably conclude that he intended to throw out some "dark insinuations"; however, I am perfectly willing to accept the explanation of Aunt Mary. I am not disposed to question the correctness of "Uncle William's" and "Aunt Mary's" assertion, that "if virtuous young ladies would unanimously decide against Cotillon Parties, they would be abolished; but it seems to me that this is an abstract proposition, without the least reference to the merits or demerits of the question. Had they, in the first place, endeavored to show that the tendency of these Parties is injurious and demoralizing, or had they, at least, given some reasons why virtuous young ladies should abandon them, their exhortation, in my opinion, would have come with a much better grace; but Aunt Mary, in her last letter, at length has shown in what she considers the danger of attendance at Cotillons to consist. I regret that business at present prevents me from answering her communication. I will attend to it, however, in a short time.

With all due respect to "Uncle Perry," I must say, that he exhibits a superabundance of kindness in bestowing such high praise upon "Uncle William's" letter. I shall pass no encomiums upon that of "A Young Man," for I consider that those productions which have merit of their own to recommend them to the public need no encomiums. The story related by him concerning a theatre-going lady and Mr. Hervey, is very good; but I think it has very little to do with the subject. It reminds me of a story concerning a very singular old Deacon in Connecticut, who, for fear that his children would not keep death constantly before their eyes, sent for an artist and had his likeness painted upon the wall in every room in his house, and if any one of his children during their innocent sports happened to laugh, he would point them to the grim monster, and exclaim, "There, children, you will not be apt to laught when death comes!"

I cannot agree with "Esq. W.'s Son" that the conduct of the young, who start at the note of the life-stirring violin should be excused because, forsooth, our ancestors have engaged in similar amusements, for I hold that it is our duty to correct all errors which have been pointed out to us by the finger of experience. If we find that Cotillon Parties exert a bad influence on society, let us do them away; if not, let us uphold them.

In my next communication I will show some of the benefits to be derived from an attendance on Cotillon Parties.

A FRIEND OF SOCIAL AMUSEMENTS.

For the Register.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—The close application to my studies, and the great amount of business on hand, ought to have excused me from the necessity of writing another letter on this subject. Inadequate as I am to the task, I hope I may have a hearing in explaining my views more clearly in favor of "Cotillon Parties."

You, who have taken the responsible station in placing before the public, a series of letters on this important subject which so much interests this community, will have the goodness to indulge one, who acts a conscientious part, and believes if these parties are properly conducted, they are conducive of that enjoyment which ought to be one of the most essential principles of our life.

I shall not attempt to show that there is only one source of amusement that would be beneficial; neither shall I confine myself closely to Cotillon Parties; but of all parties, that give ease, polish of manners, and splendid appearances of the objects around us, Cotillon Parties stand conspicuous. It is ever to be remembered, that it is not necessary to our existence, nor what we commonly intend for usefulness; but it is to be regarded as a source of pleasure and happiness that our nature seeks after, and that, gratuitously obtained.

Place a person in any occupation—let his mind be borne down with fatigue by close application to business, which is generally the case if carried on a succession of years, and the prolonged indulgence of these habits has a tendency to destroy some of the most important functions of the body—ill health must be the consequence; when, if a recourse to parties, where exercise, familiarity, change of ideas, and a union of feelings were manifested, a different result would have been produced.

Perseverance ought to be practised by every one. It is a task of little strife for one to act a part that is honorable in any profession; and dealing honorably with his fellow creatures, he is sure to gain the confidence of all. But an obstinate person, who regards his moral reputation of little importance, and conducts himself as if he were the heir of such pleasures only as can be enjoyed by such a tenement of clay, most certainly, in my opinion, leads a life that cannot be respected by friends, and the sooner society rids herself of such an individual the better. We can either associate with cheerful or melancholy companions, enjoy SOCIETY ASSEMBLIES, visit with the gay, attend the most lively amusements, and do it in a manner that is justifiable, and sustain our moral reputation. These, and many other things, are advantages which we ought to look upon as conducive to our earthly comfort, and are certainly within our power.

Nature abounds with variety; and the mind, unless chained down by habit, delights in the contemplation of new objects, and like the Poet,

> "In vain we seek for solid bliss—
> The mind wants something new."

The rising generation call into action that youthful vigor which presses them forward in a channel which nothing but Time will obliterate; and years of discretion may guide the youthful mind along the flowery and ever-varying stream of life until it arrives at the very summit of happiness and contentment.

Your correspondent "Ironia," in the last No. of the Register, appears to manifest quite a comfortable talent in epistolary correspondence, and speaks of national terms with familiarity; but, to say the least, I am of the opinion that the subject of "Cotillon Parties" is treated with too much of an air of disdain and irony.

Yours, as ever,

ESQ. W——'S SON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

Dear Bro. Greene:—I have intended, for a number of days past, to write you in reference to the state of religious matters with us. But hitherto no opportunity has seemed to offer itself; but, a few moments of comparative leisure being enjoyed, I would improve them by saying that it has pleased the blessed God to visit his people on one portion of my circuit the fall past, by reviving his work. Of this, however, you have had previous intimations, but in this communication I designed to be somewhat particular. This precious work was in Bennington, Genesee county, and embraced a section of country somewhat noted for irreligion, the prevailing faith of which was Universalism. Sometime last spring or summer, Br. James Cochran and myself commenced preaching the word to the people, and soon it was apparent that an uncommon degree of interest was felt. This state of things continued through the summer, and finally, it was thought best by the friends of religion, that a special effort should be made, which was accordingly done.—The effort was crowned with the blessing of God, and it was thought that some fifty were converted or reclaimed. There was now a very difficult duty to perform, and that was to produce proper obedience to the ordinances of God's house. There was no Christian church in travel in the place.—There were professors of various religious opinions, however, to some extent. They were all exhorted to take the Bible and the Bible only for their guide in matters of faith and practice, and I have reason to believe that, in many instances, this course has been pursued. The portion of our church formerly convening in Darien for worship, have removed their place of worship to the village of Cowlesville, three miles south, it being more central than the former.

Two weeks ago was our communion season, at which time six were added to the church. At our last communion in Clarence, four were received into the church, in all, ten, eight of whom are recent converts to the Sabbath of the Lord. Others are preparing to follow in the good way.

You will observe that our growth in numbers is not very rapid. But, when it is observed that by far the greater part of those who unite with us are persons who were educated in the observance of the first day of the week as the Sabbath, and the self-denial required to abandon a popular error and embrace an unpopular and discarded truth, I think we have great reason to be encouraged. About two-thirds of the present members of this church were a little time past in the observance of the first day of the week as holy time. May the Lord continue to shed abroad his light among the people! Amen. Your unworthy brother,

NATHAN V. HULL.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

FROM ENGLAND.

The packet ship Columbus, Capt. Cropper, arrived on Sunday last from Liverpool. She sailed, Nov. 8th, and of course brings news only two days later than that which was received by the Great Western. While off Sable Island, Dec. 6th, she lost overboard one of her crew. She reports having seen on the 21st of Nov., a ship with a signal of distress flying, which proved to be the Leonidas, Capt. Arnold, from Quebec, bound to Dublin. Capt. Cropper succeeded in taking off the crew, which consisted of the Captain and 18 men. They had been 18 days in the ship's top, and 11 without water, except what little rain water they caught. They had been living all the while on raw meat and a short allowance of bread. At the time they were taken off, they had only provisions sufficient to sustain life for a single day. The gale was blowing so freshly that, had they been a few hours later, they could not have boarded her.

The news brought by the Columbus is comparatively unimportant. Extracts from the London papers show that there is little doubt in England of the preservation of peace; the speech of the French King at the opening of the Chambers gives universal satisfaction, although there is no little anxiety to read the debates in the Chambers upon it. Many are inclined to think, from the note of preparation, and the hurry and bustle which prevail in all the English arsenals, that ministers are by no means sanguine, however anxious they may be for the maintenance of peace, that they will be able to secure that blessing to the country.—New Yorker.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Evangelist.

HALL OF U. S. H. OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington D. C. Dec. 14, 1840.

Here I am, amid the blaze of splendor, and a galaxy of intellect, such as are not to be seen in this country, if in the whole world besides. A member from Kentucky is even now, while I am writing, delivering an eloqent eulogium on a departed colleague. Ere I closed the last sentence, said member having finished his remarks, Mr. Leet, of Pennsylvania, rose, and commenced a eulogy on his deceased colleague, Mr. Ramsay, who recently committed suicide: and even before I have written thus far, he has finished, and the house adjourned till to-morrow at 12 o'clock, having been in session less than an hour and a half to-day.

This early adjournment has given me an opportunity to visit the Senate Chamber, which I have improved, and from which I have just returned. I entered that Chamber just in season to witness their balloting for a chaplain. There were but three candidates voted for at all, and those three were all Methodists! A circumstance constituting quite a phenomenon in the religious world. There were thirty-nine votes given, as follows: Mr. Cookman, 25; Mr. Thornton, 10; Mr. Shaw, 4; consequently, Rev. Mr. Cookman, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is elected chaplain to the Senate of the United States for the present session. He was their chaplain the last session, and is said to be a very eloquent man. Immediately after his re-election to-day, the Senate adjourned.

I have just been in the refractory connected with the capitol, to take a lunch. This, to be sure, is not a very important circumstance; but I mention it for the purpose of introducing another of more importance. The sale of spirituous liquors stronger than wine, is prohibited in this refractory; and yet, I am credibly informed, that brandy, &c., are sold under the name of wine! So, you see, they are playing "Striped Pig" in the very capitol of the nation, under the nose of Congress itself!—As there is a Congressional Temperance Society, I mistake if there is not an overhauling of this matter ere the close of the present session.

The house has not yet chosen a chaplain. It is rumored that there are many aspirants to that post now in the city. If so, I have only to say, they are unworthy of it. It is a disgrace to the sacred calling, a disgrace to Christianity, for its ministers to aspire, like politicians, to stations of honor like this. It looks like almost any thing rather than Christian humility, and ought to be severely rebuked. If a minister, on account of peculiar fitness, be selected as chaplain to Congress, so be it; but to aspire to it, and electioneer for it, is quite another affair. The chaplain of the House, whoever, he may be, will not, however, be a Methodist, inasmuch as a joint resolution has been passed, that the chaplain of the two Houses shall be of differnt denominations.

Mr. Clay has offered a resolution in the Senate to-day, for the repeal of the Sub-Treasury law! Thus is the political ball already set in motion; and the Demostheneses and the Ciceros may soon be expected to shake the capitol with the thunders of their eloquence. In the House, Mr. Adams last week set the Abolition ball in motion, by introducing a resolution, to rescind the resolution of the last session, which prohibited the introduction of Abolition petitions. The ball was, however, arrested in its course by a two-thirds vote; but the next day, he gave it new impulse, by the introduction of a resolution, to inquire into the matter of the mis-translation and interpretation of the papers in case of the Armistad captives. This resolution was adopted, and thus the Abolition ball was set in motion anew, notwithstanding some opposing votes were cast in its way. It rolled majestically over them, like so many straws; just as it is destined ultimately to roll over every opposing obstacle, and to crush slavery to the earth.

Now that I am on this subject, I will communicate an item of Anti-slavery information, of a most interesting and unexpected character.

In March 1828, about eleven hundred inhabitants of this District, including two-hundred slave-holders, petitioned Congress that all children of slaves, born after July 4th of that year, be free at twenty-five years of age; that the laws to sell supposed runaway slaves for their prison fees or maintenance, be repealed; and that slaves be not removed into the District, or brought in for sale, hire, or transportation. Thus, you perceive, the inhabitants of the District of Columbia recognise the right of Congress to abolish slavery here, by asking them to do it. Nay, in this same petition, they say they ask Congress to do it for them on this very ground. More than this; they go into a discussion of the merits of slavery. They denominate it an evil of serious magnitude. They say it impairs the prosperity and happiness of the community, and casts the reproach of inconsistency upon our free institutions; that the domestic slave-trade is scarcely less disgraceful than the foreign, (which is denounced as piracy,) and even more demoralizing; that slaves are torn from their homes, their husbands, and their wives, parents and children separated; that some entitled to freedom, and many who have a limited time to serve, and sold into unconditional slavery, and that these scenes are continually realized. They mention the case of a colored man, who, on suspicion of his being a runaway slave, was the very year before thrown into prison, but, no one appearing to claim him, he was sold as a slave for life, to pay his jail fees, and was shipped for a Southern state. They proceed in their petition as follows; "Slavery tends to corrupt the morals of the people, and to damp the spirit of enterprise, by accustoming the rising generation to look with contempt upon honest labor, and to depend for support too much upon the labor of others. It prevents a useful and industrious class of people from settling among us, by rendering the means of subsistence more precarious to the laboring class of whites. It diminishes the resources of the community, by throwing the earnings of the poor into the coffers of the rich, thus rendering the former dependent, servile, and improvident, while the latter are tempted to become, in the same proportion, luxurious and prodigal."

There's an Anti-Slavery document for you, and that from slave-holders and their neighbors! What will the northern apologists of slavery say to this? But even this is not all! In February, 1835, this self-same Anti-Slavery document was called up, and printed by Congress; and I myself saw the printed document, together with the names, last week! Now make the most of this circumstance. Let it fly abroad on the pinions of the wind, showing to the whole world what slavery is, according to the testimony of slave-holders themselves; thus putting to the reddest blush, its apologists of every kind. I ought to add, that since others out of the District have begun to petition for the abolition of slavery within it, the inhabitants of the District have dropped the subject; and it is understood they will not resume it till others let it alone.

An Unpleasant Situation.—The Wilmington (Del.) Journal, states that the obstructions, occasioned by the late fall of snow to the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore rail road, have been entirely removed, and awards great praise to those who have the management of the road. The magnitude of the difficulties to be overcome, may be imagined from the following extract of a letter from a Washington correspondent of the Inquirer, who left this city for Baltimore on Saturday morning last:—"About 7 o'clock the same evening, when between Bush and Gunpowder river, and 23 miles from Baltimore, our engine came to a full stop. After working away for an half hour, in an effort to extricate us, the engine, getting out of wood and water, suddenly left us for the watering station, about three or four miles distant. The storm was raging terribly, and the snow fell so fast as entirely to obstruct the return of the engine to us. Thus we were left in the cars, without any thing to eat or drink, all Saturday night, all Sunday and all Sunday night, until near noon on Monday, when some engines from Baltimore came to our relief.—We arrived in Baltimore on Monday evening, after being three days in the cars."

A Blodless Duel.—The Boston Mercantile Journal gives the particulars of a bloodless duel which recently came off at Lancaster, Mass. The challenger was a young gentleman belonging to New York, a student at the Literary Institution in Lancaster. The challenged was a resident of the village. As the party having a right to the choice of weapons, the villager selected cow-hides, to which the challenger demurred. Pistols were at lenth fixed upon, and at the first fire the villager fell. The challenger bade him a long good night, and with all proper and usual marks of contrition, started for New York. The dead man got up and went to breakfast, having made previous arrangements with the seconds, that the expense of bullets should be saved in charging the pistols.

Extraordinary History.—It will be remembered that a party of Mexicans called the Federalists, some time since proclaimed themselves independent, and got up a sort of nation day, which they called the Republic of Rio Grande. By liberal offers they induced some hundreds of young men in Texas to join their ranks. At a late attempt at revolution in Mexico, the party with which these Federalists were connected were defeated; to extricate themselves from the consequences of which, they basely surrendered the Texans as the price of their own safety and pardon, and about [illegible] of these young men were devoted to death. Upon learning of this treachery, they withdrew to a walled inclosure, determined to face the worst. The Mexicans at their arrival in the place, gave themselves up to drunkenness and debauch; in which state they were ordered to commence the attack on the Texans. The battle commenced at 2 P. M. and lasted nearly 9 hours, and resulted in the total overthrow of the large Mexican force, by which more than four hundred of the treacherous foes were left lifeless on the ground, with comparatively no injury to the Texans.—Com. Adv.

From Mexico.—This country is very poor and loaded with taxes. The Mexicans are much more acquainted with foreigners than formerly, and don't trouble them so much. Robbers are plenty in the road and they rob the stage from Vera Cruz to Mexico every now and then. The Federalists have not succeeded for want of energy. The fact is that in this country you can scarcely find a man to take any interest in his country except to rob it.—Jour. of Com.

The Remains of Napoleon.—The Boston Daily Advertiser of yesterday says,—The ship Calumet, Captain Shreve, which arrived at this port yesterday from Canton, left St. Helena Oct. 12. On the 18th the ceremony of exhumation of the remains of Napoleon took place with great parade.—The body, which on his death was embalmed by French chemists, was found in a state of complete preservation, the features being preserved. It will be remembered that Napoleon died May 5, 1821. The body was conveyed on board the Belle Poule, which with the Favorite, sailed for France on the 19th. These ships sailed from France July 7, and arrived at St. Helena Oct. 8th.

Marine Disasters.—The telegraph reported a brig ashore near the highlands—inside the Hook—and a schooner ashore on the Hook.

A whale barque, which was anchored in the North River, dragged her anchor, and grounded on the Flats, near Bedlow's Island.

DIED,

In Berlin, on the 11th inst., after an illness of nearly two years, Mrs. ELIZABETH GREENMAN, daughter of Lodowick Saunders, and wife of George N Greenman, in the thirty-first year of her age.—She united with the Seventh-day Baptist church, in 1823, and continued a worthy member until her death. She exhibited throughout her life those beautiful traits of character worthy the Christian, and her death affording a triumphant proof of the excellence of the religion she maintained. The last of her sickness was attended with much pain, but she endured it without a murmur, and calmly waited for her approaching dissolution, when she expected to go home, and be with Christ. Communicated.

Quid prodest Homini, etc.

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

BY CHARLES CONSTANTINE PISE, D. D.

What doth it profit, Warrior, to have led
Thy matchless armies, in the battle hour?
Strewn the ensanguined plain with heaps of dead,
And stalked through blood to victory and power?

What doth it profit, Tyrant, to have kept
A prostrate people groaning in their chains?
Laughing triumphantly while nations wept,
And heartlessly exulting in their pains.

What, man of pleasure, doth it profit thee,
The flowers of passion to have gathered, now!—
Feasting upon the luscious fragrancy,
And weaving chaplets round thy scented brow.

Say, man of wealth, whose anxious days were past
In hoarding treasures which must perish all;
What doth it profit!—thou must quit, at last,
The golden idols which around thee fall!

O Child of Genius! tell me, what avail
The glorious halo shining round thy name—
The applause with which remotest nations hail
Thy works enshrined among the gems of Fame?

And oh! what loss—though in his lonely cell
The humble hermit, from the world removed,
Unknown and knowing no one, chose to dwell,
Seen by his God alone—and by him loved!

Ah! on that fatal day, when every tomb
Shall open at the Archangel's trumpet sound,
In the deep solitary desert's womb
Full many a glorious body shall be found,

While, from the sculptured mausoleum proud
Full many a wretched and inglorious one
Shall lie confounded with the cursed crowd,
Whom the bright grace of heav'n ne'er shone upon.

Yea, 'mid the tumult and confusion dread,
Amid the crumbling of the earth and sky,
Methinks a clamor from among the dead
Rends the infernal vaults with horrid cry;

What doth it profit, in death's darksome hour,
O'er men and treasures to have held control!
Though the whole world were subject to thy power,
What doth it profit—if thou lose thy SOUL?

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE AUTHORIZED ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

See Fuller's Church History, Hartwell Horne's Introduction, vol. ii., Todd's Vindication of our Authorised Translation and Translators, and Quarterly Review, vol. xxiii.

It is an invaluable privilege for men to read in their own tongues "the wonderful works of God." While the Bible is wrapped in a foreign language, superstition is sure to prevail; but when it is laid open freely and fully, then the people must become, in some measure, imbued with the knowledge of divine truth. Accordingly, the Church of Eng. "a witness (as she describes herself) and a keeper of holy writ," has, ever since she threw off the usurping yoke of Rome, taken care to minister to her children the sincere milk of the word. At various times she has officially executed and authorized versions of the Bible into English; the last of which, made above 200 years ago, may challenge any version in the world for purity and faithfulness. We have abundant cause for thankfulness to God, that our church has been successful in providing us with such a translation. Her claims for this on the affectionate reverence for men extend far beyond the limits of her communion.

I purpose giving, in this paper, a succinct account of the last translation of the Scriptures into English. I shall mention the occasion of its being undertaken, the rules prescribed for its execution, and especially the names of some of the principal translators. These are names worthy to be had in everlasting remembrance; but by an ingratitude surely little to be palliated, few of them are known to the bulk of our population. Perhaps more particular memoirs of several of these venerable men may not, at some future time, be unacceptable.

Prior to the accession of King James I., the "Bishops' Bible" was used in our Church. This translation, completed in 1568, had been undertaken by royal command, under the superintendence of the Achbishop of Canterbury, Matthew Parker. Objections, however, were made to it, and were formally stated in the conference held at Hampton Court on Church matters, in 1604. The king in consequence, consented to a new version and issued letters to the archbishops and bishops, commanding them to inform themselves of the learned men in their several dioceses, who by their attainments in Hebrew and Greek, and by the direction of their studies to the Scriptures, were best fitted to be engaged in such a work. Fifty-four persons were thus selected; but some of these died before the translation was commenced, and the number actually employed was forty-seven. They were all pre-eminently distinguished for their piety and profound learning in the original language of the sacred writings. Among them were—LANCELOT ANDREWS, the very celebrated bishop of Winchester. He was regarded as one of the first scholars of his age, and is said to have understood fifteen languages.

JOHN OVERAL, bishop of Norwich, a man of great attainments in theological learning.

MILES SMITH, bishop of Gloucester, who is reported to have been perfect master of the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic tongues.

THOMAS BILSON, a bishop of Winchester. He was a profound divine, a consummate linguist, well read in the fathers, and most judicious in the application of his learning.

ROBERT TEIGH, archdeacon of Middlesex, an admirable scholar.

WILLIAM BEDWELL, esteemed the first Arabic scholar of his time.

EDWARD LIVELY, Regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, exceeded by none of that age in oriental learning. He died during the progress of the work.

LAWRENCE CHADERTON, afterwards master of Emanuel College, Cambridge. He was well acquainted with the Greek and Hebrew languages, and a diligent student of the Rabbinical writings.

JOHN REINOLDS, president of the Corpus Christi College, Oxford. We are told that he "was most prodigiously keen in all kinds of learning, most excellent in all tongues, a living library, and a third university;" and that "the memory, the reading, of that man, were near to a miracle." He, like Professor Lively, did not live till the translation was completed.

HENRY SAVIL, afterwards Sir Henry Savil, provost of Eton, a most learned man, the editor of St. Chrysostom.

JOHN BOIS, one of the first Greek scholars of that age.

ADRIAN SARAVIA, who had been the bosom friend of Whitgift nnd Hooker.

These were some of the persons to whom this important trust was committed. If our children have been taught to honor those great captains who have led our armies to victory over foreign foes, much more should they learn properly to esteem these venerable men, warriors in a more holy cause, chosen champions beneath the banner of the cross, who not merely themselves wielded the sword of the Spirit, but have put into our hand, a weapon prepared and fitted for our use, with which WE may, after their example, in the strength of the Highest, overcome the powers of darkness. We thank God for them.

The translators when selected, were divided into six classes. At Westminister, a body of ten had assigned to them the portion of the Bible from Genesis to the Second Book of Kings, inclusive. Eight were to assemble at Cambridge, and finish the rest of the historical books, and to the end of the Song of Solomon. At Oxford, seven were to undertake the Prophets, being the remainder of the Old Testament. The Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Book of Revelation, were apportioned to another body of eight, who also met at Oxford. The rest of the New Testament was assigned to a fifth company of seven, at Westminister. And, lastly, seven at Cambridge were to translate the books called Apocrypha. The rules laid down by the king, to these different companies, were as follow:—

1. The ordinary Bible read in the Church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed and as little altered as the truth of the original will permit.

2. The names of the prophets and the holy writers, with the other names in the text, to be retained, as near as may be, accordingly as they are vulgarly used.

3. The old eclesiastical words to be kept, as the word "church," not to be translated "congregation."

4. When any word hath divers significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most eminent fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place, and the analogy of faith.

5. The division of the chapters to be altered either not at all, or as little as may be, if necessity so require.

6. No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words which cannot, without some circumlocution, so briefly and fitly be expressed in the text.

7. Such quotations of places to be marginally set down as shall serve for the fit references of one Scripture to another.

8. Every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters, and, having translated or amended them severally by himself where he thinks good, all to meet together, to confer what they have done, and agree for their part what shall stand.

9. As any one company hath despatched any one book in this manner, they shall send it to the rest, to be considered of, seriously and judiciously; for his majesty is very careful on this point.

10. If any company, upon the review of the book so sent, shall doubt or differ upon any places, to send them word thereof, to note the places, and therewithal to send their reasons; to which, if they consent not, the difference to be compounded at the general meeting, which is to be of the chief persons of each company, at the end of the work.

11. When any place of special obscurity is doubted of, letters to be directed by authority, to send to any learned in the land, for his judgment on such a place.

12. Letters to be sent from every bishop to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand, and to move and charge as many as, being skilled in tongues, have taken pains in that kind, to send their particular observations to the company, either at Westminster, Cambridge or Oxford, according as it was directed before in the king's letters to the archbishop.

13. The directors in each company to be the deans of Westminster and Chester for Westminster, and the king's professors in Hebrew and Greek in the two universities.

14. These translations to be used, when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, viz: Tindale's, Coverdale's, Mathewe's, Whitchurch's, Geneva.

15. Besides the said directors before mentioned, three or four of the most ancient and grave divines in either of the universities, not employed in translating, to be assigned by the vice-chancellor, upon conference with the rest of the heads, to be overseers of the translation, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observanee of the fourth rule above specified.

It will seem that these rules were well adapted to procure the fullest consideration for every passage from all the translators; and also to draw to the work the advantage of the opinions of every other well qualified person in the kingdom, not specially engaged in the labor of translating.

All the preliminaries having been settled, the translation was commenced in the spring of 1607. In the first place, each individual rendered separately into English every one of the books which were assigned to his company. Then the company assembled, and, by a careful comparison of the version of every member, determined what expression shall stand. When any book was so far completed, it was sent to each of the other companies for their revision, in the course of which, it was examined by several other versions; for, as Selden informs us, "one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, Italian, &c.: if they found any fault, they spoke; if no, he read on." Thus all the assistance which could be afforded by former laborers in the same field was carefully collected; and if any particular difficulty occurred, special application was made to those learned persons who were most likely to render help. Nearly three years were so occupied; and then three copies of the entire Bible having been completed were sent to London, where a committee of six,—two from Westminster, two from Cambridge, and two from Oxford,—met to review the whole work. Even this, however, was not tho't sufficient; Bishop Bilson, therefore, and Dr. Smith (who wrote the preface,) were employed to make a final revision of it; and at length, in 1611, a folio edition printed. Thus by God's blessings, was this great undertaking brought to a happy close; thus were those "wells of salvation" set fully open, from which our fathers and ourselves have drawn water with spiritual joy.

Doubtless our translation has its imperfections, and learned men have at different times objected to the rendering of particular passages; but these objections are comparatively unimportant, and effect not the value of the whole. I could produce a multitude of testimonies to this effect, from persons well competent to judge; but I shall select only one; and it shall be, for various reasons, that of the late eminent orientalist, Dr. Adam Clarke. "Those (says he) who have compared most of the European translations with the original, have not scrupled to say, that the English translation of the Bible, made under the direction of King James I., is the most accurate and faithful of the whole. Nor is this its only praise; the translators have seized the very spirit and soul of the original, and expressed this almost every where with pathos and energy. Besides, our translators have not only made a STANDARD TRANSLATION, but they have made their translation the STANDARD OF OUR LANGUAGE. The English tongue in their day was not equal to such a work; but God enabled them to stand, as upon Mount Sinai, and CRANE UP their country's language to the dignity of the originals; so that, after the lapse of 200 years, the English Bible is, with very few exceptions, the standard of the purity and excellence of the English tongue. The ORIGINAL, from which it was taken, is alone superior to the Bible translated by the authority of King James."

The precious treasure thus put into our hands ought to be duly prized. Let us "read, mark, and diligently learn" it. Especially let us ask, in pursuing it, for that enlightening Spirit who "moved" the "holy men of old" to write, and who is the best interpreter. Under his guidance we shall be led into all truth.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S DAUGHTER.

BY G. P. MORRIS.

Every part of the brief but glorious life of Pocahontas is calculated to produce a thrill of admiration, and to reflect the highest honor on her name. The most memorable event of her life is thus recorded:—After a long consultation among the Indians, the fate of Capt. Smith, who was the leader of the first colony in Virginia, was decided. The conclave resumed their silent gravity—two huge stones were placed near the water's edge—Smith was lashed to them, and his head was laid down, as a preparation for beating out his brains with war-clubs. Powhattan raised the fatal instrument, and the savage multitude, with their blood-stained weapons, stood near their king, silently waiting the prisoner's last moment. But Smith was not destined thus to perish. Pocahontas, the beloved daughter of the king, rushed forward, fell upon her knees, and with tears and entreaties prayed that the victim might be spared.—The royal savage rejected her suit, and commanded her to leave Smith to his fate. Grown frantic at the failure of her supplications, Pocahontas threw her arms about Smith, and laid her head upon his, her raven hair falling around his neck and shoulders, declaring she would perish with or save him. The Indians gasped for breath, fearing that Powhattan would slay his child for taking such a deep interest in the fate of one he considered his deadliest foe. But human nature is the same every where; the war-club dropped from the monarch's hand—his brow relaxed—his heart softened—and, as he raised his brave daughter to his bosom, and kissed her forehead, he reversed his decree, and directed Smith to be set at liberty! Whether the regard of this glorious girl for Smith ever reached the feeling of love, is not known. No favor was ever expected in return. "I ask nothing of Capt. Smith," said she, in an interview she afterwards had with him in England; "in recompense for whatever I have done, but the boon of living in his memory."—Sketches of Virginia.

Upon the barren sand
A single captive stood,
Around him came, with bow and brand
The red men of the wood.
Like him of old, his doom he hears,
Rock-bound on ocean's rim;
The chieftain's daughter knelt in tears,
And breathed a prayer for him.

Above his head in air,
The savage war-club swung;
The frantic girl, in wild despair,
Her arms about him flung.
Then shook the warriors of the shade,
Like leaves on aspen-limb,
Subdued by that heroic maid
Who breathed a prayer for him.

"Unbind him," gasped the chief,
"It is your king's decree!"
He kissed away her tears of grief,
And set the captive free.
'Tis ever thus, when, in life's storm,
Hope's star to man grows dim,
An angel kneels in woman's form,
And breathes a prayer for him.

GEOLOGY.—A paper by M. Murchisonon, says the geology of Russia contains much that is interesting to the geologist.—Beginning at the N. N. W., the oldest sedimentary deposit of Russia, is the Silurian, forming the lower shale or clay on which St. Petersburgh stands, and containing no organic remains. The sandstone formation succeeds, with fossils, and this is overlaid with limestone containing ammonites, trilobites, belemites and other types of the Silurian system. The sandstone is considered the same as the old red sandstone of the British isles. It consists of flaggy limestones, marles, and fossils, which occur in Belgium and Devonshire—fishes and fish-scales—among them the Holopticuus,) such as are discovered in Nairnshire, Morayshire, Branshire, &c. Next in the ascending order is the carboniferous system, the lower beds consisting of yellow sand mixed with bituminous shale and coal plants. The megalycthis and the producta were found here so characteristic of the fossils of the carboniferous limestone of Arran, in Scotland. White limestone and oolite succeed with 30 or 40 varieties of shells similar to those described by writers on fossil geology. This range has alabaster cliffs of immense extent. In the tertiary strata 500 miles in the interior and 300 feet above the ocean, he discovered shells similar to those in the existing seas. Russia, then, at no distant geological period, must have been covered by the ocean.

The discovery of a separate series of the old red sandstone in a distant place combining the fossils of Scotland, Devonshire, and other regions, is well calculated to establish the fact that their different strata are of the same age—the vast series of mineral depositions, accompanied by corresponding organic remains in the several places where they occur, are immediately in favor of the successive formations which geologists suppose.—*Balt. EXHUMATION OF ANDRE.

The remains of the hapless Andre were taken up in 1833, under the auspices of the late Duke of York, with a view to their repose in Westminster Abbey. We proceeded, says Mr. Buchanan, up a narrow lane or broken road, with trees at each side, which obscured the place where he suffered, until we came to the opening in the field, which at once led to an elevated spot on the hill. On reaching the mount, we found that it commanded a view of the surrounding country for miles. Gen. Washington's head quarters, and the house in which he resides, were distant about a mile and a half or two miles, but fully in view. The army lay encamped chiefly also in view of the place, and must necessarily have witnessed the catastrophe. The field, as well as I could judge, contained from eight to ten acres, and was cultivated; but around the grave, the plough had not approached nearer than three or four yards, that space being covered with loose stones thrown upon and around the grave, which was only indicated by two cedar-trees about ten feet high. A small peach tree had also been planted at the head of the grave, by the kindly feeling of a lady in the neighborhood.

With great care the broken lid was removed, and there to our view lay the bones of the brave Andre, in perfect order. I, among others, for the first time discovered that he had been a small man; this observation I made from the skeleton, which was confirmed by some then present. The roots of the small peach tree had completely surrounded the skull like a net.

At this scene a new and painful question arose. The order at Andre's execution was, that he should be buried in his regimentals; but rumors were not wanting that he had been stripped before he was consigned to his wild grave. After a minute examination of the dust of the coffin, there was no metal to be found, although the string of leather that had tied the unfortunate soldier's hair was perfect. How far these facts accord with the rumors adverted to, others may judge, but it is useful that all these facts should be brought to light, as it may reasonably be inferred that if stripped, those who permitted this outrage, or knew of it, had no idea that the unfeeling act they then performed, would be blazoned to the world near half a century after the event.

Having placed the remains in a sarcophagus, it was borne amidst the silent and unbought regret of the numerous assemblage, and deposited in the worthy pastor's house, with the intention of removing it to his Majesty's packet on the Tuesday following.

A HINT TO THE GIRLS.—We have always considered it an unerring sign of innate vulgarity, when we have heard ladies take particular pains to impress us with an idea of their ignorance of all domestic matters, save sewing lace, or weaving a net to encase their delicate hands. Ladies, by some curious kind of hocus pocus, have got it into their heads that the best way to catch a husband is to show him how profoundly capable they are of doing nothing for his comfort. Frightening a piano into fits, or murdering the king's French, may be good bait for certain kinds of fish, but they must be of that very small kind usually found in very shallow waters. The surest way to secure a good husband, is to cultivate those accomplishments which make a good wife.—Farmer's Fam. Visitor.

SHOW-BILL ON A GRAVESTONE.—Coming by the Brick Church, in Beekman street, this morning, where they are substituting a neat railing for the old board fence—during which alteration the burying-ground is fully exposed to public view—I was startled at seeing a SHOW-BILL FOR A BALL, affixed to a gravestone!—"Parker's First Ball." Many reflections occurred to me, as they doubtless will to those who read this announcement.—There is often but a step from the ball to the grave. It would be well if a gravestone could be erected in every ball-room. "Momento mori" should be written over the portals. "There is a time to dance." Aye, and a time to die. May the thoughtless living lay it to heart. For one, I shall not soon forget the gravestone, with the record of the death of some one on one side, and a gaudy show-bill advertisement for a ball on the other.—N. Y. Evangelist.

WASHINGTON once called upon an elderly lady, whose little grand-daughter, at the close of his call waited on him to the door, and opened it to let him out. The general, with his customary urbanity, thanked her, and laying his hand upon her head, said: "My dear, I wish you a higher office." "Yes, Sir—to let you in!" was the prompt and beautiful reply.

SABBATH AND BETHEL CONVENTION.

Morning Session, Nov. 20 1840.

——— Atkinson, Esq., of Wheeling, in the Chair.

Dr. C. E. Stowe, reported for the Committee, a clear, Christian and convincing address to professed Christians, on the subject of 'Sabbath desecration,' which will be published.

Rev. Mr. Powell suggested that two ideas might with advantage be added to the report. To wit: That the Sabbath-traveling by church members was felt to be the grand obstacle to a Sabbath upon the inland waters, by intelligent waterman and boat owners—and that, especially, Christian emigrants leaving their homes for the West, most of whom never saw a canal-boat till they come for the passage; and never think of the temptation to violate the Sabbath till Saturday night finds them with their goods aboard,—that these Christian emigrants should be cautioned before leaving home, that they brace their hearts against the temptation when it comes.

Rev. J. Blanchard—Said he liked the report with Mr. Powell's suggestion. He thought it decidedly the best presentation of our views yet given to the Convention. Sir, said he, we are called of God, as his ministers for the propagation of his truth, to give names to Sabbath-breaking practices; and this report, so far as it goes, does it. This is what the tempted man needs, and this is what God wishes us to do.

If you assert the proposition, the general proposition that man needs a Sabbath—that the good of Society demands it; that it is a fundamental institution, without which nothing else that is valuable in Society can stand: all admit this. The gentleman on my left admitted it yesterday, yet he could not see why a man could not keep the Sabbath as well while the steam is on the boat as he can when it is off—traveling as lying still. Thus you see, sir, the great question after all is, what practices break the Sabbath and what do not? These, these are the points which God has called us to clear up: to apply the remedy right where begins the disease. The difficulty is, that the man is blinded by this apparent interest. He is on board the boat—12 o'clock on Saturday night comes—every stroke of the engine brings him nearer the port of his destination; his interest draws him onward—conscience struggles, but the man yields and the Sabbath is broken.

The blinding power of interest is almost beyond conception in such cases. When a man goes on an errand of gain, the prospect of losing a few dollars, or of making a few dollars less than he had hoped, makes him feel, for the time, almost as bad as the prospect of bankruptcy and becoming a pauper: and what will not a man do to avoid the condition of a mendicant!

Now the object of this Convention is, to set on foot a system of measures which will hold back the heart from sin at the point where sorest pressed by temptation; to hang a weight of motive on the uphill side of the soul to keep it from falling into the gulf of avarice. And there is no way to do this but to chalk every practice which the law of the Sabbath requires to be abandoned, as contraband and forbidden. This, and nothing short of this is the office which the people require and God demands at our hands.

There is one suggestion in addition to those made by the brother, (Mr. Powell.) I should be glad to have a few paragraphs added at the beginning of the report stating more at large "the law of the Sabbath," as set forth in his remarks of yesterday by the brother at your side, (Mr. Mills.) The report assumes that God requires a Sabbath; but it argues that man needs one.

Now I would prefer that the report should reverse the case and make that consideration most prominent which is really most important. I wish to see a paper addressed to Christians adapted to make this grand impression on their minds, that God requires a Sabbath—that the fourth commandment is binding on all men, now and ever, in all times and in all time. Yes, and in eternity too. For I, for one, believe that there will be a Sabbath in Heaven. For it was on "the Lord's day," that John of Patmos was in the spirit, and saw the four and twenty elders, the representatives of the entire body of the triumphant church, standing before God, and "casting their crowns before the throne." And such is the nature of the mind, though pure, that it needs this periodical return, to gaze reverently up to its infinite Author. It demands a frequent pause from its holy industry; where the ministers of fire go on the rapid wing of flame to fulfil the errands of mercy, and obey the high behests of Jehovah, and come back to look up to its source. Not to get rid of the defilements of sin; for there is no sin in heaven; but to model its growth and shape its faculties in ascending towards God. Hence, there is a day when the sons of God come to present themselves before the Lord, as the mariner brings back his voyage-worn vessel, or rather as the stars come back to their sun;

> "Thither, as to a fountain, other stars
> Repairing, in their golden urns draw light."

They come back, not to repose from weariness, but to draw warmth and sweetness from the bosom of God, and to perpetuate through eternity, that Sabbath which so sweetly begun in time.

I do not object to encouraging men to duty by pointing to the "recompense of reward." It is fair and legitimate to show that "the willing and obedient shall eat the good of the land." But convincing men that virtue is profitable will never dissuade them from vice. When the old prophets would reform men, they cried in their guilty ears, "Thus saith the Lord God,"—"I am the Lord and there is none else."—"Break off your sins by righteousness."—And when they were sore pressed by the violence of temptation to do evil, God was their motive to deter them from guilt.—"How can I," was their cry, "How can I do this great thing and not sin against God." This is the mighty motive which brings men right, and holds them so. And I wish this motive to take prominence in all that we prepare for the public mind. I wish to let in upon the mind and heart of the nation, the warm influence of the Blessed Jesus. O what a heaven upon earth will it make, when all shall thus bow their necks to his easy yoke and light burden! Then indeed shall there be one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Sabbath, one salvation, and one wide millenium, over-spreading and blessing the earth.

[Rev. Mr. Stillman, Bethel Agent and Secretary in Western New York, here presented a most interesting and convincing series of facts and arguments, respecting Bethel operations in New York and on the Lakes; triumphantly answering objections and showing the practicability of restoring the Sabbath on all inland waters. His facts respecting boatmen, drivers on the canals, etc., were deeply affecting. They will doubtless speedily appear in printed reports.]

Dr. Latta of the Methodist Episcopal church, Cincinnati, here made some remarks which were somewhat interrupted and finally broken off by a call to attend a sick child.

He said that there were difficulties in the way of establishing a line of Sabbath-keeping boats, which he believed insurmountable. We could never persuade the owners to meet the loss involved in stopping a boat on the Sabbath. Would to God all boats were Sabbath-keeping boats. But he believed it unwise and useless to interfere for establishing such a line. He thought the wisest and only course to restore the Sabbath was, to keep to preaching the gospel, and trust to its power to reform men, without our interfering with their business arrangements.

Rev. J. Rankin, of Repley, replied—

The Gospel, said he, is without doubt, the cure for all moral diseases that infect mankind. But the general diffusion of the Gospel does not remove particular evils till it is applied to them. If you wish to remove sin from any one point in Society, you must bring the Gospel to bear on that point. If you do not, nothing is done. The gospel did not expel intemperance till it was brought to bear on that specific sin. So if you will destroy licentiousness, Sabbath-breaking, or any other moral evil, you must faithfully and openly bring the gospel to bear upon it.

And the gospel thus applied, will do it.—For truth is more powerful than arms. It can bring men to do what all the arms of all the conquerors never did, and never can compel them to.

Now overlooking or neglecting this, is all the difficulty we have respecting the Sabbath. The authority of God has not been enforced upon the consciences of the people as it ought to have been, and we are now reaping the bitter fruits.

The truth is, we have got a christianity of expedience. Men want no more of it than will just take them to Heaven. They do not receive it as binding them to live for the building up of Christ's kingdom. They resort to it as an expedient by which they may get to heaven.

Now what we want is, first, to have it impressed on the minds of the people that they must keep the Sabbath because God commands it, cost what it will. "In earing time and harvest shalt thou rest." It costs the boat owner no more to keep the Sabbath than it does the farmer in harvest. But this people need to be taught that there is to be no calculation of loss and gain about it. That they must keep the Sabbath at the risk of their souls; and if they die in breaking the Sabbath, they die violating the plain commands of Almighty God.

The second thing we need is, to have the people taught to patronize those boats that do well, and withhold patronage from them that do ill. This is a universal principle of practical morals. It commends itself to the reason, and conscience, and common sense of all mankind. This we have a right to do, and nobody has any right to complain of it.

Now if these two things are done faithfully, our waters will shortly be as still on the Sabbath as the house of God. "The land will have rest." The world can do nothing against the church. If all the denominations, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Baptists will come up to this work, it is done. If the church had done her duty there never would have been a law made to break the Sabbath. If the church would do her duty now, the laws would be repealed which require the mail to be carried on the Sabbath. Not only this, but every other sin in the land which is established by law, will be done away as soon as the church sets her face against it. The history of the world proves this.—There never was and never will be one sin established by law in any country, where the religious people set their faces against it.

But here is our difficulty. When we attempt to oppose any popular sin, many of the ministers of Christ are found wanting. Of course the testimony of the church, and the force of the truth on the consciences of the people is broken. This is the reason why any sin is ever established by law.

The guilt of this does not rest on the common people. It rests with the ministers of the gospel. They are called and sent forth to this very work—to bear the reproach and labor of accomplishing it.—Therefore they are not entangled with the world. They do not depend for their support on the world. They depend on the church, who receive their idea of duty from them.

It is not so in monarchial governments. There the king gives the laws. But here the people make the laws, and the ministers form the people. Worldly men can do nothing without the church. Thus the guilt does not rest on the common people. It rests on the ministers. When any popular sin is to be opposed, many of them stand behind the curtain. This weakens and breaks the testimony of the church. And when God makes inquisition for these sins, ministers of Christ will be found to have been file-leaders in establishing and upholding them! For they are their leaders. The people always do in these things as they see their minister do. If they do not follow their own minister, it is because they are influenced by some neighboring minister to think he is wrong. Thus on them rests the awful guilt at last.

As to the loss to be incurred, a boat may stop on the Sabbath with very little loss.—Let the captain hire his pilot but for six days, and pay him but for six days. Let him employ his hands the same way. Let him say to his passengers, "We shall lie by on the Sabbath. I shall not charge you for that day for any thing but your provisions. Them I shall put as low as possible." And there are enough who would prefer that mode of traveling to sustain him. But if not, it makes no difference. Better have no steam-boats at all, than lose the Sabbath. Better transport our goods as we did before we had steam. It is better that the river should not be navigated at all, than violate the law of God to do it. What are the boats for, but for prosperity; But did ever any nation prosper by robbing God?—God never gave but six days to men for labor, and they who take seven rob God.—"Will a man rob God? But ye have robbed me," even this whole nation.

Some say that the Sabbath was done away with the old Jewish ceremonies. But Christ did not so regard it. He says to the Jews, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter neither on the Sabbath-day." Thus he establishes the Sabbath. For this was said concerning the destruction of Jerusalem; and he directs them to pray that a necessity may not be laid on them to break the solemnity of the Sabbath by the confusion of flight. And if the Sabbath is binding under the New Testament dispensation, it binds forever, for there is no other dispensation to come. And that Christ did require a Sabbath, not only the scripture above, but common sense teaches. There is no place in the whole word of God, where he has given man more than six working days in a week. It was so from the beginning, and will be so to the end. For if a man needed a Sabbath in a state of innocence, when his bodily vigor was unwasted by disease—when his soul was rent by no violent passions which needed the Sabbath to calm them; when he had no vicious appetities to check, and his breast was infested by no cares of worldly labor. How much more does he need a day of holy rest, now when his frame is enfeebled by vice, his soul torn by conflicting passions, and sunk to low desires—and he is doomed to pass his weary life amid the dust and sweat of labor to obtain his bread!

——— Sawyer, Esq., of the Episcopal church, Cincinnati.—Mr. Chairman, I am an under-writer in this city, and more or less acquainted with the business transacted by the insurance offices in this and other places. And, sir, I state from personal knowledge, that the losses on our waters occasioned by the reckless characters of our captains and crew, are so great, that the offices have seriously in contemplation to make the good character of the captain and hands a condition in regulating the prices of insurance. I believe it will be done in less than one year. I know one office in this city which has lost $20,000 the past year on the hulls of steamboats, one-half or two-thirds of the whole of which they know has been lost through the recklessness of the captain or the vices of the crew. These things have forced the rates of insurance up so high, that merchants complain that they are intolerable. Sir, they are high, and never can be otherwise until there is reformation among our boatmen. No office can live and sustain the losses occasioned by the vices of the watermen, on low rates. And, as usual, the well-doing must pay for the sins and follies of the ill-doing, till respect is had to the morals of the crew in rating the insurance.

Sir, if a line of boats were running today on Temperance and Sabbath-keeping principles, and a man wished to be insured on, say 3000 bbls. pork from this to New Orleans, I have no doubt that it would be a wise business transaction for an office to take the insurance six per cent. less, in consideration that the boat is navigated by a conscientious captain and crew, (i. e. the shipper by the Sabbath-keeping boat would pay some $1500 less insurance on one freight, than others.)

Such a line of boats if started at once might not succeed, but in the end it will succeed. And if any man wants faith in this enterprise, let him pray to God to give him faith. Those who labor for what is right must always succeed. I know our beginning looks small, but if we go into this work with our whole hearts, I verily believe that results will come out in a few years which we should start at the mention of now.

A Gentleman whom the Reporter did not know, here remarked that the discussion was now taking the turn he desired. He fully believed that Sabbath-breaking was an unprofitable business—that our transportation could be accomplished at less risk and expense with a Sabbath, than without one. What he desired was to learn how.—He was met by almost all boat-proprietors and captains, who declared that the Sabbath could not be kept without such pecuniary loss as would ruin the carrying trade. He did not believe them, but what he had come to the Convention for, was to learn from commercial men how to answer them; and to show in dollars and cents that all concerned would be better off with a Sabbath than without one.

(Concluded next week.)

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

That season of the year is approaching in which, from past experience, the people of God may hope that Divine influence will be manifest in the churches. We do not think that Christians should indulge the feeling that there are no particular seasons when the Lord will, in a particular manner, be gracious to his people, but there are peculiar circumstances in the providence of God, which may conspire to produce a better state of preparation in the minds of the church at one time than at another. Past experience has taught us, that with many churches, the winter season is peculiarly adapted to special effort for the conversion of sinners, and the advancement of the general interests of Christ's cause. Many churches, we know, have it in contemplation to hold a series of meetings this winter, to promote, with the Divine blessing, a revival of religion in their own hearts, and the advancement of the cause of religion in the communities where they dwell. Now, brethren, let those of us who contemplate such an effort, remember that the Holy Ghost was sent into the world to give efficacy to the truth, and that without his aid no real blessing will be obtained. Let us remember that no cause, moving us to pray and labor, but a sincere and ardent desire for the glory of God and the spiritual good of men, will be honored and blessed by the approbation of heaven. Let us understand and feel that no man—no means—no truth will ever avail to the conversion of a single sinner, unless the Holy Spirit gives the efficiency to the means. We cannot err by depending upon God. Too absolute and entire a dependance for his blessing upon Christian effort is impossible. The office work of the Spirit is to convince of sin, righteousness and judgment, and to take of the things of Christ, and show them unto his people; and unless this Divine agent does his work in the soul, man labors in vain. For the graces as well as the power of the Spirit, we are taught to pray; and to strengthen our faith, there is the most implicit and gracious promises. Let us, therefore, feel that to enter a mere formal round of duties, and to go through a mere mechanical process of means, while they might excite the attention of some, and stir the feelings of others, would only be to deceive ourselves and mock our Maker. Let us enter upon our duties with a spirit of self-denial. Let us prepare our hearts by sincere repentance for our past offences, and confession of our sins before God. Let us faithfully pray and labor for the conversion of our friends and neighbors. And above all, let us from first to last feel that our trust and strength is entirely in God—"Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit saith the Lord of hosts."

"TAKE HEED WHAT YE HEAR"

Thus the Lord admonished his disciples: Mark iv. 24. In Buck's Anecdotes, we find three illustrations of that caution which are always applicable. If you have read them before, probably you have forgotten them; if not, they may impress you—and in either case they are excellent and edifying, if you will take them to yourself—to efface bigotry, deepen lowliness of mind, and excite you to "practice what you know" of truth.

BIGOTED HEARER.—A person meeting another returning from hearing a popular preacher, said to him, "Well, I hope you have been highly gratified." "Indeed I have," replied the other; "I wish I could have prevailed on you to hear him: I am sure you would never relish any other preacher afterwards." "Then," returned the wiser Christian, "I am determined I never will hear him, for I wish to hear such a preacher as will give me so high a relish and esteem for the word of God that I shall receive it with greater eagerness and delight whenever it is delivered."

HUMBLE HEARER.—"A torch may be lighted by a candle, and a knife be sharpened by an unpolished stone;" so Mr. Hildersham used to say, "that he never heard any faithful minister in his life that was so mean, but that he could discover some gift in him that was wanting in himself, and could receive some profit by him."

PRACTICAL HEARER.—A poor woman in the country went to hear a sermon, wherein among other evil practices, the use of dishonest weights and measures was exposed. With this discourse she was much affected. The next day when the minister, according to the custom, went among his hearers, and called upon the woman, he took occasion to ask her what she remembered of his sermon. The poor woman complained much of her bad memory, and said she had forgotten almost all that he delivered. "But, one thing," said she, "I remembered; I remembered to burn my bushel." A doer of the word cannot be a forgetful hearer.—Christian Intelligencer.

THE GOSPEL

Practical Religion, as a part of the plan of redemption, is wisely adapted to test the sincerity of the followers of Christ, to develope the higher principles of the soul, and bring into lively operation those affections which have been prostituted in the service of the god of this world. It is peculiarly interesting to contemplate the wisdom exhibited in this arrangement of Heaven.

Take, for example, the duty of prayer.—No one can doubt the fact that all our necessities are better known to God than to ourselves. And even those things which we think are necessary and desirable, are sometimes withheld, after urgent and oft repeated intercession. Paul besought the Lord three times to remove the "thorn in the flesh," but it was not removed. Christ prayed earnestly that the "cup might pass from him," yet he was required to drink it. If we are less acquainted with our conditions and needs, than the One with whom we have to do, why are we required to pray? The simple exercise of prayer is an arrangement calculated to affect the soul.—Were the Christian to receive blessings without feeling his need, or asking for them, he would not be so sensible of the goodness of the hand that hath supplied him, or his obligation to use the blessings received for the glory of the Giver. He is therefore required to "ask," "seek," "knock," if he would receive.

The fact that he sometimes "asks and receives not," teaches a lesson of submission to the will of his heavenly Father, and should induce a more thorough and careful examination of the motives by which he is actuated, lest he desire them to consume upon his lust. In all the practical duties of Christianity, the contemplative and pious mind can discern marks of the goodness and the benevolence of the divine Being. Hence, no Christian should falter in the discharge of his duty, or consider the requirements of his Savior too arduous; for, however difficult they may appear, He will cause obstructions to give way before him, and grant blessings to the faithful, that will yield an abundant harvest here, and prepare him, by appropriate discipline, to receive a crown of life hereafter.

Another characteristic worthy of note, is that every command faithfully obeyed, increases the ability of the Christian to comply with others. Secret devotion sharpens the sword of the Spirit, promotes personal consecration to God, prepares the mind for the more public exercises of religion, and increases the faith of the humble disciple, by which he is enabled to make great sacrifices for God and expect great things from God.

Finally, the interest with which we contemplate the character of a "man on earth devoted to the skies," is greatly heightened by the consideration that he is influenced in all his labors by that secret, soul-quickening principle of love, to which the ungodly are utter strangers. A. R. H.

FOR THE YOUNG.

AN APPEAL TO YOUTH.

There are some who are distinguished by the fear of God in their youth; some Isaacs who prefer an evening walk to meditate, to the crowded avenues of dissipation; some Josephs, whose image is "a fruitful bough by a well;" some Davids, who love the harps of Zion, and have no ear "for the song of the drunkard," or "the mirth of fools;" some Timothys, who "from childhood have known the Scriptures, which is able to make them wise unto salvation;" and I hail you on your early escape from the paths of the destroyer, on your early separation from a world, which attracts only to show its emptiness, and elevates only to depress, on your early union with the wise and good. Go forth in all "the beauties of holiness," honor God, and serve your generation according to his will. Religiously occupy the stations which you are to ennoble, and form the connections which you are to bless. "Adorn the doctrine of God your Savior in all things." Earnestly pursue the glorious course which you have begun; be not weary in well-doing; grow in grace as you advance in years; "abound more and more in knowledge and in all judgment," "approve the things that are excellent," and be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ. And what hinders any of you, my young friends, from joining yourselves to the Lord? Weigh the reasoning which you have heard; suspend for a while the influence of your passions, and endeavor to feel the force of the motives which have been adduced. Deliberate, or rather decide, for there is no time for hesitation; "now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation;" the language of the Redeemer is, "To-day," and will you say with Pharaoh, "To-morrow?" Every delay will have you more remote from the God you have to seek; every delay will place more barriers between you and heaven—every delay will increase your crimes, your passions, your aversions,—every delay will diminish the efficacy of means, the period of divine patience, the time of your probation. While you hesitate, you die; while you promise yourselves years, perhaps you have not days—perhaps the shuttle has passed the loom that wove thy winding sheet—perhaps, in yonder shop lies rolled up, and ready to be served off, the piece of cloth destined to be thy shroud; perhaps the feet of them that have buried thy companion are at the door to carry thee out.—Jay.

LITERATURE.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

THE MORAL LESSONS OF CLASSIC STUDIES.

Physical science is unreasonably extolled by some in our day, and the ancient studies of our colleges are decried. It seems to be thought that the grand business of human minds is to discover how we can make the most bushels of corn grow on an acre of ground, or how can we travel over the greatest space in the shortest time; or how can we make great wheels and little wheels, with cogs or bands, move most rapidly and powerfully by steam, or wind, or water. With these sublime objects in view, books are printed, periodicals are flying on all winds, lecturers are itinerating, libraries are gathered, and lyceums established.—These objects are important, I acknowledge; but I must maintain that the study of man is more important than the study of beasts or birds, plants or minerals, fire or water. It may be well enough for me to know something about the bear; but I do not need to know him very intimately, for I do not expect to have much to do with him in the course of my life. I do not expect to eat with him, nor talk with him, nor trade with him, nor room with him. But I have much to do with man; and I want to know all about him. I want to know what he has been, all through history, in all circumstances, that I may know how I shall find him. I want to be able to judge of different characters, that I may be wise in my transactions with men, and that I may teach others this wisdom.

It is true, that there is no book like the Bible for setting man in a full light, where he appears just as he is, and just as we shall find him in our every-day intercourse with him. And if we could induce the young, in general, to pursue a full course of biblical study, we might pursue the advice of Horace with some plausible reason, and warm our rooms some cold winter day with the volumes of Plato, Aristotle, and Cicero. But as it is, the young will not generally study moral lessons about human character and actions, about moral deeds and their consequences, unless they study classic authors. I blush at the want of moral instruction in a great mass of English literature. I have taken up Ferguson's History of the Roman Republic, a book of the highest reputation in Roman history; and I have thought it was a heathen work in comparison with Sallust, Livy, or Tacitus.

But I will quote a passage from Livy, that shows the moral instruction of a classic author.

"Tullia, the wife of Lucius Tarquin, whom she married after the murder of her sister and former husband, instigated him to aspire to the throne of her own father, Servius Tullius; and Tullius was accordingly slain in the streets of Rome." The historian proceeds to say, "It is believed, because it was not inconsistent with her other crimes, that this was done at the suggestion of Tullia. However, it is clear enough that she was conveyed in a carriage to the forum, where, without a modest regard for the men, she called her husband out from the assembly, and herself first saluted him king. By him, being ordered to retire from so great a crowd, she betook herself home, and she reached the head of the Cyprian street, where was lately the temple of Diana; and as her coachman turned the chariot to the right to the Urbian slope, that she might be carried to the Esquilian hill, he stood affrighted, and checked the reins, and showed to his mistress the murdered Servius. A foul and inhuman crime is here related; and the very place is a memorial of it; for they call it the wicked street, where Tullia, furious, the angry ghosts of her murdered sister and husband harassing her, is said to have driven her carriage over the dead body of her father, and to have carried on her bloody vehicle part of her father's gore, herself also being spattered and polluted with it, and to have borne it to the household gods of herself and husband, by whose wrath there soon followed an end to this reign, appropriate to its beginning."

The heathenism of ghosts and household gods will slide over our minds like water over a rock; but the moral lessons of such passages may remain. Our moral emotions are exercised, and we learn to dislike and abhor female cruelty and immodesty; we learn to detest crimes, but especially crimes against a brother, a sister, and a parent; we learn to expect that even in society where knowledge and morals are very low, a foul deed will brand for ages the character of its author; we learn that crimes will be punished in kind probably in this world; and finally, that even before wrath comes upon the guilty, they feel dreadful torture in their own souls.

The fact is, that God reigned at Rome as well as at Jerusalem; and punished crimes in the one place, as well as the other; and in honest Roman historians, divine justice is therefore strikingly apparent.—Compared with the truth, that crimes are followed by punishments, and virtues by rewards, how long, how trifling is the lesson that lime is a good dressing for wheat! Let physical science have her proper place, and let us study about roots, and grasses, and grains; about minerals and metals; and let us know how we can feed and warm man, and his oxen, cows, and sheep; but do not deprecate the nobler studies, that respect man as a rational, moral, and social being. Let us keep hold of the study of the language, the poetry, the philosophy, and the history of men, except as we get into something much better—the book of God. O what wisdom, what morality, what holiness, what social perfection, what happiness will reign on earth, when the thorough, the enlarged, the devout, and the practical study of the Bible shall be the basis of the education of the young!

PILGRIM'S WAY SONG.

BY MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.

I'm bound to the house of my Father;
O draw not my feet from the way,
Nor stop me these wild flowers to gather;
They droop at my touch and decay!
I think the flowers that are blooming
In beauty unfading above,
The wings of kind angels perfuming,
Who fly down on errands of love.

Of earth's shallow waters the drinking
Is powerless my thirst to allay:
Their taste is of tears, while we're sinking
Beside them where quicksands betray.
I long for the fount ever living,
That flows by my Father's own door,
With waters so sweet and life-giving,
To drink and to thirst never more.

The gold of this bright happy dwelling,
Makes all lower gold to look dim;
Its treasures all treasures excelling,
Shine forth and allure me to Him.
The gems of this world I am treading
In dust, where as pebbles they lie;
To win the rich pearl that is shedding
Its lustre so pure from on high.

For his pains a torn spirit is feeling,
No balsam from earth it receives,
I go to the tree that is healing,
To drop in my wounds from its leaves.
A child that is weary with roaming,
Returning in gladness to see
Its home, and parents, I'm coming—
My Father, I hasten to thee!

SWEARING.

A Persian, humble servant of the sun,
Who, though devout, yet bigotry had none,
Hearing a lawyer, grave in his address,
With adjurations every word impress,
Supposed the man a bishop or at least,—
God's name so much upon his lips,—a priest;
Bow'd at the close, with all his graceful airs,
And begg'd an interest in his frequent prayers.

NEW YEAR'S SERMON.

Proper employment for the MERRY, is selected as the theme of a discourse, which, by leave of Providence, will be pronounced in the house of worship belonging to the "De Ruyter Religious Society," (usually called the Presbyterian house,) on the first day of the week, 11 o'clock, A. M., Jan. 3d, 1841.

J. R. JOHNSON.

De Ruyter, Dec. 16, 1840.

ORDINATION.

The Baptist church of Christ in De Ruyter, have unanimously resolved to call Bro. J. B. Pixley to ordination as Pastor of said church, and have named Wednesday, the sixth day of January, 1841, as the day on which to have him examined publicly, and set apart, if thought proper, to the work of the gospel ministry, at their meeting house in this village.

By order of the church.

Dec. 19, 1840.

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

The first Monday of 1841 has been mentioned by several ecclesiastical judicatories as a proper season to be devoted to fasting and prayer for the conversion of the world, joined with public religious services. We are requested to say, that the Presbyterian church in this village will be opened on that day. Prayer-meeting and conference at 11 o'clock A. M.—Preaching at 1 o'clock P. M. A general invitation is extended to the christian community.

VILLAGE LECTURES.—We are gratified to learn that these Lectures are to be opened this evening, (Jan. 1st,) by Professor S. N. SWEET. We understand the subject of the Lecture is to be the "Immortality of the Soul."

TO OUR VILLAGE PATRONS.—Our Carrier wishes us to say that some considerable expense has been incurred in preparing a "New Year's Address, and Business Directory" for the benefit of the villagers, and that he will furnish them with it early on New Year's morning, at their dwellings, on the most reasonable considerations.

QUESTIONS FOR MYSELF.

As I am now giving the parting hand to the closing year, and hope after a few hours to give the greeting hand to its successor, I feel inclined to question myself thus:

1. What evil have I done during the past year?

There has been evil enough done in the world by others, and therefore for me to add to the catalogue, was altogether superfluous. But I have done it. I have often acted from impure motives. When my motives have been right, I have acted too hastily, or too tardily. I am sensible that I have done much that is wrong. If I were now a more godly man than I am, my wrong actions during the past year would appear to me more numerous, and more aggravated than they now do. What, then, is their number and enormity in the sight of God? "Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults." O, Lord, forgive, for Christ's sake, all my past errors and faults!

2. What good have I done during the year 1840?

Alas! too little! But I hope I have done something to make the world better. I have tried to alleviate some sorrows—to enlighten some minds—to direct some wanderers—to point some sinners to the Lamb of God. But I might have done much more good than I have, had I been more watchful to discern favored opportunities, and had I been more ready to improve to the best advantage those which I clearly saw.

A retrospect of the little good which I trust I have done, makes me weep because I have done no more.

3. Wherein can I amend my life? I need more benevolence of heart; more equanimity of mind, more tenderness of conscience, more faith, patience, stability of purpose—in all these respects I ought to amend. Also, I have a great many wrong habits which need to be corrected. I speak at times fretfully; often give my opinion hastily; sometimes I judge harshly; I do not rise early enough in the morning, especially Sabbath morning I am apt to be deficient in this respect. I greatly fail in not fully improving my Sabbath hours. Besides these deficiencies, I have my little follies, such as are described in Eccles. x. 1: "Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savor; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor." Every Christian ought to be in reputation for that wisdom that cometh from above.—I see that I need not be idle, for to amend my life, will furnish me with no small amount of employment.

4. In what efforts for the benefit of mankind shall I engage during the year 1841?

If I am faithful in some lawful occupation, however humble it may be, I know that I shall thus accomplish something for the benefit of my race. But, aside from this, what can I do for the world? Can I write some valuable article for the Christian press? Can I help circulate some good periodical? Can I do something to interest the youthful mind, and thus rescue it from that enchanted ground—vain amusements? Can I help the missionary cause? What does the cause of Education require at my hands? Can I assist to accelerate the triumphs of the Temperance reform? What can I do in the wide department of Public Morals? What can I do for the American slave? Can I do any thing to hasten the total abolition of that iniquitous system of legalized robbery, by which he is declared to be "goods and chattels to all intents, purposes and constructions whatsoever?" What shall I do for the church of which I am a member? For the town in which I reside? For the village where my lot is cast? Can I do something to promote revivals of religion?—I see that there is enough for me to do. Who is sufficient for these things? Lord, help me! For without THEE I can do nothing.

5. Am I prepared to leave this world, should I be called to die before the expiration of 1841?

A solemn question is now before me.—Are my temporal affairs in a proper condition to be left? But I will not dwell on this; is my soul ready to go to the world of spirits? Would the sudden approach of death throw me into consternation, or should I meet him serenely as a messenger of peace? If I am called to die during the year 1841, I shall need much grace for the hour; if I am permitted to live through the year, I shall need large supplies of divine grace to enable me to meet my augmenting responsibilities. May thy grace, O Lord, be sufficient for me.

REVIVAL RECORD.

THE REVIVAL IN SCOTT continues with increasing interest and power. A considerable number have hopefully embraced the Savior, and many are inquiring what they "must do to be saved?" Having attended a number of these meetings within the last few days, we were delighted with the truly sound, plain, pungent, and evangelical character of the preaching—the marked attention of the people, and with the prospect of an extensive work of grace.

Since our return from Scott, we have received a letter from Rev. Mr. Foltz, from which we learn that "God is present among the people there in the majesty of his Spirit, and the car of salvation is rolling forward." We have not room for his article this week.

Extract of a letter from Bro. E. Stillman, to the Editors of the Register.

"GENESEE, Dec. 23d, 1840.

"Through the tender mercies of our Heavenly Father, I am permitted to address you a few lines of comfortable intelligence, that which is as cold water on a thirsty soul. Our quarterly meeting commenced with the third Genesee church, on the sixth day before the 2d Sabbath of the present month, attended by brethren Campbell, Greene, Scott, and myself. The Lord has been pleased to pour out his Spirit from on high to refresh his children in that place. The meeting commenced under unfavorable auspices, but such was the interest manifest at the time for closing, that it was thought best to continue the meeting another day; and it was continued evenings and the most of the days through the week, and finally closed the tenth day from its commencement, leaving an impression on the hearts of the people, which it is to be hoped will never be effaced. The work surely is the Lord's, overturning and rooting out prejudices, and settling difficulties, which no mortal power has been able hitherto to effect. Six young converts were added by baptism during the meeting, and more will follow soon. In all its varied circumstances it has proved a meeting of the most interesting features of any that I have ever attended."

REVIVAL AT ROME, N. Y.—A correspondent writes that an interesting revival is enjoyed in Rome. He remarks that the efforts to promote the work have been marked "by no attempts to get up excitement, but the plain and familiar preaching of the truth, visitation from house to house, and the distribution of Tracts, have been the means, under God, of bringing a large number of youth and others to Christ."—More than 250 are already numbered among those who are hopefully converted. The Sabbath school and Bible classes have shared largely in the blessing. Every member belonging to two of the Bible classes has been brought in. In the Female Seminary eleven young ladies, boarders, are rejoicing in hope, besides several others connected with the school. The work has been marked by great solemnity and stillness. It still continues, and favorable indications are observed in several churches in the vicinity.—N. Y. Observer.

ATTENTION TO RELIGION IN BALTIMORE.—A correspondent writes, "A revival of religion apeaprs to have commenced in the Hanover Street Church, Baltimore, (Mr. Hamner's) with promising prospects. The meetings are full and solemn—the truth is blessed by the Spirit, sinners are inquiring the way of salvation, and since Tuesday, ten or twelve have for the first time rejoiced in the Lord."—Ib.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.—We are informed that an interesting work of grace is in progress in Allentown, Pa., in the Rev. Mr. Landis's congregation. On Sunday the 29th of November, seventeen were added to the church. A short time previous, a series of religious services were held daily.

Rev. Mr. Davis writes, Dec. 8th, from Pittsburgh, that "the Lord has appeared in his power to revive his work in Zion.—We commenced a protracted meeting with a week of preparatory services, and the Lord has greatly blessed us; about twenty souls are anxiously inquiring, "What must we do?"

An extensive revival is in progress at the Baptist Church at Fairfax, Vt., and also another at Springfield, N. H., in which a large number have expressed hope. At Ashburnham, Mass., about fifty have been converted during meetings held in the Baptist Society.

The Christian Watchman states, that a revival is in progress at Providence and Richmond, R. I., in which upwards of forty have been converted.

The missionaries of the Methodist Church among the Cherokees, have received, during the past year, upwards of 300 on trial.

Revivals are reported in several of the circuits of the Methodists in Penn. In the Ligonier circuit, Pittsburgh conference, about two hundred have been converted; and in the Richmond circuit, upwards of one hundred and seventy. In several others, there are unwonted indications of religious interest.—N. Y. Evangelist.

REVIVAL.—The Watchman of the South, says: "We learn with much pleasure that there has, for some time, been an interesting state of feeling in the church of Rocky Spring, in Augusta County. This church enjoys the stated labors of Rev. John S. Blain. At a recent communion, in which Mr. Blain was aided by Rev. Messrs. Calhoon, Ewing, Davidson, and S. Brown, 24 were added, on examination, to the church. It is hoped that this work of grace is extending to neighboring congregations. O for times of God's powerful and gracious presence in all our churches."—N. Y. Observer.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the N. Y. Spectator.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER ACADIA.

TWENTY-ONE DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

Birth of an English Princess—taking of St. Jean D'Acre—submission of Mehemet Ali—stormy debates in the French Chamber of Deputies.

The steam ship Acadia, which sailed from Liverpool on the 4th inst., at 4 P. M., arrived at Halifax, on Saturday, at 10 A. M., sailed thence at 6 P. M., and arrived at Boston yesterday at two hours after noon. She encountered very boisterous weather, with long-continued head winds and a rough sea.

In addition to our usual files of English papers from our correspondents in London and Liverpool, we are indebted to Messrs. Topliff, of Boston, and Mr. Keefler of Halifax, for London papers to the evening of the 3rd of December, and Liverpool to the 4th, both inclusive.

We have also to tender our thanks to Lewis Lyman, Esq., who came passenger, for large files of papers, commercial letters, &c. &c. Mr. Lyman is the bearer of despatches from the U. S. Legation in London.

The Acadia brings intelligence of the safe delivery of the Queen of England, of a daughter, on the 21st of November. Also of the capture of the celebrated St. Jean D'Acre, after a bombardment of three hours, which, however, would not have expelled the garrison, probably, had it not been for a tremendous explosion of one of the magazines.

It appears scarcely doubtful, moreover, that the Pacha of Egypt has found himself under the necessity of yielding to the requirements of the allied powers. The accounts to this effect are positive, and indeed it is difficult to conceive, under existing circumstances, of his adopting any other course.

There is no later intelligence from China. The blockade of Canton has been officially promulgated in Europe.

REMAINS OF NAPOLEON.

The remains of Napoleon had arrived in France, but had not been landed at the latest advices.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT.

The steam ship President arrived at Liverpool on the 27th of November, after a passage of 16 days. Very great anxiety had prevailed for her safety for several days previous: it will be recollected that she put back to this port for a supply of coal. She will not leave England again until the 10th of February.

Bank Failure.—The failure of the banking house of Wright and Co., London, has caused a great sensation in the money market, and among capitalists. It seems that Mr. John Wright, the managing partner, had become deeply involved in various American securities—stock of the United States Bank, and a great variety of state stocks, and other descriptions of American bonds. It is also intimated that he had become farther involved by loans upon some of the New York city lot speculations.

Dealing largely in these American securities, and receiving large commissions, he pushed them off upon his friends as extensively as possible; but, as it is believed, all in good faith. He at length became so much involved as to conceal his operations from his partners, and many of his acceptances were not entered upon the books—the omission being for the purpose of concealment; one of the acceptances, it seems, was presented for payment to a partner, at a time when Wright was out. The result was a disclosure, and the situation of the house was found to be such that a suspension became necessary.

The bank possessed cash and available assets to the amount of £500,000. Its liabilities are set down at from £800,000 to £900,000.

Respecting the failure and its causes, and the present position of the house, a "banker's circular" has the following remarks:—

"Mr. John Wright has himself, in the words of his letter, very properly directed attention to the main source of the evil, when he says, 'owing to my inability any longer to support some large mercantile undertakings,' the banking-house became so compromised as to be compelled to suspend its payments. * * * * * Upon these we may be able to throw some little light.

"Mr. John Wright was the main spring, the principal moving power, in raising and sustaining a great number of public companies in this metropolis and elsewhere.

Wright seems farther to have been connected with a great many speculating companies; mercantile enterprises of a visionary character, &c.

A fiat of bankruptcy had been taken out against the Guilford bank. Suspicions of its soundness had been occasioned by the suicide of Mr. William Sparkes, the principal partner and manager.

An investigation ensued, and it was discovered that the bank was in a bad way.—Sparkes had destroyed a portion of the papers, so that a full knowledge of its condition could not be easily obtained.

Thus far it had been ascertained that the total amount of the estate of the [illegible] was £82,372 10s., and the securities, [illegible] &c. due to the bank, was £12[illegible], making a total of £207,772 19s.; while the liabilities, as far as could be ascertained, were about £184,600. The general opinion at Guilford is that the liabilities far exceed that amount.

The failure of Mrs. Dewes's bank at Penrith is also announced. Great distress will follow this failure. It was in fact the Savings' Bank of that place.

The City of Bristol, steam packet, from Waterford for Bristol, was lost on the night of November 17th, and all on board but two perished.

As usual, a number of distressing railroad accidents are recorded in the London papers now before us. Two on the Great Western railway—one on the London and Birmingham, &c. The latter was caused by collision. The coroner's inquest returned a verdict of wilful murder, and a deodand of £2000.

The Duke de Broglie has declined the English embassy.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

The treaty between Great Britain and Texas was signed by Lord Palmerston and General Hamilton, on the 1[illegible]th of November.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

By this arrival we have the important intelligence for which we have looked so confidently, that the affair of Egypt has been arranged in such a manner as will secure the peace of Europe. The announcement is thus made by the Times of the [illegible] instant:—

"The Paris papers have arrived by extraordinary express. They are exclusively occupied with the Eastern question, and the debate on the address in the Chamber of Deputies, which may be regarded as a branch of it.

The most important fact connected with this subject, alluded to in these journals, and confirmed by our private letters, is that the French Government had received positive intelligence that Mehemet Ali had accepted the terms offered him by the allies; that Ibrahim had, in consequence, been recalled into Egypt, with orders to avoid all possible collision with the forces of the allies, and that the preparations for the restoration of the Turkish fleet had actually commenced. "Nothing more remains to be done," observes a correspondent, "but to obtain from the allied powers some concessions which will enable France to escape with honor, from the position in which the treaty of the 15th of July, and its execution, have placed her.

To obtain such concessions was, it is now unquestionable, the object of M. Mounier's mission to London, and this I state with a perfect knowledge of the denial given to the statement that his visit to the British capital had a political object. What the concession sought for may be, I know not, but something must be done to set France at her ease, and to heal her wounded amour propre, in order that she may bear tamely a proposition to disarm that will assuredly issue from the Congress to be held in Vienna next spring."

Official intelligence of the taking of St. Jean D'Acre was received at the Foreign Office on the 30th of November. The fleet appeared before the place on the 2d, the bombardment commenced on the 3d, and during the night of that day, the governor and garrison quitted the town, which was taken possession of the next morning. The despatch says:—

During the bombardment, the principal magazine and the whole arsenal was blown up. By the explosion, two entire regiments, formed in position on the ramparts, were annihilated, and every living creature, within the area of 60,000 square yards, ceased to exist—the loss of life being variously computed at from 1200 to 2000 persons.—Those who may have been inclined to doubt the fighting qualities of the Egyptian troops, might acquire a lesson from the example of their endurance, if they could but contemplate the devastation and scene of horror by which this once formidable fortress is enshrouded.

On the 12th of November, at the parish church, Preston, William Stewardson, of Tarleton, was married to Miss Eleanor Relph, of Preston. Twenty-seven years ago this couple had intended to be married, and repaired to the church for that purpose, but were prevented by the father of the bride. Mr. Stewardson afterwards married; but becoming a widower he offered his hand and heart to his first love, and was again accepted by her: the fair one having lived, up to the day of her marriage, in a state of single blessedness.—Halifax (Eng.) Guardian.

FRANCE.

The address in answer to the king's speech, drawn up by M. Dupin, was read on the 23d of November, amid frequent murmurs. It was still the subject of debate at the date of our latest advices, and it was thought that it would be greatly modified before adoption. The debate had latterly assumed a very personal character, chiefly between M. Thiers and his successor M. Guizot. The former was exceedingly personal and vehement. We give the address as reported.

Sire—We thank your Majesty for having convoked the Chambers before the ordinary period of their meeting. It is particularly in important circumstances, in those which interest the honor and safety of nations, that it behooves a constitutional King to surround himself with the representatives of the country, to expose to them the situation of affairs, to take their advice, and [illegible] support.

[illegible] which the Emperor of [illegible] Great Britain, the [illegible] the Emperor of Russia [illegible] consent of the Ottoman [illegible] the relations of [illegible] Pasha of Egypt, has [illegible] France has [illegible] by this event, and has [illegible] all the phases of this [illegible] Prudence required of your Majesty to provide for all contingencies by [illegible] extraordinary [illegible] to meet them, and [illegible] appreciate their motives and [illegible].

In this state of things, our support, Sire, is assured to you, for an honorable peace, as well as for a just war. A peace without dignity, could never be accepted either by France or by her King. An unjust war, a violent aggression, without cause or object, would not be agreeable either to our manners, or to our ideas of civilization and progress. Peace, then, if possible—an honorable and certain peace, which will [illegible] the balance of power in Europe—such is our first wish. But if, in the course of events, it became impossible on these conditions—if the honor of France required it—if her violated rights—if her [illegible]——

(The President was here interrupted by [illegible] of murmurs from the left and [illegible] and was a long time unable to obtain a hearing. Several apostrophes were addressed to him which escaped us on account of the uproar. When he had at last obtained silence, he turned toward the left and told them that they would be at liberty to make their objections during the discussion; when M. Taschereau rose and exclaimed, "We cannot too soon protest against such language!" The President having repeated the sentence, his voice was [illegible] overpowered by loud murmurs. He was, however, at last allowed to proceed) ——or her interests seriously compromised, rendered it imperative: speak, then, Sire, and at your voice the French people will rise like one man, the country will submit to every sacrifice, and the national support will be assured to you.

We have anxiously desired the pacification of Spain. Interested in the consolidation of her constitutional government, we would see with deep regret anarchy endangering an undertaking so courageously prosecuted in the name of liberty.

France recalls again to Europe the rights of Polish nationality, so solemnly stipulated by treaties. (Murmurs.)

We approve your Majesty's resolution to send additional forces to the coast of Buenos Ayres, and trust that we shall at last obtain from the Government of that country, reparation for our just grievances. (Laughter.)

Our army in Africa again distinguished itself by brilliant feats of arms. Your sons, who avail themselves of every opportunity to display their courage, shared in the glory and perils of those expeditions. What we demand of your government, Sire, is, to investigate seriously the general direction of our affairs in that country, in order that the triumph of our arms may not be sterile, and that a possession so gloriously conquered, so dearly purchased, may become for France a source of strength and not a cause of weakness.

The attempt of Boulogne was not only insane—it was a criminal one. Repressed from the outset by the loyalty of the citizens, it was condemned by a solemn judgment; justice had its free course; the offence committed against society did not long remain without a reparation, and the expectations of the factions were every where signally defeated.

We shall examine with care the law of the budget. States being ever exposed to undergo unexpected burdens, a severe economy is always necessary. In other times, the Chamber, in the impossibility, of reducing the taxes which weigh on the country, had at least recommended the maintenance of a balance between the receipts and expenditures. Since, in fact, the balance is broken, we shall devise means of re-establishing and preserving it.

The other laws which your Government intends to present to us, shall be, on our part, the objects of mature attention. From this moment we congratulate ourselves on having been able to reply, by an unanimous vote, to the demands made of us by your Majesty, to relieve our departments which have been ravaged by the scourge of inundation.

The accord of the great powers of the state we know is the surest guarantee of public peace. Order maintained at home, by the energetic and persevering action of the Government, is the first principle of strength abroad. We express the wish of France when we declare that she firmly desires both.

Confide, Sire, in your star—(loud laughter)—as we confide ourselves in the perpetuity of your dynasty. A new son has been born to you; and the same Providence which lately covered you again with its ægis, will continue to protect France and preserve her from the evils of anarchy.

Let your throne, Sire, be always surrounded with enlightened and faithful advisers. Depositories of your authority, they alone are accountable for its exercise. On them rests entirely the guarantee of your personal inviolability. Let them take care, as you desire to intrust public officers to real merit; let probity be honored—let religion be respected. (Loud laughter.)

Let us support morality and the laws.—Men have been too much encouraged to attend exclusively to their personal interests. Let us endeavor to reanimate in their hearts a disinterested love of country, which inspires great and generous sacrifices. 'Honor and country!'—in these two words are to be found the seeds of those civic virtues which constitute the strength of nations and the duration of empires.

SPAIN.

Madrid journals of the 24th of November give the following items of intelligence:—

Madrid continued to enjoy perfect tranquility. The authorities had adopted energetic measures to prevent the recurrence of the cries in favor of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula, which had produced a certain agitation on the night of the 22d.

The Duke of Victory was to leave for the Basque provinces on the 23d, but at a Cabinet Council held on the evening of that day, it was resolved that the journey should be postponed. The Duke was said to have expressed great dissatisfaction at the resolution of France to replace M. de la Redorte, by a mere charge d'affairs.

Marshal Saldanha, the Portuguese ambassador, had at last been presented to the Queen. Nothing, however, had transpired respecting the nature of this interview; but it was reported that the Portuguese Government intended adopting strong measures, and marching an army to the Spanish frontier.

The London Spectator says:—

The affairs of Spain have become more embroiled by a parting manifesto of Queen Christiana to the Spanish nation; setting forth her claims to their gratitude, and complaining of the return she has met with, for all her doings for the good of the people. It was well enough known that her resignation was compulsory; but it was scarcely expected that she would hurl a declaration of war against the men to whom she had intrusted the guardianship of her daughter.

The Regents have issued a counter-manifesto; the conclusion of which betrays a want of confidence in their position, and that it is necessary to make an exhibition of their power to punish. "Spaniards, remain tranquil! Fear nothing! The constitution will be rigorously observed by all. Should any feel disposed to disturb public order, 200,000 veterans and 500,000 National Guards are ready to defend it."

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

At the commencement of the session, most of the bills and resolutions which constitute the basis of future labors, are introduced. We subjoin the more important of these, in order that a connected view of the business which is to be done, may be had, and that the progress of these various measures may be watched.

IMPORTANT BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

IN THE SENATE.—Mr. CLAY of Ala. brought forward his old project, to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands.

By Mr. CLAY of Ky., for the repeal of the sub-treasury law. Also, for requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, to communicate the quantity of land unsold in the several districts, on the 30th day of June, 1838, and what part of such land has since been sold, and at what prices.

By Mr. RUGGLES of Me., requesting from the President, the correspondence which may have taken place between this government and Great Britain, relative to the N. E. Boundary.

By Mr. DAVIS, for abolishing imprisonment of witnesses in criminal cases.

By Mr. BENTON, for establishing a prospective and permanent pre-emption system.

By Mr. TAPPAN of O., for an amendment of the Constitution, with a view to restrict the tenure of the Judges of the Supreme Court to a term of years, instead of for life, as at present.

By Mr. TALMADGE of N. Y., for an amendment of the Constitution, so as to insert a clause, that the President shall hold his office but for one term of four years, and shall be ineligible thereafter.

By Mr. BENTON, for requiring of the Secretary of the Treasury, tables of the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and of the prices of the bank notes, and of specie, on the first day of each month, of the years 1838, 9, and 40.

By Mr. MERRICK of Md., from a committee, for re-chartering the banks of the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WRIGHT, for referring so much of the President's message as relates to the finances of the country, to the Committee on Finance.

IN THE HOUSE.—The most important bills or resolutions introduced, are the following: By Mr. Adams, for rescinding the gag resolutions, adopted by the House at the last session, in reference to petitions on the subject of slavery. This was, after an animated discussion, laid on the table, by a vote of 83 to 58.

By Mr. Adams, for appointing a committee of five, to inquire whether the message which the President transmitted to the House last session, containing documents relative to the captives of the Amistad, had been falsified, and entered erroneously on the public documents. With that message were two certificates, granted to Ruiz and Montez at Havanna, one in Spanish, and the other in an English translation. The former gave permission for the shipment of forty-nine "negros landinos;" meaning those negroes introduced into Cuba prior to the prohibition of the slave trade by the Spanish government. But in the printed documents these words are translated "sound negroes." This translation, Mr. A. contends, and others concurred in the opinion, is entirely erroneous, and materially affects the prospects of the captives—showing, if translated thus, an audacious attempt, by a secret mutilation of public records, to subserve the base designs of the Spanish claimants. Mr. A.'s remarks produced great sensation, and resulted in a unanimous adoption of his resolution.

By Mr. Tillinghast of R. I., inquiring how far the provisions of the sub-treasury law had been carried into effect; whether any buildings erected; clerks or agents hired; bonds given; what sums received, and how guarded.

By Mr. Jones, for partial appropriations for 1841.

By Mr. Cushing, to pay the ordinary mileage to the carriers of the electoral votes for President.

By Mr. Everett of Vt., requiring the Postmaster General to furnish a list of all curtailments in the transportation of mails since Congress adjourned.

By Mr. Hand of O., for establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, and repealing all existing laws on the subject.

By Mr. Adams, requesting the President to communicate all the information possessed, respecting the relations of this country with China.

By Mr. Simmonton, from the legislature of Penn., asking Congress to encourage the production of silk, by assessing greater duties on foreign silks.

By Mr. Thompson of Miss., for prohibiting by law, the receiving of the testimony of blacks, in any trials before military or naval court martial.

By Mr. Petrikin, for reducing the fees of the District Attornies of the United States.

On these various bills and resolutions, as yet but little action has been held.

SUMMARY.

Frankfort Bank.—This institution is in bad odor with the people down East. The Bangor Whig contains a petition to the Maine Legislature, signed by about fifty citizens of Frankfort, praying that its charter may be annulled, and strongly condemning the Bank, setting forth, among other things, that the President and many of the stockholders, are not known to possess a dollar's worth of tangible property, either real or personal, which is not under cover. It is also hinted in an advertisement which heads the petition, that its managers, most of whom reside in Buffalo, with the President, intend to get a large amount of bills in circulation in the Western States, if they have not already done so. The old cashier has been turned out, and a new one duly installed.—Bay State Democrat.

A Story of the Discovery of Coffee in Arabia.—It is said that Omar, the Arab Sheik, was driven from Yeman, about A. D. 630, and fled to the wilderness. He soon found it very difficult for him to procure food, and seeing the coffee-berry, resembling, somewhat, a cherry, he was tempted to try it. There was a very thin pulp, scarcely more than the skin, upon the outside, that he could not eat; but he hoped to soften the inner kernels by boiling them, so that they might be edible. In the course of the process, such a delightful aroma greeted his nostrils, that he was induced to taste the decoction, and found it much more invigorating than the solids which produced it. And thus the immortal virtues of coffee, as a beverage, sprang to light and universal use.—"Round the World," by an officer of the U. S. Navy.

The schooner Rambler, of Boston, bound to Baltimore, anchored off Staten Island during the gale, and was driven from her anchorage on shore at Staten Island. It is expected she will be got off without damage.

The Murderer of Ellen Jewett.—Robinson, the murderer of Ellen Jewett, went to Texas where he has since lost his right arm—that arm with which he planted a hatchet into the forehead of a frail, but to him an unoffending girl, and with which he then applied an incendiary torch to the bed where she lay weltering in blood, thus attempting to conceal the murder by committing arson—that right arm, we say, has been cleft from his shoulder in a fight with the Mexicans.—Alb. Journal.

Severe Hail Storm.—About four o'clock on Wednesday, we were visited by one of the severest hail storms, accompanied with lightning, thunder and rain, within our experience. Some of the hail stones measured three and a half inches in circumference, and nine of them weighed three ounces, and painful havoc was done, not only to our office, but to the residences in the town generally.

We little expected to have to beat a retreat from the chair editorial so soon, but we were hailed in so boisterous and rude a manner, that we had to give way in self defence.—Norfolk Beacon.

Great Sacrifice.—The Elizabeth City, N. C. Intelligencer, states that since 1824, there have been 112 vessels wrecked for the want of an inlet at Nag's Head, which averaging 50 tons each, would make, together with the cargoes, a loss not short of $350,000, and with these vessels 224 souls have found a watery grave.

The cost of opening an inlet is estimated by Maj. Gwynn at $937,770.

A Distressing Case.—Mrs. A. Oroyd advertises in the St. Louis Bulletin for information of her husband, who had preceded her to Iowa Territory. The advertisement conveys the awful intelligence that their seven children were scalded to death on board the steamboat Persian, and herself considerably injured.

Thirty Years Ago.—An old resident, who takes peculiar interest in noting down such items of information, gives us the following:—

In 1810		Towns.		Inhabitants.
Genesee County	had	10	and	12,644
Niagara	"	4	"	6,132
Chautauque	"	2	"	2,381

Total,		22		23,557

Genesee county embraced the present counties of Genesee, Orleans, and those parts of Monroe and Livingston west of Genesee river.

Niagara county embraced the present counties of Erie and Niagara.—Buffalo Com. Jour.

North Eastern Boundary—Aroostook War News.—We learn from a gentleman who arrived in this city last evening, from Saco, the residence of Gov. Fairfield, that Mr. Miller, a messenger despatched by Sir John Harvey, had arrived in that town, bearing despatches for the Governor of Maine. These despatches announced that a regiment of British troops from Quebec had arrived and encamped on the disputed territory. Mr. Miller also had despatches from Sir John Harvey which he was to carry to Montreal, to the Governor General of the British Provinces. We also learn from the same source, that Sir John Harvey had transmitted by mail, despatches to the same effect to Washington. These troops had been ordered to that quarter by the Governor General, and were stationed at Madawaska.—Boston Atlas.

Occupation of Madawaska.—The Bangor Whig of the 14th, contains the following paragraph in relation to the occupation of the disputed territory. There can be no doubt of its correctness. The information reached us in advance of the announcement in the Maine papers, in consequence of the prior arrival of Capt. Miller, the messenger of Sir John Harvey.

We have a report here that three hundred British troops have arrived at Madawaska! We know not the object of this movement, but it is said that the British are "flaring up" because the government of this State have violated the agreement between Sir John Harvey and Gen. Scott, in organizing the 'places' in the disputed territory for party purposes.

There is at any rate something in the wind, for Mr. Miller, a messenger from Gov. Harvey, passed through this city yesterday on his way to Augusta to have an interview with Gov. Fairfield.

Emigration to Canada.—The Kingston Chronicle says that upwards of 12,000 emigrants arrived at that place during the past season, about 3000 of whom received employment and settled in the neighborhood. About 1200 proceeded directly to the United States, for the purpose of joining friends and relatives there. The emigrants, generally speaking, were very respectable, and many of them in good circumstance. Indeed, a few of them had no less than £60,000 among them.

The same paper adds that about 1300 emigrants arrived in Kingston during the season from the United States to settle in Canada, including 50 run away slaves.

The New York Post says: "The coldest winters within the last century, were 1742 and 1770; in both, the Long Island Sound was frozen over, and in the latter winter, cannon were taken on the ice from New York city to Staten Island."

Toleration.—The Rev. Mr. Rule, who was not long since expelled from Spain at the instance of the Spanish priesthood, has been permitted to return, in consequence of the political revolution in that country recently consummated.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Gross Outrage.—The Presbyterian Advocate says: Recently the Rev. Thomas S. Kendall, a respectable minister of the Associate Church, was tarred and feathered for reading and explaining the letter of the Associate Synod, on the subject of slavery, to a congregation in South Carolina. We have not seen the letter of the Synod, but Mr. Kendall denies that he was violating any law of the State.

Such outrages are a disgrace to any community, and only aggravate the evil they are intended to correct. Opposition will convince no man of his error. Brute force is no argument.

Mr. Kendall not only bore the outrage with patience but like a philosopher was not only admiring the surrounding scenery during the painful operation, but was also moralizing upon the faces of his persecutor. He says:—N. Y. Obs.

"They hurried me away to a deep bottom, shaded with heavy timber, and secluded from the highway by a dense undergrowth, and there covered my upper regions with a coat of tar, overlaid with abundance of feathers.—Poor wretches! a sense of guilt disfigures their faces, for they looked like men under the gallows, and their hands trembled like aspen leaves when perpetrating the infamous deed. The number I supposed to be between thirty and forty." Such outrages as this must meet with the most decided abhorrence of all classes of respectable citizens."

Diffusion of Intelligence in Romish Countries.—The following remarks are from a correspondent in Florence; they were written more than a year ago, but their publication at this juncture will not be out of the way.

"There are at present two newspapers published in Florence, each a little larger than a common letter sheet. Each contains as much foreign news as so small a surface can contain, but, except for the date, one would hardly determine from them, if such a city as Florence were in existence. We find frequently, circumstances which have occurred here, mentioned first in Galignani's Messenger at Paris. Of foreign matter they are also cautious. A few weeks after the events which placed the "King of the French," upon the throne, it was quietly noticed in the journals here, that Louis Phillippe had made such and such appointments. So indirect an announcement of a revolution would not be likely to excite undue notions of liberty."—N. Y. Observer.

HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF FLORIDA,
Fort King, Nov. 15th, 1840,
Order No. 57.

I. The Indians having acted with their usual want of faith, the armistice is at an end; the commanding officers of Districts, Regiments and Posts will therefore be prepared to act offensively on the promulgation of this order,

II. Col. Twiggs, 2d Dragoons, will repair to Fort Reid, to carry on operations in that quarter; he will take with him one of the companies of Dragoons now at Pilatka; one squadron will be ordered to scour the country from Fort Reid to the Ocklawaha, and such disposition made of the rest of the command as will tend to the annoyance and destruction of the enemy.

III. The commanding officer at Tampa Bay will immediately take measures to apprize the command at the Annuteliga hammock of the renewal of hostilities, who will thereupon scour the country on the Southern banks of the Withlacoochie; the three companies of the 6th Regiment, now at Fort No. 4, will be put in motion on the Northern bank of that river.

IV. Four companies of the 3d Infantry, now at Tampa, will immediately repair to Fort Fanning, and receive the two companies of the 1st, who will thereupon join the Head Quarters of the Regiment; the command at Fort Fanning will scour the Wacassassa country down to the Withlacoochie; should the balance of the 3d infantry have arrived, four companies will proceed to re-establish Fort Deynaud, and are to be employed in scouring the country around it; the other two companies will remain for the present at Tampa.

V. Wagon trains will be escorted by thirty men on all occasions, and by a greater number when ammunition and arms are transported.

VI. Should the enemy hereafter appear with the white flag, they are to be made prisoners and diligently guarded until farther orders.

VII. The Deputy Quarter Master is instructed to procure immediately the proper number of wagons and teams for the supply of the troops in the field. The staff officers will furnish the necessary transportation and supplies to carry the above order into effect.

VIII. The General Commanding has reason to be gratified with the zeal and energy heretofore displayed by officers and troops under his command, and in calling for increased energy on their part, he is confident that his wishes will be met, and he anticipates the happiest results from the approaching active campaign.

By order of Brigadier Gen Armistead.

EXTENSIVE FORGERY.

Yesterday a whole family was arrested in this place, on a charge of being engaged in an extensive system of forgery upon some of the Banks of the State of New York. The family consists of Moody M. Peabody, his wife, a son, (a lad about 13) and a daughter with her husband, (a young man of the name of Beckwith.) They arrived in this place four or five weeks since, and rented that stone building at the head of Store-street, the property of William Garratt, Esq., and formerly belonging to Mr. Butcher. On Thursday evening last, Mr. Byington, Jailor and Deputy Sheriff of Tompkins County in the State of New York, arrived here in search of Peabody. He stated to the Magistrate that in March last, in consequence of information received by him, he proceeded to Utica, where Peabody resided, and on searching his premises he found plates purporting to be on the Warsaw Bank. Peabody was then taken into custody, but the plates having been stolen from the Justice's offices at Utica, previous to the trial, the prisoner was in consequence acquitted. A large number of counterfeit notes have since been put in circulation, and Dewitt C. Peabody, son of Moody M. Peabody, is now in jail at Ithaca, having been convicted of being concerned in the forgery with his father.—Through the means of an accomplice of the older Peabody, whom Mr. Byington apprehended at Syracuse, on Sunday last, he was enabled to trace the Peabody family to Kingston. Their house was yesterday thoroughly searched by Mr. Johnson, the High Constable, Mr. Byington and other asistants, when an unfinished plate purporting to be of the Salina Bank, was found concealed in the moulding in the centre of the mantlepiece of the appartments, a tin box containing blank notes to the amount of $1400 or $1500 purporting to be of the Bank of Rome, was found concealed in an upper room between the floor and ceiling; a small copper plate press and various engraving implements were also found. The elder Peabody is an Engraver by trade and the plates appear to be extremely well executed. The parties are of course committed to stand their trial at the Spring Assizes.

From the N. O. Bulletin, Dec. 10,

MEXICO.

The schr. Emblem, which arrived yesterday, brought us our papers and letters of correspondents—the latter to the 17th from Metamoras. The treachery of the Federal leaders and the murderous designs of the Centralists, which we have already published, with the successful retreat of the Texians, are all confirmed by this arrival.

Our correspondent, under date of Metamoras, Nov. 17th, says, "a gentleman has just arrived from Saltillo, who was there at the time of the action, who reports that the whole number of Americans in the battle was only 115—that only five were killed, and some few reported to be taken prisoners. The rest made their escape by way of the mountains. This, I have no doubt, is the true version of the affair, for I believe the gentleman before I would the official account."

The official account, issued by Gen. Arista, above referred to, announces, that more than 100 of the foreigners (meaning Texians) were killed in the battle of Saltillo.

Gen. Arista was expected to arrive at Metamoras in two or three days from Monterey.

The small pox had broke out among the troops, and raging with great violence.—From them it was spreading through the country, and many of the farmers and drovers were falling victims to it in various directions.

The news of the surrender of the Federalists, and the slaughter of the Texians, (as was supposed, was celebrated in Metamoras by illuminations, firing of cannon, &c.

"METAMORAS, Nov. 7.

"There is a report here that the Government have sent a deputation to join an embassy here, to proceed to Texas, with propositions which, if accepted, will lead to the recognition of Texian Independence, whether this is true, I know not, but the next mail will inform you."

A Crash in the Capitol.—It will be seen by the Congress news, that the House of Representatives scarcely entered upon business on Friday morning—adjourning over until to day—in consequence of the derangement of the fixtures of the Representatives chamber, by the fall of the chandelier. The National Intelligencer thus notices the accident:—N. Y. Spectator.

"Yesterday morning, an hour or two before the usual hour of meeting of the House of Representatives, the gorgeous chandelier, which has been lately suspended in the Hall, with all its fixtures and appendages, fell to the floor with a force proportionate to its weight, and was smashed to pieces. Fortunately, owing to the earliness of the hour, no one was within reach so as to be injured by it. An hour or two later, had it fallen, it might have caused the death or wounding of many members. The providential escape from this danger was suitably noticed in his prayer, at the opening of the day's sitting, by the chaplain of the day, (Rev. Mr. Cookman.) In consequence of the confusion caused in the Hall by this accident, the House adjourned soon after meeting.

This chandelier was of American manufacture, weighed over seven thousand pounds, and cost four or five thousand dollars. It was 13 feet in diameter, contained 78 argand burners, and is said to have been ornamented by 2,650 cut glass lustres, and 3,000 cut glass spangles.

The Madisonian gives the annexed additional particulars respecting this accident:—

On Thursday evening it was lighted, to satisfy the curiosity of the members, many of whom were present, and highly pleased with the truly splendid effect it produced when fully illuminated. Yesterday morning, two attendants were engaged in cleansing it, and taking out the old oil, for the purpose of supplying the lamp with some of a superior quality.

They suddenly found the chandelier begin to ascend, and, in spite of all their exertions—they throwing their weight upon it—it went up along the whole rod to the dome, and struck with great violence against the frame work below the sky light; and instantly, the whole mass, chandelier, rod fixtures and all, tumbled down. The two workmen, and the Hon. Mr. Goode, of Ohio, who was standing near them, had hardly time to get out of the way. Hon. Mr. Dennis, of Maryland, was also present, but was in a remote and safe part of the Hall.

Disastrous Railroad Casualty.—We learn that a casualty of a very disastrous nature, attended with the loss of four lives, occurred at the railroad depot at Springfield, Mass., on Friday night last. As the particulars reached us, it appears that the freight train, containing 110 tons of freight, and propelled by a new and powerful engine, reached the depot at full speed, and that the efforts of the engineer to check the speed by reversing the engine, from some cause unexplained, were wholly unavailing—the reversion of the wheels taking no effort whatever.—The locomotive and train dashed into the depot, and running against another engine standing on the track, dashed it right through the side of the house, breaking both engines to pieces, and killing the engineer, the fireman, and two other men at work in the depot. The building was very much shattered by the engine dashing through it, and both the locomotives were totally destroyed. No farther particulars were known to our informant, Mr. Adams, of the New York and Boston Package Express, office No. 46 William street.—Sun.

MARRIED,

In Linckleen, 24th inst., by Elder Wm. Holcroyd Mr. LEVI MESSENGER, to Miss ANN SWEET, all of Linckleen.

OBITUARY.

Died, very suddenly, in this village, on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 23d, of Inflamation on the Lungs, SAMUEL SEWARD SWEET, an only child of Samuel N. and Emeline M. Sweet, aged three months and twenty-one days. The funeral was attended on Friday, 25th inst., at the Presbyterian church, and the consolations of the gospel were offered by Rev. Mr. Johnson, from the second book, twelfth chapter and twentieth verse of Samuel.

By this afflictive dispensation of God's Providence, a son greatly endeared to his parents, has been consigned to the dark and silent tomb. Soon did he sleep in the icy arms of Death. He was twined and knotted round the hearts of his fond parents by the strong and silken ties of love.

———"'Twas hard to give him up,
With death so like a gentle slumber on him."

O Death! how lovely thou canst be! Many pleasing anticipations were formed by the bereaved parents which are now forever blasted. He who holds the keys of life and of death, has seen fit to nip the rose in the bud, and to take their darling little babe home to himself. All earthly pleasures are like the mists of the morning, which quickly glide away.

"And love, and hope, and beauty's bloom,
Are blossoms gathered from the tomb;
There's nothing bright but HEAVEN."

Fleeting, indeed, are all the enjoyments of mortal life. The parents of the deceased were blessed with him only for a brief period, before they were called to see his "form divine" borne to its last abode, and the language of their hearts is, Rest lightly, O earth, upon the bosom of our dear child.

They mourn for their first-born, and well they may—the blessed Jesus wept at the tomb of his friend. But let the tears that fall be illumined with the assurance that "God is love," that "his counsels are directed by wisdom," and that all his chastisements will result in some signal good to the afflicted. The babe was lovely in death and he is now in heaven. In the [illegible] chapter and fifteenth verse of Matthew, it is thus written, "Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Passing out of his parent's arms, he passed into those of Jesus. While, therefore, the mother, in the fulness of overwhelming grief, says

"No more, my baby, shalt thou lie,
With drowsy smile and half-shut eye—
Pillowed upon thy mother's breast,
Serenely sinking into rest:
For God hath laid thee down to sleep,
Like a pure pearl beneath the deep!"

Let her rejoice with her husband, that through the merits of Christ, their dearly beloved child now mingles its song with the thanksgiving of the blest in the regions of endless bliss. Weep no more, fond parents, but prepare to follow your little Samuel Seward to fairer worlds on high. Be consoled in view of the heart-cheering truth that

"He is planted in the realms of rest
Where roses never die—
Amidst the gardens of the blest,
Beneath a stormless sky."

Medicines! Medicines!!

TO FAMILIES.

S. D. DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public, for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

G. A. BARTHOLICK & Co's
MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made. Since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser; and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled and so reckless of the health and lives of the most trusting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to enquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot with propriety be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, and its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her efforts to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an infinite amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given away to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

FREEDOM.

Who would reverse the glorious plan
Of Him who Freedom gave,
Who never made his creature Man
To be a crouching slave!
As chainless waves majestic roll
When tempests sweep the sea,
So with a mind and deathless soul
Man is and shall be free.

But yet cloud-cradled lightning sleep,
And thunderbolts repose,
When millions slaughtered kindred weep
In agonizing woes,
And tyrents joy when Freedom dies
And songs exulting sing,
While widows' wails and orphans' sighs
Make vale and mountain ring.

Shall stern Oppression, wrapt in gloom,
Its purple course still run,
And make earth but a hopeless tomb
Revolving round the sun?
Forbid, great God of Truth and Grace!
Thine awful vengeance spare;
But speed the time when all our race
True happiness may share.

Immortal Freedom! stand thou forth—
Thy potent sceptre wield,
That it may be to moral worth
A buckler and a shield;
Let Virtue on thy standard shine,
And Truth, the fairest gem
That e'er was found by Power Divine,
Adorn thy diadem.

Let Justice mark thy grand career,
Man's welfare be thine end,
That in his breast Care, Hope and Fear
Like rainbow hues may blend;
No more let ruffian hands profane
The temples thou hast built,
Nor yet thy sacred altars stain
With marks of scarlet guilt.

Thy blessings rich diffuse to all;
Let War's dread trumpet cease,
And Freemen gather at thy call
To welcome smiling Peace:
But while thy sons their fealty swear,
And round thy banner cling,
Let not Ambition worship there—
That would confusion bring.

Lands of the Earth! in love unite,
And bow to Reason's sway;
Then systems false, upheld by might,
Shall swiftly pass away;
No more shall rage the fearful storm
That drowns the world in blood,
For all mankind that day will form
One glorious brotherhood.

THE PARTING—A SKETCH.

It was a lovely morning in June. The birds were chirping on the trees, and flowers had spread their leaves to catch the first rays of the sun. Nature as she was dressed in her richest robes, seemed, too, to wear her lovliest smiles.

I commenced my journey, through the western part of Indiana, with a light heart. The scenery was perfectly enchanting: the beautiful prairie stretching away to the horizon the green meadow—the woodland slope—and by my side the little stream sporting along through the grass, as if it had lost its way. Delighted with the succession of new objects, constantly presenting themselves, the hours flew by unnoticed, and I was scarcely aware 'till the sun was sinking in the west, and the shades of evening gathering around me. At length I reached the hospitable mansion of Mr. R——, an old friend of my father's. I there received that hearty welcome so characteristic of our western settlers. Mr. R——, was interesting and intelligent, a little in the decline of life. Mrs. R——, to her other good qualities, added an amiable disposition, and a warm heart. I was introduced to her two daughters—Alice and Lucretia—and to say that they were beautiful would be to tell but half the truth.—Alice was lively and playful—Lucretia was more thoughtful; and a slight tinge of melancholy threw a dream-like beauty over her countenance. We talked of "olden time"—those sunny hours 'round which memory fondly lingered. Mr. R—— enlivened the conversation with interesting tales about the first settlement of the country. The clock struck nine. It seemed as if a dream. Just then a stranger entered. Henry, said the old gentleman, have you bid your friends farewell? Yes, Father, he replied, but the hardest task of all is yet to come—to leave my home! my own, dear home!

Henry joined the little circle, and our conversation changed. To-morrow he was to start with three other missionaries to India. He had bid adieu to his friends—he had embraced for the last time his loved companions—a thousand fond recollections had gathered in clusters of holy feeling 'round his heart. To leave his friends was nothing compared with home. Home was to him indeed a heaven on earth.

His starting, his plans and prospects, now formed the subject of conversation. He spoke of his difficulties—his attachment to friends—country—home—the dangers of the sea—a new language. He then depicted in glowing language the situation of the heathen—their claims—and his obligations to Christ. He spoke too of a Savior's love, and the tears burned down his manly cheek. He seemed desirous to say more, but his feelings were too big for utterance.

Yes, exclaimed his father, go, my son, the world—God has graeter claims than ours. Go, tell the heathen of a Savior! Carry to their dying souls the leaves of the tree of life! Tell them "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." Go! we will pray for you—God will bless you! Here he stopped; but his look I shall never forget! He buried his face in his hands, and wept.

Yes, Brother, said Lucretia, as she wiped away the tears, Go! millions of the perishing call for help. That dear Savior that died for us, calls you to go. Fondly have you been loved—and we'll love you still. And, oh! will we not meet in Heaven?—and then we'll never part!

His mother spoke not—her heart was too full for words. It seemed as if her very heart would break. None but those who know the depth of a mother's love, can form any idea of such a scene!

The family Bible was laid on the stand, and their voices for the last time rose in sweetest melody. An appropriate chapter was read with deep solemnity. Then, for the last time, they knelt round the family altar. The father, raising his hands to Heaven, with streaming eyes commended his son to God, and besought the divine blessing. Never was prayer more fervent breathed from mortal lips. They retired to rest. The morning dawned as lovely as before. The glad earth, and the laughing skies, seemed to mock at the unhappiness of human life. The horse stood at the gate—his foot was on the threshold—another moment more—and all is over. Farewell! dear Father, he exclaimed, as he clasped his hands and wept in his bosom. His mother fainted in his arms, and his sisters clung to his knees. He burst from their embraces, and their eyes strained to catch the last glimpse as he disappeared in the distance. I had never seen a parting before—and I have never seen one since.

From the S. S. Monitor.

"THEY THOUGHT I DRANK WHISKEY."

MR. SOUTHARD,—Will you allow me to tell your little readers a temperance anecdote about Thomas? It took place not many miles from where I live. The facts were related to me by his parents soon after they transpired: and although several years have since rolled away, yet I never pass the neat little cottage where this excellent family lived, without having the whole story arise in my mind. It is this:

By the side of one of those great roads which lead from Lake Erie to Ohio River, on the Western Reserve, there is a fine spring of water, which passes into a trough, affording a convenient watering place for travelers. Until the commencement of the temperance reformation, ten or twelve years ago, it was no uncommon sight, at this spring, to see the traveler, while his horse was drinking at the trough, take from his pocket the wiskey bottle, from which he must take a dram before kneeling down to take a draught from the spring.

Near this place stood a neat little cottage in which there lived a lovely boy, by the name of Thomas. I should think he was among the first in the neighborhood to unite with the Total Abstinence Society, at about the age of seven or eight. He had not long been a member when the following affair took place.

One day as Thomas stood in the door overlooking the spring, two travelers rode up who called aloud, "Boy! here! bring us a cup." He hastened to oblige them, but how was he disgusted, on seeing one of them take a bottle from his pocket, turn the whiskey in his cup, and drink! When they had drank they offered some to Thomas.—He refused, but they insisted on his drinking the poison, saying, "Drink some, drink some."

"I don't wish for any."

"What! drink, it won't hurt you. Come, be a man, now, and drink some."

Thomas began to weep, and they, finding it in vain to entice him further, returned him the cup and rode on. Thomas did not soon recover his wonted cheerfulness. On returning to the house, his mother, who was a little surprised to see him so sorrowful, inquired, "Thomas, why are you crying so?" "Because," said he, "they thought I drank whiskey." A. S.

UPON LYING DOWN TO REST.—What a circle there is of human actions and events! We are never without some change, and yet that change is without any great variety; we sleep and wake, and wake and sleep, and eat and feel empty, labour in a continual interchange, yet hath the infinite wisdom of God so ordered it, that we are not weary of these perpetual iterations, but with no less appetite enter into our daily courses than if we should pass them but once in our life. When I am weary of my day's labour, how willingly do I undress myself, and betake myself to my bed; and ere morning, when I have become wearied of my restless bed, how glad am I to rise and renew my labour!

Why am I not more desirous to be unclothed of this body, that I may be clothed with immortality? What is this but my closet garment, which when it is once put off, my soul is at liberty and ease. Many a time have I lain down here in desire of rest, and after some tedious changing of sides, have risen sleepless, disappointed, languishing; in my last unceasing, my body shall not fail of repose, nor my soul of joy: and in my rising up, neither of them shall fail of glory. What hinders me, O God, but my infidelity, (unbelief,) from longing for this happy dissolution? The world hath misery and toil enough, and heaven hath more than enough, blessedness to perfect my desires of that my last and glorious change. I believe; Lord, help my unbelief.—Bp. Hall.

AN IMMENSE CYLINDER.—One of those immense cylinders, weighing ten tons, intended for the Russian steam frigate "Kamtschatka," was cast on Tuesday afternoon, by Ward, Stillman & Co., at the Novelty Works. The Herald says, "to cast a cylinder of such dimensions several hours' preparation are necessary. The mould has to be sunk into the ground its whole length, twelve feet, eleven or twelve tons of iron have to be melted into almost a liquid in immense furnaces, then the melted iron has to be taken from the furnaces and poured at the rate of two or three pounds at a time, into a large caldron also sunk slightly in the ground, near the mould, and then precaution has to be taken to prevent a grand explosion by the accumulation of too much hydrogen gas. All this has to be done before the casting takes place. But after every thing was ready the cylinder was cast in two minutes time."

WONDERS OF THE DEAD SEA.—The river Jordan, from observations made by Shaw, has been calculated to carry into the Dead Sea 6,090,000 tons of water daily, exclusive of the Arnon and 7 other streams, and yet there is no apparent discharge of its waters into the ocean. Dr. Halley has shown that the waters are carried off by evaporation.

The other marvellous properties ascribed to the Dead Sea have vanished upon more rigid investigation. The waters are indeed heavier, but possessed of the same properties with other waters. The pestilential vapors said to issue from its bosom are reduced to a strong smell of sea-water, and puffs of smoke, which announce or follow the immersion of asphaltos, and fogs that are really unwholesome, like other fogs.

There is scarcely any one who has not heard of the famous tree of Sodom; a tree said to produce an apple pleasing to the eye but bitter to the taste, and full of ashes. Thesselguist, the botanist, says that it is the solanum melongana, or love apple of Linnæus. These apples are, says he, sometimes full of dust, caused by an insect (tenthredo) which converts the whole of the inside into dust, leaving nothing but the rind entire, without causing it to lose any of its color.

Chateaubriand also saw this fruit, and thus describes it. "It grows upon a shrub two or three leagues from the mouth of the Jordan. It is thorny, and has taper leaves. Before it is ripe, it is filled with a corrosive and saline juice; when it is dried it yields a blackish seed, which may be compared to ashes, and which in taste resembles bitter pepper."

THE DYING YEAR.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

VOICE of the Dying Year!—I hear thy moan,
Like some spent breaker of the distant sea,
Chafing the fretted rock. Is this the end
Of thy fresh morning music, gushing out
In promises of hope! Have the bright flush
Of Spring's young beauty, crowned with budding flowers,
The passion-vow of Summer, and the pledge
Of faithful fruitful Autumn, come to this?
I see thy youngling moon go down the west,
The midnight clock gives warning, and its stroke
Must be thy death-knell. Is that quivering gasp
The last sad utterance of thine agony?
I see thy clay-cold fingers strive to clasp
Some prop—in vain!
And so, thou art no more,
No more! Thy rest is with oblivious years,
Beyond the flood. Yet when the trump shall sound,
Blown by the strong archangel, thou shalt wake
From the dim sleep of ages. When the tombs
That lock their slumbering tenants cleave in twain,
Thou shalt come forth Yea, thou shalt rise again,
And I shall look upon thee—when the dead
Stand before God. But come not murmuring forth,
Unwillingly, like Samuel's summoned ghost,
To daunt me at the judgment. No—be kind,
Be pitiful, bear witness tenderly—
And if thou hast a dread account for me,
Go, dip thy dark scroll in redeeming blood.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

"BOYS, MIND YOUR MOTHER."

Come, boys, here is a story for you. I want you all to come together and listen. I was a boy once, and I recollect a little how boys feel. I am a man now, but I have had as much to do with boys as I have with men.

I suppose you all have a mother. What I want to tell you now is how you ought to treat your mother. When I was a boy no larger than you are, my mother used to tell me that she never knew any one to prosper that did not treat his mother well. She said, when she was young, she knew several children who did not honor their mothers, and they all came to a bad end.

There were several boys among my acquaintances whom I knew to have disobeyed, and ill treated their mothers. I thought I would remember them, and see how they turned out in the world. I should think it was as much as fifteen years ago. I will call these boys William, George and Herbert. I remember as distinctly as tho' it were but yesterday. They were my class-mates at school. I remember their mothers perfectly well, for many a play afternoon have I spent at their houses.

William was a very pleasant boy, and a fine scholar; he made as rapid a progress in Latin as any other in school. One afternoon, I was at his father's house. We were playing on the green in front of the door. William's mother stepped upon the door-stone, and called him. We were busily engaged in play with some other boys, and William took no notice of his mother's call. After she had spoken several times, he stopped a moment to hear what she had to say.

"I want you to go down to the store, and carry this box to your father," said his mother. "But I don't want to go, mother." "Well, you must go." "But I am playing, I can't go." "William, I tell you, you must go, for your father must have this immediately."

Just then one side of the party, who were playing ball, had beaten the other.—William heard the merry hurra, and exclaimed, "Well, I won't go, there." He picked up a stick, and throwing it at his mother, ran eagerly off to join the victors. I turned just in time to see the stick fall from his mother's dress, and to see how sad she looked as she went into the house.

I never before saw a boy strike his mother, and it made me feel so badly, that I could not play. I told the boys I believed I must go home. I walked away, thinking what my mother had told me. I tho't I would always remember William, and see if he prospered. Perhaps it would be better if William's mother had spoken more kindly to him, but that was no excuse to William. But what I want to tell you is what became of him. Before he grew up he was taken very sick; and, after many years of great suffering, he died.

The next boy was George. His mother indulged him very much. She used to let him do pretty much as he choose; and any thing he wanted, she was sure to do for him; but any thing she wanted, he was sure not to do for her. In fact, he seemed to have much less regard for his mother than for an older scholar, who used to be a leader in all our sports. He never minded any thing his mother said to him; and she might as well have talked to the currant bushes in the garden as to have asked him to do an errand. He always acted as if he felt, if he did not say, "I don't care for my mother." Well, George is dead too. He became dissipated, lost his character, and died a miserable death.

Herbert was much like William and George—worse, if any thing. He not only did not care for what his mother said, but used to ridicule her before the boys. He used to do it to be sure in a good humored way; but, after all, it was a great way off from the respect that was due to his mother. And what do you suppose became of Herbert? His end was more miserable than that of William or George. I shall not tell you exactly what became of him, for it is a more dreadful story than I love to relate. But I shall never think of him without remembering the text, Prov. xxx. 17: "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagle shall eat it."

EZOA.

NEWSPAPERS.—A child beginning to read becomes delighted with a newspaper, because he reads names and things that are familiar. A newspaper in one year, says Mr. Weeks, is worth a quarter's schooling to a child, and every father must consider that substantial information is connected with this advancement. The mother of the family being one of its heads, and having a more immediate charge of children, ought to be intelligent in mind, pure in language, and always cheerful and circumspect. As the instructor of her children, she should herself be instructed.

A mind occupied, becomes fortified against the ills of life, and is braced for any emergency. Children amused by reading and study, are of course considerate and more easily governed.

How many thoughtless young men have spent their evenings in a tavern or grog shop which ought to be devoted to reading? how many parents who never spent twenty dollars for books for their families, would gladly have given thousands to reclaim a son or daughter who had ignorantly and thoughtlessly fallen into temptation!

FOR THE FARMER.

DECISION OF CHARACTER.

Every person has a character of some sort or other, but every person is not possessed of that decision of character, or rather, of so much decision of character as they ought to have. By this we mean, that prompt and speedy mode, which some have, of coming to a determination how to act, and then immediately commencing the action accordingly. It will be perceived, that it does not follow by any means, that such persons always act right, for many of the most wicked and atrocious deeds recorded in history, exhibit astonishing traits of decision of character, which, if exerted in a better cause, would probably have been as productive of good as they were of evil. Nor is it necessary that the act should be one of great or momentous importance in order to exhibit this trait, although in such acts it is the most conspicuous. In actions of small and trivial importance it is not so plainly seen, or, not so much is thought of it when exhibited, as the lack of it is, when persons stand dallying and talking hour after hour whether it is best to do so and so, or not, and then perhaps after commencing it, fall back and begin again to parley, and make inquiries and objections, and at the same breath give reasons for and against the doing, what was wanted or attempted to be done, Young people should cultivate a habit, when anything presents itself that requires their action, of looking at both sides as rapidly, but as carefully as possible, and of immediately deciding upon a course, and of following it with energy. By doing this in cases of every day occurrences, it soon becomes habitual and will then be exerted with comparative ease, when any great emergency happens. They should also, in the course of their reading, note those instances of decision of character which present themselves, whether good or evil, and thus aid their judgment in conducting their own movements in future. As an aid we should recommend a little book entitled "Foster on decision of character," which should be read by every one. If this trait could be cultivated, it would make a vast difference in society, especially, if guided by sound judgment and the dictates of formality. Many of the evils which society suffers, arises from the vacillating, undecided course of individuals, who are desirous of doing well, but are kept from it, by a want of that promptness and energy in deciding to go forward.

We often see this among farmers—they become persuaded that a certain course of procedure is much better than the old one which they have heretofore followed, but it is new—or it is odd and somebody will laugh, or it may not be fashionable, or at first too laborious—or too expensive, though promising an equivolent return in time.—Hence, they vacillate—and hesitate, and "talk of it," and about it, but never do it, and plod on in the old way. Now a little decision of character would soon settle the trouble, and the question be decided one way or the other, by actual practical demonstration.

In all branches of business, in all pursuits of life, whether in high or lowly sphere, decision of character is essential to success, and although it may sometimes be directed in the wrong channel, and be productive of evil, yet the chances are in favor of its exercise at all times and on all occasions. Endeavor then to be decided—to be prompt, active and energetic.—Maine Farmer.

SABBATH AND BETHEL CONVENTION.

(Concluded from our last.)

Rev. Mr. Snethen of the Prot. Meth. church,—Said he thought we must "count the cost" before entering on this business. He had made up his mind that heavy pecuniary sacrifices must be met in restoring the Sabbath. Yet he thought they ought to be met, for the Sabbath was worth more than any losses it might occasion.

Rev. J. Blanchard—Said he disliked to trespass again on the Convention. But he was anxious, while the debate was at this point, to throw out some views and principles which seemed to him fundamental to the whole work of Sabbath restoration; and, indeed, of every other reform.

That I may be distinctly understood, I will state, in the outset, that in my soul I believe, that any man who may be induced to embark in this, or any other moral enterprise, from no other consideration but that it will be profitable in a pecuniary sense, will be a dead weight to the cause.

I am willing to have it shown to be always profitable to do right; but I repudiate the plan of putting the profit into the place of the right. I was pleased with the observations of the gentleman from the insurance office, and am always pleased to hear it proved that our duty and our interest are one on earth and one in heaven. I rejoice always to know and hear that in this life, there is gain in godliness, but I abhor that professed godliness which always looketh toward gain.

Sir, I am of opinion, with the father near me, that pecuniary sacrifices must be met in this business. Promoting righteousness, in our bad world was never the sure way to wealth. Christ, therefore, never proclaimed any other way to heaven but this one, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me."

I know that his yoke is easy, and his service respectable. I know that wisdom's ways are pleasant and her paths peace; but, sir, if we present no higher motives than these to withdraw men from Sabbath-breaking, we shall never do it.

It would be marvelously easy preaching if we could. For then "would the offence of the cross cease." If we could only turn men from their vices by converting religious duties into prudential maxims, and destroy Sabbath-breaking, by showing that the Sabbath kept holy will put money in their purses, and "save the republic;" then indeed the ministers of Christ may enjoy popularity upon easy terms; "the offence of the cross ceaseth;" and all the sin and folly of the universe may be driven out by a simple statement of profit and loss. For it always was, and always will be, here and hereafter, now and forever, safe and profitable to do right, and unsafe and unprofitable to do wrong.

But, sir, "Leviathan is not so tamed."—You cannot either make or keep men virtuous by showing them that vice is ruinous. Why, sir, men have been going to hell ever since the world stood, upon the principle of choosing the nearer and lesser apparent good; at the expense of the greater which is more remote.

A man breaks the Sabbath to secure some immediate gain. His boat lies at the wharf, and a man offers him an extra three hundred dollars to land his lading in Pittsburgh or New Orleans by a certain day; to do which he must break the Sabbath. Now suppose he had been converted to Sabbath-keeping because it would (as it surely will,) promote the general wealth. Would he not say, "What is the country's prosperity to me, if I lose this three hundred dollars?" This is the reason why he breaks the Sabbath. To what purpose is it to him that the Sabbath is profitable to the whole land? "How much comfort," he says, "is it to me that my countrymen live in palaces, if I must dwell in a hovel?" "Of what use is good and intelligent society to me, if I cannot dress my wife and daughters so that they will be received in it?" He breaks the Sabbath to get a new necklace for his wife, and fashionable frocks for his daughters. He tramples on the law of God to reach the three hundred dollars. And he will do it: for every man in quest of gain, feels like becoming a pauper in the prospect of any loss.

But you say he may be told, (and it is true,) "That though it cost him five hundred or a thousand dollars to keep one Sabbath, yet that the operation of the Sabbath upon his business, securing him from losses by vice, will make him the gainer during life."

But, sir, men do not act upon such motives. Why does not the merchant who visits the abodes of sin in the suburbs of the city, know that his lewdness is consuming his estate? Does he not know that his fair young wife sits lonely at home, dropping down to the grave piece-meal, like a decaying mast? Does he not know that his vices are a festering canker in the blood of his children, deforming their persons, impairing reason and wasting life! Does he not know all these things? Yet he goeth onward—"as the ox goeth to the slaughter and the fool to the correction of the stocks," even so keeps on his way to his fearful end.

No, sir, nothing but directing the eye of the soul to God, will draw men away from the practice of sin. You may pile up your arguments drawn from expediency as high as heaven above, and lay them as deep as the gulf which separates it from the abodes of despair, and you will never deter one man by them from a course of wickedness which promises instant profit or gratification. Never, never will he forsake it, till one takes up the wood on which the blessed Jesus was crucified, and, placing it in the path before him, cries in his ears, "Be ye crucified to the world." Thus saith the Lord God, "Cease to do evil and learn to do well."

Sir, my heart is full of this subject, my very bones are hot within me. For I am certain, as of my own existence, that neither this, nor any other moral reform can ever be carried, which starts not in the principle of doing right at all, costs for the sake of obedience to God.

Suppose you have induced men to lay down this, or any other wrong practice for the hope of secular profit—buy out, or remove by mechanical appliances, or the hope of superior profit in some other way, all the distilleries in the land. Have you not left all the owners distillers in heart? So remove by hopes of secular prosperity, all Sabbath-breaking in the land: Are we not a nation of Sabbath-breakers still? Sir, a reform upon such principles is rotten at the very centre. It is vicious in its principle and in its motive. It is not a reform. It is a mere change which was made for convenience, and which inconvenience may un-make. I therefore said, and say, that I dread to see a man coming to aid in such an enterprise, moved by no higher and steadier impulse. I feel that he will be a dead weight to any moral cause which he espouses.

"Timeo Danaos et donaque ferentes."

I always expect such a man to clog the wheel he attempts to lift at; and when you come to the place where sacrifices must be made, and unpopularity incurred, I always expect such an one to start back and cry, "prudence."

Sir, it may be said of a reform upon such principles as Pyrrhus said of his victories; "a few more such would ruin us"! We must have a Sabbath for the sake of God, or we shall never get one for the sake of man.

A clergyman once said to me in reply to views expressed like these, "Ah well, I believe more flies may be caught with molasses than with vinegar after all," meaning more men might be enlisted in a good cause by arguments addressed to their interest, than by appealing to their conscience. My reply was, "Yes, but when you have caught good flies with molasses, their legs are so glued together by the sweet that they are unable to move." Now I never see converts to a moral cause from worldly policy but I think of that clergyman's flies caught with molasses. The greater the swarm the worse for the cause. In the language of Burke, "I never knew a man that was bad, fit for any thing that is good. There is always some disqualifying ingredient entering into the compound and vitiating the whole mass." Even so this expediency vitiates any man and every cause where it predominates over the fear of God.

Thus you see, sir, my objection against urging the Sabbath upon men merely as a means of secular prosperity goes as deep as the philosophy of morals. The truth is, wherever a notion obtains, that a thing or practice is made right or wrong, by its consequences it confounds and destroys all distinction between right and wrong. You cannot tell whether the act is right and proper where you perform it. You must wait and see how it works. If well, then you go back and pronounce it right: if ill, then it was wrong. Such is the doctrine, that the Sabbath must be kept or not kept, because men will make or lose by it. If this practice were legitimate and right, there would be no such thing as right and wrong. When the man puts forth the act it has no moral character. The law does not speak and say it is right or wrong. You wait till he begins to work consequences good or ill—to make men richer or poorer—and then go back and name it accordingly, a good act or a bad one.

The truth is, it is not this sin of Sabbath-breaking, or that other law-established sin, (Slave-holding,) which some of us are known most ardently to oppose, which makes us differ from our brethren. It is the principle which lies at the bottom of opposition to all sin. It is because we dread the effect of substituting a low worldly policy which allows men to act or not act against moral evils, as their fallible minds shall judge wise and safe; a principle which is eating out and destroying all the vitality of the church of Christ. You know, sir, how low the church is fallen. You know its practices at the South and the North, and how the plain fundamental principles of common justice are superseded and set aside, as the Sabbath is, on the plea of necessity, and at the call of convenience. It is these things that cause our souls to mourn in secret, for what is a Sabbath reform or any reform good for which does not bring us back to the principle of obeying God at all costs? What signifies outward success while there is a principle within vitiating and corrupting the whole? What signifies how many or how few wolves are howling in the forest while the pestilence is raging in the flock? I can not, I dare not express all that is in my heart of the present moral condition of the church of Christ. I know that my views would be regarded as extravagant. But, blessed be God! that which is insanity now, will in the millenium be sane!

God who foresees from eternity all consequences, has marked certain practices right, and certain others wrong, and Sabbath-breaking is among the last. And it behooves us, his short sighted creatures, meekly to practice and defend the good, and forever abjure and oppress the bad though we do it with the loss of all things. This only will establish holiness in the earth as it keeps all pure and harmonious in Heaven.

Dr. Beecher here arose and said he must say again he did not understand the object of the brother in his remarks. He thought the speech was eloquent and good if it had been relevant.

Rev. J. T. Brooke—Said he had confidence in the general soundness of the brother's heart, (Mr. Blanchard's,) though he differed from him in some points, he could not agree with him that one converted to our cause, upon any other than the highest principle of duty, was a dead weight upon it.* On the contrary, he hailed every person as a friend to the Sabbath who should join in promoting its observance.

On the subject of expediency he generally agreed with him, (Mr. B.,) though he thought it proper to use arguments drawn from sources adapted to the light and capacity possessed by the person addressed. Arguments from the usefulness of the Sabbath to worldly men, might operate as pioneers to prepare the way for motives drawn from the higher principle of duty to God. (Mr. Brooke made other very judicious and sensible remarks to the same effect, after which the Convention took a recess till afternoon.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Friday, Nov. 20, 1840.

Rev. J. T. Brooke—Introduced a motion to print the proceedings of the convention in pamphlet form. He had never attended a convention which embodied so much religious influence since he came to the west. No man could have attended these meetings without going away with greater horror of Sabbath-breaking than he came, whether by himself or others. He related an anecdote of himself to show how much he had needed in past time, and how much many clergymen now need clearer light on this subject. And if the community are once brought to see and feel the truth in regard to the Sabbath, the fourth commandment will soon be regarded, as religiously as the eighth, or the tenth, and Sabbath-breaking will soon become as disreputable as to filch from our neighbor's pockets, or to destroy his life.

NOTE.—I was obliged to leave the Convention just as Rev. Mr. Brooke concluded. There was an evening session which also I could not attend. A subscription was taken up to print the doings of the convention in pamphlet form, and the papers were committed to Rev. Mr. Mills for that purpose. The pamphlet will soon appear. A general convention on the subject of the Sabbath and Bethel cause, was appointed to meet in Cincinnati next year. Let this be remembered and borne on our hearts before God.

*Mr. Blanchard explained. He had intended to say that those who embarked in the enterprise of Sabbath-reform, from hopes of secular profit, and not from fear of God, would be a dead weight upon the plans and counsels. While it was a matter of joy that any indifferent person should, from whatever motives, rest on the Sabbath.

CHRISTIANS DISSIMILAR.—We must not expect that all persons will see the truths of religion with equal distinctness, or feel an equal degree of joy, on being first brought from darkness into God's marvelous light. While some pass in a moment from the deepest anguish to the most rapturous emotions of joy and gratitude, others are introduced so gradually into the kingdom, that they are hardly able to tell when they entered it. The subject may be illustrated by the different views and emotions which would be excited in three blind persons, of whom one should be restored to sight at midnight, another at dawn, and the third amid the splendors of the meridian sun.—The first, although his sight might be as perfectly restored as that of the others, would yet doubt, for some time, whether any change had been effected in him, and tremble, lest the faint outline of the objects around him, which he so indistinctly discovered, should prove to be the creation of his own fancy. The second, although he might, at first, feel almost assured of the change which had been wrought upon him, would yet experience a gradually-increasing confidence and hope, as the light brightened around him, while the third, upon whose surprised and dazzled vision burst at once the refulgence of mid-day, would be transported, bewildered, and almost all overwhelmed, with the excesses of surprise, and joy, and gratitude.—Dr. Payson.

SORROW FOR SIN.—Humble your souls before the Lord for every evil you shall be convinced of. Tell him it pierces your hearts that you have so displeased him;—and that it shall be a caution to you, while you live, never to return again to folly. Invite him again to your souls, and mourn after the Lord till you have found him. 2 Chronicles xv. 2. Wait in the use of means till Christ return. Be not discouraged! Though he tarry, wait for him.—Blessed are they who trust in him.—Flavel.

DECEITFULNESS OF SIN.—The approaches of sin are like the conduct of Jael, who "brought forth butter in a lordly dish," Judges v. 25—27. Sin bids high for the soul; but when it has fascinated and lulled the victim, the nail and hammer are behind.—Cecil.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

THE PAST YEAR.

"What report has it borne to Heaven?—Have the feelings we have cherished towards God and man been such that we can look upon them with satisfaction? Have we done what we could to advance the kingdom of Christ where we have influence? Have our feelings towards those who differ from us in their religious and political sentiments been such that we are willing to meet them at the bar of God?—Meet them we must. Does the thought give us peace? Similar questions to these it may be profitable to ask, and definitely answer, as the year is now drawn to a close.

What is the record of the year 1840?—It commenced with a pleasing prospect in regard to revivals of religion. A goodly number of interesting revivals were in progress. The Church felt to some extent, that she had wandered from God, and that revivals were needed. Years of speculation, and spiritual darkness, and desolation had preceded. And it did seem that the Church felt this, and was almost prepared to return and seek the Lord till He should "rain righteousness upon the earth." But alas! we have passed through a year in which, perhaps, seldom has there been more done to prevent a "rain of righteousness." A political excitement, rejoiced in by most of the people, but desolating in its influence upon religion, and even morality, has swept over the country—an excitement in which good men have mingled, and by which they have been overcome. The Bible, the closet, and the prayer-meeting, we fear have been abandoned for the productions of the party press, and the partizan political meetings. But not only have the means of grace been neglected, and thus a positive loss experienced, but hard words have been used, and bad passions excited, and thus a positive injury has been sustained. The causes of benevolent reform have been left to a great extent to suffer, and more than this, courses have been pursued which tend directly to defeat these reforms. We are not finding fault, but stating facts. In these things, professing Christians, and some ministers of the Gospel have mingled, and been deeply interested. Of course the revivals ceased, and the spirit of revivals—where is it?

In the ecclesiastical world, what has been its influence upon the promotion of the holiness of the Church? The question only needs to be asked. We shall not attempt a statement of the facts that answer it, but only ask whether this course has resulted in inducing Christians to search the word of God with all diligence—to be much in prayer—to labor much in every good work—to grow in grace—to love and promote revivals? Have these results attended the course that has been pursued, showing that God approves that course? Have the members of the Church been growing more holy under the influences that have acted upon them for the past year—are they now more conformed to the will of God, than when the year commenced?

The year has gone, and the account it must give in these respects, is sealed up. To some, we know it has been a precious year. God has not left Himself without a witness. There are those who can testify that it has been as the beginning of years to them. We wish this were true of all God's dear children—that the influences operating upon them had done them good. But for the great mass of them we fear.

RESPONSE TO CHRIST'S KNOCKING.—Rev. iii. 10.—Often and long, O Lord, hast thou knocked at the door of my heart! O infinite condescension! that the Creator of all, the Proprietor of those glorious orbs should stand a patient supplicant at the door of such a wretched hovel as my sinful heart. Yet such as it is, O Lord, behold it is open to Thee. Come in thou blessed of the Lord, why standest thou without.—Come in and bring with thee all the graces of thy train, and furnish it for thine own abode, and then from a cage of unclean birds, it will become a beauteous palace, a pure and holy temple. Come in, O blessed Lord; let me constrain thee. Pass me not by. Abide with me—in my heart, in mine house! for it is towards evening and the day of life is far spent. O pass the remainder of my days with me in this poor and lowly dwelling of my heart, that I may pass eternity with thee in the glorious mansions which thou art preparing for them that love thee!—N. Y. Obs.

KNOWING CHRIST.

Where does the Christian's strength lie? It lies in this alone—in believing, experimental views of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we obtain those views of our blessed Savior, which are offered to us all, we obtain a principle and power to resist all difficulties in our way; but this is absolutely essential. To know Christ, then, is the general lesson of our lives; to know him more and more is the single and grand lesson which every s[illegible] amongst us desire on our way to heave[illegible] For this alone, St. Paul counted all things but loss that he might be accounted of Him. This, and this alone, was that which seemed to him to sum up all other blessings in himself.—What was so inexpressibly precious to St. Paul, and is most precious to each believer in exact proportion to his experience of it, must be set before us all, as the grand thing we have to aim at in our desires, our exertions, and our prayers. To know the glory of Christ, the majesty of Christ, the power of Christ, the faithfulness and truth of Christ—to know his holiness—to know more and more of his tender compassion to sinners—to observe his wise and merciful dealings with his people—to observe the promises he has given, and the means by which he accomplishes them—to know how he loves us—to experience, in our own hearts, the height and depth, and length and breadth of that love which passeth knowledge—this is the business of each one who would call himself a Christian—this is the grand spiritual discovery, after which each of us must aim. For this, no exertions are too great, it will infinitely more than repay every effort that can make for it.—Rev. B. Noel.

From the (Me[illegible]) Wesleyan Journal.

THE USE OF MEANS.

As the Savior came to the grave of Lazarus, and was about to perform one of the most stupendous miracles ever wrought, he said to them that stood by—"Take ye away the stone." He possessed almighty power—he could say to the winds and waves, "be still,"—to the dead, "arise,"—and he might have said to the stone "roll back, the dead still liveth." But no, this could be performed by human agency, and a miracle was unnecessary. So all along in the narrative of the miracle—Mary and Martha sent for Jesus, informing him of the sickness of their brother, and intimating a desire that he would come and heal him;—and for ought we know, the miracle would not have been performed but for the proper exertions of these pious females.

So it is with spiritual affairs. The church may pray for a revival of religion, and appear to pray fervently. The minister may preach earnestly and faithfully.—But there are yet other means to be used besides praying and preaching. The church may be unwilling to put on self-denial—to abstain from sin—to come out from the world—to exemplify the precepts of the gospel in their daily deportment; or, there may be an Achan in the camp. "Take ye away the stone."

Christians may pray for and [illegible] the influences of the Holy Spirit upon themselves, as individuals—that they may "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord,"—that they may attain to a higher state of holiness. They may wish for the conversion of their dear friends—and [illegible] present their cases at the mercy-seat.—Still all [illegible] "Take ye away the stone."

Impenitent sinners may "wait God's time," expecting that their hearts will be changed without an effort on their part—nay, they may pray for [illegible]—may read the Bible—may attend [illegible] ordinances of God. Yet there remains something to be done—the commands of Christ are not obeyed—a right hand or a right eye is felt to be of more value than the undying soul. "Take ye away the stone."

PRAYER FOR THE AMERICAN [illegible].—The national Legislature has just commenced its session, and it is natural that the attention of the country should be centered upon it. Our Senators and Representatives may be the wisest men whom the people can select for the responsible offices they fill, but they are men of like passions with others, and they need the wisdom that is from above to guide them.—That wisdom is "first pure then peaceable;" and were the Legislators of the nation deeply imbued with it, the halls of legislation would no longer witness scenes that have hitherto disgraced us in the eyes of the world, if not in our own. Wild ambition, the recklessness of party strife, the heat of passion, the struggle for empty victory would yield to the power of gospel principles, and patriotism, and philanthropy, and intelligent justice would dictate the laws for a happy people.

Such a result is certainly to be desired in preference to the wrangling and fighting and murder which have been the attendants of past sessions of the Congress of the United States. From the repetition of such scenes, we hope our country may forever be delivered. And for this end, let Congress be remembered in the prayers of the people, in secret, in the social circle, and in the sanctuary. Wherever prayer is offered, let it not be forgotten that those in high places are exposed to peculiar temptations; that in scenes of strong party excitement, the worst passions of frail man may be roused; and that the grace of God is the strongest restraining influence that can be thrown around the heart. Let prayer, therefore, without ceasing, be made for those in authority, that they may be men fearing God and loving their country.—N. Y. Evangelist.

DEAD IN TRESPASSES AND SINS.—The heart of an obdurate sinner may be called his sepulchre, which by means of long habits of sin is shut up against grace, as by a hard and heavy stone, and in which there is nothing but darkness and corruption. It is a very great mercy when the Deliverer comes to that prison, when the light shines in the darkness, and holiness itself visits that corruption.—Quesnel.

OLD PATHS.—Guard against new-fangled humors, nauseating old and solid truths, and seeking after something fresh, with itching ears for novel doctrines, for such turn away their ears from the truth—2 Timothy, iv. 3, 4. It is dangerous, for it savoreth of a spirit of levity and inconstancy.—Brown.

The Christian, whilst he rejoices in this world in temporal and spiritual rest, has the anticipation of that which is eternal.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

VANITY OF EARTHLY THINGS.—Who that has passed from youth to manhood, and contrasts his early expectations with his actual experience, has altogether escaped the withering feeling of disappointment!—As we advance in life, are we not every day more thoroughly schooled in this universal lesson of human experience, that the world is a vain show, and that its best enjoyments are either beyond our reach or difficult of attainment, and even when possessed, are transient, precarious and unsatisfying. Our prospects, if confined to the things seen and temporal, are not brighter than our past experience. Which of our present comforts can we count on retaining? Our wealth may be taken away, our friends may grow cool and desert us; at all events, they must die; our good name is at the mercy of a thousand evil tongues—our health may fail, and disable us for every enjoyment—and very soon we must quit all earthly things, and resign them to others. Even were every temporal comfort continued with us to the close of life, can we expect to derive from them more substantial happiness than we have hitherto enjoyed in them? Have they satisfied the cravings or filled the capacities of our souls? The mind which thus calmly revolves its past experience and future prospects, is learning that great lesson which God has designed to teach us by the vanity of the world—that souls formed in His image cannot find their happiness in any earthly object; and that successful as they may be in this world, they must look beyond it for the satisfaction [illegible] limited by its range; and that so long as they look to it, they will find vanity and vexation of spirit.—[illegible].

Let the Lord's remembrancers give him no rest. There is a kind of omnipotency in prayer, as having an interest and prevalence with God's omnipotency. It hath loosed iron chains: Acts xvi: 25. 26. It hath opened iron gates: Acts xii: 5. 10. It hath unlocked the windows of heaven; 1 Kings xviii: 41. It hath broken the bands of death: John xi: 40. 43. Satan hath three titles given him in Scripture, setting forth his malignity against the church of God: "a dragon," to note his malice; "a serpent," to note his subtility, and "a lion," to note his strength. But none of all these can stand before prayer. The greatest malice—the malice of Haman—sinks under the prayer of Esther.—The deepest policy—the policy of Ahitopel—withers before the prayer of David. The largest army, an host of a thousand thousand Ethiopians, run away like cowards before the prayer of Asa. How should this encourage us to besiege the throne of grace with armies of supplications: to treasure up our prayers; to refuse a denial; to break through a repulse. He hath blessed those whom he did cripple: Gen xxxii: 25. 29. He hath answered those whom He did reproach: Matt xv: 26. 28. He hath delivered those whom He did deny; Judges x: 13. 16. and He is the same yesterday and to-day. If He save in six and in seven troubles, should we not pray in six and seven extremities? When prayers are strongest mercies are nearest.—Reynolds.

FOR THE MINISTER.

From the [illegible] Observer.

"I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, that will not hold their peace by day nor night."—Isa. lxii. 6.

Such must be the ministers by whom this apostate and wandering world shall be brought back to God and established in holiness.

They must be incessant in prayer. This holy exercise will qualify their hearts for preaching the truth in the most effective manner. Most, if not all, of those ministers who have been eminent instruments in the conversion of souls, have been men of prayer. When the Savior preached, he wrestled whole nights in prayer. Ministers should imitate him in persevering and fervent prayer for the salvation of souls.—The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Prayer is the channel through which the influences of the Spirit are to flow down to give efficacy to ministerial labor. "Thus saith the Lord, I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them." Let ministers then "give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth."

Ministers must preach incessantly, and not hold their peace day nor night. They must be instant in season and out of season. They "are the light of the world" and "the salt of the earth." They are charged with the duty of preaching the gospel, so far as practicable to every human being. They are chosen of God as the prominent instruments of regenerating the world. They are appointed to wield the weapons that are to demolish every strong hold of sin. The "sharp two-edged sword" that went out of the mouth of the Son of God is put into their hand for universal conquest, and they must wield it against every sin, and every strong hold of iniquity. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong holds." All true Christian ministers are engaged in a stupendous warfare. They "wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." The lovers of ease, honor and wealth, will shrink from this mighty contest. A zealous, faithful, laborious, and poverty-enduring ministry are indispensable to the conversion of the world. They must have a burning zeal to bear them on against the tide of opposition; they must be faithful in declaring the whole counsel of God, and in warning the world of every sin; they must be laborious in carrying the word of life to every creature, and they must endure poverty in preaching the gospel to the wretched and degraded poor who have no means of comfortably supporting themselves.—Such, doubtless, will be the ministry that God will honor as the instruments of converting the world, and introducing the millennial age. They will not hold their peace day nor night. JOHN RANKIN.

LITERATURE.

LOUIS PHILLIPPE.

This prince is a lineal descendant of Phillip the first, of Orleans, a son of Louis 13th, and brother of Louis 14th, sometimes called Louis Le Grand. Louis Phillippe was the eldest of three sons of Phillip, duke of Orleans, who promoted the "grand revolution" of France, and, to show himself a true French democrat, abjured his privilege of the peerage, laid aside all his aristocratic titles, and assumed the name of Egalite. The grateful people, to reward such devotion to their cause, beheaded him in 1793. The young prince early joined the revolutionary army and served with distinction in Flanders. The blood royal, however, which flowed in his veins, rendered him an object of suspicion, and he was soon obliged to flee into Switzerland. Here for eight months he taught geography, the French and English languages, and mathematics, and on quitting the professorship which he had occupied at Richenau, he received a certificate acknowledging his services. Maintaining his incognito, he was elected [illegible] at Caen. Being desirous of warlike distinction, he returned to the army, and acted as aide-de-camp to General Montesquieu, till 1794, when the Jacobins still seeking his life, he abandoned France, repaired to Hamburg, traveled thence to Denmark and Sweden, and settled at Christiana in Norway. From Norway he afterwards passed into the country of the Laplanders, traversed on foot to the land extending to the gulf of Bothnia, returned to Denmark and passed again into Germany. Here he received a communication from his mother, informing him that she was in prison and his brothers in dungeons in Marseilles, but that the Directory had promised to liberate them, if she could persuade her eldest son to retire to America. The proposition met his immediate compliance, and he embarked under an assumed name, and as a Dane, in the ship America, Capt. Ewing, sailing between Hamburg and Philadelphia. The captain regarded him as a runaway gambler, and a French West India planter on board employed him as interpreter, remarking that "he talked very good French for a Dane." His brothers and he reached Philadelphia at nearly the same time, and were presented to Washington who invited them to Mount Vernon. Here they spent an agreeable visit, and then with an 'itinerary' furnished by Washington, during four months explored the Western country on horseback. One of them in writing to his sister at this time, says, "To give you an idea of the agreeable manner in which they travel in this country, I shall tell you that we have spent fourteen nights in the woods, devoured by all sorts of insects, after being wet to the bone, without being able to dry ourselves, and eating pork, and sometimes a little salt beef and Indian corn bread."—Thus they traveled three thousand miles. On returning to New York, intelligence reached them that their mother, with the rest of the Bourbons, had been banished from France, and that she had taken refuge in Spain. In attempting to join her, their vessel was run down by another carrying the tri-colored flag, but to their agreeable disappointment she proved to be English. Louis Phillippe became attached to the eldest princess of the royal family of Naples, shortly after his return to Europe, and married her. Both families were then exiles. She is his present consort and Queen of France. She was born in 1782, and bears the name of Mary Amelia. After a union of thirty years, their mutual attachment and respect for each other remain unabated.—Bapt. Adv.

VARIETIES OF FLOWERS.—There are, dispersed over the surface of the globe, upwards of 40,000 distinct species of plants which bear flowers; and from the number of new species which have, in comparatively recent times, rewarded the labors of collectors, we cannot suppose that the entire number, or any thing approaching to it, is yet known, even to those best skilled in plants. The vast number of flowers, producing vegetables, is variously distributed over the globe, in its different regions, according to its several latitudes, climates, and characters of soil. In this respect, the usual estimate is, that there are upwards of 13,000 flowering plants, natives of the inter-tropical parts of America, and considerably more than 5,000 in tropical Africa. In Australia, and the numerous islands with which the wide expanse of the Pacific is studded, either within the tropics or not very far without them, there are about 5,000 species already known, though some of the largest and most tropical of those islands have been but imperfectly explored. Temperate America, in both hemispheres, contains about 4,000; temperate Asia about 2,000; and Europe, which lies almost wholly within the temperate zone, contains, at least, 7,000 distinct species of plants which bear flowers.

Much is wanting to those who seek much.—Horace.

BAPTIST ADVOCATE.

It appears from the last No. of this paper, that the editor has concluded to publish our article which appeared some time since in the Register, containing an answer to his queries on several points. We insert below what he says on that subject:

"SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.—In accordance with the wishes of the editor, we have marked the article from the Register for insertion in our next paper.—He will, of course, republish ours of week before last. Probably he will find in it such an expression of the views which we entertain, as will satisfy him of the position which we occupy.

"We should feel ourself under the necessity of answering formally all his remarks, had not the controversy held by the same writer with a distinguished Baptist minister in this city, been published in full thro' many successive weeks in the Baptist paper then established here, and thus made familiar to the most of our readers."

Since the editor has referred us to his published views respecting the "obligation to keep most religiously and reverently one day in seven," as well as before, we have examined the matter with some attention, and are obliged to confess that, though we understand his position to be that "one day in seven" ought to be kept holy, we cannot see how this obligation can be enforced by him, since he thinks the fourth commandment, which requires the sanctification of the seventh day, is abrogated; and has failed to show, in answer to our request, that the New Testament contains any proof of the Apostles having observed the first day as a Sabbath. If, therefore, the example of the Apostles were all-sufficient to settle this question, Sunday-keeping could derive no advantage from it. If any had thought of this practice at the time the Scriptures were written, they seem to have taken great care to conceal their thoughts. If what the church has decreed, since the days of inspiration have ceased, is binding on Christians and mankind at large; then ourselves, and the editor of the Advocate, and all Baptists, may as well cease opposing Pedo-baptism, Episcopacy, &c., and all Protestants may justly be required to assent to all the dogmas of the Church of Rome!

We think the editor is not able, in the absence of any command or example in the New Testament, in favor of observing the first day of the week as holy time, to settle the "obligation," with any considerable strength, on the consciences of Christians, whatever tradition and a mistaken view of facts may do. The views of the Advocate appear to us to be quite at variance with the sentiments professed by Baptists to teach and practice nothing for which they cannot produce a "THUS SAITH THE LORD," as well as most repugnant to the Scriptures.

We invite our brother Wyckoff to a full discussion of the subject of the Sabbath; and to show that this may not be unnecessary, we now inform him of his mistake in reference to the authorship of the articles which have appeared in this paper touching the subject of the Sabbath. The person who wrote some years since in reply to Mr. Parkinson, of New-York city, is not the writer of any thing in the Register on that subject; neither is the position assumed by the editor of the Advocate the same, if we understand the matter, which was taken by Mr. P. The editor is also mistaken when he says the "controversy held," &c. was "published in full in the Baptist paper." All of Mr. Parkinson's, we believe, was published; but the latter and most important part of his opponent's argument was not allowed a place in that print! The readers of the Baptist paper, published there at that time, did not, therefore, see what was said in reply to Mr. P., though the Seventh-day Baptist paper published all that was said on both sides. We do not anticipate any reason to complain of such unfairness in the editor of the Baptist Advocate.

His reply to an article copied into the Register from the New-York Evangelist, was published in this paper week before last.

PRAYER FOR RULERS.

Our Sate and National Legislature are now in session. Very important consequences are connected with the subject upon which they will be called to act, not of a political nature only, but also of moral and religious. Subjects, affecting the happiness and liberty of thousands, will be before them. They will be called to consider a variety of crimes, such as intemperance, licentiousness, &c. &c. These crimes, like some others, are eating like a canker, destroying happiness, usefulness, lives, and immortal souls. Judicious legislation upon these subjects may, in a great measure, close up these flood-gates of wretchedness, and give life and joy to thousands just ready to perish. The duty to pray for rulers is clearly inculcated in the scriptures, and when Christians consider the effect that such prayers may have, we are persuaded they will be most earnest in them. They, who wish to see crime, and oppression, and wretchedness take their flight from our shores, will, in their prayers, remember those who are chosen to legislate upon such and other subjects. The responsibility of rulers is next to that of those who administer in holy matters. The influence which they may exert, savory or otherwise, is of alarming magnitude. We are persuaded that none, uninfluenced by the Gospel, are prepared to assume the responsibility of legislating on subjects of a moral and religious bearing. In fact, none, whatever their religious sentiments may be, are prepared to legislate upon such subjects without that wisdom which God alone can impart, and all, (religious or otherwise,) who look at the consequences of injudicious legislation, will tremble at the thought of acting on subjects affecting the happiness or lives of men.

When God inspired Moses to give laws to Israel, there were perfect and holy laws made. When God shall inspire our rulers, in answer to the prayers of Christians, then will the like results follow.

COTILLON PARTIES.

Some of our readers are doubtless ready to complain of the Cotillon discussion. We are happy in the belief that most of our societies know but little of them. Those who have no interest identified with such parties, may think that too much prominence is given to them. It may be so. We have, however, felt it our duty to enter every field of Christian influence and responsibility, and thus be of some service to all. It is true, also, that many of our readers are effected by them. It is, therefore, expedient that they should know what can be said for and against them. We expect that the discussion will very soon terminate, and wish whatever is written to be as much argument in as little space as convenient.

LADIES' COMPANION.—The January number of this Magazine has come to our table. It contains its usual variety of matter, entirely original. The Companion is, perhaps, second to no periodical in its literary character. Its historical, descriptive, moral and religious articles are valuable. Its tales of the fancy, &c., are of questionable utility. Indeed, we fear that the numerous fanciful pictures of life and fortune found in many publications of the day are exerting a dangerous influence on youthful minds. To our readers, we say, avoid romances whether found in the gilt volume, magazine or newspaper. Their touch, like that of the Torpedo, is withering. They are frequently very fatal in their consequences, giving a wrong bias to the mind, presenting false pictures of life, intoxicating the passions, and ending in the loss of the immortal spirit.

We take the liberty of spreading the following extract of a private letter of Bro. T. B. Brown, to one of the Editors, before our readers. We think he presents a right view of the subject. We should greatly deprecate a sectarian translation of the Bible. If one denomination may assume this work, all may, and if all would, Zion would doubtless be shaken to its centre.—[EDS.

I do really think the version of King James, though probably the best extant, very defective. Every day's experience confirms me in this opinion. We have very many passages which convey no tolerable sense—wholly unintelligible; and the common reader, therefore, fails to be instructed.—What meaning, I would ask, does the common reader get from Isa. lxiv. 5.—"In those is continuance, and we shall be saved."—And though this may be a place of uncommon difficulty, and one which cannot be improved except by some conjectural emendation of the text, there are many other places couched in language quite as obscure, for which no plea can be predicated upon the obscurity of the original. Job, Psalms, and the books of Solomon, abound in such places. Of this, Henry Martyn was fully sensible, when he said, "It appears to me that the two Royal Authors have suffered more from the plebian touch of their interpreters, than even the Prophets, or any other but Job." When he was preparing the Persian and Arabic translations, he said, "The Psalms we must leave till the end of the New Testament, for this solid reason, that I do not understand a considerable portion of that book. Much of the present translation is certainly unintelligible."

But however desirable a new version may be, I feel rather sorry that an attempt towards one has been made, just at this juncture, by one or two private individuals. It takes place, apparently, too much in connection with the great effort of the Baptist denomination in their new Bible organization, in consequence of which it is regarded as a denominational effort, rather than a private and individual enterprise. But in truth, the denomination, as such, makes no attempt towards a new translation. If it did, it would stir up such wide-spread jealousy as would prove a serious obstacle. For my own part, I would commit the work to the Baptist persuasion as readily as to any other sect. But I think there is a better way still. Let all the different sects, not only those reputed orthodox, but the heretical also, delegate their most competent men to the work, and at the proper time in convention assembled, make such revisions of the present translation as they can unanimously agree upon, and when they cannot unanimously agree, let King James' remain unaltered. Such a convention, methinks, would effect some very desirable and important alterations. Some such plan as this, if my memory serves me, was once suggested by the Hon. Thos. Grimke.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—If you can afford a place in your columns for the following communication, you will, I doubt not, oblige many of your readers who have it on their minds to emigrate to the west, and who, knowing that I was going to Wisconsin, wished me to give a fair description of that part where many of our brethren have already settled, which I shall endeavor to do by giving a mere statement of simple facts.

The place of their location is about latitude 43 N. about twenty miles north of the south line of the Territory, and from about fifty to sixty miles west of lake Michigan, and from near Rock River, to about ten miles east. The general face of the country descends gradually to the south, and so smooth that there is but little if any but that can be plowed in any direction. Many hundred acres lie in bodies almost entirely smooth, other parts are broken into gently rising bluffs from five to fifty or sixty feet high; these sometimes run many roods in length in other cases they are broken more into knoblike forms resembling ridges and hills in miniature, yet the face of the land is so slightly undulating that a wagon can be drove any where or in almost any direction without any difficulty. The prairie where they live is small, perhaps about five miles long and from one to three miles wide; but few brethren own land on the prairie; there is no water courses, ponds or marshes on it. In its immediate vicinity there are frequent ponds or basins of water so that almost every man has a place for watering stock. The timber land is generally better supplied with water, in some places with springs and brooks. The timber is principally burr oak and very scattering and small compared with timber in other countries, but the inhabitants are perfectly satisfied that there is enough for every purpose of farming or domestic use.

With regard to lumber, oak, ash, and bass-wood boards can be had for ten dollars per thousand, to haul but a few miles, black walnut from twelve to fifteen dollars per thousand—pine at Milwaukie, a distance of about fifty-five or sixty miles from eight to twelve dollars—salt can be had at the same place for two dollars and fifty cents per barrel—soleleather for twenty-five cents per lb.—Merchandize can be had at the stores in that settlement as cheap as in this country. The soil of the land is as good as any country with which I am acquainted, it is composed of quartz, silex and an abundance of lime, being well adapted to the culture of wheat, corn, oats, flax, potatoes and every other species of produce which they have yet tried, all of which grow in luxurious abundance. Wheat yields thirty busheles to the acre on an average, corn from thirty to eighty &c. In breaking up the sod it requires from four to six cattle or horses, to hire it done costs from two to three dollars per acre. The soil is from three to five feet-deep, then a strata in some places of marl from six to ten inches deep, then loose gravel and sand as deep as they have dug wells, which are from 30 to 70 feet deep. There are but few stone for building, except on the banks of the river, where they are very abundant. Good brick clay can be found plentifully, and lime of superior quality at 25 cents per bushel.—The climate is more mild than in eastern region in the same latitude, the atmosphere is pure and dry, the winter sets in about the last of Nov. or first of Dec. and continues till about the first of March. Snow from six to twelve inches deep; no frost to injure the crops; all kinds of corn from small yellow flint to the large dent grows with equal certainty. These remarks apply equally to the prairie and timber land. The timber is so scattering that it requires only to girdle it to make the land fit for cultivation, and the roots are so deep in the earth as to be no obstruction to plowing. There is but little chance to market grain at present for cash, consequently it is low, but an out let is anticipated through a canal that is already located from Milwaukie, on lake Michigan, to Rock river, where it is navigable for small steamboats, which canal runs through about 14 miles north of them. It costs no more to fence their farms and make their wells, which they curb in the neatest manner as they dig, than in other countries.—They have a little ague and fever on and in the vicinity of the river but of the mildest form, otherwise the country is as healthy as any other that I am acquainted with, the streams and ponds have sandy bottoms and very pure looking water, but impregnated with carbonate of lime.

Melville to his Brother William:

MY DEAR BROTHER WILLIAM,—Amanda's recent letter to you has cheered my anxious heart. I am also happy to learn that you are expected to spend a few days at home about the middle of January, which will be sooner than Amanda anticipated when she wrote.

When you shall again be allowed to sit by your own fire-side, other communications from you, on youthful amusements, will be expected. Allow me to suggest several items which we hope will receive your special attention. If you have other reasons for believing Cotillon parties, and like amusements to be injurious, besides those which you have already intimated, or which have been mentioned by others of our family circle, including Amanda herself, we desire you to be free in expressing them.—If any of us who have designed to support your side of the question, have written any thing which you cannot approve, be pleased to frankly inform us. Not only in the name of our family circle, but also in behalf of several christian parents who are our choice friends, I request you to fix your mind upon the following questions:—Does the youthful mind need any relief from a fixed routine of business, studies and cares? If any, then what kind? What recreation or amusements, (I know not what term you will select,) would you recommend? How shall christian parents restrain their children from improper amusements? What I have arranged in several interrogations, perhaps you may express in one. In one word, we wish you to re-enter the field of discussion which has been providentially opened, and pour out your whole soul. We pray that you may write under as deep a sense of responsibility as ever moved your pen.

This discussion involves great principles and far-reaching consequences. If it is now rightly directed, and if it secures the blessing of God, we expect that it will prove to be one of those incipient measures which God saw requisite for the promotion of a revival of religion; for we are all fully convinced that next to the stupidity of professed christians, the most formidable obstacle to the out-pouring of the Holy Spirit, is the influence of vain amusements—especially that form of them against which we warned Amanda, viz:—Dancing Parties. Your affectionate brother,

MELVILLE.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I have just received the following communication from "A Young Man," which you will please insert in your valuable paper, in place of the one I promised in your last.

A FRIEND TO SOCIAL AMUSEMENTS.

To a Friend of Social Amusements:—

No institution has yet given us a guide to which society could look for a polish of manners, save it found its home, either directly or indirectly, in a component part of Dancing assemblies. The light and airy skip of the dance, has been the theme of admiration for ages long numbered with centuries that are past, and all, and every class pretending to civilization, have borrowed their ease of deportment from the rules adhered to in the dancing hall—its tutored steps—its graceful salutes—and its winning confidence of address, have long been imitated and counterfeited as nearly as possible, by every class of people regarding appearance, ease, grace, affability or courtesy of manners, and the Cotillon at once, the nursery of politeness—holding up to its votaries the measured display of self-beautifying improvement, sends forth many a model of graceful gentility, only to be found with the tutorings connected with the giddy steps with which youth lingers in the pleasures of its harmless and social amusement. To test my positions with demonstrations having occurrence in every day life, I must beg you to bear with me while I compare one of the two classes claiming precedence with the other, that I may illustrate my views clearly.

Imagine to yourself two young men just entering upon the active scenes of ripened manhood, possessing regularities of features, and alike in all respects save in the tenor of their education. The one has received all the goodly instructions which forms the care of the watchful mother, strict in her superstitious belief—of the father in his unbending and honest blue-lighted love, forbidding all levity and mirth, and in fine, every light-hearted amusement which gave life and animation to the youthful heart, springing in all the exuberance of its nature, to portend happiness and joy.—The other has been taught that the world possesses charms, and imparts its rich blessings to that heart which, while it joys in the lighter amusements and seeks for the accomplishments of the day, can possess as honest motives and as untainted an ambition as ever formed the hopes of youth, giving to the mother the assurance of unbending integrity, and to the father the consolation of knowing, that while he had been tutored in the lighter and more joyous scenes of life, he had kept that prompter within him which made him worthy the name of man. Follow the two into the active scenes of life and watch their progress through its intricacies and trials. The one has learned the principles which spring into existence under the pent-up moralizings of an unsocial, superstitious, and stoical fire-side, and if perchance, he has encountered the vicissitudes of a school-life, his early lessons have received so deep a root that he dreams not that they should be eradicated; but, on the contrary, were he to overreach the proscribed barrier of his early tutors, he leaps with a madness that bids reason blush, for he is ignited with a flame too powerful to be quenched, till his devastation is complete; else, he appears before the world a rough, unpromising picture, the veriest child of superstition. While the other, the early associate of society and its amusements, has traced the pages of human nature, and read a lesson of maxims, and a code of actions only to be known from a connection with his fellow man, yet they are almost inseparable from success and happiness.

Follow the two yet a little further into the higher scenes of life, and walk with them into the social parlor and observe the result. The one passes the exchange of a friendly greeting, and converses upon topics of mutual solicitude with a confidence undismayed with timid fear, and turns with a joyous ease from one source of happy converse to another, till the listening heart is drawn out in its tenderness and admiration, to eulogise the means of acquiring such ease and such affability. The other steps forward and attempts a similar greeting—he blunders and stammers—the blush mantling upon his cheek, timid with confusion, betrays his uneasiness; he gets one side bewildered in bashfulness, the pity of observers; or, again, he attempts at the polite, which effort results in so ludicrous a swagger, and so uncouth an attempt, as to cause the silent gurgling laugh of experience to look upon the uncultivated thing, and weep over the follies of mankind.—Then pause a moment at the fireside, when years shall have found their choice registered in a connection for life, and see how the one has avoided the thousand bitter things which rush too suddenly upon the heart unacquainted with the flinty realities of human existence; in the one you may see the light rays of happiness which illumine the home with domestic cheerfulness and contentment, as it keeps up its intercourse with the world, while, with the other, dark and gloomy superstition, blackened in its hue by a want of the civilities learned in the round of the happy dance, becomes the cold and stoical disciple to ennui, envy and jealousy.

Yours, truly,

A YOUNG MAN.

INTELLIGENCE.

Awful Explosion—An entire Building Demolished.—On Monday morning between 6 and 7 o'clock, a most terrific explosion took place by the bursting of the steam boiler in the paper manufactory of Mr. Gabriel Moore, situated in the upper part of the district of Kensington, between Edward and Lydia streets and School and William streets, which demolished and laid in one mass of ruins the entire building, which was partly brick and frame, two or three stories high. The accident is attributed to the filling up of the feeding pipe with a hard deposite which prevented the water from flowing into the boiler. At the time of the explosion the steam engineer, Enoch Garside, and John Grant, machine engineer, were in the building preparing for the day's work by attempting to get up the steam, both of whom were dreadfully scalded and otherwise injured by the falling of the building upon and around them.—Mr. Grant had one or both of his legs broken,—his situation is considered dangerous. Mr. Moore himself was hurt by a large piece of the building falling upon his head while standing in the yard,—supposed to have fractured his skull. The boiler, which was situated in the basement of the building, was forced upward, and changing its direction, was forced through the back wall of an adjoining two story brick house, a distance of about 40 or 50 feet from its position in the factory. The boiler forced its way some ten feet into the bed room of this house, knocking away a staircase, and scattering large fragments of boards and brick upon a bed from which three children had just arisen, who very fortunately escaped serious injury and perhaps death. Fortunately at the time there were but two of the hands in the building, the number usually employed is somewhere about twenty.

One of the workmen was within a few yards of the building at the moment it fell in ruins before him. The concussion was tremendous, shattering all the houses in the immediate vicinity, and felt for a great distance around the neighborhood. Mr. Moore was an industrious man and will feel the loss severely, which cannot be less than ten thousand dollars. He is confined to the bed from the injuries received. The other two men were soon dug from among the ruins, and may possibly recover, altho' the nature and extent of their injuries make it extremely doubtful. It is certainly a miracle that in such a terrible disaster no lives were lost.—Phil. Gaz.

Fall of the Chandelier Explained.—We understand that the chandelier in the Representatives' Hall, at Washington, was broken through the carelessness of one of the men employed to trim the lamps. There were seventy-eight lamps, together holding nearly twenty gallons of oil. The chandelier was drawn down, and while the lamps were taken out for the purpose of being trimmed, a man was stationed upon it, in order to make up for the deficiency of weight thus occasioned. This man, however, forgetting the importance of keeping at his post, jumped off, and in consequence, the chandelier flew up to the ceiling with prodigious velocity, and was, of course, by the violence of the concussion, dashed in pieces.—Northampton Courier.

This varies from the accounts first published only in regard to the man jumping off. The story originally was, that the men who were at work about the chandelier, when they saw it moving upward, clung to it with all their vim; but it was obviously absurd to imagine that the oil contained in 78 lamps could weigh more than two men. The jumping off affords a more rational explanation.—N. Y. Spec.

Philadelphia Senator.—At the recent election for State Senator in Philadelphia, there were three candidates, whig, democrat, and abolition. Out of some 7,000 votes polled, the latter received but 77, and it is said the only votes which were legal, all the rest wanting the important addition, "for the unexpired term of Frederick Fraley, resigned." It is rumored that he intends to claim the seat.—N. Y. Express.

The Mormon City.—A bill to incorporate the Mormon city of Nauvoo, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, in the Legislature of Illinois, on the 15th inst.—N. Y. Express.

Death of the Mayor of Providence.—The Hon. Samuel W. Bridgham, Mayor of the city, died at his residence yesterday morning at 8 1-2 o'clock. Gen. Bridgham was elected Mayor upon the organization of the city government, and has been annually re-elected without any serious opposition.—He was one of the oldest members of the bar of this State.—Prov. Jour.

Munificent Donation.—We learn that our fellow citizen, Mr. Nathan Dunn, a friend to liberal education, has recently given to the Managers of the Haverford School, the only Quaker College, we believe, on this continent, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, which establishes that institution on a durable basis.—Phila. North American.

The Senate of Alabama have passed a bill for the election of Congressmen by general ticket.

We learn from Concord, N. H., that Levi Woodbury has accepted the situation of U. S. Senator, and declared his determination to take his seat in the Senate on the 4th of March next.

Georgia and Maine.—The old Maine Question has suddenly sprung up again in the Georgia Legislature—the refusal of the Government of Maine to give up certain persons resident in that State, who, it is alleged, have violated some of the laws of Georgia relative to black people; and at the last session a bill was reported recommending a quarantine upon all vessels arriving at ports in Georgia, from ports in Maine.—This bill slept quietly until last week, when in the lower house, after much discussion, the bill passed. How it will fare in the Senate is not known.—N. Y. Express.

IMPORTANT FROM GEORGIA.

The Maine Quarantine Law.

Corres. of the Augusta Chronicle,
MILLEDGEVILLE, Dec. 22.

In the afternoon, after disposing of various bills of little interest, the Senate took up the Maine Quarantine bill. An amendment was adopted, declaring that the bill should not operate after the Governor gave notice that Maine had surrendered the fugitives. The Senate then adjourned and met again at 7 o'clock, when, after considerable discussion, the bill was passed—Yeas 35, nays 31. It was advocated by Messrs. Miller, Spencer, Moore and Kennan, and opposed by Messrs. Gordon, Reid, and Echols, of W.

The Senate then took up and passed the resolution reported by the Committee on the state of the Republic, requiring the Governor to continue his correspondence with the Governor of Virginia, and to open a correspondence with the Governors of the other slave holding States, with the view of devising some plan to remedy the wrongs now existing, in relation to Georgia and Virginia, by the refusal of the Governor of Maine and New York to surrender certain fugitives, and if necessary, to carry out such plans, to call a convention of the people of Georgia.

So you will perceive that Georgia has taken a decided stand upon this important question. Some calculate on the Governors refusing his assent to the quarantine law. I trust they will be disappointed.

The Senate adjourned till 7 o'clock tomorrow morning. Both branches of the Legislature will adjourn sine die to-morrow morning.

[The bill as it passed the House and Senate, imposes a quarantine of one hundred days after 1st of March on all vessels coming directly or indirectly from the ports of Maine, and also provides for a search of said vessels on their departure.]—N. Y. Express.

A "poor white man" was recently sold in Missouri, under the vagrant act, and purchased by a keeper of a livery stable.

Melancholy Death.—We are pained to learn by the letter of a gentleman in Milan to his friend in this city, that Jabez Wright, Esq. of Huron, one of the oldest, most useful and respectable citizens of the lake country, lost his life under distressing circumstances on the night of the 16th inst. His body was found in the lake opposite the village of Huron on the morning of the 17th, and it appeared on investigation that he left his house early the evening previous to go to Huron—that in walking along by the fence near the brow of the bank, it gave way with him, or by some means he was precipitated some 12 or 15 feet upon the stone crib erected near his house to prevent the encroachments of the lake, and was so severely injured by the fall as to cause his death. The body was washed off by the waves and floated to Huron.

The death of Judge Wright is not only a severe affliction to his family, but a public calamity. With the land titles and early history of the lake country, particularly Huron county, he was more familiar than perhaps any other man. A very large circle of friends and relatives mourn his melancholy exit.—Cleaveland Herald.

Singular Escape.—A vessel was recently capsized near the Sicily Islands so suddenly that it did not fill with water, the internal air being confined, and three men and a boy who were in the cabin, were shut in and remained there three days without food, and were afterwards rescued.

The Case of the Heirs of Anneke Jane Bogardus.—This case, which was carried by appeal from the decision of the Chancellor to the Court of Errors, was decided in that court on Tuesday last, against the applicants. The decree of the Chancellor was affirmed unanimously. The title of the case was Humburt and others, vs. Trinity Church, and involved property to the amount of many millions.

Strange Disease.—The Huntington (Tenn.) Advertiser of the 9th inst., mentions that a most fatal disease had made its appearance, within a few days previous, in the county of Henry, in that State. The Advertiser says: "It is said to be contagious, but in its symptoms unlike any other disease known to the human family; and in its fatality far more dreadful than the Cholera. Several deaths have occurred in a few families. On Saturday night four deaths occurred in one family. Its victims live from 1 to 4 hours after being attacked. The citizens of Paris, we learn, are greatly alarmed. Many talk of leaving the town. We have heard no name by which to call this mysterious and awful disease."

Tribute of Respect.—The members of the bar in the city of Albany, headed by Teunis Van Vechten, Esq. have requested the Hon. Ambrose Spencer, to which request he has acceded, to consent to have his bust taken, with the design of placing it in the room of the Supreme Court in that city, as a memorial of the regard entertained for him by the bar as a citizen, and as a Judge and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

SUMMARY.

The Baptist church at Town Creek Dallas Co. Ala., has resolved that all Abolitionists are fanatics, enthusiasts and political factionists, and as such have no fellowship for them. They further resolve, that no Preacher from any free state, shall be permitted to preach in their pulpit, unless he first give ample satisfaction to the Dea. of the church, that he is not an Abolitionist.

National Gallery of American Manufactures.—We desire very especially to call the public attention to the subjoined notice issued by the Commissioner of Patents at Washington. It will be seen that, in the new Patent Office, a hall has been prepared and set apart to be used as a gallery of American Manufactures, and that in the conception of the purpose, agriculture has not been forgotten. We trust that this notice will not be unheeded by any manufacturer in the land, in whatever division of the vineyard he may be a laborer, but that every individual will feel himself stimulated by the ambition to improve—to excel, to surpass, if possible, the best in his line; that if it please him to enrol his name among the contributors to the gallery of American Manufactures, he may have it made a part of the national record on the catalogue of manufacturing benefactors of their country. Agriculturalists too must feel much gratified, to find that provision is made for them, to whatever extent they may find it convenient to avail themselves of it; and it is to be hoped they will not neglect the praiseworthy suggestion relative to the collection of agricultural statistics—Baltimore Amer.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

Dec. 28. Mr. Braxton, Chaplain to the House, preached in the capitol yesterday. He is a good preacher and an excellent man. He is but forty-two years of age, instead of being patriarchial, as I had supposed. He is from Richmond Co., Va., the interior of the State. He is a country, Baptist preacher, unaccustomed to the splendors of the Speaker's chair in the capitol. He is self-educated; and all things considered, he acquited himsel well.

The religious members of Congress have a prayer-meeting every Saturday evening. I may in a future letter give you some particulars on this point.

Congress, during the first three weeks, were in session less than thirty hours.—Expense upwards of $40,000!

President's Message.—The Finances.

The motion of Mr. Wright, to refer so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances, to the Committee on Finance, coming up,

Mr. Webster, addressed the Senate at length, upon its statements and positions. He thought the message adapted to convey erroneous impressions, in deprecating the beginning of a national debt, when it was well known that one was already begun. It was erroneous in its statements of the expenses of the government. He attempted to prove that the expenses had, during the term of the present administration, exceeded the income, at the rate of seven millions a year.

Mr. Wright followed Mr. Webster in a long and able speech, in which the several positions taken were critically examined. The friends of Mr. Wright regarded it as an able effort, and perfectly vindicating both the policy and message of the President.

The few hours in which the Senate has been in session, have been occupied with business of local character, or of indifferent interest.

In the House, Mr. Adams introduced, Dec. 15th, a resolution, requesting of the President a statement of our diplomatic relations with China.

Mr. Underwood presented memorials from different places, praying Congress to act upon the bills reported by the select committee at the session, to prevent steamboat disasters.

A committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the act which granted half pay and pensions to the widows of revolutionary soldiers, for another term of five years. The law by which those gratuities have been heretofore granted, expires next July.

The President was requested to communicate to the House, all the correspondence and doings relative to the border troubles at Canada and Maine.

Mr. Fillmore introduced a joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution to change the time of commencing the term of Congress from 4th of March, to 15th Dec.

The P. M. General was directed, on motion of Mr. Morgan, to state how much had been expended by that department for special agency, and also the names of those agents.

Mr. Adams presented a resolution calling on the P. M. General, for the names of all postmasters removed since 3d March 1839, with those designated who have been removed for official delinquency.

The bill which was omitted last session, providing for a more faithful execution of the revenue laws, on motion of Mr. Adams, after long and angry debate, on account of its bearing upon the tariff question, was referred to the committee on manufactures.

TO FAMILIES.

S. D. DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public; for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser; and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. The pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to [illegible] to prevent a wicked and [illegible] take the occasion to say, [illegible] call for the Mother's Relief [illegible] guide to a correct opinion [illegible] mation in which it is [illegible] of believing that it has [illegible] an infinite amount of [illegible] valuable lives. He would likewise say, that he has a large and desirable assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Hardware and Crockery, which he is selling at lower prices than they have ever before been offered in the county, & that purchasers will enhance their interest by examining his stock before purchasing elsewhere.

POETRY.

A BEAUTIFUL HYMN.

The following from a late number of "Blackwood's Magazine," is beautiful. It breathes the very soul of poetry and religion.

When up to nightly skies we gaze,
Where stars pursue their endless ways,
We think we see from earth's low clod,
The wide and shining home of God.

But could we rise to moon or sun,
Or paths where planets duly run,
Still heaven would spread above us far,
And earth remote would seem a star.

'Tis vain to dream those tracts of space,
With all their worlds approach his face;
One glory fills each wheeling ball—
One love has shaped and moved them all.

This earth, with all its dust and tears,
Is his no less than yonder spheres;
And rain drops weak, and grains of sand,
Are stamped by his immediate hand.

The rack, tha wave, the little flower,
All fed by streams of living power,
That spring from one Almighty will,
What'er his thoughts conceive, fulfil.

And is this all that man can claim?
Is this our longing's final aim?
To be like all things round—no more
Than pebbles cast on time's gray shore?

Can man, no more than boast, aspire,
To know his being's awful sire?
And born and lost on nature's breast,
No blessing seek but there to rest?

Not this our doom, thou God benign,
Whose rays on us uncounted shine,
Thy breath sustains yon fiery dome;
But man is most thy favorite home.

We view those halls of painted air,
And own thy presence makes them fair;
But dearer still to thee, O Lord!
Is he whose thoughts to thine accord.

SEA LYRICS.

THE NAUTILUS.

See along the ripples bright,
Crested with her purple light,
With her gaudy sail outspread,
Mimic rainbow fringed with red,
Through the sea-stars gleaming round,
On a summer voyage bound,
Fanned by winds melodious,
Sails the gentle Nautilus!

O that I might dwell with thee,
Spirit of the slumbering sea!
With the hearts I love the best,
On the dimpling ocean's breast,
Far from trouble, far from care,
Breathing morning's rosiest air,
Gaily sailing ever thus,
Gentle, gentle Nautilus!

Rocked within thy pearly boat,
In the sun thou sleep'st afloat;
When the calm comes, thou art glad—
Then my drooping heart is sad,
For my heart is far away
Where the Seine's blue waters play,
But till winds blow, sail with us,
Gentle, gentle Nautilus! W. F.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the New-York Observer.

HONESTY IN SMALL THINGS, OR A CHAPTER ON POSTAGE.

If the God of the universe, who holds the stars in their orbits, suffers not a sparrow to fall without his notice; if he not only numbers his angels, but counts the hairs in his children's heads, his creatures may not be ashamed of attending to things that are small. But it is too true to be denied, that many, who, in the judgment of charity, are Christians are exceedingly scrupulous about those great features of character that strike the world's attention, but utterly overlook the requisitions of integrity in those matters that are likely to escape observation. To avoid all misconception of my meaning, I will illustrate the thought by referring to a single species of dishonesty common among those who claim to be patterns of virtue. They are very strict in the observance of the poor, they are very zealous in every good word and work, but their great sin is,

THEY NEVER PAY THEIR POSTAGE.

I do not mean that they refuse or neglect to pay for letters they receive, but they frequently write letters on their own business, to promote their own ends, and address them to those who, they have no reason to believe, are anxious to receive them, and neglect to pay the postage. This, I say, is dishonest, and I am ready to prove it. But first I will give my past experience, the experience of a poor country minister with an income just sufficient to support a numerous family, and pay the postage of one or two newspapers, and of a limited correspondence with dear friends.

Once a year I receive a letter from a gentleman requesting me to take up a collection in my congregation for a society of which he is secretary, and though I never take up the collection, and he has no right to suppose that I am friendly to his object, the letter comes as regularly as Christmas and the postage is never paid.

Frequently I receive printed circulars, in letter form, and sometimes as pamphlets, soliciting my sympathies, prayers and contributions for this periodical, or that seminary, or that new enterprise, and although they may relate to matters to which I am altogether averse, the postage is never paid.

Once I received a letter from a clergyman "in quest of vacancies," desiring information respecting a neighbouring parish, and although my answer might be worth "a living" to him, he neglected to pay his postage.

Often it is my lot to receive letters inviting me to come and preach here, or deliver a lecture there, or an address in another place, and if I accept, I have the pleasure of the expense of both going and returning and the postage into the bargain.

I might multiply this list of grievances, but one more shall suffice. Not many years ago I received a letter from an agent in behalf of a theological seminary, requesting me to take up a collection for the seminary, and the letter had the following moderate postscript: "Deduct the postage of this letter from the collection." This was the coolest instance of doing a man out of eighteen pence, that I ever had the misfortune to know. What difference would it have made to him or his cause, whether I paid the postage out of the collection, or him? None at all; but if I took up no collection, then he would save the postage, and I would be cheated out of it. Such was just the fact.

This is a part of my own experince.—Others similarly situated have told me that they have similarly suffered. One of my ministerial brethren published a book, and a certain clergyman, a hundred miles off, wrote him a double letter, finding fault with the book, and sent it by mail without paying the postage. Another received a letter from the same agent who did me out of the one and sixpence, and suffered the same imposition.

And I have heard editors of religious papers say that it is a matter of daily experience with them to be thus defrauded. If a man reads an article in their paper which offends him, forthwith he sits down and writes a letter full of pious indignation, protesting against such sentiments, and professing great regard for truth and righteousness, and sends the communication to the editors without paying the postage. He flatters himself that he has inflicted a double wound; he has abused the editors, and made them pay a couple of shillings for having an opinion of their own.

Or, what is more common still, they receive multitudinous communications from individuals, who think their articles, if inserted, are worth the postage, but who forget that, if rejected, the editors have to pay for that which to them is utterly worthless. And this, too, notwithstanding the announcement that invariably accompanies the paper, that "communications must be post paid."

Some may call this small business. Perhaps it is small business to be honest. But what is the difference in the honesty of two men, one of whom filches a shilling directly from my pocket, and the other steals it by mail. In the code of gospel morality the distinction is without a difference.—There is a principle in this matter as vital and far-reaching as if it regarded pounds and not pence. And he who would offend in one point, would in many. He who would defraud his neighbour of a sixpence, would prefer an opportunity of cheating him out of a shilling. But if the weightier matters of the law are to be regarded, it is also essential to the purity of Christian character, to pay tithes of mint, annise and cummin. HONESTUS.

SCATTERED THOUGHTS COLLECTED.

WILL IT EVER BE KNOWN?

Yes, conscience will tell it. Conscience is a traitor; and when you trust her with your secret sins, you must not be disappointed if she betrays you. She was on the spot, and recorded them. She tried to restrain you; she whispered in your ear, not to do the fearful deed; and because you would not listen to her, she told you then that she would publish it to the world.—More than twenty years rolled away, and Joseph's brethren appeared to have had no compunction for their crime. They had kept the secret, and no doubt imagined that it would forever lie buried in their own breasts. But in the providence of God, they were sent into Egypt, and by a cluster of circumstances, stood agitated and trembling before that very brother whom they had so cruelly sold as a slave. "Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not him." Conscience could no longer sleep. "And they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us and we would not hear, therefore is this distress come upon us!" A "fire not blown" consumes the man who has a guilty conscience. In the midst of laughter his heart is sorrowful. Like that pagan monarch, surrounded by his guards and princes, and amid all the delights of music and banquetting, he is terrified by a sentence which he cannot even understand.

And the providence of God will tell of it. "His eyes are upon the ways of men." There is "no darkness, neither shadow of death where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves." In a thousand ways, unknown and unsuspected by you, he can bring it to light. Men are sometimes most unaccountably infatuated in the commission of what they themselves suppose to be secret sin. Saul spared "the best of the sheep and the oxen, and the fatlings," themselves to proclaim the sad tale of his disobedience. Your wonted prudence may forsake you, and you may act as if you were determined to be your own accuser. The very plans which you have devised with the greatest art for concealing your guilt, may prove the discovery. God is above you. Say not, "Can he judge through the dark cloud?" He so controls and governs all your devices, that their very secrecy may prove the occasion of their disclosure. He has your heart, your lips at his disposal, and he can make them tell the mournful and astounding tale of all your secret wickedness. He can unmask your character, and disclose it in all its deceit and loathsomeness. He can so order your external condition, as to prove your guilt to the world.

Evil spirits will tell of it. They know who tempted you to commit the wickedness; who helped you to paliate its aggravations; and who promised you the veil of secrecy. They were artful in leading you into embarrassment and difficulty; but they will be faithless to rescue you. They wait only for the permission of their great Sovereign, not only to proclaim your folly, but unmercifully to aggravate it.

Holy angels will tell of it. Though unseen by you, they saw what you so vainly hoped to conceal. They noted it down. They have preserved it in long remembrance, and are witnesses against you.

Men will tell of it. They knew it, too. Your accomplice knows it. All your guilty companions know it. And the oath of secrecy will be dissolved, whenever selfishness and pride shall become the gainers by the perjury.

There was another who was witness to it. His grim form stalks unseen amid the frequented and the solitary abodes of men. His ghastly eye was there; and on his ear fell that soft whisper, those still and almost sepulchral breathings, that were never designed for mortal man. All-pervading, omnipresent Death, will reveal the secret.—Nothing shall have power to silence his testimony. He shall come up into your windows; he shall have a place near that pillow of anguish, there to recount your crimes, and fill you with reproaches. And when you are left alone, in the dark and narrow house, he will write your history on the stone that covers you, and many a passer-by shall read it and mourn.

"And after death, the judgment." This is the great revealer. "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God." The Son of Man shall come with power and great glory, and all nations shall stand at his bar. Sovreigns and slaves shall be there. Rich and poor; young and old, male and female, every saint and every sinner shall be there. Deeds of solitary wickedness shall then be remembered. Deeds committed under the veil of night and darkness, shall then be set in the light of God's countenance. Deeds done far away from human eyes, shall no longer lose their atrocity in the distance of place, of time, or retirement; but every eye shall see them. The sentence of the world will be of little moment then, compared with the judgment of God; and yet will his judgment be sanctioned, and justified, and honored by the unanimous concurrence of the world. The magnificent scenes of that day, and all its solemn splendor, impressive and affecting as they will be, will be lost sight of in the more impressive and affecting developements of human character.—God will do justice to the secret transgressor then; and the secret transgressor will be constrained to do justice to himself.—His history shall no longer be secret, and he shall no more ask the question,—"Will it ever be known?"

THE THORN IN THE FLESH.—2 Cor. xii. 7.

BY THE REV. JOSHUA MARSDEN.

A thorn in the flesh, and yet it bore a rose,
Which every hour its sweetness did disclose,
And still put forth new buds, and blush'd and bloom'd
On the bush burning bright, but unconsumed.
But many a sigh escaped me, for the wound
Was painful, and it festered all around;
While patience, like a Hebrew, on the thing
Of Egypt's doom, and Israel's paschal rite,
Seemed all in haste to make a quick retreat,
With staff in hand, and sandals on her feet;
But mercy called her back to my support,
Just as she gained the spirit's outward court:
And then I felt a little comforted,
Yea, thrice I bowed my knee and raised my head,
And still I prayed, and prayed, nor ceased my suit,
Till each impatient rebel thought was mute;
For He who by the bloody pillar stood,
Dropped in the fester two rich drops of blood;
And quick as that life cordial touched the part,
A thrill of ecstasy went through my heart.
My faith, which till that moment could not stand,
Revived, and took the promise by the hand;
Yea, they were married in that very hour,
And Faith brought full salvation as her dower.
Now come what will to me of pain or wo,
To Christ for instant grace and strength I go;
I rest on him the weight of all my care,
To him I pour my heart's full prayer:
His merit is my bulwark, there I rest,
His smile the sunshine of my drooping breast;
My springs are all in him alone, and I
Am often cheered, though all around is dry;
From that dear fountain all my comfort flows;
On that sweet balm-tree my salvation grows:
There drops my myrrh, there blooms my cassia rare,
My Gilead balm, my life elixir there
Forever flows, to heal my wounded flesh,
When in some new disease it bleeds afresh.

A NEWSPAPER IN FAMILIES.—A newspaper taken in a family seems to shed a gleam of intelligence around. It gives the children a taste for reading; it communicates all the important events which are passing in this busy world; it is a never failing source of amusement, and furnishes a fund of instruction which will never be exhausted. Every family, however poor, if they wish to hold a place in the rank of intelligent beings, should take at least one paper, and the man, who possessed of property sufficient to make him easy for life, and surrounded by children eager for knowledge, is instigated by the evil genius of cupidity, and neglects to subscribe for a newspaper, is deficient in the duties of a parent or good citizen.

TO THE BELOVED.

When far from them we love,
We feel how much we love them,
And pray each gentle saint above
To spread their wings above them.

At the dead of night, on the ocean forlorn,
My thoughts are of thee till the dawning of morn:
O Flower of my bosom! my Sorrowful One!
My rose with thy rosebud debarred from the sun!
The sky that bends o'er me, heav'n's pavement, is bright;
The large Tropic stars now illumine the night;
But my heart is afar, in the home of our love,
Though the cold sky of Winter be frowning above.

In the flush of Morn, ere the sun has arisen,
I lean o'er the walls of our swift-speeding prison;
With halo of crimson afar from the gales
In his light boat of pearl the gay Nautillus sails,
And, wooed by the notes of the mariner's song,
The wave-dying dolphins in joy speed along:
But my heart is afar in the home of our love,
Though the cold sky of Winter be frowning above.

In the fervor of noon when the winds are asleep,
With the white ocean birds, on the motionless deep:
When naught save the call of the sea-bell is heard,
And naught is astir but the white Tropic-Bird,
Soaring on, soaring on, like a cloudlet of snow,
Its graceful form mirrored so purely below!
O my heart is afar, in the home of our love,
Though the cold sky of winter be frowning above.

When the Day-god hath set, and the night-shadows fall
At once o'er the scene, like an Emperor's pall,
Bespangled with stars 'neath the cross of the south,
As I muse on the far-fading joys of our youth,
I pray for ye all, my Beloved ones, till fair,
Ye arise on my visions and solace my care;
For my heart still is true to the home of our love,
Though the cold sky of winter be frowning above.

FOR THE FARMER.

WINTER BUTTER.

Of all the products of the dairy, there is none more extensively used than butter;—and there is none, the preparation of which requires more care, or better repays a little extra attention. The difference between good and bad butter is as wide as between the Zenith and Nadir; and there is nothing more advantageous to the dairy-woman, or more to be coveted by her, than a high reputation for the quality of this article.—Good butter always indicates good order, great neatness, personal supervision, domestic industry, and skill in housewifery; and when a man carries an inferior article to market, the opinion entertained of his wife is directly the reverse of this.

The first thing to be attended to in making sweet butter, and butter that will keep, is the perfect purity of every thing used in the manufacture. Not only the vessels used, the pails, pans, churns, &c., but the room in which the milk is set, and the air which circulates in it while the cream is rising, should be clean and free from every offensive odor whatever.

The temperature also of the milk while rising, and of the cream while churning, is of much moment. Cream on the milk will be injured or melted by too high a temperature, as well as while the churning process is going on; and if the temperature is too low, the cream rises so slowly that it becomes bitter, and the butter, of course, is unpalatable. A temperature of from 50 to 60 deg. has been thought the best for the milk-room, and from 60 to 65 deg. will make good butter. The churning after it commences, should proceed without intermission until the butter is formed, and separated from the milk as far as it can be in this stage of the process.

The salting of the butter is a matter essential to its good quality. Too frequently, salt of a coarse, inferior description is used; and so much is put in that it remains undissolved, gritting like sand in the teeth, and provoking uncomfortable thirst. The salt for butter should be of the purest kind, made as fine as it can be by grinding, and if a little powdered saltpetre is mixed with it it will be none the worse. Some have recommended 5 lbs. of good salt, 8 ounces of saltpetre, and 1 lb. of first rate loaf sugar, thoroughly incorporated and used for salting, at the rate of an ounce and a half to the pound of butter. If the salt is of the right kind and the butter is correct in other respects, it may be questioned whether the addition of any foreign ingredient is not to be deprecated.

The great point in making good butter, and that which will keep, is the freeing it from all buttermilk; and if every thing else is well done, if this point is overlooked, good butter is impossible for any length of time. The mixture of milk in any degree with the butter is sure to produce frowiness or an unpleasant taste to the butter; and the entire freedom from this, constitutes the grand secret of making good butter.—There are many who think washing butter with water, incompatible with retaining the rich flavor; but if the water is cold and pure, it is scarcely possible any thing should be washed away, the buttermilk which destroys the flavor of all butter excepted.—Besides, the best butter in the world, and that which in all markets commands the best price, viz. Dutch butter, is invariably made in this way; and where the example has been followed by others, it has rarely failed of success. If any, however, doubt the propriety of washing butter, they may use any method they choose, provided the milk is separated perfectly. Perfectly freed from the substance that causes it to assume the putrid frowy taste of bad butter, it may be kept with almost as much ease as tallow; and solidity in packing, clean sweet vessels, and a low temperature, will ensure its keeping for any reasonable time. Let no one expect good butter, however, so long as coarse, impure salt is used, or a particle of the buttermilk is allowed to remain in it.

JOY OF RANSOMED SPIRITS.

Written soon after the death of a valued Christian Friend and Relative.

Still'd be each murmur of this heart,
For 'tis the Savior's gracious will,
That dearest friends on earth do part,
His purpose to fulfil.

We part, but 'tis to meet on high,
Where sin and sorrow ne'er alloy
Our ransom'd spirits' ectasy,
Our rapture and our joy.

And then we'll take our sweet ton'd harps,
Attun'd to heaven's melody,
And sing a louder, louder strain,
T' mercy shewn on Calv'ry.

Our pains and death-pangs all forgot,
We'll walk in garments wash'd in white,
And praise him for the grace that bro't
Our souls to glori'us light.

And ours shall be the crown of Life
The Savior purchas'd with his blood;
We'll praise him for his dying strife,
That brought us safe to God.

And there we'll dwell in mansions blest,
Secur'd us by a Savior's love;
Our powers redeem'd and disenthrall'd,
In harmony shall move.

And O! we'll range the climes of bliss,
Our hearts attun'd to heaven's lays,
Where Father, Son, and Spirit, have,
Enraptur'd song and praise.

And ours shall be ecstatic joy,
Joy that shall never, never end;
Our ransom'd powers in God's employ,
Our Father and our Friend.

O! Earth is base, and Earth is vile,
And soon I'll say a long adieu;
I'll leave with those who've left before,
With glory in their view.

Then farewell to all earthly scenes,
Dead be my heart to sinful joys;
For soon my conqu'ring Savior comes,
He comes to bid me rise.

And I shall rise to worlds of light,
Upborne on wings seraphic—till
My ransom'd powers find sweet employ,
His pleasure to fulfil.

And there we'll never, never part,
And sin shall mar our peace no more;
Eternal joy shall fill the heart,
And praise employ our powers.

O thanks to God for victory!
And thanks to him for dying love,
For welcome to angelic lays,
And paradise above.

RELIGIOUS.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

Thus speaks the dying Christian: When I consider the awful symptoms of death, and the violent agonies of dissolving nature, they appear to me as medical preparations, sharp but salutary; they are necessary to detach me from life, and to separate the remains of inward depravity from me. Besides, I shall not be abandoned to my own frailty; but my patience and constancy will be proportioned to my sufferings, and that powerful arm which hath supported me through life, will uphold me under the pressure of death. If I consider my sins, many as they are, I am invulnerable; for I go to a tribunal of mercy, where God is reconciled, and justice is satisfied. If I consider my body, I perceive I am putting off a mean and corruptible habit, and putting on robes of glory. Fall, fall, ye imperfect senses; ye frail organs; fall house of clay into your original dust, you will be sown in corruption, but raised in incorruption; sown in dishonor, but raised in glory; sown in weakness, but raised in power. (1 Cor. xv.) If I consider my soul, it is passing, I see, from slavery to freedom. I shall carry with me that which thinks and reflects. I shall carry with me the delicacy of taste, the harmony of sounds, the beauty of colors, the fragrance of odoriferous smells. I shall surmount heaven and earth, nature and terrestrial things, and my ideas of all their beauties will multiply and expand. If I consider the future economy to which I go, I have, I own, very inadequate notions of it; but my incapacity is the ground of my expectation: could I perfectly comprehend it, it would argue its resemblance to some of the present operations of my mind. If worldly dignities and grandeur, if accumulated treasures, if the enjoyments of the most refined voluptuousness, were to represent to me celestial felicity, I should suppose, that partaking of their nature, it partook of their vanity. But, if nothing here can represent the future state, it is because that state surpasseth every other. My ardor is increased by my imperfect knowledge of it. My knowledge and virtue I am certain will be perfected; I know I shall comprehend truth and obey order; I know I shall be free from all evils, and in the possession of all good; I shall be present with God, I know, and with all the happy spirits who surround his throne; and this perfect state I am sure will continue for ever and ever. Such are the all-sufficient supports which revealed religion affords against the fear of death. Such are the meditations of a dying Christian; not of one whose whole Christianity consists of dry speculations, which had no influence over his practice, but of one who applies his knowledge to relieve the wants of his life.—Saurin.

THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

When we are converted we have escaped many and grievous dangers; but yet there are many more before us, which we must by care and diligence escape. We are translated from death to life, but not from earth to heaven. We have the life of grace, but yet we are short of the life of glory. And why have we the life of grace but to use it, and to live by it? Why came we into the vineyard but to work? And why came we into the army of Christ but to fight? Why came we into the race but to run for the prize? Or why turned we into the right way but to travel in it? We never do God faithful service till the day of our conversion, and then it is that we begin. And shall we be so sottish as to think we have done, when we have but just begun? Now you begin to live, that before were dead. Now you begin to wake that before were asleep. And, therefore, now you should begin to work that before did nothing, or, rather, a thousandfold worse than nothing. Work is the effect of life; it is the dead that lie still in darkness and do nothing. If you had rather be alive than dead, you should rather delight in action than in idleness. It is now that you set to sea, and begin your voyage for the blessed land; many a storm, and wave, and tempest must you yet expect. Many a combat with temptations must you undergo; many a hearty prayer have you yet to pour forth. Many and many a duty to perform to God and man. Think not to have done your care and work, till you have done your lives. Whether you come in at the first hour or at the last, you must work till night if you will receive your wages. And think not this a grievous doctrine. It is your privilege, it is your joy, your earthly happiness, that you may be so employed; that you till now have lived like swine, or moles, or earthly vermin, may now take wing and fly to God, and walk in heaven, and talk with saints, and be guarded by angels,—Is this a life to be accounted grievous? Now you begin to come to yourselves; to understand what you have to do in the world; to live like men, that you may live like angels! And, therefore, now you should begin, accordingly, to bestir you.—Baxter.

MY MOTHER, MY MOTHER

Rev. Mr. Moffat, Missionary in South Africa, relates the following affecting incident to show the anxiety of converted heathen for their pagan relatives.—N. Y. Obs.

On entering a house to attend a sick child, I said to the mother who was weeping, 'My child'—(for so we speak—she was a convert)—'what aileth thee? Is the baby still ill?' 'No, no,' she replied, with a heavy sigh. 'Why do you weep then?'—'Oh my mother!' was her reply. 'Which, your mother-in-law? 'No, not my mother-in-law: my own dear mother who bore me!' and she paused and sobbed, as if her very heart would burst through her bosom. I said, 'What is the matter with your mother?' Holding out the Gospel of St. Luke in her hand, bedewed with tears, she said, 'My mother' (who was still in her native district, from whence this daughter had been brought captive,)—'my mother will never see this book! my mother will never hear the glad tidings of this book!' and sighed and sobbed again, she looked to heaven, and breathed a prayer. It was, 'my mother, my mother! she will never hear that glad sound that I have heard! the light that shone on me will never shine on her! she will never taste that love of the Savior which I have tasted!' Oh, could you have witnessed that sable daughter of Africa weeping for a far-distant mother, and looking heavenward and saying, 'My mother—my mother!'

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and Assembly:

The field of public service to which you have been called is bounded by no narrow limits. It includes the responsibilities of securing civil rights; of defining crimes of every grade, and prescribing their appropriate punishments; of establishing laws concerning the acquisition, tenure and alienation of property; of instituting and maintaining courts of justice; of prescribing and enforcing all duties arising out of the domestic and social relations; of creating associations designed to promote the public good, and controling or suppressing such as are injurious; taking care of the public health; providing a medium of exchange, sustaining domestic trade; regulating elections, and preserving the purity of the elective franchise; enacting laws for the discipline and instruction of the militia, the education of youth, the support of the poor, the relief of the afflicted, the encouragement of agriculture and all the useful arts, and the development of the resources of the State by the improvement of rivers and the construction of roads and canals; and finally all the responsibilities and powers which sovereign states may assume and exercise, with the exception only of those expressly granted to the Federal Government, and subject only to the limitations prescribed by the Constitution of this State and that of the United States. These responsibilities affect the welfare, honor and happiness of two and a half millions of free people. Although distinguished for the refinement of its social condition, this community is only in the beginning of its existence. Notwithstanding its thousand towns, it has yet an extensive region altogether unoccupied; and with aggregate wealth of a million of millions of dollars, its soil is imperfectly cultivated, its minerals have hardly been disturbed in their beds, the natural obstacles to trade have been only partially removed, and the perfect subdivision of industry in its various departments is yet to take place. We are in the midst of communities which are neither hostile nor rival powers, nor yet dependent colonies, exhausting our wealth for their support; but free and prosperous states, bound to us not only by the federal compact, but by the stronger ties of common sympathy and affection, and obliged by the natural direction of their trade to contribute to our revenues and increase our commercial importance.

The Comptroller will lay before you a full report of the fiscal condition of the State. The revenue derived from auction sales, within the fiscal year, ending on the thirtieth day of September last, amounted to $164,621 38. The receipts for duties on salt manufactured at the salt springs, were $155,961 16.

The revenues from auction sales, have been effected by the depression of commerce, and exhibit a diminution of $60,780 46, since the previous fiscal year.—The quantity of salt manufactured, has been less than in the year 1839, by about two hundred thousand bushels, and the revenues are therefore less by the sum of $33,301 96.

There has heretofore been in use one salt spring in each of the villages of Liverpool, Salina, Syracuse and Geddes. The water at Liverpool contains about seventy per cent of salt; the springs at Salina and Syracuse, furnish about fifty six per cent each; and the water at Geddes yields about thirty per cent. All the springs, except that of Liverpool, furnish limited supplies. The very commendable efforts of the Superintendent to discover additional sources of brine, have been crowned with success. Three springs have been found at Salina, each furnishing water equal in strength and purity to that at Liverpool; and collectively they will yield an ample supply for the manufactories at Syracuse and Geddes.

I am happy in being able to state that the search for new springs at Montezuma, has been successful; and that a revival of the manufacture of salt at that place, may be expected. As a consequence of these discoveries, we may anticipate a reduction of the expense of manufacture, and an increase of the quantity produced; results which cannot fail to be profitable to the treasury, and beneficial to our fellow-citizens.

The amount of tolls and rents of surplus waters collected during the last fiscal year, on all the canals of the State, was $1,606,827 45 and the amount of charges on all the canals, exclusive of interest on loans, was 586,011 87 leaving a nett revenue, $1,020,815 58
being $16,981 17 less than the amount of nett income of the preceding year.

The amount of tolls and rents received during the season of navigation in 1840, was $1,775,747 57, showing the gratifying increase of $159,365 55 over the amount received in 1839.

The productive capital of the School Fund, at the close of the fiscal year, was $2,033,807 95. The revenue received within the same period, including the appropriation of $165,000, from the income of what is called the United States Deposite Fund, was $268,400 65. The amount paid out for the support of common schools, was $275,010 10.

The capital of the Literature Fund is $268,777 93. The revenue during the year, including $28,000, appropriated from the income of the United States Deposite Fund, was $46,935 84. The amount paid out and applied to the support of the higher seminaries of learning, was $47,871 97.

The institution for the instruction of deaf mutes, and the asylum for the blind, continue to make ample returns for the patronage they have received.

The number of convicts in the State Prison at Auburn on the 13th day of Sept. last was six hundred and sixty-seven; of whom two hundred and fifteen were received during the year ending with that day. In the same period, twelve died, thirty-five were discharged by pardon, and one hundred and fifty-four by expiration of their sentences. The amount received for the labor of the convicts during the fiscal year was $61,355 35; and the amount expended for general support and necessary improvements, and in payment of previous debts, was $57,928 10. The excess of the earnings of the convicts over the ordinary expenses of the prison, was $6,917 39. The number of convicts in the State Prison at Mount-Pleasant at the close of the fiscal year was eight hundred and thirty-two.—The number received during the year was three hundred and fifty-six; sixteen died, twenty were discharged by pardon, and one hundred and ninety-two by expiration of sentence, within the same period. The amount of earnings was $83,504 14 and the expenses of the prison were $77,460 00. The fiscal condition of the prisons is highly satisfactory, and their discipline has been improved. The complaints of cruelty which heretofore engaged public sympathy, and brought our penitentiary system into disrepute, have altogether ceased. Sunday-schools have been returned; and in pursuance of my recommendation, the cell of each prisoner is always supplied with a volume of the School District Library.—This measure was followed by a gratifying improvement in the conduct of the prisoners. Many weary hours of solitary confinement are beguiled, resolutions of repentance and reformation are formed, and the minds of the unhappy convicts, accustomed to the contemplation of virtue and expanded by knowledge, are gradually prepared to resist the temptations which await them on their return to society.

The whole number of persons pardoned for every description of offence, including misdemeanors, in 1820, was three hundred and fifty-four; in 1821, three hundred and eleven; in 1822, two hundred and nine; in 1823, one hundred; in 1824, one hundred and eighty; in 1825, one hundred and seventy-three; in 1826, two hundred and eighty-five; in 1827, one hundred and ninety; in 1828, two hundred and thirty-one; in 1829, eighty-eight; in 1830, one hundred and thirty eight; in 1831, one hundred and fifteen; in 1832, one hundred and seven; in 1833, one hundred and sixty; in 1834, one hundred and forty-nine;—in 1835, one hundred and thirty-one; in 1836, ninety-three; in 1837, one hundred and eight; in 1838, one hundred and fifty-eight; in 1839, sixty-four; and 1840, eighty-five.

Sixteen convictions for murder have been reported to me within the last two years.

The enlargement of the Erie canal has been prosecuted with all the diligence permitted by the appropriations for that object. Various portions of the work have been finished, and others will be completed during the winter. The amount expended for the enlargement, prior to the 1st of Jan., 1840, was $4,669,661. The appropriations for that object, during the last year, were $2,500,000; and the surplus revenues of the canals applied to the same purpose, were $369,171. Thus, between the 1st day of January, 1840, and the 1st day of March next, the sum of $2,869,171 will have been expended: making the aggregate sum which will then have been applied to this great work, $7,538,832. The experience of the present Commissioners justifies the belief that the cost of the enlargement will not exceed the corrected estimate submitted by their predecessors in 1839, viz. $23,112,766. Deducting the amount which will have been expended on the 1st of March next, $7,538,832, there will be required to finish the enlargement, the sum of $15,573,934. That portion lying between Albany and Rome, might be completed in the spring of 1843; the part extending from Rome to Rochester, might be finished by the spring of 1845, and the residue, from Rochester to Buffalo, by the spring of 1847.

The debt of the State, exclusive of the portion which was contracted for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals and which is regarded as paid by the accumulation of funds set apart for that purpose, and exclusive also of the contingent liabilities arising from the loans of its credit, is as follows:

Debt of the General Fund, exclusive of what is called the permanent loan to the Treasury from the Canal revenues,	$1,412,961 62
Debts for the lateral canals that are completed, including the recent loan for the Chemung canal,	3,551,784 71
Debts contracted for unfinished works, viz:
For the enlargement of the Erie canal,	6,500,000 00
For the Black River canal,	1,050,000 00
For the Genesee Valley canal,	2,500,000 00
For the Oneida River improvement,	50,000 00
Aggregate State debt,	$15,064,746 33

The nett revenues of all the canals during the last fiscal year, after deducting all expenditures and the deficiencies of the lateral canals, were	$1,020,815 57
Leaving a clear surplus after paying the interest on the debt for the enlargement of the Erie canal, and the $400,000 annually loaned to the Treasury, of	$393,095 95
The Commissioners of the Canal Fund estimate that the clear surplus of the current fiscal year will be	$570,000 00
The expenditures from the General Fund, during the fiscal year, exclusive of the deficiencies of the lateral canals were	$779,324 36
The receipts from the sources provided by law were	$379,211 01
From the payment of the balance due the preceding year from the Canal Fund and from other sources,	$400,113 35

The Legislature of 1840 entitled itself to the lasting gratitude of the people, by benign measures designed to produce a reform in legal proceedings. It dissolved the connection between judges of county courts and boards of supervisors, in the appointment of county treasurers and county superintendents of the poor, a connection by which judges were made partizans; and the power of the Executive department was exercised to defeat the will of the people in the selection of those local functionaries. The office of commissioner of deeds was abolished, except in cities; its duties were devolved upon justices of the peace, while the fees allowed for those duties were diminished; and thus an office was dispensed with, in which there were about three thousand incumbents, and the burthens of the people were sensibly diminished. A law was also passed requiring all judgments designed to affect any real estate, to be docketed in the county in which such real estate is situated. This measure has relieved the alienation of land of onerous charges, and much inconvenience, and has removed one of the causes which diverted business from the courts of common pleas, into the supreme court. The jurisdiction of justices courts was extended, so as to include controversies where the amount involved does not exceed one hundred dollars. It is gratifying to notice the progress of these domestic tribunals in the favor and confidence of the people. Their jurisdiction was originally limited to demands not exceeding five pounds, or twelve dollars and a half. By other laws, the Legislature reduced the fees of many other officers, and diminished the average cost of foreclosure of mortgages to a sum two-thirds less than under the former system, that of collecting debts in actions not litigated to a sum three-fourths less, and the costs in litigated suits to an amount one-third less. While there can be no doubt that these measures were in principle just, and that the reform that has been accomplished was necessary, it is complained by many who are conversant with the practice of the courts, that some of the laws which have been passed are imperfect, liable to be evaded and in some respects unequal in their operation. Such a result is by no means improbable. There are few of the works of man which are not susceptible of improvement; and certainly all experience has shown, that laws seldom form an exception. If the system which has been substituted in the place of one that had long prevailed, is, in any material respect defective, or unjust, I doubt not that it will afford you much pleasure to make the necessary amendments.

The charitable institutions under the patronage of the State, have heretofore been commended by me to the Legislature; and I am happy to acknowledge that no appeal made in their behalf, has been denied. It was suggested in 1839, that the interests of the State required the visitation of the Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb. The Superintendent of Common Schools was very properly charged with that duty.

In regard to our Penitentiaries it has been maintained that discipline ought to be tempered with kindness, and that moral influences should be employed to secure the submission and promote the reformation of convicts. Although some improvement has been made in this respect, more may yet be accomplished. It is too often forgotten, that the object chiefly contemplated in the adoption of our Penitentiary system, was the reformation of offenders. This object derives its importance from considerations of prudence, as well as of philanthropy. The unreformed convict after being released, spends a brief period in committing depredations upon society, and in corrupting youth, and then returns to the prison to exercise a vicious influence upon his fellow-prisoners. Reformation can seldom be expected, without addressing the mind. I would have the school-room in the prison fitted as carefully as the solitary cell and the workshop, and although attendance there cannot be so frequent, I would have it quite as regular. The recent establishment of a separate institution for female prisoners, under the management of one of their own sex, reflects much honor upon the State; and I am happy to add that it has realized the expectations of the Legislature. Female convicts within the district from which criminals are received at the Auburn prison, are now sent to that Penitentiary, where they remain until an Executive order is made for conveying them to Mount Pleasant, and such an order cannot be made for less than ten convicts. This temporary imprisonment of females in the prison at Auburn operates harshly towards them, and is inconvenient in regard to the management of that institution. I respectfully recommend that the law be modified so that females be directly conveyed to their proper Penitentiary. The chief obstacle to a reformation of this class of offenders is the inflexibility with which society rejects them after their season of penance is past. While the cause of public morals requires their exclusion, at least until they have given satisfactory evidence of reformation, humanity and expediency unite in recommending proper efforts to sustain those who are truly reformed. It has been suggested that a retreat might be provided for them at Mt. Pleasant, where, under the care of benevolent families, they might maintain themselves by labor until by good conduct, they should become entitled to employment elsewhere. Such a plan must necessarily be left to private liberality, and I am informed that such liberality is awakened to the undertaking, and ready to engage in it, if a proper edifice can be obtained. There is a building which belongs to the State, situated near the prison, and now of very little use, which might be devoted to this humane purpose, at least until the experiment can be tested. The whole number of male convicts in the State Prisons is fourteen hundred and twenty-three, of whom eleven hundred and fifty three are white, and two hundred and seventy are colored persons. The number of female convicts is seventy-four, of whom forty are white and thirty-four are colored. The sex has a just claim to extraordinary effort for the reformation of the small number of persons it furnishes to our prisons.

The success which has crowned the benevolent efforts of the House of Refuge, has induced an opinion that it would be profitable to establish a similar institution in the western part of the State, where the subjects of its discipline could be maintained at much less expense than in the city of New York.

* * * * * *

Our currency was sustained in 1839 and 1840, during a period of suspension in most other States. For this advantage we are indebted to a supervision of the banks, to the establishment of a free banking system, to the repeal of the act prohibiting the circulation of small bills, and to the law of the last Legislature regulating the redemption of bank notes. The policy found most conducive to the public welfare, has been to desist equally from increasing the number of chartered banks, and from legislation hostile to those in existence; to correct defects in the new system of free banking, and to give it a fair trial; to require of all banking institutions and associations, not only a prompt redemption of their circulating notes, but also that such notes should be at all times kept in good credit throughout the State. These views having prevailed in the Legislature during the last two years, the public inconvenience which heretofore existed, have ceased: and it has happened for the first time within thirty years, that the Legislature is relieved alike from applications for banking privileges, and from complaints against those by whom such privileges are held.

* * * * * *

Not much however can be accomplished by legislation, to affect the relations between masses of adult citizens, and the change desired in this respect, must be left chiefly to time and the operation of our institutions. But it is not so in regard to the rising generation. The census of the United States is said to show, that there are [illegible] white persons in this State who have passed the age of twenty-one years, without having learned to read and write. Let us make allowances for any portion of adult foreigners, and there yet remains a large number of uneducated native citizens. The number of children now growing up in the same manner, does not fall short of thirty thousand. These are the offspring, not of prosperity and affluence, but of poverty and misfortune. Knowing from the records of our penitentiaries, that of this neglected class, those are often most fortunate, who from precocity in vice, secure admission into the House of Refuge or the State Prison, through the ways of crime, and knowing that almost every application for pardon is urged on the ground of neglected education, I have felt it an imperative duty to appeal to the Legislature, to render our system of education as comprehensive as the purposes for which it was established. Of 1358 children in the Alms-House of the city of New York, one sixth part is of American parentage, one sixth was born abroad, and the remainder are the children of foreigners; and of 250 [illegible] in the House of Refuge, more than one half were either born abroad, or of foreign parents. The poverty, misfortunes, prejudices and inequalities to which foreigners are exposed, satisfactorily account to my mind for the undue proportion of their children in the neglected class to which the attention of the Legislature was called. Although the excellent public schools in the city of New York are open to all, and have long afforded gratuitous instruction to all who seek it, nevertheless the evil there exists in its greatest magnitude. Obviously, therefore, something more is necessary to remove it than has yet been done, unless we assume that society consents to leave it without a remedy. These circumstances led me to the reflection, that possibly a portion of those whom other efforts had failed to reach, might be brought within the nurture of their schools, by employing for their instruction teachers who, from their relations towards them, might be expected to secure their confidence. When the census of 1850 shall be taken, I trust it will show that within the borders of the State of New York, there is no child of sufficient years who is unable to read and write. I am sure it will then be acknowledged that when, ten years before, there were thirty thousand children growing up in ignorance and vice, a suggestion to seek them wherever found, and win them to the ways of knowledge and virtue by persuasion, sympathy and kindness, was prompted by a sincere desire for the common good. I have no pride of opinion concerning the manner in which the education of those whom I have brought to your notice shall be secured; although I might derive satisfaction from the reflection that amid abundant misrepresentations of the method suggested, no one has contended that it would be ineffectual, nor has any other plan been proposed. I observe, on the contrary, with deep regret, that the evil remains as before; and the question recurs, not merely how or by whom shall instruction be given, but whether it shall be given at all, or be altogether withheld. Others may be content with a system that erects free schools and offers gratuitous instruction. But I trust I shall be allowed to entertain the opinions that no system is perfect that does not accomplish what it proposes; that our system is therefore deficient in comprehensiveness, in the exact proportion of the children that it leaves uneducated; that knowledge, however acquired, is better than ignorance; and that neither error, accident nor prejudice, ought to be permitted to deprive the State of the education of her citizens. Cherishing such opinions, I could not enjoy the consciousness of having discharged my duty, if any effort had been omitted, which was calculated to bring within the schools all who are destined to exercise the rights of citizenship; nor shall I feel that the system is perfect, or liberty safe, until that object be accomplished. Not personally concerned about such misapprehensions as have arisen, but desirous to remove every obstacle to the accomplishment of so important an object, I very freely declare that I seek the education of those whom I have brought before you, not to perpetuate any prejudices or distinctions which deprive them of instruction, but in disregard of all such distinctions and prejudices. I solicit their education, less from sympathy, than because the welfare of the State demands it, and cannot dispense with it. As native citizens they are born to the right of suffrage. I ask that they may at least be taught to read and write; and in asking this, I require no more for them, than I have diligently endeavored to secure to the inmates of our penitentiaries, who have forfeited that inestimable franchise by crime, and also to an unfortunate race, which, having been plunged by us into degradation and ignorance, has been excluded from the franchise by an arbitrary property qualification incongruous with all our institutions. I have not recommended, nor do I seek the education of any class in foreign languages, or in particular creeds or faiths; but fully believing with the author of the Declaration of Independence, that even error may be safely tolerated, where reason is left to combat it; and therefore indulging no apprehensions from the influence of any language or creed among an enlighted people, I desire the education of the entire rising generation in all the elements we possess, and in that tongue which is the universal language of our countrymen. To me the most interesting of all our republican institutions, is the Common School. I seek not to disturb, in any manner, its peaceful and assiduous exercises, and least of all, with contentions about faith or forms. I desire the education of all the children in the commonwealth in morality and virtue, leaving matters of conscience where, according to the principles of civil and religious liberty established by our Constitution and laws, they rightfully belong.

The report of the Comptroller shewed that the debt which had been contracted for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals was virtually paid, that the liabilities for the completed lateral canals were about three and a half millions of dollars, which, if added to the existing debt, would have made an aggregate of about twenty millions, the annual interest of which would be one million. The tolls of the Erie and Champlain canals after deducting the expenses of collection, had increased from $839,925; in 1826, to $1,501,384 in 1836, and although the tolls were diminished during the commercial revulsion of 1837 and 1838, yet their future increase could not be a matter of question, and it was equally certain that they would be accelerated and augmented by the growth of the trade from the Western States, and by the reduction of the expense of navigating the Erie canal when it should be enlarged. The Canal Commissioners communicated to the Legislature their opinion, that in a few years after the completion of the enlargement, the tolls would amount to three millions of dollars. If from this sum even one million of dollars were to be allowed for the expense of superintendence and repairs, the enlarged Erie canal would yield a revenue of two millions of dollars, double the amount required to pay the interest on the debt of twenty millions of dollars. The annual nett revenue of the State, after the completion of the enlargement, would therefore be one million of dollars. The view thus taken in 1839, of the existing and anticipated condition of the State, was regarded by me as justifying the vigorous prosecution of the public works, and the expression of a confident hope, that the time had come when the State might realize the long cherished expectation of an extension of her system of internal improvements. Experience has fully confirmed the positions then assumed, so far as they depend on the revenue from the canals. The tolls, during the season of navigation in 1840, were $1,775,747 57.

* * * * * *

The eastern section of the Erie canal has, during the last season, been subjected to a test of its ability. From the opening to the close of navigation, a period of seven months and a half, there was an average lockage at each lock of one boat in eleven minutes. The irregular arrival of the boats has caused much detention and often delays of several days. The immediate enlargement, therefore, of this portion of the canal, is indispensable to the public convenience, and to the security of trade. 1,805,135 barrels of flour, and 1,395,195 bushels of wheat were delivered at the eastern termination of the canal during the past season. 646,970 barrels of flour, and 1,467,904 bushels of wheat entered the canal from lake Erie. Of the flour and wheat which entered the canal at Buffalo, 525,262 barrels of flour, and 725,025 bushels of wheat were received from the State of Ohio, 112,215 barrels of flour, and 97,249 bushels of wheat from the State of Michigan; 13,726 barrels of flour, and 48,279 bushels of wheat from the State of Indiana; 2,259 barrels of flour, and 10,634 bushels of wheat from the State of Illinois, and 166 barrels of flour from the Territory of Wisconsin.

* * * * * * *

The amount of the revenues from the public lands for the present year, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, will be three and a half million of dollars, of which the share of this State would be nearly six hundred thousand dollars. An imperfect idea of the rapid settlement of the public lands may be conceived from the fact, that the population of the State of Indiana has increased, within the last ten years, from 341,000 to 683,000, and that of the State of Michigan, from 31,000 to 211,000. What the actual value of our share of such a distribution would be, cannot be estimated, but it may safely be assumed that it would far exceed all we have expended in the construction of canals and roads, the foundation of charities, the erection of penitentiaries, and the endowment of colleges, academies and schools. After such an accession to our revenues, the various enterprises of internal improvement would no longer be rivals, prosecuted against the influence of local jealousies and alarms of taxation. The present generation would anticipate the blessings in store for posterity, and every portion of the State would be admitted immediately to their enjoyment. It will be in our power, not only to extend our system of improvement but also to increase in various other ways the general happiness. We are now obliged to practice a cold and calculating charity. We have more than twenty-three hundred lunatics in the State, yet we have made provision for the relief of only two hundred and fifty. We have more than a thousand deaf and dumb persons, yet we are obliged to select by favor from among them, instead of pouring the lights of truth and knowledge into the minds of all. Our alms-houses are perhaps sufficiently convenient for those who are brought into them by idleness and vice, but do they afford all the enjoyments we would be happy to yield to the aged, the sick, the widow and the orphan, whose afflictions are the result of providential visitation, unattended by vice or error of their own? Should we longer contend about the apportionment of moneys devoted to education, if our funds were ample for the full endowment of all our seminaries of learning? Would there not be an end to the great fault of our common schools, the small compensation paid to teachers, if we could adequately increase the Common School Fund, upon which we rely for the education of more than a half a million of children? But if it be maintained that enough has been done for the relief of wretchedness and the improvement of the foundations of prosperity and union, what reason can be assigned why, with the revenues in question, acknowledged to be the property of the people, the burthens of the people should not be diminished? Let us bring annually into the Treasury of the State, her proportion of these revenues, and our fellow-citizens can be relieved of the burthens of repairing common roads, and of paying tolls upon canals, rail-roads, and turnpikes, and from the heavy expenses of the administration of justice and the support of schools and charities. We are sometimes called by the adversaries of internal improvement to contemplate a condition of exhausting taxation. Who can object to a measure which would almost secure a general exemption from the burthens of government.

But we shall derive from a distribution of the surplus revenues, other advantages than those resulting directly. We are to participate largely in the benefits conferred upon other States. Our system of internal improvement is only a part of that entire system, contemplated by the Father of our country, and relied upon by him to accomplish the object of his earnest solicitude—the binding of the States together in an indissoluble union of affection and interest. Not to dwell upon the importance of thus securing the ark of our political safety against the storms to which it must sooner or later be exposed, we have interests of a subordinate character, in the completion of the public works of our sister States. If such a distribution should be made, we should be able, if we are not now, to connect the Chenango, the Chemung, and the Genesee Valley canals with the rail-roads and canals of Pennsylvania; render them productive of revenue, and at the same time giving a new impulse to our domestic trade. Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river would no longer be separated from the central valley through which our commerce flows, but the vast territory which intervenes would be traversed by rail-roads and canals, its forests would disappear, its soil would be rendered productive, and its mineral wealth will no longer be left among the neglected resources of the State. Ohio proceeds in her system slowly. Michigan labors under great difficulties, in her efforts to construct roads that will establish a connection between her inland regions and lake Erie. Indiana and Illinois are struggling with extreme embarrassment in the prosecution of works upon a scale of equal magnitude with our own. It is not surprising that the financial difficulties of those States are magnified, and their credit traduced in the stock markets of Europe. But it is strange, indeed, when we reflect that there are members of this confederacy, parts seeking closer union with the great whole, that they should be visited with the censure of the Federal Government, in a season of embarrassment and that the Senate of the United States should, in the face of the world, gratuitously refuse to grant in their behalf, a guarantee which they have never solicited and never desired. One might suppose, from the cold speculations, sometimes heard among ourselves concerning the improvidence of those States, that they were hostile or at least rival powers, and that our security and prosperity rose with the decline of theirs. Yet it is far otherwise.—They are communities bound to us by interest, as well as by consanguinity between their citizens and our own; their prosperity is our prosperity, and no calamity falls upon them by which we do not suffer, although we may withhold our sympathy.—The great lakes, about twenty-five hundred miles in length, may be regarded as a prolongation of the canal we have made across the isthmus, which separates their waters from those of the Atlantic. Following the policy which has dictated the construction of our lateral canals, the States situated upon the shores of those lakes, have severally undertaken the construction of improvements, to connect their interior regions with those inland seas. The Ohio canal, three hundred and twenty miles in length, reaching from Lake Erie to the great river which separates the States of Ohio and Kentucky, secures to us the trade of the nearer regions of the great west. The trade of the central portions of the west will be given to us by two other improvements, to wit: the Wabash and Erie canal, two hundred and thirty-four miles in length, extending from Lake Erie through the States of Ohio and Indiana to the navigable waters of the Wabash river; and the Miami canal, two hundred and ten miles in length, reaching from the lake to the north bend of the Ohio river, and connecting with the Wabash canal at Fort Defiance. The canal of Illinois will extend to the Mississippi the navigation we now enjoy, and thus bring to us the trade of the remotest western settlements. Of these canals, the Ohio is already completed. That portion of the Wabash and Erie canal, one hundred and forty-four miles long, lying within the State of Indiana, is finished, and the remaining portion, ninety miles in length, which lies within the State of Ohio, is yet incomplete, but the late Governor of that State, in his last message, gave the assurance that it would be ready for navigation during the present year. Of the Miami canal, nearly the whole is under contract, and more than one hundred miles have been completed.—Of the Illinois canal, which will cost about eight millions of dollars, about one-half is finished, and the construction of the remainder, unhappily retarded by financial embarrassment, might be hastened by the aid which the State of Illinois has a right to claim from the General Government, or by a speedy distribution of the public lands. When we consider the vast amount and value of the agricultural productions received from the Ohio canal alone, the only one of those canals yet in full operation, we may form some imperfect conception of the interest we have in the success of the system of internal improvement in the Western States. And when such conceptions become as familiar as they are just, we shall manifest more of wisdom than even of philanthropy, by lending our western brethren all the aid in our power, to complete what none but free and enlightened States could ever have undertaken. Views similar to these were commended to your predecessors and received their approval. If they accord with your own, I respectfully suggest the propriety of renewing the expression heretofore made in favor of the great measure I have advocated.

VILLAGE LECTURES.

Rev. A. Campbell will deliver the Lecture at the village School House, this evening, (15th.)

TOO LATE.

This language gives rise to the most serious reflections. Few, if any, are so fortunate as to escape them. The aged sinner sinking under the load of his sins, has his anguish immeasurably increased by the reflection that his day of grace is past, and that it is now too late to amend his ways and sue for pardon. The Infidel who has denied God, finds, when the visions of the eternal worlds are bursting upon him, that it is too late to prepare to meet that God, whose existence and attributes he has denied. The drunkard, and debauchee, sinking under loathsome and terrific disease, produced by a violation of nature's laws, lament, with inexpressible anguish, that it is too late to escape a just retribution of their sins. The murderer, just launching into eternity, feels that it is too late to retrieve the wrong he has inflicted, and secure his own life. The convict, incarcerated in a prison's gloomy cells, mourns because it is too late for him to escape the rigor of equitable laws. These, and other classes innumerable, have their peace destroyed in reflecting that it is now too late to escape the reward of their doings. How does the condemned malefactor vainly sigh for the hour, unstained with guilt, which he once enjoyed? How does the soul, strong with immortal vigor, yet wishing to die, remember, with keen remorse, instruction slighted, a Savior neglected, a Holy Spirit grieved, and hope perished for ever? The Scriptures inform us that a prolific source of wretchedness to lost spirits, will be the remembrance that they had a day of grace, and prized it not, and it is now too late for one ray of hope to dawn, or one drop of water to be given to cool the parched tongue. The chief cause that leads to the gloomy reflection it is too late, is, that when there was time to do right, the conscience was stilled with the plea it is TOO EARLY.

He, who died an aged sinner, said to the Holy Spirit and the servants of God when reproving of sin, go thy way for this time, it is yet too early for me to leave my sinful pleasures. The Infidel, when every thing around spake of a God, said within himself it is too early to indulge such serious thoughts, I must have more time for sensual indulgence. The drunkard, and debauchee, when warned of the error of their ways, have plead there is time enough yet, but it is now too early for me to leave that in which my passions delight. And so have plead the murderer, the robber, the swearer, the liar, the hypocrite, and the wicked of every character and name. The only certain way to escape a just retribution for any, or all of the sins that have their origin in the human heart, is to attend to the voice of conscience—of the Holy Spirit, and of God, which says, behold

NOW

Is the accepted time—behold now is the day of salvation. Conscience reproves for that which the Judgment declares to be wrong. The Holy Spirit reproves for what God declares to be wrong. And God reproves in his word and providences, for that which in the nature and fitness of things is wrong. These say to the sinner now is the time for repentance, now "amend your ways." They say to the Infidel, now is the time to learn the character of God & to prepare to meet him. They say to the drunkard, and debauchee, now is the time to regard your own safety and attend to virtuous and holy principles. To those who are about to invade another's rights, or trample on the law of God, they say, now is the time to do right, and secure your peace by rendering unto God and all men, that which is their due.

It can never be too early to seek God—to do right—repent of sins—love and practice virtue; but it may at some time be too late. Therefore, conscience, the Holy Spirit, and God declares that now is the time.

Young persons are, most of all, accustomtomed to make this plea, it is too early to become a disciple of Christ and forsake innocent amusements or lawful business.—Years of pleasure are in reversion for me, it is surely too early to become a Christian. So have said myriads of youth, who, by their neglect, now find that it is too late, and with one of their number exclaim, "The battle's fought! The battle's fought!! THE BATTLE'S FOUGHT!!! but the victory is lost forever."

Christians sometimes think or say it is too early to attend to certain duties required of them by God. Happy will it be for them if they do not defer till it is too late. God bids us work now in his vineyard, when the night of death comes it will be too late. "Whatever thy hands find to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." Sinners now associate with us. They are treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath, and are fast filling up the measure of their iniquity. Soon it may be too late to do them any good.—But now is an accepted time. We can not too early point them to "the Lamb of God" who now taketh away the sin of the world, but will, when it is too late for repentance, judge men for the deeds done in the body.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

Those who patronize this school, we are sure, will have no cause to regret it. Ample facilities are presented for the acquisition of useful knowledge. Notwithstanding it is under the direction of Seventh-day Baptists, it presents equal advantages to those observing the first-day as a Sabbath. There is nothing in its internal arrangements of a sectarian character. Those wishing to observe the first-day of the week, can be accommodated with board in families who religiously observe that day, and can enjoy their sentiments here as well as elsewhere. Should any of our readers wish to avail themselves of the advantages of this school, and board in families observing the first-day, they can, by addressing a line, free of postage, to Rev. J. R. Johnson, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church, obtain any information they may desire.

Governor's Message.—We insert in this week's paper an abstract of the Governor's Message. Its length prevents its entire insertion. That part which is of most interest to our readers is here presented. We expect that those who are desirous of seeing the Message entire, will pardon us for presenting an abstract, and those who have no interest at all, for what we have given.

The irregularity of the mails may cause some inconvenience to our subscribers. We hope we shall not be blamed if papers are not regularly received, as we invariably mail the paper before the day of publication.

The Youth's Cabinet.—The first number of the IV. volume has come to our table. It is published weekly, at No. 9, Spruce street, New York, and 25, Corn Hill, Boston, and edited by N. Southard, who is also editor of the Sabbath School Monitor. We know of no work better calculated to make right impressions on youthful minds. We most cordially welcome it to our list of exchanges, and recommend it to those who wish an assistant in the culture of the rising generation. One dollar in advance, free of postage, will secure it for one year.

Legislature of New York.—This body assembled in the Capitol on the first Tuesday instant. Peter B. Porter, Jr., of Niagara, was elected Speaker, and Philander B. Prindle was appointed Clerk. In our news department we shall give a synopsis of the proceedings of this body.

Fire.—The Meeting-House of the Congregational church at Summerhill, Cayuga Co., was burned to ashes on the morning of the 14th inst. The fire is supposed to have originated from some ashes that were taken out of the stove.

Christian Investigator, is the title of a quarto sheet published at Whitesboro', N. Y., by Wm. Goodell. The reputation of Mr. Goodell, the Editor, is a sufficient recommendation for the paper. It will be published as long as the contributions of its friends last. Those wishing the paper can have it by contributing for its support.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CIRCULAR.—TO THE CHRISTIAN PUBLIC.

Feeling that in order to convince mankind of the real worth of the Sabbath institution and observance, there should be unity of action by all the friends of the Sabbath, and that such unity of action should be qualified with the command of God, and be based on "the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." The writer will here propose such a stand according to the best of his judgment, humbly and earnestly praying any christian friend to correct any mistake through the medium of the Register.

1. "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath." Mark ii. 27, 28. The first seventh-day was blessed and sanctified, and made a Sabbath for man, for all mankind, before man had sinned. Therefore, the Son of man is Lord also of this same seventh-day Sabbath which was made for man, teaching us that this is "also" an institution of his kingdom.

2. "The seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Exo. xx. 10. It is a part of the royal law of God which cannot be altered, changed, nor pass away, not "one jot or tittle of it, till heaven and earth pass away." Matt. v. 17, 18, 19. Luke xvi. 17. Ps. cxi. 7, 8. Rom. viii. 4. Rev. xiv. 12.

3. This Sabbath is mentioned some fifty-five times in the New Testament. Matt. xii 1 to 12, and xxiv. 20, and xxviii. 1. Mark i. 21, and ii. 23 to 28, and iii. 2, 4, and vi. 2, and xvi. 1. Luke iv. 16, 31, and vi. i to 9, and xiii. 10 to 16, and xiv. 1, 3, 5, and xxiii. 56. John v. 9 to 18, and vii. 22, 23, and ix. 14, 16. Acts i. 12, and xiii. 14, 42, 44, and xv. 21, and xvi. 13, and xvii. 2, and xviii. 4. Heb. iv. 4, showing that it was Christ's "custom," and Paul's "manner" to observe the seventh-day Sabbath; and that it was the practice of the followers of Christ to "rest the Sabbath-day according to the commandment," after Christ was crucified. Luke xiii. 56: that Jews and Gentiles, believers and unbelievers held their religious meetings for worship on the seventh-day. Acts xiii. 12, 44. And that so late as A. D. 53, Luke, the writer of the Acts of the Apostles, knew of no other "Sabbath" except the Seventh-day. Acts xviii. 4.

4. The first day of the week is mentioned, Matt. xxviii. 1. Mark xvi. 2, 9. Luke xxiv. 1. John xx. 1, 19. Acts xx. 7. Cor. xvi. 2, and in all these places the word "day" is in italics. And all these places show that "the first-day of the week" was not then "the Sabbath day"; but that the first-day of the week was always understood to mean the very next day after the Sabbath, as Matt. xxviii. 1.

The places quoted by many to prove the first-day of the week to be "the Sabbath day" after the resurrection of Christ, are, John xx. 19. But here the disciples "were assembled in the evening for fear of the Jews," and not to celebrate a new Sabbath. Again, they quote verse 26, "And after eight days again the disciples were within," &c. But the day of the week is not mentioned in this place, it must have been about the second day of the next week at evening. Again, they quote Acts xx. 7, where the "disciples came together" in the evening after the Sabbath "to break bread," (verse 8 shows this to be an evening meeting, and not intended as a "Sabbath" meeting for preaching and worship, as Acts xiii. 42, 44.) This evening meeting where "there were many lights in the upper chamber," then, is no proof of a new Sabbath day! Again, they quote 1 Cor. xvi. 2, "Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him." But Paul did not tell these brethren to do this individual business on "the Sabbath day," but as the very first business of the week; no meeting, no congregation, no new Sabbath here mentioned! Again, they quote Rev. i. 10. "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." But no where is the first-day of the week called "the Lord's day" in scripture. But the seventh-day is called the Lord's day. Isa. lviii. 13. Mark ii. 28. Luke vi. 5. But many believe John had reference to being in visions on the Lord's day, that is, on the "great day of the Lord"—the great day of events which was then revealed to John.—Again, they quote Psalm cxviii. 24. But this is the day of Christ, the day of salvation. "Have they not spun a fair thread," (says a Roman Catholic writer,) "in quoting these scriptures to prove Divine authority for the change of the Sabbath? Could we produce no better to prove purgatory and prayers for the dead, they might have good reason to laugh us to scorn!"—[The Catholics urge the change of the Sabbath as an act of their church.] There is, then, no authority, no precept, nor example in the New Testament for calling the first-day of the week the Sabbath, or Lord's day. But if the words, "The Sabbath day"—"The next Sabbath day," and "every Sabbath," meant the seventh-day when the Acts of the Apostles were written, then, the same words mean the same thing now; the Man of sin, the Mystery of iniquity, the great changer "of times and laws," (Dan. 7th ch.) to the contrary notwithstanding. Neither will the example of Christ, in traveling with two men seven and a half miles to Emmaus and back to Jerusalem, making fifteen miles, prove that first-day after his resurrection to be intended as a christian Sabbath, or rest-day! Luke xxiv. 13, 15.

5. Christ our Lord was crucified "the midst of the week," the fourth-day of the week "about the ninth hour," (three o'clock in the afternoon,) and the same day "at even," as the "high Sabbath" of the Jews (the fifth-day of the week,) "drew on," "Joseph and Nicodemus took the body of Jesus" and laid it in "a new sepulchre," "because of the Jews preparation day," for the "high Sabbath" or feast day was to be held on the next day, the fifth-day of the week. And Jesus was to be precisely "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," as a sign that he was the true Messiah. Matt. xii 40. Jonah i. 17. John ii. 19, 21. Mark viii. 31. So that he must rise the seventh-day of the week "at even," just the same time of day that he was interred on the fourth-day. Thus, Christ our Lord was risen before the end of the seventh-day Sabbath. Matt. xxviii. 1, 6. But to say, as many do, that Christ was crucified on the sixth-day, (called Friday,) and that he rose first-day morning, is to contradict the scriptures and the true "sign" of his Messiahship, which he repeatedly gave to the Jews! To say that he arose the first-day morning, we will count back to seventh-day morning, is one day and one night; and still back to sixth-day morning, is two days and two nights; and still back to fifth-day morning, is three days and three nights.—But the reader cannot believe that Jesus was laid in the new tomb in the morning of any day. Where it is objected, that Mark has said, Mark xvi. 9. "Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week," &c., I answer, that this scripture, nor no other scripture says that Christ arose on the first-day of the week. But that he "was risen" early, &c., in the past tense. He "was risen" even before "the end of the Sabbath." Matt. xxviii. 1. But even if he had risen on the first-day of the week, that could not have altered or changed the Sabbath of the seventh-day, which was to be kept so long as there should remain an Isrælite on this earth. Exo. xxxi. 13 to 18.

6. That the seventh-day was regarded as the Sabbath for several hundred years after Christ, we may see, by comparing Acts xiii. 42, 44, and xvi. 13, and xvii. 2, and xviii. 4. Millman's History of the Jews, vol. iii. Page 193. Socrates' Ecclesiastical History, Book v. ch. 21. Eusebius Life of Constantine, Book iv. ch. 17, 18, 23.—H. Dan. vii. 25, and viii. 12. 2 Timothy, iv. 3, 4.

7. "By the law is the knowledge of sin." Rom. iii. 20. "Sin is the transgression of the law." 1 John iii. 4. "For He that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now, if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law." James ii. 11. Also, He that said, Do not kill, said also, "The seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Now, if thou do not kill, yet if thou do not keep the seventh-day Sabbath, thou art become a transgressor of the law. "The law of God is spiritual," "the law is holy, the commandment is holy, and just, and good." And if those who have had the law "shall be judged by the law" "in the day of Judgment," Rom. ii. 12, 16. James ii. 12. John xii. 48, then, What does the law of God know concerning keeping any other day of the week for the Sabbath, besides "the seventh," which God commanded, blessed and sanctified? The answer is given, Mark vii. 7, 8. Matt. xv. 6, 9.—"Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition."—"But in vain do they worship me teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

If, then, "By the law is the knowledge of sin," and if "sin is the transgression of the law," and if he that offends in one point, or in one command, "is guilty of all," and if we know by the law that it is sin, and a transgression of the holy law of God for a Roman Catholic christian to bow down to images; we know, also, by the same law that it is sin and a transgression of the holy law of God for a Protestant christian to disregard "the seventh-day Sabbath," which "was made for man," whether he kept any other day or not.

Editors, who with Paul "delight in the law of God after the inward man," without any alteration, are respectfully requested to give the above circular a place in their papers, with such corrections as truth may require, and much oblige a humble friend to union on the basis of the truth.

BENJAMIN CLARK.

Alden, Erie Co., N. Y., 1 mo., A. D. 1841.

Melville to his Brother William:

DEAR BROTHER.—When I wrote you a few days since, I neglected one item of importance. You are desired to notice the arguments which some derive from scripture in favor of dancing. Reliance is placed on passages like the following: "A time to dance," "Praise Him in the dance," &c. I thought I would add this suggestion, lest this point might escape your notice. Your affectionate brother,

MELVILLE.

For the Register

Uncle William to his Brother Melville:

DEAR BROTHER.—Your first note to me in which you propose important questions, shall receive my attention as soon as consistent. I thank you for reminding me of the responsibilities which will rest upon me, when I shall take up my pen to express my views of those topics. Your last note, relating to what some suppose to be the scriptural argument in favor of dancing as an amusement, cannot receive a more direct reply than the one which you will find in the pamphlet which I send you, viz:—"Christian Spectator, Vol. 1, No. 4, April, 1819.

That "Pastor," at the time of writing the appropos answer to the note which he received, was located at Litchfield, Ct.—was afterwards set for the defence of the Gospel in the city of Boston, and is now President of the Lane Seminary, near the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. Having said so much, I may as well add that the author is REV. LYMAN BEECHER, D. D.

As you circulate the pamphlet among your friends, you may also present this, my note, disclosing the authorship; if the Dr. finds any fault with us for making such free use of his name, I will adjust that matter with him, for we are in good terms.

Your affectionate brother,

WILLIAM.

[The pamphlet referred to in the above communication has been handed to us by Melville, from which we extract the article alluded to.—EDS.]

From the Christian Spectator.

SIR,—The subjoined note, was received soon after a ball, which occurred during a season of peculiar seriousness among the youth of my charge; and upon which a number of those who were invited declined attendance, as was then supposed, (though erroneously,) through the influence and interference of their Pastor.

NOTE.—"SIR,—Obey the voice of holy scripture. Take the following for your text, and contradict it. Show in what consists the evil of that innocent amusement of dancing."

"Ecc. iii. 4. A time to weep, and a time to laugh—a time to mourn and a time to dance.

"A TRUE CHRISTIAN BUT NO HYPOCRITE."

To this note, I immediately wrote the following answer; which, as the note was anonymous, has remained in my possession to the present time. Should it find a place in your publication, it may possibly meet the eye, and correct the opinions of the writer of the note.

PASTOR.

MY DEAR SIR,—You request that I would preach from Ecc. iii. 4, I cannot comply with at present; since there are some christian duties more important than dancing, which a part of my people seem disposed to neglect. Whenever I perceive, however, that the duty of dancing is too much neglected, I shall not fail to raise a warning voice against so dangerous an omission. In the meantime, there are certain difficulties in the text, which you commend to my notice, the solution of which I should receive with gratitude from a "True Christian."

My first difficulty respects the time for dancing, for although the text declares that there is a time to dance, yet when that time is, it does not determine. Now this point I wish to ascertain exactly, before I preach upon the subject; for it would be as criminal, I conclude, to dance at the wrong time, as to neglect to dance at the right time. I have been able to satisfy myself, in some particulars, when it is not "a time to dance." We shall agree, I presume, that on the Sabbath day, or at a funeral, or during the prevalence of a pestilence, or the rocking of an earthquake, or the roaring of a thunderstorm, it would be no time to dance. If we were condemned to die, and were waiting in prison the day of execution,—this would be no time for dancing; or if our feet stood on a slippery place beside a precipice, we should not dare to dance.

But suppose the very day to be ascertained; is the whole day or only a part, to be devoted to this amusement; and if a part of the day only, then which part, is "the time to dance?" From the notoriously pernicious effects of "night meetings," in all ages, both upon morals and health, no one will pretend that the evening is the 'time to dance;' and perhaps it may be immaterial, which portion of the day light is devoted to that innocent amusement. But allowing the time to be ascertained, there is still an obscurity in the text. Is it a command to dance, or only a permission? Or is it merely a declaration of the fact, that as men are constituted, there is a time when all the events alluded to in the text, do in the Providence of God come to pass? If the text be a command, is it of universal obligation; and must "old men and maidens, young men and children," dance obedience? If a permission, does it imply a permission also, to refrain from dancing, if any are dispoed? Or if the text be merely a declaration, that there is a time when men do dance, as there is a time when they die, then I might as well be requested to take the first eight verses of the chapter, and show in what consists the evil of those innocent practices of hating, and making war, and killing men; for which it seems, there is "a time," as well as for dancing.

There is still another difficulty in the text, which just now occurs to me. What kind of dancing does the text intend? for it is certainly a matter of no small consequence to a true christan, to dance in a scriptural manner, as well as at the scriptural time.

Now to avoid mistakes on a point of such importance, I have consulted every passage in the bible which speaks of dancing; the most important of which, permit me to submit to your inspection.

Ex. xv. 20.—"And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and with dances." This was on account of the overthrow of the Egyptians in the Red Sea. Judges xi. 34. The daughter of Jepthah,, "came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances." This also was on account of a victory over the enemies of Israel. Judges xxi. 21.—The yearly feast in Shiloh, was a feast unto the Lord, in which the daughters of Shiloh went forth in dances. This was done as an act of worship.

II. Sam. vi. 14 and 20.—"And David danced before the Lord with all his might."—But the irreligous Michal "came out to meet David and said, how glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncoverd himself to-day, in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovered himself." Dancing, it seems, was a sacred rite and usually performed by women. At that day, it was perverted from its sacred use, by none but vain fellows, destitute of shame. David vindicates himself from her irony by saying, "it was before the Lord;" admitting that had this not been the case, her rebuke would have been merited.

I. Sam. xviii. 6.—On account of the victory of Saul and David over the Philistines, "the women came out of all the cities of Israel singing and dancing."

Ps. cxlix. 3.—"Let them praise his name in the dance." Ps. xxx. 11.—Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing." The deliverance here spoken of was a recovery from sickness; and the dancing, an expression of religious gratitude and joy.

Ex. xxxii. 19.—"As soon as he came nigh unto the camp, he saw the calf and the dancing." From this it appears, that dancing, also, was a part of idol worship."

Jer. xxxi. 4.—"Oh virgin of Israel, thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and go forth in the dances of them that make merry." This passage predicts the return from captivity, and the restoration of the divine favor, with the consequent expression of religious joy.

Math. xi. 17.—We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented." That is, neither the judgments nor the mercies of God, produce any effect upon this incorrigible generation. They neither mourn when called to mourning by his providence, nor rejoice with the usual tokens of religious joy, when his mercies demand their gratitude.

Luke xv. 25.—"Now his elder son was in the field; and as he came, and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing." The return of the Prodigal, was a joyful event, for which the grateful father, according to the usages of the Jewish church, and the exhortation of the Psalmist, "praised the Lord in the dance."

Eccls. iii. 4.—"A time to monrn and a time to dance." Since the Jewish church knew nothing of dancing, except as a religious ceremony, or as an expression of gratitude and praise, the text is a declaration that the Providence of God, sometimes demands mourning, and sometimes gladness and gratitude.

Math. xiv. 6.—"But when Herod's birthday was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod." In this case, dancing was perverted from its original object, to purposes of vanity and ostentation.

Job. xxi. 7.—"Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea are mighty in power." Verse 11. "They send for their little ones, like a flock, and their children dance. They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave. Therefore they say unto God depart from us for we desire not the knowldge of thy ways.—What is the Almighty, that we should serve him, and what profit shall we have if we pray unto him." Their wealth and dancing, is assigned as the reason of their saying unto God, "depart from us," and of their not desiring the knowledge of his ways, and in serving him or praying to him.

From the preceding quotations, it will sufficiently appear:—

1. That dancing was a religious act, both of the true and also of Idol worship.
2. That it was practiced exclusively on joyful occasions, such as national festivals or great victories.
3. That it was performed by maidens only.
4. That it was performed usually in the day time, in the open air, in high-ways, fields or groves.
5. That men who perverted dancing from a sacred use, to purposes of amusement, were deemed infamous.
6. That no instances of dancing, are found upon record in the bible, in which the sexes united in the exercise, either as an act of worship or amusement.
7. That there is no instance upon record, of social dancing for amusement, except that of the "vain fellows," devoid of shame; of the irreligious families described by Job; which produced increased impiety, and ended in destruction; and of Herodias, which terminated in the rash vow of Herod, and the murder of John the Baptist.

I congratulate you, sir, on the assured hope which you seem to have attained, that you are a "true christian," and on the meekness and modesty, with which you have been able to express it; and most sincerely do I join with you in the condemnation of all hypocrites.

I am affectionately yours.

Medicines! Medicines!!

TO FAMILIES.

S. D. DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public; for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

G. A. BARTHOLICK & Co's

MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser, and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an infinite amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given away to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

POETRY.

From the Churchman.

"HO EVERY ONE THAT THIRSTETH, COME YE TO THE WATERS."

Ho, every one that thirsteth:
See ye where the waters flow,
Gleaming, gleaming, O how brightly!
In the blessed sunshine's glow?
Not a ripple swells their surface,
Not a stain dark earth hath given,
Not an image meets their pureness,
Save the boundless vault of heaven.

Ho, every one that thirsteth:
Taste ye of the living wave—
Why delay ye, when 'tis proffered
To the monarch and the slave?
Not the needy or the lowly
Shall the waters make to blench—
Not the proudest or the noblest
Here may fail their thirst to quench.

Ho, every one that thirsteth:
Would ye now for ever live—
Would ye know the priceless blessing,
That your Lord alone can give—
Here behold his bright stream flowing—
Taste its waters sweet and clear—
They will quench the spirit's yearning,
They will hush each earthly fear.

Ho, every one that thirsteth:
Though no price your hands may hold,
Sure the draught of God, salvation,
Is not bought with worthless gold:
It is given fully, freely—
Yea, 'tis urged on ye to drink—
Why will ye refuse the favor!
Why your hearts within ye shrink?

Ho, every one that thirsteth:
Would ye never thirst again?
Would ye never feel the torment
Of eternal years of pain?
O then haste ye, where the waters
In their fadeless beauty flow—
There, partaking of their freshness,
God shall free you from your wo.

Ho, every one that thirsteth:
Hear ye not your Savior call?
See ye not those choicest treasures
Which he proffers now to all?
O then hasten to the waters—
Drink ye, drink ye, ere you die:
Drink ye, and ye shall be gifted,
With an endless life on high.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MAKING AUGER HOLES WITH A GIMBLET.

There is a fund of good sense in the following sketch, we copy from one of our country exchanges, where it appears as a selection, but without credit,—it reads very much like the pen work of a city friend, whose 'Hole in my pocket,' and other kindred teaching, have conveyed lessons of true wisdom, to thousands of persons in all parts of the country within the past five years. We had him among our correspondents during last winter, and now that the election excitement is over, we should be pleased to make our colums the vehicle of his communications to the popular mind.—Cincinnati Gazette.

'My boy, what are you doing there with that gimblet?' said I the other morning to a flaxen haired urchin, who was laboring away with all his might, at a piece of board before him.

'Trying to make auger holes?' was his reply, without raising his eyes, or suspending operation.

'Precisely the business of two thirds of the world, in this blessed year of our Lord, 1840; is this making auger holes with gimblets;' said I to myself as I walked musingly onward.

Here is young A. who has just escaped from the clerk's desk behind the counter. He sports his mustuches, wears his hair long, has acquired the power of being shaved; carries a rattan, drinks champaign when he can command an X to purchase a bottle, and treat a friend to a dinner; talks large of the price current, fall of western stocks, and profits of banking, stands in his boots two inches taller than Astor or Appleton, and speaks of foreign exchanges as Rothschild or Biddle. He thinks he is a great man, when all others know he is only making auger holes with a gimblet.

M. B. is a rabid politican. He labored hard at caucusses, at town and ward meetings, has talked of the dear people till the words flow parrot like from his lips; and has done a full share of dirty work of the party for years.

Office has been the lure held out to lead him onwards, and which has made him neglect his business, spend his time in hunting up recruits, drilling the refractory, and qualifying himself for bar room and stump oratory. He can settle the affairs of a nation in a trice; diplomacy has no intricacies for him: he has shaken hands with the President, and is a great man. He will soon be used up, and cast aside; and will then see, as others now do, that he is chasing a jack o'lanthorn, that he is making auger holes with a gimblet.

There is Miss C., who is really a pretty girl, and who might become a woman, a man of sense would be proud of. Now she apes the ton in all things; reads exciting novels, goes to the opera, admires Celest's dancing; has nearly ceased to blush at the most incident nudity; lounges on sofas, glories in her idleness, keeps her bed till noon, coquettes with male animals, as feminine as herself; imagines she is a belle, and forgets that her father was a cooper, lisps of high life, and plebian presumption, and is in a fair way to ruin herself. All this comes of her belief that an auger hole can be made by a gimblet.

Mr. D. whom I have just passed may be put down as a distinguished professor of the gimblet. He was a farmer. His father had left him a fine farm free of incumbrance; but speculation becomes rife, fortunes were made in a twinkling, and D. fancied "one thing could be done as well as another." So he sold his farm, and bought wild lands in the prairies, corner lots in lithographed cities, and began to dream of wealth worthy of 'golden land.' Work he could not, it had suddenly become degrading. Who could think of tilling or being contented with a hundred acres of land, when thousands of acres in the broad west, were wanting for occupants or owners. D. was not the man to do it, and operated to the extent of his means. At last the land bubble broke, lithographed cities were discovered to be mere bogs; and prairie farms the basis of exhaustless wealth, worthless unless rendered productive by labor. But D's beautiful farm is gone, and as he is preparing on compulsion to become a pioneer in the west, he feels that it is difficult making auger holes with a gimblet.

Mr. E. is the representatives of quite a class. He has his attention awakened to the subject of religion, and obtained new views of its importance and his obligations. Believing what cannot be disputed, that love to God and good will to man, is the only true source of happiness, and feeling as every benevolent mind must, a desire for the welfare of his race, he fancied himself called upon to declare these truths to the world; and forsaking his lapstone his anvil or his plow, become without delay an expounder of the scriptures, a self-delegated instructor of mankind. He forgot that the age of miracles had ceased; and that ability to teach must now be acquired by the the slow but necessary process of human learning. He begins to have misgivings that he has mistaken his call and probably discover, when too late to rectify the error, that he has spent the half of his life in trying to make augur holes with a gimblet.

ORDINATION.

"I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel."—Ezekiel 3. 17.

High upon Zion's holy walls,
Thy place and portion hence will be;
It is Jehovah's voice that calls,
To gird thee with His panoply.

Sleep not upon thine honored post,
Wear thou an eagle's piercing eye,
Blow loud the trumpet 'mid the host,
To warn them that the host is nigh.

Unfurl the blood-stained banner free
To float above thee far and wide,
And let thy watchword ever be,
In good or ill, "Christ crucified."

Watch, for thou knows't not of the time
Thy Lord will come in mighty power;
Whether at day's unsullied primo,
At early dawn, or midnight hour.

Go forth undaunted; ever bear
A fearless heart when danger springs;
For, O remember, thou dost wear
The armor of the king of kings.

Fight the good fight, thy steady aim
Shall bid the vengeful foe despair;
Go forth in thy Redeemer's name,
And be thy weapons faith and prayer.

Go forth; fulfil the work begun,
Forsaking earth, and earth's renown;
Then rise from earth, thy duty done,
To wear the victor's deathless crown.

WEBSTER AND BROUGHAM.

The following paragraph is extracted from a late London publication, which is entitled "Portraits of Public Character."

"The first occasion on which I saw Mr. Webster was in the Court of Exchequer, three or four days after his arrival in town. He sat on the right hand of Mr. Baron Gurney; while Lord Brougham and the Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar—the latter a young man, not seemingly out of his teens, sat on his left. To see the greatest men of their day, the one the master spirit of the Old, the other of the New World, thus sitting so near each other, was a sight of no ordinary interest. Nothing could be more striking than the contrast which the personal appearance of the two illustrious individuals presented. The large broad countenance of the American seemed more ample when the eye took in at the same glance the narrow contracted face of the English peer. Lord Brougham's hair seemed more gray when seen in juxta-position with the almost jet black hair of Daniel Webster. While there was no hair on the forehead of the latter, the small, low forehead of the former was so overlapped with it, as almost to render it doubtful to those who knew no better, whether he had any forehead at all. The English ex-Lord Chancellor's small gray eyes appeared to dwindle into yet more diminished proportions when placed side by side with the large dark eyes of the Leader of the American bar. The tall, slender, bony frame of the Englishman, arrested the eye more readily, when witnessed at the same time as the full, middle-sized, broadbuilt figure of the American. While the dress of Mr. Webster was plainness itself, that of Lord Brougham had so much of positive dandyism about it, that a Parisian swell would have been proud to put his person into it. I have already described the apparel the former wore on the occasion. The noble and learned Lord patronized blue, tastefully made surtout, a white waiscoat, white trousers, white stockings, and thin shoes; on his breast was a handsome gold chain, while from his small clothes watch pocket there was suspended, by a smart looking riband, a cluster of massive gold seals. His appearance, altogether, with the exception of his grey hair, his complexionless face, and large features, was remarkably boyish-like. He reminded me of a youthful student at some country academy, "trimmed up" for the annual ball.—The severity of a Mr. Webster's countenance, the repose of his features, and the motionless position in which he sat, must have struck every one more forcibly from the perpetual smile which played on the face of his Lordship, the incessant and rapid movement of his muscles, and the infinitely diversified attitudes into which he put his body. He laughed, spoke and acted with his hands, feet and face, during the whole time he sat on the bench—his body thus exhibiting a singular sympathy with the known restlessness of his mind."

From the Youth's Cabinet.

WHAT IS POETRY?

Who can answer this question? The child who has just learnt to read, says, "I can." But when asked to give a definition of Poetry, he hesitates and stammers. No wonder; for critics and philosophers have tried, without satisfying themselves. The word Poet comes from the Greek poiesis, which signifies creation. This origin is significant of the true Poet's art. He puts life into every thing he describes.

"And as imagination bodies forth
The form of things unknown, the Poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

It is true, his creations must resemble nature. But he may select from the whole real world, all the objects which please his fancy, and present them in their loveliest forms, skillfully heightening their beauties, and concealing their defects. A true poet, in writing a dialoguo between a mother and her little son, puts the following language into the mouth of the child.

"I saw the glorious sun arise,
Behind a mountain gray,
And, as he travelled through the skies,
The darkness fled away;
And all around me was so bright,
I wished it would be always light."

What makes this Poetry? The simple elegance of the language, the perfect metre, and the smooth rhyme are not sufficient of themselves. The poetry was in the warm imagination of the writer, which gave color to the mountain, glory to the sun, and brightness to all visible objects. The poet was not content to say of the sun, 'It moved from the east towards the west.' That would be too dull and prosaic. He gives personality to the sun, and tells us HE traveled, as we spake of a man taking a journey, while the darkness, as if smitten with sudden terror, flies away, and hides from his face. This glowing language, being arranged in syllables which flow in regular numbers, becomes true poetry. The fact that it is expressed in the simple language of childhood is but another proof of the poet's skill. The perfection of art is, to conceal art. I first read this verse in childhood, a season when we are apt to fancy that all things are what they appear. It then seemed as if some had listened to a child's question, and written it down just as he said it. That was a great mistake. That verse may have cost hours of patient labor.

Here is another specimen of perfect poetry, appearing like the most natural prose.

"How long, sometimes, a day appears,
And weeks, how long are they;
Months move as slow as if years
Would never pass away.

Days, months and years must have an end,—
Eternity has one;
'Twill always have as much to spend
As when it first begun.

Great God, an infant cannot tell
How such a thing can be,
I only pray that I may dewll
That long, long time with thee.

The first line seems like the unstudied expression of a weary child. The three verses are truly poetic, notwithstanding their simplicity. The mind becomes enlarged in thinking of eternity, and is ready to join in the address to God, with solemnity and reverence, and without effort or constraint.

Rhyme is not essential to poetry. In a dramatic poem, called the Siege of Valencia," Mrs. Hemans introduces a mother whose sons must die, unless their father betrays the city to its enemies. In the bitterness of grief, she reproaches her husband with want of love to his sons, and says:

——————"There is none,
In all this cold and hollow world, no fount
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within
A mother's heart."

After some remarks on man's love, she exclaims:

——————"What, marvel! you ne'er made
Your breast the pillow of his infancy;
While to the fullness of your heart's glad heavings
His fair cheek rose and fell; and his bright hair
Waned softly to your breath! You ne'er smoothed
His couch, ne'er sung him to his rosy rest,
Caught his least whisper, when his voice from yours
Had learnt soft utterence, pressed your lip to his,
When fever parched it; hushed his wayward cries
With patient, vigilant, never wearied love.
No! These are woman's tasks.

Here is no rhyme, and the subject is,—not the revolutions of empires, the motions of suns and stars, or the length of eternity. It is,—the every-day duties and cares of mothers. Yet the language has ever been admired as genuine poetry.

But space fails, and we conclude with the best definition of poetry we can frame: It is the language of a lively imagination, smoothly flowing in regular numbers—sometimes in rhyme, but not always.

THE POLAR SEA.

It is certainly a reasonable curiosity that we should desire to penetrate every quartar of our globe. As human art increases, we shall undoubtedly be able to solve many unsettled questions and advance science and human comfort far beyond any point which has yet been reached.

The attention of the world has recently been called to the exertions of Wrangell, to explore the Polar Ocean in the service of Russia. He was employed four years on the Siberian coast, to rectify errors concerning the coast line, and to settle the question respecting a large country supposed to be situated north of New Siberia.—He proceded from St. Petersburg to the mouth of the river Kolyrna, where he spent one winter, and whence he started on the 22d of February, over the ice northward. He had nine sledges, drawn each by twelve dogs—an indispenible animal in these regions—by which be was able to travel on the ice from sixty to one hundred miles a day. The loading of each sledge, consisting chiefly of provision for dogs and men, was about nine hundred pounds. The thrilling incidents connected with these expeditions we cannot repeat. In doubling Cape Schelagskoi, they had to ascend icebergs ninety feet high, with great peril to the dogs. Their chief dangers were out in the sea, where the ice became thin, treacherous, and liable to be broken up by the winds. The second journey was wholly on the sea. It commenced on the 26th of March with twenty-two sledges and two hundred and forty dogs. They proceeded to the north about four hundred miles, and returned in about thirty six days. The third expedition was with five sledges and sixty dogs. They penetrated further than before, to lat. 72, and discovered no land, although they were allured with the prospect of it for several days. They were absent fifty-seven days, and traveled more than nine hundred miles.

The fourth attempt was made from Cape Schelaskoi, whence they traveled easterly thirty-five miles, and reached a small island, which they named Schalarow. They left this island on the 13th of March, proceeded northward, until on the 14th their course was impeded by rugged hummocks of ice, through which, and other obstructions, they worked their way, until they arrived at an immense break in the water, which was more than one hundred and fifty fathoms across. From a lofty ice hill, they saw the wide ocean, and as farther progress was impossible, they returned. Who does not wish that a noble steamboat could then and there have been ready to bear them triumphantly through those polar regions? The discovery of the northwest passage, and of the North pole itself, is rendered we think probable and certain to some future navigator, by the voyages both of Captain Parry and the explorations of Baron Van Wrangell.

The London Quarterly Review, on which we are dependent for these statements, urges the enterprise upon Great Britain. It is, indeed, a post of honor yet in reserve to be contested between the nations, first to lift the flag of possession on the Pole itself. To us, it appears an object worthy of American enterprise, and which we should not willingly suffer to pass into the hands of any other power.

What scenes may there be witnessed it is difficult to say. What inhabitants—and what climate. The Yankees should find out.—N. Y. Evangelist.

A Pyramid no Wonder.—Mr. McBriar, a Methodist missionary thus describes a visit to a pyramid:

"There are only two things which incite most travelers to ascend the pyramids: one is, to say that they had been there;—and another, to obtain a view of the country, which is certainly grand. But it was too much for my dizzy head to sustain: for though pretty good at climbing up a steep place, I can never look down from a great height without shuddering; so that my swimming brain was much at ease when we reached the bottom. I thought that I should make a better hand at scrambling through the interior of the pyramid. Disencumbering myself, therefore, of hat and coat, I crawled upon all fours through the aperature; the Arabs leading the way with lighted candles. It was suffocatingly hot; and we were sometimes obliged to crawl upon our bellies, and again to climb the rocks: for which trouble and fatigue, we were privileged with a sight of some bare stone chambers, one of them containing a sarcophagus like a bath. I was almost tempted to ask, "Is this all that is to be seen?" But remembering that it was antique, and was really the inside of a pyramid of Egypt, where every thing must necessarily be marvelous, I prudently held my tongue, and wondered like others; though my amazement was excited in trying to guess what others found here to wonder at. I never visited a natural cavern that was not a hundred times more worthy of being seen; and, if enthusiastic antiquarians will pardon me, the rail-road tunnel under the town of Liverpool, and much more the tunnel under the River Thames, are a thousand times more marvelous.

Oils and Essences.—Aromatic herbs, such as mint, peppermint, pennyroyal, sage, margendy, lavender, and rosemary, derive their effects from a volatile oil, which is obtained from them by distillation. These oils are very powerful medicines in small doses. Thus, for instance, the oil of peppermint in larger doses than two or three drops, would be unsafe. Oil of tanzy, over three drops, is also highly dangerous, and one or two tea-spoonfuls will inevitably destroy life. The same is true of other oils as a general remark.

Essences are nothing but the spirits of these oils, i. e. the oils dissolved in alcohol, and are comparatively safe. Thus the essence of peppermint may be taken in considerable quantities, (comparatively speaking,) without detriment, while the oil of peppermint would be only safe in doses of from one to three drops.

This distinction between oils and essences is worthy of being remembered, as many accidents may be prevented thereby.—Let it then be recollected that oils are dangerous, essences, comparative safe.

A Physician.

Hallo there! young man!! we mean that one clad in broadcloth and ruffles, who has just emerged from the bar-room, having swallowed his brandy and water, and who now appears with a Spanish cigar in his mouth, and is mounted on his swift trotting horse—hallo there! young man!! you are on the high-road to ruin, and will soon trot into disgrace. Rein back, dismount, lay off your broadcloth, cast away your cigar, abjure the cup, procure some mechanical or agricultural tools and go hard to work like an honest and useful man. In this way you may gain a wanting reputation, and place yourself in easy and respectable circumstances in due time.—Beacon Omnibus.

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

NO. XXXVI.

RECOVERY FROM BACKSLIDING.

The backsliding believer can only be distinguished from the final apostate by the fact of his recovery; at least, when Christians have slidden far back, no satisfactory evidence of the genuineness of their piety can be exhibited; nor can they have any which ought to satisfy their own minds.—In the course of pastoral visitation I once called upon a habitual drunkard, who had been a flaming professor. I asked him what he thought of his former exercises of religion. He said that he was confident that they were genuine; and expressed a strong confidence that the Lord would recover him from his backsliding state. Now here was the very spirit of Antinomianism. Whether he was ever recovered from his besetting sin, I cannot tell; but I rather think that he continued his intemperate habits until the very last. I have often remarked, how tenaciously the most profane and obstinate sinners will cleave to the hope of having been once converted, if they have ever been the subjects of religious impressions. One of the profanest men I ever heard speak, and one of the most outrageous drunkard, when on his death-bed to which he was brought by intemperance, when asked respecting his prospects beyond the grave, said, that when a very young man he had been among the Methodists, and thought that he was converted; and though he had lived in the most daring and open wickedness for more than twenty years since that time, yet he seemed to depend on those early exercises. Miserable delusion! But a drowning man will catch at a straw. An old sea-captain, whom I visited on his death-bed, seemed to be trusting to a similar delusion. He related to me certain religious exercises which he had when he first went to sea, but of which he had no return ever since, though half a century had elapsed. I have met with few persons who had neglected to cherish and improve early impressions, who were ever afterwards happily converted. They are generally given up to blindness of mind and hardness of heart. But some of these are sometimes brought in times of revival; or, at a late period, driven to the Gospel refuge, by severe affliction. The conviction of a Christian backslider is often more severe and overwhelming than when first awakened. When his eyes are opened to see the ingratitude and wicked rebellion of his conduct, he is ready to despair, and to give up all hope of being pardoned. He sinks into deep waters where the billows of divine displeasure roll over him; or he is like a prisoner, in a horrible pit, upon miry clay. All around him is dark and desolate, and he feels himself to be in a deplorably helpless condition. His own strivings seem to sink him deeper in the mire; but as his last and only resource he cries out of the depths unto God. As his case is urgent, he cries with unceasing importunity, and the Lord hears his voice of supplication, and brings him up out of the horrible pit, and places his feet upon a rock and establishes his goings, and puts a new song into his mouth, even of praise to the Redeemer. The freeness of pardon to the returning backslider is a thing which is hard to be believed, until it is experienced. No sooner is the proud heart humbled, and the hard heart broken into contrition, than Jehovah is near with his healing balm. To heal the broken in heart, and to revive the spirit of the contrite ones, is the delight of Immanuel. And he receives the returning penitent without reproaches. He pardons him freely, and sheds abroad his love in his heart, and fills him with the joy of the Holy Ghost. It is, in fact, a new conversion; there is but one regeneration. We never heard of a sinner being born a third time, but we remember that Christ said unto Peter, "when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." Indeed, the exercises of the soul on these occasions may be so much more clear and comfortable than on its first conversion, that the person is disposed to think that this is the real commencement of spiritual life, and to set down all his former experience as spurious; or, at least, essentially defective. Christians, when recovered from backsliding, are commonly more watchful, and walk more circumspect than they ever did before. They cannot but be more humble. The remembrance of their base departure from God fills them with self-loathing. Whenever spiritual pride would lift up its head, one thought of a disgraceful fall will often lay the soul in the dust. And whether the blackslider's sins have been open or secret, the recollection of his traitorous behavior fills him with shame and self-abhorrence. When such persons have so conducted themselves as to bring upon them the censures of the church, so as to be separated from the communion of his people, at first it is probable, resentment would be felt towards the officers of the church who performed this painful duty; but after reflection, these resentments are turned against themselves, and they pass much heavier censures than the church ever did. Judicious, seasonable discipline is a powerful means of grace, and often would be the effectual means of recovering a backslider, if exercised as it should be. Indeed, this may be said to be one main design of its appointment. If, whenever there is an appearance of declension in a church member, the pastor, or some other officer of the church, would go to the person, and in the spirit and by the authority of Christ, would address a serious admonition to him, and then a second, and a third, and if these were unheded, then to bring him before the church, backsliding, in most cases, would be arrested before it proceeded far. But every member of the church has a duty to perform towards erring brethren. When they see them going astray, they should not act towards them as if they hated them, but should in any wise rebuke them. Christian reproof from one Christian to another, seems to be almost banished from our churches. There is a quick eye to discern a brother's faults, and a ready tongue to speak of them to others, but where do we now find the faithful reprover of sin, who goes to the man himself, without saying a word to any one, and between themselves, faithfully warns, exhorts, and entreats a straying brother to return. The serious discipline of formal accusations, and witnesses, &c., by such a course would be, in a great measure, rendered unnecessary; but the practice is, to let the evil grow until it has become inveterate, and breaks out into over acts, and then there is a necessity to pay attention to the matter, and to put in force the discipline of the church. But even this often proves salutary, and is a powerful means of reclaiming the offender; or if he persists in his evil courses, it serves to separate an unworthy member from the communion of saints. But when church officers and private Christians utterly fail in their duty towards backsliding brethren, God himself often makes use of a means of his own, which does not require the intervention of men. He smites the offender with his rod, and causes him to smart in some tender part. He sends such afflictions as bring his sins forcibly before his conscience. He deprives of the objects for the sake of which he forsook the Lord. It may be the wife of his youth, or a beloved child, on which his affections were too fondly fixed, so as to become idolatrous. Or if it was the love of the world which was the seductive cause of his backsliding, "riches are caused to make to themselves wings and flee away like the eagle to heaven." Or, was the love of ease and indulgence of the sensual appetites the cause of his delinquency, the stroke falls on his own body. He is brought low by sickness, and is tried upon his bed with excruciating pains, until he cries out in his distress, and humbly confesses his sins. Or, if he was carried away by the undue love of the honor that cometh from men, it is not unlikely that his reputation, which he cherished with a fondness which caused him to neglect the honor of his God, will be permitted to be tarnished by the tongue of slander, and things may be so situated, that although innocent, he may not have it in his power to make the truth appear. Children, too much indulged, become, by their misconduct, fruitful causes of affliction to parents, and thus they are made to suffer in the very point where they had sinned. Look at the case of Eli and David. All afflictions, however, are not for chastisement, but sometimes for trial; and those whom God loves best are most afflicted in this world. They are kept in the furnace, and that heated seven times, until their dross is consumed, and their piety shines forth as pure gold, which has been tried in the fire. But we are now concerned only with those afflictions which are more effective to bring back the backslider: the virtue of which the Psalmist acknowledges when he says, "It is good for me to be afflicted, for before I was afflicted I went astray." It may truly be said that many who had backslidden never would have returned had it not been for the rod; other means seemed to have lost their power, but this comes home to the feelings of every one. Whether a believer is ever permitted to go out of the world in a backslidden state, is a question of no practical importance; but it seems probable that Christians see all conditions in which any of this character are ever found. No one has any right to presume, that if he backslides, derth may not overtake him in that unprepared condition. Backsliding then is a fearful evil; may we all be enabled to avoid it; or if fallen into, to be recovered speedily from so dangerous a state?

BEECHER'S LECTURES.

NO. II.

Is there any evidence that the moral law has been, or will be perfectly obeyed in this life by the fallen race of man.

The question is not whether this law is in force as the stand of perfectness.

Not whether man is a free agent and justly punishable for every transgression.

Not whether the perfect conformity of all belivers to the law, would be safe and of good tendency in society.

Not whether some saints are not, in their best frames, perfect a week or a month at a time, more or less, and often just before death.

For, though we neither admit nor believe it, this is not the intent of the claim affirmed on the one side, and denied on the other. The claim is, that of perfect and continued conformity to the moral law through subsequent life.

The question is not whether a great and universal increase of holiness in believers will precede and attend the millenium. It is as certain as the coming of that day.—But will it be sinless—perfect holiness according to the moral law.

Not whether God prefers that the saints should sin some all their days, and has said that they shall sin, and taken measures to prevent their becoming perfect. He has said no such thing. On the contrary, the undivided influence of his character, law, gospel, and Holy Spirit, are constantly on the side of obedience, and never on the side of sin—the most powerful moral influence, probably, in the universe, and prevented in results of perfect obedience only by the voluntary pertinacious repellance it meets in the hearts of the people, and the question is whether it is the plan and purpose of God to remove wholly this repellance in this life.

Not whether he would be pleased to have them obey him perfectly under the auspicious influence of his gospel—but whether they refusing to yield such obedience, God sees it to be wise and best to secure it by his free and sovereign grace—and this is a question, not of theory, but of fact. Does God sanctify all his saints in this life? Does he sanctify them all immediately, and continue through life their perfect sanctification—and if not, why? This question, it belongs as much to one side as the other to answer. The subject will be discussed in another place.

The question is not whether Christ is able to remove the moral inability of his saints, and make them perfect. He has promised to make them perfect at sometime, and has perfected all who have entered heaven.

The question is, has he promised the exercise of his power to secure his people sinlessly perfect in this life.

The question is not whether believers make themselves perfect in the exercise of their own unaided free agency, and by the use of the proper means attain the faith and prayer to which the promise of perfection is made. It is understood to be admitted that they do not. But that for the faith of perfection, as for justifying faith, they are dependant upon God.

The question is not whether the faith which insures perfection, is the same precisely with justifying faith, so that Christians are made perfect, by their regeneration and justification, and from the first moment of Christian character lead a sinless life.

It is not understood that this is claimed by any; and it is understood that the faith which secures perfect sanctification is not exactly identical with justifying faith.

Nor is it the question, whether God as a sovereign gives the faith to which perfection is promised to all saints unconditionally in the present life.

It is admitted, as I understand, that under the old dispensation, none were made perfect—and that under the new, the instances of perfection have been hitherto few and far between—so that the discussion respects, for the most part, what is to be rather than what has been.

The question is not whether God in his sovereignty bestows on some few saints the faith which ensures perfection, and leaves the rest to their own free agency and a life of sinful imperfection. This will not, I believe, be claimed by any.

The question seems to be, what is that faith as distinguished from justifying faith, to which the promise of perfection is made—and is there any faith intelligibly revealed and defined in the Bible, distinguished from justifying faith, to which a subsequent sinless life is promised, and are there any promises of actual perfection, conditional, or unconditional, made in the Bible—fulfilled in the past or to be fulfilled in the future?

To decide the question, whether any are perfect in this life, an exposition of the law is indispensable. The materials for it are contained in the language of the law, as epitomized in two commands by our Savior. In its practical illustration in the ten commands—in its perfect exemplification by our Savior, and in the experimental indications of Christian character. The first of the two commands is, thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.

This means, doubtless, that our love to God shall be commensurate with our capacity, and the governing principle of our whole accountable action, securing the entire consecration to his service, of all our powers of soul and body, our intellect, our will, our affections, and all our bodily powers.

The attributes of this perfect love, are,

That it has God for its immediate and primary object.

It does not mean good actions, and loving God by doing good to men, without any consciousness of direct supreme delightful affection for God.

Good actions are not love, and men are not God, and to love and do good to men, though it would be the effect of love to God, and not the love itself. It might as well be insisted, that the love required for our neighbor means only worshiping God, as that to love God means only loving and doing good to man.

It includes benevolenee towards God, to the exclusion of all selfishness of heart.—Originating not on his dependence on us, but in his boundless being and capacity of enjoyment, and of communicating enjoyment. There is more being and enjoyment in God than in the whole intelligent universe besides.

It includes also perfect complacency in his character, law, gospel, and providence, and a delightful approbation of his excellence and ways.

It includes the preference of God and his service as our chief good, undivided and unwavering, excluding all rivalship or competition of creatures, or inordinate affection for them.

It includes affectionate confidence in God, to the exclusion of all doubt, distrust, fear, wavering or unbelief, however dark and incomprehensible his ways may be.—Perfect resignation to his will under the operation of disappointment and suffering, however severe—realizing his hand in it, confident of his rectitude and wisdom, and, willing, if need be, to suffer for his glory. Resignation instanter, without hesitation, murmuring, or fainting—rejoicing in tribulation.

Perfect gratitude to God for all his benefits of creation, providence and redemption; gratitude unwavering amid their constancy and multitude, and unextinguished by temporary deprivations, and rendering unhesitating and unstinted praise and service up to the fullness of all our powers, according to benefits received—a living, full hearted, unforgetting gratitude to God for all his benefits.

A habitual, joyful realization of the divine presence—the welcome evidences of his being, and character, and presence always shining uneclipsed without, and always apprehended within.

A full-hearted and constant desire and purpose at all times, to serve and please God, by doing actively and immediately his known will, with un-sinning fidelity in the application of our powers and means to understand his will.

That our benevolence, and complacency, and preference for God, and confidence in him, and resignation to his will, and gratitude for his benefits, and desire to please him, be free from relative deficiency, and up to our entire capacity of knowledge, and love, and obedience, so that sanctification by taking away sin is impossible, and increase of holiness possible only by the enlargement of our capacity and knowledge, to this is to be added, the perpetuity of the whole through all time, without short coming or over-transgression.

For to love God perfectly in the above manner, one-third or one-half of our time would no more constitute perfection in this life, according to the moral law, than perfect honesty, one-third or one-half the time would constitute a perfect honest man. It would be such perfection in honesty under civil government as would send a man to the state's prison on conviction of his offence, and will not—compared with the law of God, bear the ordeal of the judgment.

YOUR OWN EPITAPH.

Reader, you may not have employed any person to write one for you. You would shrink from this. But you have been doing it already yourself. Were you to close life to-night, your epitaph would be completely finished and ready for perusal, and all the work of your own hands. You are startled perhaps. You are not aware of having ever been engaged in any such employment.

True, you have not used the pen upon paper, nor the chisel upon marble; but you have been doing this thing far more perfectly in another manner. You have been writing your character by your course of life, upon the memory of each survivor who has been acquainted with you. You have written it fairly. There has been no flattery. Just what your life has been, you have penned concerning yourself. You have told your own story.

The tablet on which you have been engraving your epitaph, think of that. It is a living mind. The cold marble receives neither good nor evil from the characters inscribed upon it. Not so the tablet of the heart. Your life has made impressions on an indestructible substance, on an immortal mind. What you have written you have written. You cannot blot it out. With a pen of iron you have done this work. Your character as you have been inscribing it in the minds around you, may have given power to principles of action, currency to moral sentiment, impulses to courses of conduct, that have made this writing in this way, of your Epitaph, the most serious and momentous business you have ever transacted. Thus the dead live. And how many to a dreadful purpose! Had monumental marble only received the story of life, it had been well. But living, sensitive, immortal minds received it. Moral character was tinged, controlled perhaps, by the sentiments thus impressed, and eternity will display the dreadful harvest.

You are writing your own Epitaph!—What a motive you have to write it well! Some of the lines are traced every day. Some developments of your character cause much to be written in a single hour. You are writing for eternity. The inscription will be read there. You will read it there. Therefore write it well.

A member of the church removes from his former home to a distant part of the country. He is gone, says one friend to another, as the sound of the rolling wheels grows more and more faint. He will be missed. The family circle will feel the vacancy. In the scenes of social life in which he moved, there will be a notice of his absence. Many an acquaintance and friend will feel the loss.

But will the church feel it. His name was on record. Many remember the day, and its affecting solemnities, when it was placed there. He had sat often at the sacramental table. He was called brother, and was publicly known as a professed Christian. But all this would not prove the church to be a loser by his departure. All this does not prove that he was such a branch that the vine would bleed when it was broken off. All this does not prove that a particle of moral strength had been lost when he departed to a distant land.

What was he in moral character? This is the question.

So it is when a disciple dies. We perform the last sad offices over him. We lay kindred dust upon him, and retiring, leave all that remains in the cold silence of the place of sepulchre. There is a loss. There are broken social ties. But has the church been a loser? Here again we fall back upon character.

Death may rob a family, and a community, when it does not rob a church. A valuable and useful citizen may be the one removed, and he a professed disciple, but the church may have as much strength and beauty as ever. The departed disciple may have brought no glory to Zion, and hence he loses none when she is removed. Her records may lose a name, and this may be all her loss.

There is something sad in the thought, that a disciple may remove to a distant land, or be called to the eternal world, and the church he left sustain no loss. Having added nothing, he subtracts nothing. The spiritual and devoted in that church do not find their number lessened by his departure. He did not belong to that number. But if no loss to the church on earth, is he any gain to the church in heaven? If Zion below does not mourn over him, will Zion above welcome him?—Recorder.

UNIVERSALISM.

In our first number we commenced reviewing a Universalist Tract, consisting of forty-four questions, and entitled, W[illegible] Answer? We then promised to proceed in future numbers, until the last question should be answered. We will now attend to the second question, which reads as follows:—

"2. If God hates His enemies, why should we love our enemies? Are we required to be better than our God? If God love those only who love him, what better is he than the sinner? Luke, vi. 32, 33."

Here are three questions, which deserve particular attention, and separate answers.

"If God hates his enemies, why should we love our enemies?"

1. We should love our enemies because God has commanded us so to do, and not because God loves his enemies, admitting that he does love them. The conduct of God is not a certain rule, in all things, for our conduct. God gave his son to die for his enemies, but it does not follow that we are, therefore required to give our sons to die for our enemies. Again, God often punishes and destroys his enemies, as in the case of the Antediluvians and the Sodomites, but it does not follow from thence that we are at liberty to destroy our enemies. If it be sound logic to reason that because we are required to love our enemies, therefore, God loves his enemies, it must be equally sound to argue that because we are forbidden to kill our enemies, therefore, God cannot destroy his enemies, which matter of fact proves to be false.

The principle of reasoning from our duty, concerning what God will do, or from what God does concerning our duty, is false, for the following reasons.

1. Obligations always correspond to the relations in which intelligent beings are placed, and hence, as the relation which exists between us and our enemies, is not the same as that which exists between God and his enemies, it is fallacious to reason from one to the other.

2. It is admitted that God loves his enemies, in one sense, but it does not follow from thence that he loves them with the same love as that which he loves his friend, or those that love him; or that he does not hate them, in another sense, at the same time. Love is used in different senses.—"It has been distinguished into, 1. Love of esteem, which arises from the mere contemplation of some excellence in an object. 2. Love of benevolence, which is an inclination to seek the happiness or welfare of any thing. 3. Love of complaisance, which arises from the consideration of any object agreeable to us.—Buck's Dictionary.

Now it is admitted that God loves his enemies, with the love of benevolence, but it is denied that he loves them with the love of complaisance, for he "is angry with the wicked every day."—Ps. vii. 11. Again it is said, that the "Lord hates a lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, feet that be swift in running to mischief, a false witness that speaketh lies, and him that soweth discord among brethren."—Prov. vi. 17, 18, 19.

But it is asked, "Are we required to be better than our God? We answer most certainly not, nor would it follow that we are required to be better than God, were it admitted that we are required to love our enemies, and that God does not love his enemies. We have shown above, that the relations are not the same between man and man, and between God and man, and therefore that it is fallacious to reason from the obligations connected with one of these relations concerning the other. If the fact that we are required to love our enemies, and that God does not love his enemies, would prove that we are required to be better than God; than the fact that we are forbidden to destroy our enemies, while God does sometimes destroy his, or the fact that God "hates a false witness," must prove the same point, and the conclusion will be that we are required to be better than God. Can any one believe a theory which involves such absurdities? or will any one be led by reasoning, which, if carried out, will push them upon such consequences?

But it is asked still further, "If God loves those only who love him, what better is he than the sinner?" This question is founded upon the fallacy, already pointed out above, that God sustains the same relation to man that man does to his fellow. A sinner is one who has violated God's law, "for sin is the transgression of the law," one precept of which is, "love your enemies," but this is a law for the government of man and not for the government of God, and hence, to reason that if God does not love his enemies, he is no better than sinners, is worse than trifling. But there is another fallacy in the position. If it were admitted that God loves only those who love him, it might still be shown wherein God is better than sinners, who do the same. The text referred to, which says that "sinners love those that love them," means no more than that sinners love those who are like themselves, for they do not love christians. Christ says, "Because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore, the world hateth you."—John xv. 19. Now if God did love only those who love him, still he would love all good men, but sinners, who love those who love them, that is, those who are like them, do not love good men, but bad men, and in this God is better than the sinner. It is worthy of remark that the text referred to, at the end of the question, was given as a rule of comparison between man and man, and not between God and man. "If ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them." This is plainly a test of the [illegible] goodness of professed disciples and sinners, [illegible] connection with which it is referred to, supposes it a test of the comparative merits of God and men, which is no more absurd than it is profane.

From [illegible].

FORGIVENESS AND REVENGE.

What more [illegible] than forgiveness and revenge. The former is noble—is Christlike,—the latter is mean—is demon-like—He who freely forgives injuries and prays for the offender holds communion with spirits above. The revengeful person is allied to fallen spirits, whose motto is, "Spite with spite is best repaid."

How forgiving was our Saviour! See him nailed to a cross, hear the taunts of the vile, the sneers of the rulers, the railing of the rabble, the mocking of the priests, and to hear to Him, who is the object of all this insult, praying, "Father, forgive them."—See also, the martyr Stephen, while men are also gnashing on him with their teeth, and stoning him to death, he kneels down and prays, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." William Tyndale, the first translator of the New Testament into the English language, was banished and burnt in consequence of his efforts to give the Scriptures to the common people. At the stake he prayed for the king who had driven him out and caused him to be put to death. "Lord, open the eyes of the king of England." How like his divine Master was Stephen! Happy Tyndale! The fires which liberated the soul wafted it towards the residence of its Redeemer.

Would we do our enemies good, the surest way is to forgive them and pray for them. There is power in meekness; forgiveness is persuasive. Prayer for an enemy will do more to disarm him, than all the arguments which can be used. He who requites an injury with nothing but goodness, may soon find, as did Joseph, his enemies bowing at his feet. If the Lord be for us, who can be against us? O how unwise to seek revenge! What good can result from sinful passion? Why indulge in rage when insulted? Who is made better by it? Is the injured person benefitted by retaliation? Is the abuser reformed by it? Does the community acquire a better name? Does the cause of virtue ask the patronage of sinful passions? Is Christ in need of madmen? Can the work of Heaven be promoted by those, whose bosoms burn with the fires of hell? Can aught of good result from spiteful feeling? "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city." Methinks the whole empire of hell reverberates with shouts of fiendish exultation, when one of Christ's disciples on earth, is in pursuit of revenge!

Y-n-r.

GOODNESS OF GOD.—If the goodness of God is so admirably seen in the works of nature and the favors of Providence, with what a noble superiority does it even triumph in the mystery of redemption! Redemption is the brightest mirror in which to contemplate this most lovely attribute of the Deity. Other gifts are only as mites from the divine treasury; but redemption opens all the stores of his glorious grace. Herein God commendeth his love; not only manifests, but renders it perfectly marvellous; manifests it in so stupendous a manner, that it is beyond parallel, beyond thought, and above all, blessing and praise.—Hervey.

MEEKNESS OF CHRIST.—Do you at any time find your heart fretting, disquieted and impatient, under every petty cross and trial? See how quietly Christ, your sacrifice, went to the altar! how meekly and patiently he stood under all the wrath of God and man together. That will convince, silence, and shame you.—Flavel.

There is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches.—Solomon.

FAMILY RELIGION.

"But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."—Joshua xxiv. 15.

The dependencies of man upon God—the relations which he sustains to the divine being, together with the happy effects thereof, make the resolutions of Joshua peculiarly appropriate. Men, in all circumstances, are so entirely dependant on God, that the utmost service they can render is his due. The most pious will always be debtors. After they have done all that they can, they are unprofitable servants. Did God exact an equivalent for his mercies rendered to men, the services of all would not repay the blessings of one. How great, then, the sin of those who do not, like Joshua, resolve that they with all their house shall serve God. The fury of God is threatened to all the families that call not upon his name.

More are they who neglect the practice of Joshua, than they who deny the duty.—Every believer in divine revelation, must be as thoroughly convinced of the duty of family devotions, as he can be of any of the claims of God. Every head of a family can not be insensible of the fact that God should be acknowledged before his household; else, how can he train up those committed to his care in the nurture and admonition of the Lord? or, how can he feel a conscience void of offense, while he renders to his neighbor that which is an equivalent for any service rendered, but neglects to express his gratitude to God for blessings every moment repeated? If reciprocity is due from man to man, How much more from man to his Creator? Shall he who deals uprightly with his fellow, claim the Christian name when he deals wickedly with his God? And surely, does he not act wickedly in the sight of God who does not acknowledge God in his various relations, especially in his own house?

But it is in vain to tell our readers that family religion is required of all professing godliness. The enlightened conscience of the believer, speaks it in stronger terms.—It may not, however, be amiss to suggest a few hints relative to the manner of its performance.

1. It should not be an occasional business. If the minister of the Gospel, or any pious Christian visits you, you need not ask him to attend to religious duties in the family when they are not performed in his absence. By so doing, you evince that you are afraid to let him know your negligence, but are willing to indulge it continually before God. Your family knows that it is the presence of the man of God that causes prayers and thanksgiving to ascend to God before them, and may inquire, Why that occasion should call it forth more than others? It is not the business of the Sabbath only. If it is proper to acknowledge God then, it is proper every day in the week. Sabbath exercises only, will be insufficient to secure the continual pleasures of Heaven. Seasons of revival are no more appropriate than others for family religion. 'Tis true, the heart is then enkindled with holy love to God more than usual, but if religious exercises are appropriate for such seasons, they are always so. If the conscience can not be quieted then, it can not at other times, without being seared as with a hot iron.

2. It should be attended to cheerfully, and not as a task. Religious duties performed reluctantly lose all of their happy tendencies. A slavish fear, and an unwilling sacrifice are abominable in the sight of God. Forced service is never acceptable to God—he loves a cheerful giver. Unless the heart with all its affections can enter into the exercise, it is of comparatively little avail to come around the family altar. God is not pleased with that spirit that seeks an excuse, or labors to make a little do.

2. It should be emphatically a family exercise. Around the altar, all the members of the family should come, and participate as much as possible in the devotions. "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." Joshua was not left to serve alone. Christian parents or guardians should not serve alone. Most happy is that family, where parents, and children, and all the members of the household can unite together in paying their devotions to God. Nothing, scarcely, can exert so happy an influence as such a scene as this. All partake of the same spirit, and have the same emotions enkindled in their hearts. The morning devotions exert their happy influence till evening, and the evening till morning. And the time for family worship is hailed with as much joy as any passing scene by all. When children are taught to read the Bible with the parents, at the seasons of family devotions, and then bow themselves before God, they receive divine impressions that for the time exert a most happifying influence, and which, in their ultimate effects, lead them to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. Christian parents, learn your children to love the family altar by accustoming them to attend to it, and by interesting their hearts in the exercise, and thus train them up in the way in which they should go; and you may rest assured that they will begin early to relish the religion of the blessed Savior, and be found walking in the footsteps of the Lamb of God.

4. It should be a devotional exercise. O! how often is the Holy Spirit grieved by the deadness of those who professedly engage in this duty. A cold, unfeeling prayer from a cold heart is presented by one, perhaps, while of the rest of the family, some are sitting, some are standing, others absent, and all glad when the last word is said. Shall such be termed a religious exercise? No present benefit can be expected from such a scene, and we question whether God can look upon it with approbation. If you would acknowledge God in your family, and have all its members brought under the influence of religion, make your altar a place where all can come and be interested, and feel as if God was looking upon them waiting to be gracious. Let all bow themselves together there, and then evince your great interest in their welfare by presenting them with all their circumstances to God.

"NEW-ENGLAND CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE" is the title of a new paper, published at Lowell, Mass., devoted to the interests of the Christian Religion, and edited by Rev. Luther Lee. The sinfulness of Slavery will occupy an important place in its columns. The Missionary cause, Sabbath Schools, Temperance and Moral Reform will receive due attention. The specimen No. before us, together with the reputation of its editor, augur well for its character and usefulness. We cordially welcome Br. HOW A PEOPLE SHOULD LOVE THEIR MINISTER.

Extract from the address of the Cortland Presbytery to the Presbyterian Society in De Ruyter, Jan. 22, 1840, at the installation of Rev. J. R. JOHNSON as their Pastor, furnished at the request of the Editor of this paper by the author, D. PLATT, Pastor of the Congregational church in Homer.

1. Love your minister—not with the fondness of personal attachment and earthly affection, but with the sober, chastened, christian attachment enjoined in the Bible. As a man—he may have his excellencies and his defects—he may please your fancy and gratify your taste, or he may not. He may awaken your sensibilities and call forth your admiration—or he may appear to you in many respects less engaging, personally, than you may desire. It is unreasonable to expect that any one man should please the taste of every one. It is not as a matter of taste or personal liking that we ask you to love your minister.—The sickly sensibility and personal fondness too often exhibited in the attachment of a people towards their minister, is no part of your duty as enjoined in the Gospel.—The less of it you cherish, the better it will be for you and him.

The love which we urge you to cultivate, is the love of a Christian towards a Christian minister. Esteem him very highly in love, (not for his sake as a man—not because he has a pleasant voice and can play well on a musical instrument—not because he is a scholar and a gentleman,) but for his work's sake. He comes to you as the embassador of Christ, to proclaim to you the Gospel, and instruct you in the ways of holiness. This is the reason you should love him. He is the messenger of God to you for good—to dispense the rich gifts of heaven to your souls—to impart to you the instructions and counsels of infinite love—to heal your spiritual maladies, and prepare you for the joys of heaven. Do you love the physician whose skill, and attention, and kindness are the means of saving your bodies from death? How much more should you love the physician of your soul, who comes to you with the healing balm of heaven to cure the diseases of your soul, and save you from the second death.

Love your minister, then, with a pure, chastened, christian affection, not as a man, but as the minister of Jesus Christ. Whatever may be his personal defects and failings, so long as he faithfully discharges towards you the duties of his office, esteem him highly in love for his work's sake.

Be careful not to think too much of his personal defects, and never speak of them except when duty to him, or to the cause demands. Think of the Gospel which he preaches to you—the precious truths he unfolds to your view—the messages of eternal life to your never dying spirit; and if you find that the treasure is contained in a vessel of clay, do not despise or throw it away on that account, but in rejecting the vessel, you lose also the treasure which God has deposited therein. If he proves himself a faithful minister—be thankful for the gift of heaven—encourage him in his work—honor his holy calling—and cherish towards him, always, a chastened and steadfast christian affection.

MONTHLY SERMONS,

BY

A VILLAGE PASTOR:

(JANUARY, 1841.)

NO. I.—THE RAGING MOCKER.

Prov. xx. 1. "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

Solomon, in alluding to certain kinds of beverage, fixes our attention upon their intoxicating qualities; and wherever this be found, in wine, or in any other strong drink, he denounces it—

A Raging Mocker.

If we would fully understand the character of this raging mocker, we must notice his insiduousness, and destructiveness.

I. HIS INSIDUOUSNESS.

He promises to drown trouble. He thus accosts the man who is weighed down by the loss of property, or loss of friends, or other calamities: "Come, form an intimate alliance with me, and your troubles will vanish—in me you shall find needful refuge, and complete solace." The unwise one, being deceived by the much fair speech, and by the flattering lips of the mocker, straightway goeth after him, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks: Till a dart strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knowing that it is for his life.—The mockery does not cease here. A great amount of happiness is promised to every class of persons who will consent to indulge in the inebriating cup. Not only are sorrow's clouds to be driven away wherever they lower, but the bright sunshine of happiness is to gild the whole meandering path of life.

The insiduousness of the mocker leads on the deluded, pledging, "happiness—happiness! just before you; at the next step you will find it." Repeated disappointment serves as occasion, not for the dispelling of the delusion, but to develope other and stronger insiduous arts of the mocker.

He even counterfeits happiness. He makes his votary believe that he is happy. He feels some better for his indulgence; he experiences an exhilaration of spirits. His quickened pulse, his gleaming eye, his warm imaginations, his confidence that he is strong as Samson, rich as Job in his prosperity, wiser than Solomon, learned as Newton, talented as Milton, more sagacious in state affairs than Washington or Franklin—his certain knowledge that he far excels St. Paul in piety—all combine to prove him happy. Under these impressions, he boldly re-asserts his complete happiness, and who can dispute him?

"And while the heedless wretch believes,"
He "makes his fetters strong."

The habit of partaking of the poisonous cup increases, but the deceived victim knows it not. The insiduous mocker leads him on to take deeper and deeper draughts, and more and more frequently. When his friends first saw indications of the foundation of this habit in its incipient stages, they felt that they must remonstrate; they watched for indications to become a little plainer, lest it should be thought they were interfering where there was no demand; but, alas! when they were convinced it was time to speak, they found their friend in the strong grasp of the raging mocker. The beverage which contains the intoxicating ingredient, is often introduced to cement the bond of friendship; it has long been regarded as the badge of cheerfulness. Those of us who move only, or chiefly in the temperance circles, forget that those habits of using alcoholic beverage which once pervaded all classes of society, are now retained by some classes in some sections of our country. In those places the mocker smiles with all his practiced insiduousness, until he inflicts his deadliest bite.

We now see the mocker, but would we see his raging characteristic combined with his mockery, we must notice

II. HIS DESTRUCTIVENESS.

His proverbial waste of property need not be dwelt upon now; he squanders it by thousands; yea, he even takes the bread from the mouth of our children, and converts it into liquid death. His destruction of the peace and comfort of the individuals whom he beguiles is beyond description. He promised them happiness; but, "Who hath woe"? A thousand voices join with the Bible in replying, the victim of the mocker—"they that go to seek mixed wine." As they partially awake from one scene of inebriation, the resolve of each is, "I will seek it yet again."

This destroyer wages war upon domestic comfort. He spoils the once happy home. The father becomes the tyrant, from whom the defenceless wife and frightened children hide themselves, as his staggering footsteps approach the door. If the mother be the mocker's prey, can the devastation of domestic peace be less? Is a son the deceived one? Let the mortification of his brothers, the deep smothered sadness of his sisters, the sleepless nights of his father, and the unrevealed agony of her who rocked his cradle—tell us of the waves of domestic sorrows. See this raging mocker prostrate the strong and healthy constitution, causing reason to quit her throne, and making the poor man glare, rage, and SHRIEK, amid the horrors of the delirium tremens!

We often hear of such cases, but we parry off the force of their appeal, by saying, 'they occurred at a great distance.—Who knows that the true account has reached us? Perhaps there is a great exaggeration.' But I will now mention a case that recently was witnessed in an adjacent county—in the village of Waterville.

The communication from which I make the following extract, is from the pen of the Rev. John Frost, is published over his own name, in the New York Evangelist of Jan. 2d, 1841. It is dated, "Waterville, Nov. 7th, 1840." Being already a public document, though it relates a most appaling occurrence, which turned the inhabitants of a neighboring village pale, I see no impropriety of making the most public use of it. The words of Mr. Frost are as follows:—

"On this day" (Sabbath, March 6th, 1840,) "a very intelligent man, and who had been a respectable citizen, 41 years of age, was attacked with delirium tremens.—He had one attack previously. He resolved to reform, but after an abstinence of two months, relapsed. He had been employed among the head workmen of the distilleries in this place, for 15 years. I visited him on Tuesday. His incoherent language, his violent spasms, and his cries for help to defend him against the snakes and devils, that passed before his disordered imagination, were truly shocking, and enough, one would suppose, to deter men from swallowing a poison producing a disease so frightful. His wife, a worthy member of the Baptist church, was present, and his distracted children. He had the best medical aid, but his nervous system was so excited that no medicine could procure sleep. His disease increased in violence, and before morning terminated in death." Here my friends, we have the full portrait of the Raging Mocker.

I say the full portrait; I intend only so far as his war against the health, reason, and life of an individual is portrayed—together with the heart-rending recital of domestic anguish which incidentally is brought to view, and which was inseparable from the faithful representation. But as we weep in gazing upon this "single captive," the unwelcome, but inestimable thought comes home—he is but the representation of tens of thousands. By this form of death, and by a variety of others, though perhaps not as shockingly obtrusive as this, he opens the premature grave for untold numbers of American citizens.

Time would fail us to tell how he perverts and ruins some of the most promising blossoms of intellectual powers that adorn the smiling circles of Columbian youth. In this respect alone, what an indictment we record against him for his destruction of the public welfare! If we fill out the "count," what will be the aggregate? Because of the ravages of the mocker, the land, the whole land mourneth.

But I have said nothing of the future destiny of those souls that quit the bodies of inebriates. Here my words must be few—and God grant that they may be plain, tender, and searching. I do cherish the anti-despairing reflection, that the drunkard may be regenerated in the closing hour of life. I recollect the thief who said, "Lord, Remember me"! I have not forgotten the reply which he received from the Redeemer of the world—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." I know that God is as able to display the triumphs of his grace in the expiring hours of a drunkard, as in those of a thief. In which instance, if in either, he will most probably make such display, is not for mortals to decide, nor do I know that they have any business to alter, or even to think the conjecture. But if opportunity for the most astonishing display of sovereign grace, be the criterion of probability—the soul preponderates on the side of the drunkard. But, possibly, I have now indulged in these incidental remarks to an extent which is censurable.

I simply mean to say, that it is extremely improbable that any habitual drunkard will ever turn from his sins, and make preparation to meet in peace his offending Judge. If he dies without this preparation, the Bible decides his future condition in that declaration which is found in 1 Cor. vi. 10:—"Nor DRUNKARDS shall inherit the Kingdom of God."

We have looked upon the raging mocker; we have studied his Satanic characteristics as we find them developed by his insiduousness and his destructiveness; and from the view which we have taken, we derive the following

LESSONS OF INSTRUCTION.

1. Pity for the unwise who have been deceived by this mocker, and sympathy for their mortified and suffering family connections, are demanded of us. I do not recommend such pity as will attempt to shield the drunkard from the charge of guilt; but such as shall incline us to commiserate his fallen condition, and shall cause us to mingle our tears of gratitude for God's restraining grace towards us, with our tears of regret over our poor besotted fellow man. This pity will impel us to do all we can to reclaim him.

The sympathy which we are to exercise for his suffering relatives, will incline us to avoid saying unkind words to them, and will dispose us to say as little concerning the vicious habits of their "deceived" friend, as we can consistently with our increasing responsibilities as the firm advocates of Temperance Reform. Our obligations to exert ourselves to the extent of our power to advance the reform, will sometimes require us to make disclosures respecting the habits and woes of the intemperate, that otherwise would never be made. But whenever this becomes our painful duty, sincere pity for the drunkard, and the kindest, deepest sympathies for his wife, parents, children, or other kindred, should be assiduously cherished by us, while we disclose, so far as the public good may require, the humiliating facts which have come to our knowledge. Before passing from this suggestion, permit me to add, that if we find the children of deceased drunkards, or of those who seem yet to exhibit too many signs of animal life to be consigned over to the undertaker—if we find such children struggling against a strong current of temptation, and the roaring surges of adversity—let us not fail to extend to them the helping hand. In doing this, we may strengthen the hands and gladden the heart of their virtuous and almost disconsolate mother, who will ten-fold repay us for all our efforts, by her midnight thanksgiving to the God of the fatherless.

2. Combined influence, embracing the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating beverage, is the only mode of warfare by which we can exterminate this raging mocker.

Whatever may be said on the wine question to prove that the Bible permits us to use intoxicating wine, or any other beverage of that nature; one thing is certain, the Bible no where enjoins the drinking of the inebriating cup. I am at liberty to let it entirely alone if I please. If by entire abstinence I am rendered in any degree safer myself, from the wiles of the insiduous mocker, or if by my example I can strengthen one of my fellow creatures against temptation to become intemperate, then it becomes my duty to entirely abstain from alcohol as a beverage in all its forms. It is the duty of each one of you to firmly resolve to abstain from all that can intoxicate. Do you say that there is no danger that you will be deceived by wine or by any other strong drink, though you indulge yourself to partake of it moderately? You are not wise to reason thus. Thousands have fallen before the mocker, who ventured to speak as you now do. But you say, you can cease to partake of the cup just when you please—it costs you no effort.—Then do it, my friend, for the benefit of others. But will the abstinence cost you some effort—much effort? then speedily abstain for your own soul's safety. "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

3. We ought to appeal to all the venders of intoxicating drinks, and ask them to desist from an occupation that sustain this raging mocker in his insiduousness and destructiveness. As their neighbors and fellow citizens, we ought to entreat them to cease from that business that causes so much woe, sorrow, contentions, babbling, wounds without cause, redness of eyes, and expulsion from entering into the Kingdom of God.

But I anticipate their defense; they say their business is legalized. Yes, and you and I have assisted to legalize it. Responsibility therefore rests upon us to assist in undoing this mischief as speedily as possible.

This leads us to say—

4. That the vending of intoxicating beverage ought no longer to be sanctioned by statute law. We, the people, should petition for the repeal of such laws, and for the enactment of such prohibitory statutes as the wisdom of our legislators may judge requisite. This raging mocker boastfully walks forth, priding himself that his arms, (the very personification of destructiveness,) are gracefully shielded by the statute EPAULETS of the Empire State. Let these be torn off, and let the bloody arms of the mocker be seen, and his mocking, raging, deceiving reign will soon cease from among the people of the State of New-York.

5. The subject reminds us that we ought to make timely preparation for the simultaneous temperance meetings to be holden on the last Tuesday of February next.

All that we can do by previous arrangement to make that day subservient to the advancement of the cause of Temperance, ought to be done. The attention of the community must be aroused to the subject; we must expect a full congregation on that day—some one to address us must be secured—the singers must make preparation: all these items must receive attention.

6. We must oft reiterate well known truths relating to the Temperance cause.—There must be line upon line, precept upon precept.

* * * * *

7. We must labor to advance the Temperance Reformation as a part of the great scheme of the Gospel for the renovation of the world. This is the view with which we ought to engage in every department of reform. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is the great reformatory scheme for this sinful world. For this purpose was the Son of God made manifest, that he might destroy the works of the devil. If one resolves to preach the general truths of the Gospel, leaving them to work their silent influence for the reformation of mankind, without ever directly applying those truths in opposing any specific form of vice, he mistakes his proper course. He should use Gospel weapons for direct assault in pulling down the strong holds of sin. If others conclude to spend their efforts in this or that department of reform without reliance upon Gospel principles and promises—they suffer under a delusion. The fate of the seven sons of one Seva, a Jew, will be theirs; the evil spirits will leap upon them and overcome them, exultingly inquiring, "Who are ye"? The true course is, stand upon the Gospel as the basis of all the truths which we ever need to use for opposing sin, or promoting righteousness.

Engage in works of reform as varied departments of Gospel effort. Let Christ crucified be the sum of our moral system. Then we shall be safe from the contamination of Jehu-like zeal, and shall not be induced to pray that fire may come down from heaven upon our opposers to consume them.

If we stand amid the Gospel truths as 'Christians at home,' we shall prosecute all reformatory plans with Gospel benevolence. We shall not be dejected by temporary defeat, nor become peevish though many a Demas should forsake us; nor be disheartened though some good men should regard our measures as injudicious. With God we shall leave our cause, and cheerfully go forward in the path that his word and providences mark out before us.

These are the feelings with which we should enlist afresh in the Temperance Reform. This reform being one branch of the Gospel scheme, our simple duty is, to engage in it with Gospel motives, arming ourselves with Gospel truths, and relying upon Gospel premises. Thus furnished and sustained, we shall triumph over the insiduousness and destructiveness of the raging mocker, and shall rejoice in beholding him cease to deceive the people of this favored, yet trembling republic.

For the Register

MESSRS. EDITORS,—Permit me to call the attention of the youth of this vicinity to the importance of attending the Bible Class, which is to be re-organized in the S. D. B. Church in this village the present week. It is a subject of vital interest to the rising generation to imbibe a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures in the days of their youth, ere the clouds of disappointment and anguish lower over the mental horizon, and blunt the keener energies of the immortal mind. The Students of the Institution are particularly invited to attend. X. Y. Z.

THOUGHTS FOR JANUARY 1841.

Little Charles thought he should like to wish every body a happy new year; but he knew so little about people in different parts of the world, that he did not feel much interested in them. He thought he should care more, if he knew more about them.—I will tell this thoughtful boy about some of the people who should be remembered new year's day.

1. There are some millions of orphan children, little girls and boys, who have no father or mother. Turn your kind wishes into a prayer for them, that God would raise up kind friends who will take care of them and train them up in the way in which they should go.

2. There are other millions of children, whose parents teach them to swear, steal, and fight. You should wish and pray that their parents may grow wiser and better.

3. There are many thousands of children who are taught to beg for a living, and often encouraged to tell lies. The parents of many of these are drunkards. You may wish that their parents may become sober, kind and industrious.

4. Many children are children of heathen parents, who are taught to worship false gods. You may desire that they may receive the Bible, and learn about the Savior. If in this you are sincere, you will do something to have your desire accomplished.

5. Many thousands of children, who read the Bible, and attend Sabbath School, do not love God, and therefore cannot have a happy new year. You may pray that they may have new hearts, that they may be happy, not only for a year, but through all eternity.

6. Several hundred thousands of children are born to be slaves. I receive in exchange for the Sabbath School Monitor, a paper called the Carolina Watchman. In a late number, I saw the following advertisement:

SALE OF TEN VALUABLE NEGROES.

In pursuance of an order of the Court, I will sell

10 NEGROES,

the property of the estate of James G. Spears, deceased, at the Court House door, in the town of Concord, N. C. on the FIRST DAY OF JANUARY, 1841.

Among the number ordered to be sold, is a boy, GREEN, about 20 years old, who has been raised a cook, and is said to be one of the first order; another boy, DICK, has been raised a house servant, both of which Negroes have been hired at the Hotels in Salisbury for several years, where their characters can be had for honesty, &c. CYNTHIA, a negro woman, who is a good Cook, Ironer and Washer. SARAH, a likely girl, about twelve years old, yellow complected and very smart. The other six are men and boys from 15 to 20 years of age, of good character, and as likely as any other lot of negroes in the State of the same number.

INTELLIGENCE.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

THE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

IN THE SENATE, Jan. 6,—This bill was called up, and discussed at considerable length, and with great latitude of remark, by Messrs. Clay, Wright, Linn, and others, without however, bringing it to any conclusion. This bill has been discussed nearly every day since its first introduction, and though it was then thought to be a matter easily disposable, will probably engage the attention of Congress through the short remainder of its session.

On the 8th, Mr. Crittenden moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to report amendments to the effect that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be distributed among the States; and that the pre-emption principle should be extended to such bona fide settlers as choose to enter a quarter section at $1,25 per acre, who, at the time of making their settlement, should not be worth more than $1000.

Mr. Calhoun said he should move an amendment by way of substitute, for that offered by the Senator from Kentucky, which would be "to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie." The bill was then postponed until Monday. Thus the whole land question will be opened.

OREGON.

Mr. Linn introduced his bill to extend the laws of the United States over the territory of Oregon, and for the protection and settlement of the same.

Mr. Linn said he had forborne to press this subject, at the suggestion of some friends, lest he might add to the controversy with Great Britain at a time when another question of magnitude was pending;—to their suggestions he had yielded his assent, but not to his judgment. He was one that never believed the N. E. Boundary question could be settled amicably. The British had gone on, step by step, until the claim set up assumed a formidable shape. It was notorious that at the treaty of Ghent they did not assert more than a mere shadow of the claim. Delays were always dangerous. By and by, unless something decisive was done, the same claims would be made to the territory of Oregon. Indeed they had already pushed up to the very confines of Missouri and Arkansas. The Hudson Bay Company were already bringing emigrants from Europe, shepherds, farmers and others, and had succeeded in depriving our people of the trade with the Indians. If our claim was valid, Mr. L. was for asserting it at once, and maintaining it. At all events, he thought we ought, at least, to proceed pari passu with the British Government. The bill was referred to a select committee of five.

HEIRS OF HENRY ECKFORD.

A bill was reported by Mr. Williams, for the relief of the heirs of Henry Eckford, deceased.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

Mr. Walker submitted a resolution instructing the committee on Foreign relations to inquire into the expediency of procuring copies of the debates in the British parliament, prior to 1820, in relation to the Northeastern Boundary.

The resolution was objected to by Mr. Preston and others, and its propriety and utility discussed by Messrs. Webster, who approved of the resolution, considering the debates to which it referred, as shedding important light upon the views entertained of the Boundary at the peace of 1783.—Messrs. Buchanan and Allen opposed it, also Mr. Clay, who clearly expressed himself of the opinion that all apprehensions of a collision with Great [illegible] were unfounded.

CONDITION [illegible]

[illegible] Mr. H[illegible] presented a [illegible] from the Ch[illegible] Anti-Slavery Society, praying that an inquiry might be instituted concerning the condition of the slaves in the District of Columbia. The motion to receive it, was ordered to lie on the table.

INGERSOLL AND NAYLOR.

In the House, Jan. 6.—The contested election at Philadelphia was taken up.—The question is on adopting the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee, viz. that Charles Naylor was duly elected as the representative from the 3d Congressional District of Pennsylvania, and is entitled to the seat, which he now holds as the sitting member.

This resolution was reported at the close of the late session, and was not acted upon. The committee also made a report setting forth that the election was illegally and fraudulently conducted. It does not appear that any case of fraud going to vitiate the election, has been made out.

Mr. Ingersoll resumed his argument about two o'clock, and spoke about an hour and a half in conclusion. He urged upon the House the propriety of recording their judgment on the question presented in this case, though it was a matter of sovereign indifference to him what their judgment might be.

Mr. Naylor replied on the Monday following; the case is not yet disposed of, and very probably will not be, till the close of the session.

LUNATICS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. Fillmore moved the re-consideration of the vote by which temporary provision was denied the lunatics in the District, which was carried 87 to 57. The matter was then discussed at length by several gentlemen, in which the only objections offered to the provision for them, was on the ground of its unconstitutionality. A bill was subsequently passed, which makes such provision, by a vote of 110 to 59.

Mr. Monroe reported a bill for the establishment of an asylum for the support of invalid officers of the army.

THE AMISTAD.

Mr. Curtis, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill to authorise the enrolment or register of the schooner Amistad, which was passed. By this she becomes an American vessel.

An inefficient attempt was made to adjourn on the 8th of January.

PRE-EMPTION LANDS.

Mr. Lincoln introduced a resolution, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for an account of all the lands purchased by preemption, under the several pre-emption acts of Congress.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. Granger introduced a bill authorizing an issue of Treasury notes not exceeding five millions.

DISMISSED POSTMASTERS.

The resolution introduced by Mr. Adams, for the names of all the postmasters removed, was called up, when Mr. Hopkins moved a substitute, stating the right of the Executive to remove, &c., without assigning reasons. The case is not yet disposed of.

Much business of a local or unimportant nature has been transacted.

FOURTH INSTALMENT.

Mr. Stanley, introduced, on leave, a bill to authorize the payment to the States of the Fourth Instalment, under the law of 1836, for the distribution of the surplus revenue, as soon as the same can be done, after providing for the public debt.

The sum due to the State of New York, under this bill, will be one million, three hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars—a very pretty slice out of the public loaf.

THE FRESHET.

Every mail brings us farther accounts of the effects of the late unusual freshets.

FROM THE SOUTH.

Patterson—Considerable injury has been done to some the factories, and some of the buildings have been swept away.

From the Trenton Gazette.

The Flood.—Besides the Yardleyville and Taylorsville, the New Hope and Centre bridges, and, it is positively said, the Reigelsville bridge, have been carried away.

The daily Easton mail, which comes down the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware, has not been received since Thursday night; indicating the destruction of many bridges and roads in that direction. There are serious breaches in the bank of the water power at Crossley's and Scudder's. Most injury was done after the river began to subside, by the water's running out of the race way into the river.

Part of the guard wall of the Assanpink bridge, in Warren-street, Trenton, fell off on Friday night, and another part was started so that it must be taken down.

The bridge at Lowrey's mill was swept away.

The guard bank of the canal between Trenton and Bordentown was washed into the canal, filling it up. The opposite, or eastern bank, with the rail road, was carried away for more than a quarter of a mile. Below Bordentown the road is covered with water.

The river began to fall on Friday evening about 9 o'clock. It had fallen at 12 o'clock to-day about 10 feet above low water mark.

A coffin, screwed up, was observed floating by the Delaware bridge.

The fragments of the up river bridges came twice in contact, with the Delaware bridge, with great force. Several guard timbers, some 16 inches square, were snapped off.

Three of the five arches of the New Hope bridge are standing.

There is a breach of a mile or two in the feeder of the canal, about two miles below Lamberton. The fine farm of Mr. Larrison, in the flat between the feeder and the river, was completely swept over. Not a rail, not a hay stack was left. The dwelling house was on the other side of the feeder. The guard lock at bull's island is gone.

The high bank and the road along the river above Hill's ferry is washed away for a distance of two miles.

The bridge on the Lehigh, at Easton, is said to have been destroyed, but not the bridge over the Delaware at that place.

Several rail road brigdes in Burlington and Gloucester were carried away.

Easton, Pa., Jan. 8.—This morning, at half past 4, the splendid bridge over the Lehigh was torn from its abutments, and floated off a mass of ruin. At 8 o'clock, the Delaware attained the hight of thirty-five feet above low water mark.

On the Lehigh the following bridges have been carried away.—Bicey's bridge, the Allentown bridge, the Bethlehem bridge, the Freemansburgh bridge, and the Easton bridge. It is reported that the Rugglesville bridge, on the Delaware, has been carried away.

Allentown, Pa., Jan. 8.—About one o'clock, last night, the new and beautiful bridge recently erected over Lehigh at this place, though standing on piers some fifteen or twenty feet above the usual water mark, was swept down the stream. It is impossible to estimate the loss along the Lehigh. The Cran Iron company's grounds are reported to be under water, and their immense anthracite furnace is said to be chilled, if not ruined.

About midnight a family who live in a house above the company's dam, which was and is still in the middle of the torrent, were removed in boats, having attracted the attention of the spectators by firing several musket shots from an upper window. It was a bold undertaking; for the current was strong and the surface of the water covered with timber and ice.

Bethlehem, Pa. Jan. 8.—The beautiful bridge over the Lehigh is gone—the paper mill of Mr. Boyd, and Bickel's foundry, with other establishments, are all swept off.

Pottsville, Pa., Jan. 9.—The destruction of property has been considerable by the filling up of cellars, &c., in this borough, which in some instances was so sudden that the merchants had not time to remove their goods. Part of the embankment of the Green-wood canal has been swept away below the aqueduct—and the houses on the island were all completely surrounded with water. The families of some were carried out when the water was middle deep.

About 50 yards of the embankment of the Navigation Company's Canal has been swept away opposite Tumbling Dam, and about 100 feet of the embankment opposite C. Lawton's wharf, carrying away his schutes and boat-house, and the old bridge connecting the new turnpike with Mount Carbon was also carried off. The tow path bridge opposite Lewisport is carried away, and a breach has been made in the canal at Adams's Locks. Dribelbis's dam is also injured.

The Schuylkill Bridge below this borough is so much injured that it is considered dangerous to pass over it.

At the first dam above Audenried's Mill, the water broke out and completely surrounded the lock house, carrying away the stable, undermining the walls of both of which will probably fall down—about 100 yards of the embankment of the canal has also been carried away. A sick person in the lock house was rescued with great difficulty.

The town of Port Carbon was completely inundated—the water reached up almost as far as the bank; but two bridges are left standing. Mr. Kinsley has lost considerably, and Mr. Pott has lost his garden and an acre lot.

Mr. John Pott's dam, at his iron works, on the West Branch, has been swept away, and his works considerably injured.

At Schuylkill Haven, the damage has also been very great. Several of the coal wharves have been washed away, and the balance filled up.

The destruction of boats and coal has been very great, and the whole course of the streams in this neighborhood presented a frightful appearance yesterday.

From the New York Spectator.

FROM THE EAST.

Connecticut River.—At a late hour we received the following letter from Hartford.

Hartford, Ct., Jan. 10—evening.

We are now in the midst of one of the highest freshets ever known in the Connecticut river. During Friday and Friday night it rose with unprecedented rapidity, and at about 11 o'clock the merchants on Commerce street, having previously cleared their cellars, commenced removing their goods to the second stories. I finished clearing my lower floor about 1 o'clock on Saturday morning, and in less than an hour there was over a foot of water upon it.

During the night, the scene was beyond description. In Commerce street, and in all the streets east of Front street, every person was busy in securing his family and house-hold goods, or goods in his store.—Women and children were screaming for help to take them from the second story windows, and pigs and horses were squealing or neighing as the water invaded them in their pens or stables.

The river continued to rise until Saturday morning at about 10 o'clock, at which time the water rose within ten inches of the mark of 1801, on the old distillery. All of Front street was covered, except from the North side of Temple street, to a short distance South of State street. In State street the water came up to Beach & Co's store, second building East of Front street.

During this time the ice continued to run in very large quantities, and on Saturday morning it showed evidence of having become choked below, as the current of the river was so slow that the motion of the congealed masses was impracticable.—When this obstruction gave way, at about 10 o'clock, the rapidity of the current was instantly increased to its full extent, and the river fell in a very few minutes, some eighteen or twenty inches.

After this the water again commenced to rise, and it kept gradually advanced until day light this morning, when it was about eight or ten inches below the extreme height of yesterday morning. This I believe to be the natural swell of the river, from the rain and melting snow, without any aid from obstructions in the river from ice.

Since morning the river has fallen some four or five inches. It falls so slow, that I fear it will be several days before we get back into our stores again.

There must be much suffering on the part of families who have been driven from their homes, or into the second stories of the houses. I have heard of no accident to life or person. A number of horses and swine have been drowned.

The drybridge at the end of the causeway in East Hartford is gone; the powder house in the south meadow has floated off; a small house and the kitchen part of another have been carried away. The latter was a part of the old Wadsworth place, above the creek, and the other was farther above.

The water was so high on the upper part of Enfield falls as to run over the embankment into the canal, by which it is supposed considerable damage was done. The feeder dam to the Farmington canal, on the Farmington river, was mostly carried away, and the acqueduct at Westfield is gone.

One sloop was carried away in the ice, a schooner was nearly crushed against the old Victory's store house, which in its turn was nearly demolished.

Several bridges across the Farmington and other rivers were carried away, but I have heard of none on the Connecticut. I have no doubt that we shall hear of serious damage through the whole extent of the river.

This freshet is two or three feet higher than that of January 1839, and much higher than that of any other year since 1801.

Middletown.—A letter from Middletown, Ct., states that the meadow bridge across the Little River, and connecting the Lower and Upper houses, had been carried away. It is stated that the water was very high, but no other particular damage is mentioned.

FROM THE NORTH.

We have received intelligence from the North as far as Troy. On Friday at one o'clock the ice in the river opposite that city had broken up and was floating toward Albany.

From Albany we have advices also, to Friday evening at 8 o'clock.

South Market street was impassable for foot passengers, and all communication was carried on by boats.

Catskill.—The damage at this place and vicinity is reported to be extensive.

Saugerties.—The losses at this place are estimated at 100,000 dollars.

Truth from an unexpected quarter.—John M. Morehead was inaugurated and entered upon the duties of Governor of North Carolina, on Friday last. The following is an extract from his inaugural address:—

Nothing so surely indicates the happiness and prosperity of a people, as numerous School-houses well filled during the week; and churches well crowded on the Sabbath, and the latter is sure to follow the former. If we desire to perpetuate our glorious political institutions, we must give to all our people moral and intellectual cultivation—that man who improves his intellect for six days in the week, and on the seventh endeavors to give it the proper direction, from the precepts of our holy religion, who learns to do unto others as he would they should do unto him.—That man will never become a tyrant—and he can never become a slave.

SUMMARY.

Eclipse.—There will be a total eclipse of the moon, on the evening of the 5th of Feb. next. It will be visible in all parts of the United States.

Yale College.—There are 61 students in the theological department, 32 in the law department, 52 in the medical, and 429 in the collegiate.

FOUNTAIN IN THE DESERT.

He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out: they ran in the dry places like a river.—

He spoke, and from the barren rock
A crystal fountain burns:
Streams through the arid desert ran,
To slake the traveler's thirst:
Oh! joyous shouts were borne to heaven,
For that new type of mercy given.

They drank—the way-worn host of God,
And every languid eye
Looked bright again, as star gleam out,
When shadows have passed by
How grateful to the burning brow,
Was that cool fount's luxuriant flow!

Oh! deemed they not its worth beyond
The costliest diadem?
Could aught of finest gold compare,
Or pearl, or lustrous gem,
With those pure bubbles, as they broke
All glist'ning from the desert rock!

Love burned anew, and notes of praise
Arose to Abraham's god,
While yet again their pilgrimage
With cheerful feet they trod;
Onward, a chosen joyful band,
They hasten'd to the promised land.

Behold a better fount appears
'Mid life's drear wilderness,
Whence streams of living water flow,
The thirsty soul to bless;
Forth from a rock issues free,
And boundless as eternity.

The fever'd spirit, sore oppressd
With earthly wo and care;
The weary, and the guilty too,
May find refreshment there:
Hope springs and blossoms like the rose,
Where this celestial fountain flows.

And oh! can aught exceed its worth,
Bright gems, or purest gold!
Seem not the choicest things on earth,
Its stores of wealth untold,
Less than the fading hues of even,
Compared with this best gift of heaven!

Come nigh, ye pilgrims, faint and worn,
For you a fount has burst;
A Rock is open'd 'mid the waste!
Come, freely quench your thirst;
Then as on eagles' wings arise,
Soar for your immortal prize!

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Wilmington (Del.) Standard.

CONSITENCY.

If consistency is a jewel, as every body says it is, there must be a great many persons in this miscellaneous world of ours, who held jewels in very low estimation. Perhaps the cost of it is so great as to deter them from the purchase; for it must be acknowledged that consistency is oftentimes a very expensive jewel. It costs almost as much as a conscience, which is known to be entirely too costly for some men to keep. There is a good deal of plausibility in the doctrine advocated by some of the old German physicians, that the stomach is the seat of the soul. A day spent in exploring the taverns, oyster and eating houses in one of our populous towns, might almost convince a sceptic of the truth of that doctrine. Certain it is, that the souls of a great many people are hardly to be found if not in that capacious receptacle. And there are not a few of these everlasting eaters and drinkers, whose souls have so long companioned with their meat and drink, that they seem to have dissolved away under the process of digestion, and to have run into adipose. Phrenologists have allotted to a small space about friction point of the jaws the organ of alimentiveness.—But we think they attach too little importance to the organ. It should be located between the short ribs, and may one day become the basis of a new science, for which we suggest the title Gastrology or Gastroscopy.

But there is another class of human animals to whom we have already referred, and who are more concerned with the heading of this article—those who carry their souls in their pockets. "Make money, my son, make money. Make it honestly if you can, but MAKE MONEY"!! What doth it profit a man to be consistent, or to keep a good conscience, if he lose money by it? Or what shall a man gain in exchange for his purse? The end justifies the means, and that end is money.

We recollect an old gentleman who formerly lived in this city, and kept a small shop for the sale of "notions." He was a greater enemy of tobacco than King James, and considered it as little better than the personifications of the spirit of evil.—He was so troublesome to the church of which he was a member, that they disowned him for disturbing their religious worship by his unseasonable and perpetual exhortations against the "Devil's weed," as he was fond of styling it. One day, a Quaker gentleman was in his shop, when some one came in and asked for a cent's worth of tobacco. The tobacco hater stepped round the counter, and unrolled the noxious stuff from its huge coil, and supplied the demand of his customer. The Quaker, who knew the man to be a violent anti-tobacconist, was startled, and expressed his astonishment at the inconsistency of denouncing a disgusting practice, and at the same time furnishing the means of maintaining it. "Ah, Mr. F., said the shopkeeper," you do not understand me. My profession and practice are perfectly consisent. By my keeping tobacco and selling it, a great many people who need advice on the subject are induced to come to my shop, and this gives me an opportunity of lecturing them, and enforcing my testimony against the use of the 'Devil's weed.'"

This tobacco-hater was not a whit more inconsistent than many persons who are objects of ridicule. We will cite a few illustrations in proof.

The conductors of many newspapers are in the practice of treating their readers with frequent lectures on the evils of intemperance, and on the necessity of avoiding intoxicating drinks. They often declaim truly and eloquently against the deleterious influence of the traffic in alcohol, and denounce it as a national curse. But on looking into their advertising columns you will find the usual portion of advertisements, setting forth where Wine, Brandy, Rum, Gin, Cordials, and all kinds of excellent liquors can be obtained. Perhaps their object in admitting such advertisements is to gain the ears of rum-drinkers and rum-sellers, and convey to them their valuable lessons on the iniquities of the use and traffic. We saw lately in a Philadelphia paper, some excellent remarks attributing a large portion of the taxes under which that community is groaning, to the traffic in alcohol, and denouncing that traffic in the severest terms. In another column was an advertisement of the character refered to, in which almost every kind of poisonous drink was conspicuously named, and the reader recommended to that particular establishment to make his purchases. Call you this consistency?

Again, we read in some newspapers, professing a high regard to morality, eloquent expositions of the pernicious consequences of Theatres and Play houses—ascribing to these sinks of vice the most deplorable ravages in society. In the same paper, and perhaps in the next column, you will read a long list of theatrical advertisements, much more conspicuously arrayed than the philippics against the stage. Is this consistency?

Again, you read of the ill effects of lottery-gambling—you see it denounced as the vilest species of gambling, and instances are given of the most dreadful consequences resulting from it. Hard by, the eye lights on flaming announcements of "Splendid Prizes, Fortune's Home," and the like; tempting the reader by all the inducements that a publication can present to his cupidity or his wants, to embark in this "vilest species of gamblimg." Is this consistency?

Betting on elections has been denounced in unqualified terms by many papers, in the late political canvass; to this cause has been traced much of the corruption and fraud with which the political parties are infected. At the same time, currency is given by the same papers to challenges and other notices of bets; and in one instance, we observed an advertisement offering a large bet on the Presidential election, qualified by a grave notification that the proprietors of the paper were decidedly opposed to betting! Is this consistency?

But we have extended this article far beyond the limits contemplated in commencing it, while there are other instances of inconsistency which ought to be told. The further consideration of the subject we refer to the next number.

A THRILLING NARRATIVE.

We never read a narrative of wretchedness more touchingly told than the one which follows, from real life. The scene occurred in New York a week or two since, before the Police Court, and is from the New York Tattler—a paper remarkable for the vividness and power of its police reports. We never saw a mother's all-absorbing love for her children better described. If any one can read the following without feeling queer about the heart, he may depend he has none.—Argus.

GENUINE WRETCHEDNESS.—A tall, haggard-looking woman, very neatly clad, but with an air of worn-out gentility about her, was charged with stealing a brass candlestick, worth about two shillings. She sat apart from the other prisoners, and appeared to be deeply stricken with poverty and sorrow. It was evident, that she took no interest in her present position, nor cared for the disgrace or inconvenience she might be subjected to, but that her sorrows had a deeper root, and that her heart (alas, what a wretched heart that was!) was elsewhere. She sighed continually, but her sighs were suppressed, as if she did'nt wish them to be overheard; and her eyes were red and hard with weeping, and she would have wept still, but she had no tears to shed.—She was beyond that. The poor creature's hair was loose & ragged; her paroxysms, her wrinkled brow, and her haggard eye, gave evidence of much mental suffering; and her pinched up, attenuated nose and chin, and hollow, skinney cheek, told but too plainly that stark famine had almost done its worst upon her; for she was so much wasted, that there could be but little further effected by the grave and the worms. Her dress consited of an old tattered gown, and that was all; for the rents here and there made it but too evident that she had no inner garment, and she was alas deficient in shoes and stockings. God help her! Much as we are used to scenes of poverty and misery, we did not think there was so forlorn a creature in existence, or even that a being could exist and be so forlorn. Her name was Ellen Barclay.

The Court having disposed of three or four trifling cases, called Ellen Barclay, but received no answer. "Don't you hear his worship call?" said a watchman. Still no answer.

"Get up," added the watchman, with an oath, and he was about to lay rude hands on her, when he looked her in the face, but was at once subdued, and almost terrified, by its expression of abstract misery. It was evident the wretched woman was wrapped up in her own agonizing reflections, and that she was not aware of what was passing around her.

Being at length aroused to a knowledge of her position, however, her fit of abstraction forsook her, and she became keenly sensitive; her countenance relaxing from its expression of contemplative suffering, and assuming a mingled air of eagerness, distrust, and solicitation.

"Do you know what you are confined for, Ellen?" inquired the Court.

"I do, Sir, I do," exclaimed the prisoner, clasping her hands together, and looking as nothing but deep misery and want can look. "I do, Sir, I do. It is for stealing a little brass candlestick; and, oh, God! oh God! I wish I had stolen and got off with it, for I fear that my little Dickey is dead, and that my poor little Ellen and Mary are crying themselves to death over him."

Court. You acknowledge, then, that you attempted to steal the candlestick?

Prisoner. I do, Sir—kill me—hang me—do what you like with me—but oh! for God's sake, send some one to look after my children.

Court. Where are your children?

Prisoner. (Looking wildly about her.) Ah! that's it,—I fear they are dead and gone forever; for they had nothing to wear—nothing to eat—no bed to lie on—and their poor mother in prison. Oh Ood! I wish I had killed myself, and them, before it came to this; for then, at all events, I would have been with them when they were dying!

Court. Poor woman, I pity you, and will have you comforted.

Prisoner. You can not comfort me unless you bring me my children. The biggest is only six years old, and they have eaten nothing since Monday. O go quick, for I know my babies are dead or dying, as human nature can not stand so much as they were called upon to suffer.

Court. I again ask you where yon can find them?

Prisoner. O, Sir, I don't know how to tell you, but I could find it out myself, for its somewhere close at hand. They are in a long, dark hall, under a stairs, where we have lived for a fortnight. For the Father of Mercies your worship ———— permit me to go and find them, and, dead or alive, I'll return, and let you do what you please with me.

Here the poor creature threw herself on her knees to implore his worship for liberty to go and look for her children, and an officer had been desired to attend her for that purpose, when the door opened, and a watchman entered with an infant in his arms, and two half naked, trembling little girls, the one about four and the other about six years old, holding on to his coat.

Instantly the prisoner sprung to her feet and rushed toward the watchman, shrieking, "Is Dick alive?" and on finding that he was alive she laughed hysterically, clasped the infant wildly to her bosom, and danced about the office; and throwing herself upon the form exhausted, she took her two half famished infants in her lap, when they all commenced laughing and weeping together.

Meanwhile the watchman had told his worship that the eldest girl had called his attention to the children, and that he found them huddled together, under a stairs, evidently in a state of starvation, and with nothing to cover them other than the rags they had on.

Court. Now, Mrs. Barclay, since you have got your children, will you answer me a few questions, and I'll have you and them properly taken care of.

Prisoner. I will, Sir. I'll do anything now; but oh! whatever you do, don't part us again.

Court. Never fear. How long have you been in this city?

Prisoner. About two months, Sir.

Court. How have you supported yourself in that time?

Prisoner. I hardly know, Sir, but we eat very little. I tried to get work, but no one would employ me, because they said I looked so shabby. I then went to beg, but some people told me they would have me taken up, and others that I was drunk: though, God knows, at the time, I was almost wild with starvation, and with hearing my poor infants crying for food. And so, Sir, I was driven on by sheer necessity until I did the thing that brought me here.

Court. What brought you to New York, when you had no friend here?

Prisoner. I come here to seek my husband, Sir, who deserted me six months ago for another woman; but wen I found him, he only beat me: and when I told him that I and my children were starving, he said he wished we were all dead; and God knows so did I.

Poor Ellen then stated, that for seven years she and her husband had lived very comfortably together in Albany, where they had kept a little store; but that a servant girl, whom she had hired to take care of the children, while she herself attended to the store, had induced him to go off with her, and to take everything of value along with them. From that time she did nothing but pine away, until necessity compelled her to go in search of her husband, whom she knew to be in New York. And we have heard the result. The complaint of the larceny having been withdrawn, the unfortunate family were ordered to be taken care of, and will probably be handed over to the commissioners of the alms-house this morning.

EXTENT OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

The last number of the Edingburgh Review contains an article on this subject, which places the matter in a clear but startling point of view. According to the writer, who has gathered most of his facts from Sir Thomas Buxton's able work on this subject, the whole importation of slaves from the coast of Africa into the Spanish and Portuguese colonies, amounts at least to one hundred and fifty thousand annually—and the grounds on which the calculation is built, would raise it much higher. In three years, ending 1830, there appear, by the returns of the British Vice Consul at Rio de Janeiro, to have been 148,940 imported into that place, or nearly 50,000 a year, and returns from the British Commissioners show the importation into Bahia, Pernambuco, Maranham, and Para, to have been at least 21,000 during the same period. In 1792, the slave population of Brazil was 600,000; in 1835 it was 2,000,000—and by making due allowance for the deaths of newly imported slaves, &c., the total importation to Brazil alone, must have equalled 130,000 a year!

According to authentic documents, the importation into Cuba has been very large also. The annual excess of deaths over births in that island is 8 1-2 per cent, being 10 upon sugar, and five upon coffee plantation. In 1828, the census gave 300,000 for the whole slave population, which in 1830 should have fallen to 250,000, had there been no importation. Instead of that, it had increased to 479,000, leaving an excess of about 230,000, or an importation of about 125,000 yearly. So that by these statements the importation into Brazil and Cuba would seem to be about 245,000, instead of 150,000, at which Sir T. Buxton is content to take it. The price of slaves being £70 in those countries, this indicates an expenditure of between seventeen and eighteen millions yearly.

After making every allowance, says the reviewer, for the inaccuracy of the returns supposing, as is very possible, that the census may have been less accurate at the earlier periods to which those returns relate; the melancholy result is yet certain that ever since the peace the slave trade has been carried on by the Spaniards and Portuguese to an extent wholly unparalleled at any other period of its history. For, in 1790, before the destruction of St. Domingo, it was never by any one supposed to exceed 70,000; and the very lowest estimate now made carries it to double that amount.

FANCIES AND REALITIES.

Eyes, dazzled long by Fiction's gaudy rays,
In modest Truth no light nor beauty find;
And who, my child, would trust the meteor blaze,
That soon must fail, and leave the wanderer blind—
More dark and helpless, far, than if it ne'er had shined!

Fancy enervates while it soothes the heart,
And while it dazzles, wounds the mental sight:
To joy, a bright'ning charm it can impart,
But wraps the hour of wo in tenfold night
And often, when no real ills affright,
Its visionary fiends, an endless train,
Assail with equal or superior might;
And through the throbbing heart, and dizzy brain,
And shivering nerves, shoot stings of more than mortal pain.

And yet, alas! the real ills of life
Claim the full vigor of a mind prepared—
Prepared for patient, long, laborious strife,
Its guide experience, and truth its guard
We fare on earth, as other men have fared;
Were they successful? let us not despair
Was disappointment oft their sole reward?
Yet shall their fate instruct, if it declare
How they have borne the load ourselves are doomed to bear.

From the New York Evangelist.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION—AN INCIDENT

The following facts have been in my possession some time, and were communicated by one who understood the whole transaction.

Miss S., who was connected with several families of the Catholic persuasion, professed to have experienced a change of heart, and united with an evangelical protestant church, in one of our Eastern cities.

She soon after became an inmate of the family of one of her Roman Catholic friends where it seemed to be a desirable object to convert her from her supposed errors.

In order to insure success in this enterprise, she was frequently visited by a priest whose learning and talents were thought equal to the task of enlightening her darkened mind.

His manners were bland, and his skill sufficient to confound, though not convince her understanding. At some times his persuasions were so plausible and his deportment so pleasing, that her faith wavered, and she became half inclined to yield her predilections for the church with which she was connected. Soon after, however, her doubts were dissipated, and her purposes fixed.

Learning that he would, on a certain day, renew his labors, she earnestly prayed for strength and wisdom, by which to repel his arguments, and silence his appeal.

As was expected, he soon arrived, and on this occasion attempted to prove the doctrine of transubstantiation. While the discussion was proceeding, respecting the conversion of the wine of the sacrament, into the real and literal blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, by the act of consecration, she recollected the account of that sacrament, as according to the language of Paul, it was administered at Corinth.

If, said she, there be such an entire change of the nature of the elements as you name, how did the literal blood of the Son of God make some of the Corinthians drunk? Surely it is not one of the properties of blood to intoxicate, much less the life-giving blood of Immanuel. Her prayer was answered. The priest was confounded and did not even attempt an answer.

From this time, she seemed to be considered a hopelessly confirmed heretic, and no further attempts were made for her conversion.

It appears to me that the argument in this case is entirely new, at least, I have never heard it before. It is, however, as conclusive as it is new, and can be used with overwhelming power, against the propagators of this unscriptural doctrine.

'Tis the misery of the poor to be neglected of men: 'tis the misery of the rich to neglect God.

THE VILLAGE BELLE.

Eliza D—— was one of those interesting beings whose first appearance attracts the eye of the stranger. She was happy in loving and being beloved by parents whose circumstances permitted them to amply provide for her education. The halcyon days of her childhood passed by, marked only with uninterrupted prosperity, and no portentous cloud hung over her future prospects.

Her father, in early life, was a minister of the Gospel, and his fine talents procured for him great popularity. But the period arrived when he became weary of his high and holy calling, and he renounced his former belief and was a professed Universalist. This change of sentiment produced a great change in his family. They were introduced into all the gayeties of fashionable life, in which they deeply participated. Soon after the renunciation of Eliza's father, there was an extensive revival of religion throughout the country in which the village of P—— shared largely. Eliza felt deeply interested in the salvation of her soul. The vanities of the world dwindled into nothing when compared with her eternal interests. She went to the house of prayer and heard the servant of God proclaim the way of life and salvation. She was impressed with a sense of her exceeding sinfulness, and desired the prayers of Christians and knelt at the altar. She was watched by her parents. They led her from the altar and the house, and tried every means to drive away her melancholy, as they termed it. Against her own inclination they took her to a Universalist meeting. A Cotillon Party was appointed on her account, and by much entreaty she consented to attend it. She was heard to say, from that moment her serious impressions left her, and that she could not stem the tide of opposition; and in order to find peace of mind she must put implicit confidence in her father's sentiments, and if he was mistaken and finally lost, she was willing to share his fate also.

* * * * * * *

Years rolled on, and Eliza became the village belle. Her father was successful in business, and able to procure the gaudy trappings which her thoughtless heart desired. The most of her time was devoted to amusements. Her personal attractions, joined with intellectual beauty, won many admirers who would live awhile upon her smiles, and then she would turn to some newly acquired favorite. Among those who sought her hand, was one who had been the playmate of her childhood. He had loved her ere her heart knew guile or had learned to practice deceit. His parents removed to a distance from the village of P—— before he arrived at the age of manhood, where he acquired good habits, and was well established in business and much respected. Eliza's parents saw that her love of pleasure must be checked, and they urged her to accept of the offered hand of her early friend. He knew not precisely the manner in which Eliza spent her time. He would spend a week at her place of residence when she would devote her time exclusively to him. He knew she had faults, and would sometimes chide her for her vanity, but he could not erase the early affection which he felt for her from his heart, and she was at length his affianced bride. But who can confide in a heart that never concentrates its affections upon one object, but like the gay butterfly of a summer day, sports awhile with every gaudy flower! In the routine of amusements which Eliza pursued, the theatre was often resorted to. One of the actors was enamored with her beauty, and professed his attachment to her; it was mutual. But from regard to the feelings of her parents and public opinion, she rejected his proposals of marriage. It was rumored that Eliza expected soon to be married to her early friend. And thus it was. Great preparations were making at her father's house for the wedding. All was gayety with its inmates, save one. She, who was wont to be the gayest of the gay, seemed not much interested in what was passing around her. A look of melancholy was discernable upon her countenance, and appearances indicated that all was not right. One day her father entered the apartment where she was setting, an open letter lay before her, and she was weeping. What, my child, weeping when you are so soon to be united to one of the most worthy of men? Why so sad? I hardly know why, but I was thinking that I had so long lived on airy dreams of bliss that I should make a poor companion for Wm. R——. His manner of life is different from mine. True, he is no devotee of pleasure, yet he delights to partake of innocent amusements. There is something else to be considered, Eliza. You know his parents left him a patrimony, and he is engaged in lucrative business, and is able to support you in affluence. The time will arrive when you must turn aside from the giddy throng to find enjoyment, and where will you find more refined pleasure than that beside your own fireside. It was said that the old gentleman did not approve of the career of folly that Eliza pursued, and that he cast some reflections upon his conduct respecting her. The actor had gone to a distant city, where, by some means, he heard that Eliza was to be married to her early friend. He immediately returned to the village of P—— where, by stratagem, he had an interview with Eliza —an elopement was agreed upon, which took place the day that preceded the one that was fixed upon for her marriage. All was in consternation at her father's house. The voice of mirth was hushed, and the preparations ceased. Her father had gone to an adjoining town to make arrangements for the expected wedding, and did not return until evening. He was informed that Eliza had eloped with the actor. He, with some of his friends, proceeded after them and overtook them at a village about fifty miles distant, where they were just ready to be married. The meeting can more easily be imagined than described. He told Eliza that he would use no coercive measures with her, but tried every means to persuade her to return with him. She was much affected, but remained fixed in her purpose, and desired her father to stay and see the marriage ceremony performed. He said he could not, but if the grave was about to close over her and hide her from his sight, he could look on with calmness, and it would be a melancholy pleasure when compared with his present feelings. They were married and proceeded on their way to New York, and the father returned to his once happy, but now desolate home. The parents were left to reflect upon their past conduct towards the child. And, perhaps, conscience reminded them that they taught her to seek enjoyment at the convivial party, and to disregard the precepts of the Bible. Parental affection was deeply implanted in their hearts, and they could not brook the idea that their child was in a large city with a stranger, whose character and calling they disapproved of. Resentment could not find place in their heart, and the father went to New York in search of his erring child, where he found her quite happily situated. Her husband found employment in a mercantile house, and Eliza had an opportunity of indulging her love of amusements more than formerly. The old gentleman made proposals to them to return home with him, of which they accepted.—What mingled emotions of joy and sorrow must have agitated the bosom of Eliza when she drew near the home of her childhood? The meeting with her friends was of no ordinary kind. She was received as one who had been lost to them, and they had hardly dared to cherish her memory. Painful, indeed, were the recollections which it recalled to mind. But after all her deviations from the path of rectitude, she was forgiven. Her father advanced a large sum of money to her husband, which enabled him to commence business with very flattering prospects. The ball-room and other places of amusement was still frequented by Eliza, and if her husband's business prevented him from attending with her, she would willingly accept of some other one for a partner. Thus, time wore away, and Eliza was again accounted happy by the thoughtless multitude.

"How sad a sight is human happiness,
To those whose thoughts can pierce beyond an hour;
Know, smiler! at thy peril art thou pleased,
Thy pleasure is the promise of thy pains."

For a time, Eliza's husband was successful in business, but by a life of extravagance, and folly, and inattention to his affairs they were reduced to poverty, and Eliza returned to her parents with three small children, to lead a solitary life, almost "unknowing and unknown;" and her husband is a wanderer she knows not where. And she can now trace the first origin of her misfortunes to the indiscretion of her parents. But the blighted hopes which her conduct caused, ends not here. The happiness of another individual, and of another circle of friends has been destroyed. Her early friend, him to whom she was betrothed, has suffered much; but he has done with the disappointments of earth, and his body rests beneath the sod "where yew-tree branches wave." At first, he bore the disappointment manfully. There was no change in his outward appearance, excepting he mingled in the society of his friends more than usual, and said he was glad to be released from the fickle girl, although the cup of happiness was dashed from his lips. But at length he grew melancholy, and dire disease—

"Seized on his manly frame, exhausted slow
The fountain springs of life. Now withering fell
Health's blooming rose, and o'er his ghastly cheek
Played the light hectic flush. His step so light, so free,
So like an angel's tread, grew slow and heavy.
But ah! his eye with purer radiance beamed,
Than in health's rosy hour. 'Twas not the flash
Of vivid wit, or genius' glittering ray,
That shone with so unearthly lustre there.
His was the Christian's hope—that hope which buoys
The sinking soul above life's troubled waves,
That sweetly points beyond the shadowy vale
Where disappointment's blasts ne'er touch the heart,
Where grief's dark shades ne'er sully holy joy."

Gibson-Ville, Jan. 8th, 1841. S. G.

RELIGIOUS.

LORD, WHAT IS MAN!

A very important inquiry. How important that we know what we are. And how proper that we make the inquiry with our heart's desires raised to heaven for divine aid in so important an investigation. What is man? Offspring of the dust. A creature of yesterday. "He cometh forth like a flower," and "fleeth like a shadow." What is his life? As a vapor. How fleeting.—Ever hastening to its close. Three-score years and ten, how short, how soon gone; and how soon his place will know him no more. In all his glory of health and strength, riches and honor—a wind passes over him, and he is gone to his long home, and the mourners go about the street. And all things move on as though he never existed. What are his resolutions? You may hear him resolving to-day with full purpose, to live differently, to break off some evil habit, to renounce some evil course, to shun some vicious companions, and to pursue a virtuous course. To-morrow you see him pursuing the same old track, just as though he never had thus resolved; and all his resolutions are lost in the wind, all are forgotten and pass away like the morning cloud, and the early dew.

And what is his wisdom? Almost perfect folly. How much weakness is mixed with all he does. How many mistakes, and how much ignorance. He cannot comprehend the works of God around him, with all his boasted knowledge. How soon is he lost when he undertakes the task, and is forced to confess his ignorance, and feel his nothingness. Let him try to explain the wonders of nature or providence, and he must fail altogether. O how humiliating! What becomes of our pride and self-conceit. What is his moral character? He is by nature an enemy to his Creator, preserver and greatest benefactor; one who has always been doing him good, and one upon whom he is continually dependent for every breath he breathes and every step he moves. And upon whose Spirit he is dependent entirely to lead and guide him to heaven. His feelings are such, and his situation such as an enemy, and a transgressor against the just and holy laws of God, that it is impossible for him ever to make amends for the dishonor he has cast upon God, or for one of all the ten thousand sins he has committed. And although God has opened a way of reconciliation, he rejects it with all his heart, while every day and hour he is adding to his innumerable sins. He owes ten thousand talents and he has nothing to pay. And yet, strange as it may seem, he is full of his own self-righteousness, and opposed to God, his word, and Spirit.

What are his deserts? He deserves nothing good from the hand of his Maker. No temporal favor, no aid of the Spirit, no light from heaven to guide his feet in the path of peace. No, he has forfeited all. He hears the thunders of the law, and the invitations of the gospel with the same careless indifference, and has thus cut him off from every claim to mercy. And when the Spirit has whispered in his breast to turn from sin, he has resisted. When reason and conscience have remonstrated, he has outraged them and put them to silence. Is any thing clearer than that he deserves no good at the hand of God? He deserves his wrath, and the threatened penalty of the law of God which he has despised and made light of. Life and death have been set before him and he has chosen death. And is it not plain that he deserves it? Can any thing be plainer?—Would it not be just in God to shut him out of Heaven forever? Forever to withhold the aid of that Spirit which he has resisted, and leave him to his own chosen way? Must not reason and conscience forever say, Amen, to such a decision?

Such is the situation of man. Cut off from all claims to any good from God, by his own voluntary conduct, he is entirely in the hand, and at the mercy of God. If he is saved, it will be grace, undeserved favor from first to last; and if he is lost, justice will shine in his condemnation, and conscience will forever acquit God of injustice. What then is his duty? It is his duty to surrender himself up to God unreservedly. To confess his deserts, feel that God would be just in his condemnation, and that if he is saved, it will be grace from first to last. Such conduct will honor God and keeps us in our place.

Is not this a true picture of man as presented above? Does not conscience testify to the truth of it? If so, let us never forget it. Let us not go away and forget what we are. It is dangerous for us to get out of our place, or lose a sense of our vileness. We then are prepared to quarrel with God's word and conduct, and to think him a hard master. But let us keep in our place, and carry about with us a humbling sense of our situation and deserts, and we shall find little or no difficulty with the word or conduct of our Maker, and shall never charge God foolishly. And the moment we are tempted to do it, we shall repel the temptation by asking, "who art thou?" But when we get out of place, every thing else appears out of place, and we look at every thing else through a false medium?—Chr. Mirror.

MEMORIAL OF MRS. HEMANS.

A better memorial of her than any from her own pen, or from the recollections of her family, will be found in the beautiful testimony of an attendant, who has since followed her beloved mistress to the haven of rest. It occurs in a letter written by her a few months after Mrs. Hemans's death: and it is a remarkable instance, not merely of innate susceptibility and delicacy of feeling, which are not confined to any particular rank or station, but of an intellectual refinement, like that of the "Dairyman's Daughter," which is not usual among persons of the writer's station in life. It seems if her intercourse with Mrs. Hemans had etherealised her; and who can say how much the Scriptural knowledge and humble faith of the dependant were blessed to her highly gifted mistress.

"It is a continual cause of thankfulness to me that I was so wonderfully supported, even to the last sad hour—sad it must ever be to me; it is a thing not to wear off. Oh, no! with me it seems to deepen daily—remembrances grow dearer. My thought of her is like some hidden treasure, [illegible] which no power could win from me. I feel it would be downright selfishness to wish her back: it may well be said this was not her rest. She ever seemed to me as a wanderer from her heavenly Father's mansion, who knew too much of that home to seek a resting-place here! She often said to me, 'I feel like a tired child—wearied and longing to mingle with the pure in heart.' At other times she would say, 'I feel as if I were sitting with Mary at the feet of my Redeemer, hearing the music of his voice, and learning of Him to be meek and lowly.' And then she would say, 'Oh Anna! do not you love your kind Savior? The plan of redemption was indeed a glorious one; humility was indeed the crowning work.—When any body speaks of His love to me, I feel as if they were too slow; my spirit can mount alone with him into those blissful realms, with far more rapidity.'

"My heart gets too full for utterance when I think of her affectionate manner to me. She often told me that she believed I had been sent to her in answer to her earnest prayer, and said that, whatever might be her fate, I might always feel that my being with her had not been in vain. These were her words; and the searcher of hearts only knows how thankful, yet humbled, I feel for such an inestimable blessing. It is one for which I feel I shall have to render an account. May it prove a blessed one! I wish I could tell you more of what she said; but my language is so poor, so weak, that when I would try, it is as if I were robbing her words of their brightness; but then I know that none can speak as she did. These are not words of course; no, I can truly say my ties to earth are weakened, because she is no longer here."—London Christian Observer.

MORAL POWER OF THE GOSPEL.

The Gospel is not the fearful burden of Isaiah, threatening judicial blindness and hardness of heart. It is a message from Pity to Misery—an invitation from Mercy to Guilt. It is a gift from the fulness of God to the emptiness of man. The witness for Christ takes with him a treasure more precious than the ancient Jew, could he have taken the ark of the temple. The Christian missionary takes with him tears—the tears of incarnate compassion; blood—the expiatory blood of the Son of God. "Before your eyes," said the apostle to the Galatians, "Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you."—Brethren, he goes to India with the cross, to repeat the scenes of Calvary, to let the Hindoo see Christ crucified before his eyes. Does he feel sufficiently the grandeur of this message? He goes to Africa with the identical gospel that Paul took to Rome. He goes to China with the identical blessing that Christ brought from heaven. Oh, it was the consideration of their subject—its necessity, its adaptation, its infinite grace and glory, which fired the apostles—which made them think little of life itself when this was at stake—which made them wonder that any should suppose that persecution could affright them from their office—which gave them the ambassadors, the ports of kings—which would have led them, if necessary, to contend for precedence with an angel. He goes to address a nature which, however depraved, was originally pre-configured to the truth, and the message he bears is divinely adapted to the moral state which that depravity has created—and the Spirit goes with him.—He goes to tell the victims of imposture of essential truth—to point the eye of the Hindoo widow from the corpse of her husband to Him who is the Resurrection and the Life—to tell the infanticide mother that she may save her offspring, and may press them to her heart—to tell the [illegible] of [illegible] Boodna of a true [illegible] the parched pilgrim of the desert, [illegible] water that springs [illegible]—and the [illegible] of the Ganges, of the washing of regeneration, [illegible] of the Holy Ghost—[illegible] votary of cruelty, that the name of [illegible] Love—and the self-immolating worshipper of Juggernaut, of the sacrifice offered once for all, and of the blood which cleanseth from all sin. [illegible] guilt has [illegible] accumulating [illegible] since the time of the deluge [illegible] mand of Christ is, "Go to it." And, having gone, challenge them to produce the one guiltiest man of their nation; and the command of Christ is, "Offer him redemption through the blood of the cross." Have they, as many of the nations have, a fabulous tradition that such or such a cavern is the mouth of hell? Ask them to lead you to it; for even there, could the dreadful spot be found, your commission would extend—to the very brink; for He [illegible] most.

In testifying to the necessity [illegible] ty of the Gospel, we occupy [illegible] than did even the apostles. Since [illegible] day, nearly eighteen hundred years [illegible] added their testimony to [illegible] by [illegible] spiritual deliverers [illegible] direct from heaven [illegible] hundred years have only served [illegible] strate the sufficiency of the [illegible] dy. Guilt, which might destroy a world, has been cancelled [illegible] sin have been burst [illegible] with pollution, made [illegible] where Satan's seat was [illegible] ties have been [illegible] blessed by it, and heaven [illegible] growing [illegible] its never [illegible] our voice [illegible]—all the [illegible] rise up and [illegible] tuntary, and urge us to repeat it [illegible] er, and yet deeper, our [illegible] claiming its efficiency, the thousands who in every age have been saved by [illegible] to speak louder in its praise [illegible] all heaven comes to our aid, ascribing [illegible] to the Lamb that was slain [illegible]—Dr. Harris.

THE BIBLE TO BE [illegible]

[illegible]

There is one thing [illegible] schools, which has [illegible] to my mind: the [illegible] Scriptures. I hope [illegible] the all-sufficiency of [illegible] faith and practice [illegible] any formulary [illegible] which the Bible is [illegible] the Bible is the [illegible] formulary, creed, [illegible] to be judged, and [illegible] accordingly. [illegible] of the children [illegible] Scriptures themselves [illegible] teach them very [illegible] interpret the Scriptures, [illegible] to misrepresent, and [illegible] they would put the [illegible] the place of Christ [illegible] supplied with [illegible] the operations of [illegible] future days. I [illegible] thought of mixing [illegible] Let the word of God [illegible] in all our schools. [illegible] sign of the times, that [illegible] becoming elevated [illegible] on which the final appeal is to be made. I know there were many persons who thought [illegible] destroy [illegible] injury, unless it were accompanied with some formulary, some safe-guard to keep it from doing harm. Very respectable men, gentlemen, educated men, have [illegible] to me solemnly that such was their [illegible]; that it was a very dangerous thing to put the Bible into the hands of all classes, especially of young children. I hold the notion to be an absurdity; a libel both on the Author of the book and on the human mind. I believe that there is no book in the whole world easier to be understood in all its essential parts; one more universally adapted to man in all the capacities and all the diversified situations of human life. Its truths can enter into the minds of the humblest, as well as the highest orders, and under all the disadvantages of the want of literature; like the elements of water, which, while it fills the bed of the ocean, can insinuate itself into the smallest crevice; or like the element of light, which, while it gladdens the monarch in his palace can cheer the peasant in his cot. I believe that the Scriptures can make every class wise unto salvation. I believe that they can, through the blessing of God, make young children wise unto salvation; that they can understand its histories, precepts, and doctrines, so far as is necessary to their salvation. I wish that those Objectors had heard me examine some Sunday School children on the parables. They were not told before hand what question they would be asked, but were left to the answers which might be prompted by their own minds. The parable of the Sower was one; "Who are meant by the stony-ground hearers?" "People with hard hearts."—"Who are meant by the way-side hearers?" "People who do not attend to what they hear." "Who are meant by thorny-ground hearers?" "People who are choked by the cares of life." "And what are the [illegible]" "If you please, it is worrying [illegible] themselves." I wish they could have [illegible] heard the words of a little Irish boy on [illegible] the conversation of our Lord with Nicodemus [illegible] new birth. "What is the meaning [illegible]" [illegible] "What is a miracle?" "A wonder." "What is the new birth?" "A great change." "What [illegible] of heaven?" "Och, your [illegible] it is something here, (pointing to his breast,) and something up yonder." Oh! but they cannot understand the Bible! It is very clear that those objectors do not understand [illegible] that from the want of giving [illegible] attention to it, and thinking about it. There are multitudes of minds which never had a noble thought, and multitudes of persons who have a mind which they [illegible] suppose that nobody else ought to [illegible]. It is like a blind man finding [illegible] other people for opening their eyes [illegible] telling them, that as it was only a little light they could see, there would be great danger of its leading them wrong. I [illegible] you will hear no more of the [illegible] knowledge only which [illegible] sure tendency of [illegible] from these for more [illegible] standing the [illegible] Scriptures. I believe that there are many [illegible] members of [illegible] an examination [illegible] Sunday School teachers. There [illegible] who would put old-[illegible] the readiness of [illegible] familiar acquaintance [illegible] with the sacred Scriptures.—*Rev. [illegible] A CHRISTIAN MOTHER. [illegible]

[illegible] to the world.—Kirwan.

[illegible]—The last [illegible] character of [illegible] The [illegible] the whole [illegible] was suspended from his [illegible] to hang. [illegible] sunk under [illegible] of suffering; but even here he [illegible] forget his mother. He gave, in the [illegible] possible, his dearest friend [illegible] to protect [illegible] care of her as long as she [illegible]. He did this, almost by a word; for under such circumstances it was torture to speak. "Behold thy mother." That was all; but it was enough. Now let me ask each one of my readers, whether young or old, who has a mother still in life, as you shut this book at the close of this paper, to go and devise some act of kindness and affection for her in imitation of the dying example which the Savior set us. Do something to cheer and comfort her; even if it is no very substantial act of kindness, it will bring gladness to her heart, as a memorial of your kindness and affection.—Abbott.

CONVERSATION WITH A YOUNG SCEPTIC.

In a party of Christian friends, a young man was introduced, shrewd, well read, and amiable; but a professed sceptic! He had engaged a part of the circle in the details of the objections against the Scripture.—"How unlikely the story of the temptation, the universal darkness at the crucifixion, the dead coming out of their graves into the city, &c.!" Embarrassment sat in the faces of some, while others were endeavoring to make the accounts appear to be very probable.

I found it necessary to expose him.—"You have doubts, then, sir, respecting the Christian revelation; may I ask the ground of those doubts, and to what parts they refer?" "To the whole," he replied, with a smile of apparent satisfaction and confidence.

"Nay, but we must descend to particulars. Do you doubt whether the books of the New Testament were written by the persons whose names they bear."

"I do."

"Do you then believe that the works which are ascribed to Cicero and to Virgil, were written by them?"

"Certainly; they have been in the world a long while; we can go back to very early editions of them, and these refer us to early ones still. And the learned have admitted them to be genuine. They could not have been written by other men, for they must have been clever men who wrote those works, and could not be unknown, or deprived of their fair fame."

"Why, said one of the company, "we have just all these grounds for believing the Scriptures to be the work of the parties who are said to have written them; so we must take all or none."

The young man was silent.

"Then, sir, since it seems pretty clear the books are genuine, what sort of persons do you suppose their authors to be? Were they bad men?"

"They might be," said he, "for aught I know."

"But could bad men be the authors of such a system of morality? I believe you can mention no vice, which they have not reprobated in the severest terms, nor any virtue which they have not placed in the clearest and most attractive light. Were they impious fingers which drew such a portrait?"

"Well, they might have been very good sort of men, and copied their system from other works."

"But, if good, they were inspired, for they declare they spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; under the teachings promised them by their Master. Now, it is not compatible with the character of good men to lay claim to so high a matter if they were not fully assured of its truth."

"Oh, they were a set of enthusiasts!"

"Pray, sir, what is enthusiasm?"

"Why,—it is a heated imagination, a set of wild incoherent notions; and this is what they have uttered."

"But what has this to do, sir, with the facts which they relate? Enthusiasm does not deprive a man of eyes, ears, touch, memory. They declare what they saw, heard, and felt; and being good men, the facts were so; the miracles they relate did take place; then their author must have been divine; then their inspiration true; and the Christian revelation imperishable.

"Well; he had his own opinions, he did not wish to press the subject further, nor to be so obtruded on the company."

"Nay, young man, you ought to be ingenious; you ought to own you were wrong. You have taken upon you to determine concerning a matter which you have not examined. Why not yield to conviction?—Abandon sceptical modes of thinking; they have a direct tendency to beget captiousness and conceit; to destroy whatever is candid and generous in controversial warfare; to lead the mind to view questions of great and acknowledged interest to our whole species, with coldness, apathy, and distrust. In one word, the general and most valuable of our mental principles, become paralyzed and enfeebled by a constant habit of frivolous doubting and minute fastidiousness as to the degree of evidence to produce firm and internal conviction on subjects of vital importance."

From the Morning Star.

HOLINESS.—God is a holy being. "For I am holy." Lev. xi. 44, 45,—xx. 7. His works are holy. "The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." Ps. cxlv. 17. Heaven is a holy place.—"God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness." Ps. xlvii. 8. All his angels are holy. "When the son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him." Matt. xxv. 31. The way to heaven is a holy way. "And a high way shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called, The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it." Isa. xxxv. 8. God requires holiness of all his people. "Be ye holy." Lev. xx. 7. All who would enter heaven must be holy. "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Heb. xii. 14. "And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie."—We must become holy in this life. "For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." Eccl. ix. 10. How is it with thee, reader? Are there not some sins lurking in thy heart! Remember, thy heart must bar out every sin, or sin will forever bar thy soul out of heaven, and lock thee up in that dark abyss of eternal woe! Flee to Christ, whose blood "cleanseth from all sin." O. B.

POWER OF RELIGION.—Without removing a single passion, the gospel alters its operation and influence, by simply giving it a new direction: leaving actions and externals to themselves, it grapples with motives and principles. It is thus the lever, that raises the otherwise immoveable weight—the Prometheus, that wakes the dead form into life. It tells the creature of the Creator; the sinner, of a Redeemer and a Sanctifier; and the immortal of eternity; and from these themes draws the principles and motives of everlasting life.

DEATH IN TRESPASSES AND SINS.—The heart of an obdurate sinner may be called his sepulchre, which by means of long habits of sin, is shut up against grace, as by a hard and heavy stone, and in which there is nothing but darkness and corruption.—It is a very great mercy when the Deliverer comes to that prison, when the light shines in the darkness, and holiness itself visits that corruption.—Quesnel.

VILLAGE LECTURES.

The village Lecture for this evening, (29th,) will be delivered at the village school house, by H. A. NELSON, A. M., of Eaton. Subject, The proper object of Education.—Mr. Nelson will be able to interest all who will give him a hearing.

THE BAPTIST ADVOCATE.

The Baptist Advocate of the 16th inst. contains the subjoined article, which seems to have been intended as a reply to some remarks of ours, recently published, respecting the Sabbath.

"SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.—On the outside of our last number, we copied by request the article from the Register impugning our views regarding the observance of the Lord's day. As it was written before our article of Dec. 19th, it is to be excused for imputing to us views which we never entertained. Whether the same excuse can be extended to the charge of Popish views, because we believe ourself justifiable in following the example of Christ and his apostles, is more questionable.

"We know that it is customary to draw a broad line of distinction between the commandments engraven on tables of stone, and the rest of the laws and commandments given to the Jews through the instrumentality of Moses. To a certain degree this distinction is just. Prominence is thus given to the superlative, momentous, & comprehensive matters included in the ten commandments, when compared with the numerous and minute charges interspersed throughout the communications of God to the Jews. But to contradistinguish the ten commandments from the rest by calling the former exclusively the moral law, and all the other divine instructions of the Jews, through Moses, the ceremonial law, never met our views. When the Jews are told, Exodus xxii. 22, "Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child," we need no scholastic definitions to enable us to recognize this as a part of a moral code; and when we are enjoined to observe one day in seven, wherever we find the command, we view it as ceremonial. Had the same Lawgiver directed us to observe one day in five, the nature of the obligation would have been the same, and we would recognize it as a positive institution.

"A ceremonial law or positive institution is capable of abrogation or change by the supreme Lawgiver who enacted it. We believe the same Almighty and All-wise Being who gave to the old world and especially to the Jews the seventh-day of the week for religious rest, has given to us through his beloved Son the first day of the week for a similar purpose.

"It is a mistake to suppose that a positive institution when known, is less binding than a moral edict. The latter may indeed be sometimes ascertained by the mere force of reason, and is incapable of change while the nature and relations of the beings on whom it is obligatory remain the same; the former can only be known by express revelation, and may be varied at will by him who enacted it. These very circumstances contribute to render more distinct and respectful, those acts of obedience that have regard to positive institutions. A truly obedient child will seek to know the will of his father, and having ascertained it, will adhere to it, not merely because it is commended by his judgment as beneficial to himself or as approved by his juvenile reason, but because it is his father's will. Therefore, we keep the Lord's day, because Christ and his apostles kept it, and we are commanded to imitate them, and herein we endeavor to honor the Son even as we honor the Father."

We regret that the Editor of the Advocate did not publish our remarks on the subject in dispute between us, that the readers of both papers might have seen what was said on both sides of the question, and thus possessed the means of judging relative to the soundness of the views and arguments advanced by the parties respectively. This would have been magnanimous in him, and would hardly have failed to have produced in many minds impressions favorable to himself as an Editor, and a fair disputant, while the valuable paper under his supervision would have received no detriment.

Our views of propriety in such matters may be inferred from the fact, that we have published faithfully and seasonably, all the Advocate has contained in reference to the Sabbath, with the Editor's animadversions on our views, since the appearance of our first article on that subject, and that it is our determination to continue to do so in future.

Our search is after truth, and for truth, and not for mastery, are we contending, and from none would we receive truth with more pleasure than from our friend of the Baptist Advocate. It is not our desire to censure or impugn him unjustly, though we confess his course is to us somewhat novel and singular. There may be good reasons in his judgment for his measures; we are sorry, however, that with the good intentions which charity impels us to hope he cherishes, he should have fallen into several most palpable errors. The one respecting the abrogation of the fourth commandment appears more glaring and alarming at every successive attempt of his to keep it in countenance.

On his remarks respecting the "law" in the article above, though we esteem them hardly pertinent to the subject, we may hereafter make some strictures.

The passage he quotes from Ex. xxii. 22, is doubtless an application of the principle contained in the second table of "the" moral law, which requires us to love our neighbor; but if he is correct in what he says immediately after it, then in keeping "one day in seven," he is either acting without a command, and consequently performing a work of supererogation, or he is perpetuating an institution which is merely "ceremonial"! That "a positive institution is capable of abrogation or change by the supreme Lawgiver who enacted it" we do not dispute; but we do deny that his possessing the power to do so proves that this power has been thus exercised, and in the absence of any intimation to that effect, he has repealed the Sabbath law! As soon one might prove that because God is Almighty, he has lately created many laws, or annihilated a portion of the material universe; or that because he is Almighty and hates oppression, he has within ten days given every southern bondman his freedom; or because baptism is a positive rite, and many prefer sprinkling to dipping, God has waived his authority respecting the mode, or abolished the institution altogether! How many assertions from Pedo-baptists would it require to make our friend believe that the positive ordinance of baptism had been thus abrogated? And can Baptists ask to be believed without proof or evidence? Or are they incapable of drawing wrong inferences? Once more, therefore, we solemnly call on the Editor of the Advocate to show us, if he can, that the fourth command is repealed, and the first-day required of God to be kept. What evidence has he that the "same Almighty Being who gave the old world the seventh-day, &c., has given us through his beloved Son, the first-day for a similar purpose"? Can it be innocent to reiterate such a statement without any support from the lively oracles, or having it, to withhold it? If the Bible says so, let him refer us to the chapter and verse; if not, let him condescend to inform us how many divine institutions we may "believe" in, of which the scriptures say nothing, and preserve our consistency in opposing with the zeal of good Baptists, Pedobaptism, the supremacy of the Pope, &c, &c. &c. It cannot be plead that the first-day is the Sabbath by divine appointment because we find it very extensively observed, any more than Popery is true, because "all nations have been made to drink of the wine of the wrath of," &c., or than affusion is baptism because so many practice it.

We are inclined to think the ground for "believing" the first-day is the Sabbath, is no better than those named above, and to tell the truth about it, we are half tempted to believe that the Editor of the Advocate is convinced there is nothing in the Bible to support his theory, or he would, when repeatedly and kindly asked to adduce a command for first-day keeping, or a record of its "observance" by the apostles, bring something to substantiate his assertions! To attempt a defense of such a position, is like the Israelites being required to make "brick" without straw! The means are wanting.

His assertion that Christ and the disciples kept the "Lord's day," (he means the first-day of the week,) is truly astonishing! No writer before him, to our knowledge, ever claimed earlier attention to this day than a period immediately subsequent to the resurrection. If Jesus and his disciples kept it, what law did they obey in so doing? Was Christ 'fulfilling' or 'destroying' 'law' by this observance? Was he not, as "a minister of the circumcision," bound to observe the fourth command? If this assertion was wittingly made, and we admit his sincerity, we must certainly do so at the expense of his understanding! If he will turn to Luke iv. 16, he will find what day the Savior of men observed. "And as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day." This was indeed the "Lord's day"—the seventh-day of the week, which the Father sanctified at the creation, and which the Son observed during his sojourn among men on earth.—And if he will consult the 40th verse of the same chapter, he will find when the Savior began and ended the Sabbath, which corroborates our views of Acts xx. 7, as published some time since in the Register.

If we were not confident that our brother would publish a recantation of his statement that "Christ and his disciples kept the first-day of the week," we would present something further on that point now; but we think he will, after some reflection, render that labor unnecessary. We now barely refer him to the last verse of the 23d chapter of Luke, to determine the practice of the disciples relative to Sabbath-keeping previous to the resurrection, having abundance of evidence in reserve to show what was their usage subsequent to that event. "And they returned and prepared spices, and ointments, and rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment." The next chapter commences as follows:—"Now upon the first day of the week," &c. (i. e.) the next day after the Sabbath on which they had "rested" "according to the commandment," &c. Will HE SAY THEY KEPT FIRST DAY AT THIS TIME?

Before we are through with this subject, we intend to show clearly that the Apostles kept the seventh-day of the week, (or true Lord's day,) subsequent to the resurrection. As this is a subject of vast importance to the church, and to mankind at large, we renew our proposition to the Editor of the Baptist Advocate to discuss it at length in the spirit of brotherly kindness, and for the purpose of eliciting truth. If our first-day friends are right, they do not well to be silent. We entreat them to show this from the "lively oracles," and we will abide their decision; if they are wrong, is it not time they conformed their faith and practice in this respect to the word of God?

SIMULTANEOUS MEETINGS.

The last Tuesday of February is designated as a time for holding Temperance Meetings throughout the country. Let the friends of this holy cause unite their efforts on that day to put down the destroyer. Let them, then, adopt a systematic plan of operation. The drunkard—the temperate drinker—the wives and children of drunkards—the rising generation, call for a renewal of effort in this great moral enterprise. Should an enemy enter our borders and slay, annually, one-tenth part of the number that intemperance destroys, the whole country would resound with the cry, "to arms! to arms!!" and a ready response would be made by buckling on the armor, and rushing, by legions, to the rescue.—Bear in mind the day of the meeting, and remember that both the temporal and eternal interests are pendant on the course that Christians and the friends of humanity take on this subject.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We must decline publishing the article on Camp-Meetings. The writer has misunderstood the design of the remarks formerly published. The scrap accompanying the article is doubtless correct. It has not been denied by any, that incalculable advantage has resulted from such meetings, and that many souls have been converted.

SMALL POX.—There have been several cases of the Small Pox at Log City, in this county. At present, there are five cases; one of them, only, of a malignant character.

CRITERION OF A REVIVAL.

"Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust, for fear of the Lord and for the glory of his majesty. The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day."

Such is a revival spirit, and such are revival fruits. Man trembles and retires, and God walks forth in the resplendent panoply of his everlasting truth, and in the glorious majesty of his unchangeable perfections.

When we observe any movements among the people, which any serious persons are disposed to regard as a revival of religion—our inquiries should be;—Is God honored? Is man humbled? Do Christ and his cross constitute the great absorbing theme of preaching and of conversation? Do transgressors turn from their evil ways?—Do careless youth forsake their vain amusements, and engage in praying and other religious exercises? Is the family altar erected where it had been demolished, or in the domestic circle where it had never before been known? Is an increasing attachment manifested to the Bible—to the Sabbath and to its sanctuary privileges—and to all that stands connected with the interests of Christ's kingdom?

Do professors of religion live nearer to Christ, and abound in the work of the Lord?

Does he who has been a rejecter of Christ, by his words and actions say unto God—

> "No more, my God, I boast no more
> Of all the duties I have done,
> I quit the hopes I held before,
> To trust the merits of thy Son."

If these questions can be answered in the affirmative, then that arousing of the people, which has suggested them to your mind—is the work of God.

As such, it must be acknowledged, and for it God must be adored, however much of imperfection may be exhibited by any human agents who may be prominent laborers in the work. If the hand of the Divine Agent is clearly seen, then we must give glory to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, for such displays of renovating grace. J. R. J.

THE VILLAGE LECTURES.—I am pleased with this arrangement. It looks like public spirit, and christian spirit. I was much delighted with the lecture of PROF. SWEET on the "Immortality of the Soul." I felt grateful for the Gospel stamp which he left indelibly impressed upon his lecture. I was also equally entertained and instructed by the lecture of MR. CARPENTER, the Principal of the De Ruyter Institute, on "Natural Theology." I hope we shall manifest a lively and prayerful interest in sustaining this series of lectures which has commenced under such promising auspices. DEVELOPEMENT OF TALENT IN THE ANTI-SLAVERY CAUSE.

This department of reform is developing the talent of many young men. A modest youth, being pressed by a deep sense of duty to publicly speak in behalf of the enslaved, makes the experiment; it may be his first public speech, but it is not his last. Some one misunderstands what he has said, or perhaps purposely misconstrues it, or a reviewing reply is given; in either supposed case the inexperienced speaker must rise from his seat again. He now finds himself committed to the wide field of arousing discussion. Will he find it easy to immediately retire from it? The cause is gaining every twenty-four hours, yea, every hour, upon the attention of the American people; and this young American citizen who ventures to think aloud, and begins both with his tongue and with his pen, to "put proper words in proper places," will hold on his course. His 'heart will instruct his mouth, and add learning to his lips'—until he stammered and blundered, pained others and frightened himself in his first attempt to talk in a district school-house—will rise up deliberately in the crowded hall, village church, or Broadway Tabernacle, and will for one full hour chain to his mighty theme the attention of a discriminating auditory.

This self-made orator will not find it difficult to put to confusion some famed public functionary, who, having had his mind entirely engrossed by other subjects, or having always thought wrong upon the "vexed question" of American slavery, suddenly enlists in opposing by public speech-making, the anti-slavery cause; for, though he may be greatly renowned for technical love and professional skill, he manifests himself as destitute of knowledge of the circumstances by which he is surrounded, as was Rip-Van Winkle, when, after his profound sleep of twenty years, during which time the scenes of the American Revolution transpired—he returned to his native village with his rusty musket on his shoulder, exclaiming—"Long live King George the Third!" J. ERRATA

To the Editors of the Register

BRETHREN.—I regret to trouble you with so long a list of Errata as the one which I here furnish; but in doing it I will use the frankness to say, that the proof-sheet which contained the Sermon, entitled "The Raging Mocker," was submitted to my eye, therefore the mistakes which I request you to correct are probably chargeable more to my own carelessness than to any other source.

Yours, "A VILLAGE PASTOR."

In the first paragraph of the sermon, for "qualities," read, quality.

In the second division, after the extract from the Rev. John Frost, for "inestimable," before "thought," read, irresistible.

5th line from top of col. 5th, for "alter," read, utter.

Near the close of the second division, for "soul," before "preponderates," read, scale.

Near the close of the sermon, for "sum," after "Christ crucified," read, sun. In the concluding paragraph, for "premises," read, promises.

In the article, "How a people should love their Minister," for "but" in rejecting, &c., read, lest in rejecting, &c.

FOREIGN.

ELEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steam ship Columbia, Captain Ludkins, arrived at Boston yesterday, bringing Liverpool papers of the 5th instant, and London papers of the day previous.

The news of the greatest interest is from Turkey & Egypt. Admiral Stopford refused to ratify the convention with Mehemet Ali, made by Commodore Napier, but he very soon proposed other terms, not very materially different, which the Pacha immediately acceded to, and the pacification was likely to be consumated. The Pacha agreed to make his submission to the Porte—to give up the Turkish fleet—and to evacuate Syria.

It appears from the Paris accounts that the recall of Marshal Vallee from Algiers was determined on, and he was to be succeeded by Genl. Bugeaud. The charge against General Vallee is that he has extended his operations too far, occupying distant cities and posts, and requiring a great expenditure of life and money to maintain his system.

In the Chamber of Deputies, in the session of December 30th, M. Humann, the Minister of Finance, presented the budget for the year. He went into a very full statement of the condition of the finances—the debate—the expenditures—and the resources of the country. The amount of the budget of expenses for the ensuing year is 1,316,000,000 francs. That of revenue 1,162,000,000, presenting a deficiency of 154,000,000.

The quarrel between Spain and Portugal has so far subsided that the Spanish Regency has consented to wait until the Portuguese Government could lay the treaty of 1835 before the Cortes, for its sanction or rejection, in the course of January. The Portugese Government offered to submit the question between the two countries to the mediation of Great Britain. It is said that Espartero is raising an army of 25 or 26,000 infantry and 4 or 5,000 cavalry to enforce the pretentions of Spain to the free navigation of the Douro. It is said that Espartero has expressed his readiness to accept the mediation of England.—Eve. Post.

Mrs. Harrison.—A correspondent of a Providence paper, writing from Cincinnati, says:—"Mrs. Harrison has for many years lived in great retirement, and I am informed it is now more than twelve years since she has visited this city. She is a lady of most exemplary character—of strong domestic feelings, and warm, glowing piety. She is much absorbed in the care of her numerous family, and much attached to the old homestead, and it is probable she will continue to make North Bend the place of her residence most of the time. The honors of the White House will be dispensed, it is supposed, by one of her daughters."

Message of the Governor of Michigan.—Governor Woodbridge transmitted his message to the Legislature of Michigan on the 5th instant. He recommends early attention to improving the system of common schools; some alterations and modifications in existing laws, and speaks favorably of a general bankrupt law, not to include, however corporations. The public works of the States yield, as yet, no income, and the Governor recommends to prosecute to completion first, those that will soonest bring some returns, with which to pay the interest on their cost. The aggregate sum expended on works of internal improvement the last year, was $163,816 85. The expense of sustaining the State government for the four years of its existence, was nearly $400,000, beyond the means provided for that purpose, which amount remains yet unpaid.

A Rogue caught in his own Trap.—A singular incident occurred during the holidays on the opposite side of the river. Two ladies, who resided in Illinois, came to the city to make purchases. A well dressed man followed them into several stores, at one of which one of them got a ten dollar bill changed, receiving the change in small bills. In the evening, on their return home, when but a short distance from the Ferry in the prairie, the same man they had seen in the city rode to them and demanded their money. The one who had the money drew it out, and in attempting to hand it to him, the wind caught the bills and carried them off on to the ground. The man dismounted to pick them up, and as soon as he was down the ladies put whip to their horses and made off fast as possible. On their way they heard the clatter of a horses' hoofs following them, but were too much terrified to stop or look back. When they reached their own gate, behold the robber's horse was with them, a fine animal, with an elegant saddle and a pair of saddle-bags, but the man was no where in sight; they supposed his horse escaped whilst he was picking up the bills. On examining the sadle-bags a large sum of money was found and several articles of wearing apparel, but nothing by which his name could be discovered. Up to Saturday last no one had appeared to claim the horse or property.

The above facts we have from a respectable gentleman of the city, who assures us that singular as the circumstances may appear, they are strictly correct.—St. Louis Republican.

A man named Death, still a resident of this state, formerly lived in this city. Over the door of his store was the sign of "Rectified whiskey," and directly under that name, "Absalom Death." An old lady from the country, with her son, a hearty lad, was one day quietly wending her way through the street in a wagon; this sign caught her eye. "Stop! 'Rectified Whiskey, Absolute Death.' That's a fact! Johnny let me get out, there is one honest man in Connecticut; I want to see what he looks like."—New Covington Whig.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

In Senate, Jan. 11th.—This was the day assigned by Mr. Clay for calling up his resolution for the repeal of the Sub Treasury Act; but, as the Senate was thin, he deferred it. There is no prospect that Congress will act on the proposition at this session, but the discussion will serve to fix public attention on the subject. It seems probable that this question, together with that of a National Bank and a modification of the tariff, will lie over till the next regular session.

Prospective Pre-emption Bill.

This interminable bill, together with Mr. Crittenden's substitute—the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States—was the subject of discussion in the Senate today.

Mr. Benton denounced the distribution scheme as unreasonable and corrupt. He argued too, that it was incongruous with the bill for which it was proposed to be substituted, and wholly unparliamentary.

Mr. Mangum opposed both the original bill and the substitute. He maintained that the Pre-emption bill was the most crude and undigested, and least safe of all he ever knew to be presented. It was one at which the judgment revolted, if not with scorn, at least with indignation

Mr. M. said no proposition ever advanced was more repugnant to his feelings than that which we had heard in the course of this debate—that an alien should participate with us in the elective franchise before he had become a citizen. He reviewed the whole land system as it had hitherto operated, and showed clearly that there could be an additional revenue raised by graduating and reducing the price of public lands, and that in States where the value of lands had been put at a low estimate; millions over that estimate had been raised. The bill was further discussed by Messrs. Linn and Calhoun, and until the hour expired.

Bankrupt Bill.

During the day, Mr. Crittenden gave notice that on Thursday next he should call up the bill to establish a uniform bankruptcy. Many were anxious for the consideration of this measure, and he hoped the Senate would consent to consider it at that time, at least in the way of a begining.

Jan. 12th.—The Pre-emption bill was again brought up, when Mr. Calhoun addressed the Senate at length in favor of the substitute offered by himself, which proposed to cede the lands to the States in which they lie, on certain conditions. He was listened to with great attention, and the effort was thought worthy of its source, adducing considerations in favor of his scheme, difficult to be answered, whether or not they are yielded to.

Mr. Crittenden spoke in reply, with great force, and Mr. Benton followed, until the day was worn out.

Revolutionary Monument.

Jan. 13th.—A bill was reported by Mr. Graham, from the committee on Revolutionary claims, to authorize the building of a monument in commemoration of the services of Brig. Gens. Davidson and Nash, in the State of North Carolina. Upwards of fifteen bills were ordered to be engrossed; the most part of a private nature, and can be of no interest but to the parties immediately concerened.

Pre-emption Bill again.

Mr. Preston delivererd his argument being chiefly directed against the proposition of Mr. Calhoun to cede the lands to the new States on certain conditions, which are now understood to be, 35 per cent to the new States and 65 to the old, for which the new States are to give their bonds.—The ground taken by Mr. P. was that a bill of this kind would act so unequally that if there were no other objection, this ought to be sufficient to deter the Senate from giving it their support.

The Sergeant-at-Arms.

Stephen Haight, sergeant-at-arms having died, Mr. Phelps moved that $500 be paid from the contigent expenses of the Senate, to defray the expenses of the funeral, and that his widow be paid the amount of his salary for the remainder of the session.

Peace Society.

Jan. 14th.—Mr. Clay presented a memorial from the American Peace Society, praying for the appointment of a select committee to consider the petitions presented at this and previous sessions, which Mr. C., declined to do for them.

Mr. Wright presented similar petitions from Schenectada and from Kentucky.—They were ordered on the table.

Bankrupt Law.

Memorials from all quarters were presented, praying the enactment of a Bankrupt Law. The city of New York sent some in favor of that measure, and one remonstrating against its passage,—also one signed by a number of merchants, mechanics and traders, giving the outlines of such a Bill as would be acceptable.

Chesepeak and Ohio Canal.

The joint resolution to transfer so much of this stock as belonged to the general government, to the State of Maryland, was taken up, but not definitely acted on.

The matter stands thus:—the three cities of the district borrowed the money of the Dutch (fifteen hundred thousand dollars,) to subscribe to the stock of the Canal, but finding the payment of the interest onerous to the last degree, they memorialized Congress to take the stock and liberate them from the debt, which Congress, being burthened with an overwhelming surplus revenue, graciously consented to do. The money was all expended before the Canal was carried to any point which could make it useful or productive. The work was then taken up by the States of Virginia and Maryland, and the latter asks the transfer of the government stock to her, on condition that she will complete the Canal to Cumberland, and transfer, free of expense, all munitions of war, &c., for the government.

The Tariff.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, presented resolutions from the Legislature of this State, remonstrating against the adoption of any protective tariff.

Fishing Bounty.

Mr. Ruggles presented a memorial from citizens of Bucksport, in Maine, praying that the fishing bounty might not be abolished, and stating that with all their enterprise, industry and hardy toil, the cod-fishery afforded them a scanty subsistence with the bounty on.

Mr. Benton immediately said that he was prepared to show that these bounties were paid in flagrant violation of the constitution, and that he would blow up the whole system. In a few days he would ask leave to bring in his bill abolishing them.

Mr. Ruggles then gave notice that he would ask leave to bring in a bill to repeal the duty on lead.

Pre-emption Bill.

The interest of this question does not appear to flag. Mr. Clay is evidently ready to speak upon it, and perhaps Mr. Webster. Mr. Sevier spoke at length in favor of Mr. Calhoun's scheme, and was replied to by Mr. Smith of Indiana.

Judiciary.

Jan. 16th.—Mr. Smith reported a bill to amend the judicial system of the U. S., the object of which was stated to be, to equalize the judicial circuits, and the duties of judges.

Sugar, Rum and fish.

Mr. Benton moved a requisition of the committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of reducing the drawbacks on refined sugar and rum, manufactured from foreign materials, and exported, and also of reducing in the same proportion the fishing bounties and allowances.

Pre-emption.

Mr. Southard addressed the Senate at length, on this subject.

Hemp.

Jan. 18th.—A very interesting communication was made from the Navy Department, in relation to American water-rotted hemp. This communication says the hemp is equal, in all respects, to the best Riga hemp, and that it can be as successfully employed in the Navy, as any imported hemp. This document was referred to the committee on Naval affairs, which will, no doubt, report favorably on the subject. A gentleman named Merlee, has been making a variety of experiments, all of which go to prove the value of the American water-rotted hemp.

Pilots.

Mr. Mouton from the committee of Commerce, reported a bill to repeal the law of 1837, in relation to pilots, which was ordered a second reading.

Jan. 19th.—The subject was continued by the remarks of Mr. Smith, who concluded his remarks.

District Banks.

Mr. Merrick made an ineffectual attempt to bring up the bill incorporating the banks of the District of Columbia it being opposed by Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, and Tappan, was lost by a vote of 25 to 15.

The Contested Election.

IN THE HOUSE, JAN.—The Report of the Committee of Elections, in the case of Ingersoll and Naylor, was taken up as the special order of the day. Mr. Naylor occupied about three hours in reply to Mr. Ingersoll, and without concluding, gave way to a motion to adjourn.

Tariff on Silks and Wines.

JAN. 12.—Mr. Green, of Ky., introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill laying a tax upon wines and silks.

Objections were made by Mr. Pickens, of S. C. The resolution therefore lies over.

Imprisonment for Debt.

Mr. Sargeant reported the bill from the Senate to abolish imprisonment for debt.—Mr. Adams moved an amendment, which, after considerable debate, was rejected, and the original bill passed.

Contested Election.

Mr. Naylor then resumed his argument in reply to Mr. Ingersoll, and continued to speak, without concluding, until a motion to adjourn was made and carried.

This matter also occupied the House during the whole of the next day, JAN. 13, without arriving at a conclusion. Mr. Naylor was very hoarse, and is also in feeble health, but he nevertheless managed his case with much energy and ability. He was quite severe in his remarks upon Mr. Ingersoll, impeaching his character, motives, &c. Mr. Naylor did not conclude, but spoke some three hours, when, quite exhausted, he gave way to a motion to adjourn. The House has been very thin during this discussion.

Duties on Silks, and Wines.

JAN. 14.—The question was taken on Mr. Adams' motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of making his bill to increase the duties on imported manufactures of silk the special order for the 27th of this month, and it was lost.

In the course of the proceedings, the House also refused to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering Mr. Green's motion to instruct the Committee on Ways and Means to report on the expediency of raising such a revenue from wines and silks and other articles of luxury, imported into the United States, as will meet the necessary expenditures of the government.

It may be inferred from these votes, that the House does not intend to look at these subjects at the present session.

Treasury Note Bill.

The House determined by a vote of 85 to 42, to make the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury Notes the special order for Monday next, giving it precedence over all other business until disposed of. This decisive vote seems to render it quite probable that the House will pass the Treasury Note bill, without much opposition or delay.

Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. Barnard from the Committee on the Judiciary, obtained leave to report a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

The Contested Election Decided.

JAN. 15.—Mr. Naylor having concluded, and Mr. Ingersoll having replied, the vote, after many attempts to end it, was finally taken; and it was decided that CHARLES NAYLOR was duly elected, by a vote of 117 to 85.

Ingersoll and Naylor.

JAN. 16.—An ineffectual attempt was made to suspend the rules, in order for a motion to allow Mr. Ingersoll the mileage and pay of a member, for the time spent in contesting his seat.

Appropriations for 1841.

Mr. Proffit made an ineffectual effort to introduce a resolution to this effect: that, inasmuch as the Secretary of the Treasury in his Annual Report, stated the finances of the nation to be in such a flourishing condition, that little difficulty would occur in making the receipts cover the necessary expenditures; and that it could be done by a little economy in those expenditures, he be required to state to the House, what items of the estimate recently made by him can be dispensed with, and why, if they be not called for, they have been brought before the House.

Treasury Note Bill.

JAN. 18.—This bill was taken up, and Mr. Jones, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made an exposition of the condition of the Treasury.

From the Norfolk Beacon of Jan. 11.

SINGULAR INCIDENT.

A ship fallen in with on the coast, abandoned.—On Saturday evening last, the ship Grace Brown, of and bound to Baltimore, from Liverpool, with a valuable cargo on board, arrived at this port in charge of the crew of the pilot boats Baltimore, Pocahontas and Liberty, of Baltimore.

We learn from Capt. Thomas, one of the pilots, that the ship was discovered on Friday afternoon last, about 15 to 18 miles north of Cape Henry. On approaching her, found she was ashore, and on boarding her, discovered she was entirely abandoned, the crew he supposes having left her in the long boat, as tackles were rigged to the fore and main yards.

Capt. Thomas, with his associates from the boat Pocahontas, being unable to get the ship off sent for the pilot boat Liberty, which was cruising a short distance from them, and on her arrival, with the assistance of her crew, they succeeded, at about 2 o'clock A. M. Saturday morning, in getting her off, and worked the ship as far as Craney Island, when she was towed up by the steamer Star.

When Capt. Bean of the boat Baltimore boarded the Grace Brown, he found that she had upward of nine feet of water in her hold, and he supposes there were about twelve feet forward, owing to the melting of the salt on board, which tipped the ship by the head. During Saturday, while under way, they reduced the leak 12 inches. One of her anchors and a chain was gone, the other anchor was broken.

Capt. Duff, a skilful and enterprising shipmaster of Baltimore, was in command of the ship when she left Hampton Roads, 9th of Sept. for Liverpool.

Cargo, dry goods and salt.

A survey has been held and the cargo ordered to be discharged.

The vessel has been placed in the hands of Mr. John Dickson, and since then the captain and crew have arrived here.

FARTHER PARTICULARS.

After the above was in type, we received from the above the following statement. It will be seen that Captain D. and his crew arrived here on Saturday night, a few hours after his ship had been brought in by pilots:

The ship Liverpool, on the 12th of Nov. for Baltimore, laden with salt, iron, coal, dry goods and hardware. &c. On the 1st of January, within 25 miles of the land, South of Cape Henry, was blown off by a heavy W. N. W. gale across the Gulf to the latitude of 72 1-2. On nearing the coast on Wednesday night, the ship struck on the S. E. point of the middle ground, unstripping the ship's mizen mast and causing her to leak badly, and immediately running into four fathoms water.

The sea being very high and weather thick, the ship continuing to leak, and then having two feet of water in her hold. Capt. D. determined to anchor his ship and payed out a full scope of chain, to take his boat and crew and make for the land and procure assistance to return to the ship, should the weather become moderate. Capt. D. and his crew supplying the boat with provisions, clothing, &c., left the ship at half-past four o'clock, and after encountering tremendous weather and hardships, landed on the Eastern shore, next morning, in safety, being 18 hours in the boat.

He immediately proceeded to procure assistance as he deemed necessary, and succeeded in engaging several vessels and their crews. About 8 o'clock on Saturday morning, however, the weather clearing, to his surprise, he saw the ship under way, when he with his crew took passage in one of the vessels engaged from the Eastern shore, and arrived here at 11 o'clock the same night; repaired on board the Grace Brown and demanded possession of his ship, which was refused him by those in charge.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—This horrid traffic is carried on with unabated zeal; according to Mr. Buxton there are annually enslaved by Christians 120,000 Africans, and by Mohammedans 50,000. In the process of seizure and conveyance 330,000 perish. Africa loses thus HALF A MILLION annually. About 13,000 recaptured slaves have been returned to Sierra Leone the last three years. Our Wesleyan brethren have a Mission in the colony, including 3000 members.

FRIENDLY ISLANDS.—The Wesleyans have succeeded remarkably in these Islands. Their members amount to 8354, and scholars to 8217. Not less than 1200 natives are employed as teachers, including the families of leading chiefs. They have ameliorated vastly the civil code of the government.

IT IS REAL.—There can be no doubt of the profound influence of the Temperance Reform in Ireland. Official statements show a reduction in the manufacture of alcoholic drinks of 3,500,000 gallons the last year. The Revenue has lost £466,666. It is a valuable loss.

BIBLE FOR THE BLIND.—The Lords of her Majesty's Treasury have just awarded the sum of £400 towards printing a Bible for the blind, under the superintendence of a committee at Glasgow, and which was to be fully completed this month. It will be contained in fifteen volumes, large super-royal quarto, and in all there will be 300 volumes printed. There will be in each 9,470 pages, each containing 37 lines, and will consist of 1,160 reams of paper, weighing 9,860 lbs. The New Testament has been already completed in four volumes, and contains 42 lines in each page. No fewer than 10,850 volumes have already been published by the Glasgow Society for the Instruction of the Blind.

POPERY.—Besides the amounts paid by the Leopold Foundation and other Societies in Europe for sustaining popish missions in the United States, the French Society De Propaganda Fide alone has transmitted, within the year, $63,582 for that purpose.

MISSIONS.—It is an interesting fact that the largest local Protestant Church on earth is in the heathen world, at Hilo, Sandwich Islands. Upwards of 5000 have been converted there the last year. The present No. of church members in these islands is no less than 15,915!

Naval.—The U. S. frigate Constitution and schooner Shark were lying at Calloa, Peru, all well, Sept. 5th, to sail in a day or two for Payta and Guayaquil. The U. S. sloop of war St. Louis, was daily expected at Calloa from the coast of Mexico. She had been absent about eight months. Our naval forces seem to us to be entirely too limited for the extensive commerce we have in that ocean. It will be seen in referring to the report made by the committee on naval affairs in the Senate of the United States in 1836, that the whale ships alone in the Pacific Ocean number 460 sail, amounting to nearly 200,000 tons, and manned by 12,000 seamen! The reports says: "Every time this whale fleet puts to sea, there is required, in outfits, flour, 80,010 barrels; pork and beef, 79,120 barrels: molasses, 621,000 gallons; coffee, 552,600 pounds; sugar, 256,800 pounds; tea, 172,500 pounds; rice, 1,300 tierces; duck, 46,460 pieces; cordage, 8,950 tons; iron hoops, 4,600 tons; copper, 552,000 sheets, vessels coppered every voyage; staves, 10,000,000. No part of the commerce of this country is more important than that which is carried on in the Pacific Ocean. It is large in amount—not less than $12,000,000 of capital is invested in, and actively employed by one branch of the whale fishery alone; and in the whole trade is directly and indirectly involved not less than from fifty to seventy millions of property!" We commend the perusal of the whole of the report as a document which throws much light on the important subject of our commerce in the Pacific.—U. S. Gazette.

A Whole Family.—There is an interesting squad of thirty children, located in some part of Connecticut, being the tender branches of two brothers, one of whom died, leaving 17 children, and the wife of the other also dying, leaving 14 more. The widower and widow feeling their disconsolate and lonely condition, united their fates and stock, and are now blessed in children, if not in their store.

Ransom Clark, a soldier who belonged to the command of Major Dade, and who alone escaped, covered with wounds, to tell the bloody story, died recently at the residence of his father, in York, Livingston County.

Emigration to Canada.—The Kingston Chronicle says, that upwards of 12,000 emigrants arrived at that place during the past season, about 3,000 of whom received employment and settled in the neighborhood. About 12,000 proceeded directly to the United States, for the purpose of joining friends and relatives there. The emigrants, generally speaking, were very respectable, and many of them had no less than £60,000 among them. The same paper adds that about 1,300 emigrants arrived in Kingston during the season from the United States, to settle in Canada, including 50 runaway slaves.

Renewed Martyrdom at Madagascar.—A recent London Evangelical Magazine gives the melancholy intelligence that sixteen of the persecuted Christians at Madagascar, who had for a long time succeeded in concealing themselves from their pursuers had been apprehended, and that nine of their number were cruelly speared to death on the 9th of July, among them were Raminahy, the wife of Davis, one of the refugees now in England, and Paul and his excellent wife, of whom mention is made in the 'Narratives of Persecutions in Madagascar.'—Watchman.

TEXAS AND MEXICO.

Galvaston papers to the 3d instant have been received at New-Orleans.

President pro tem. BURNET has submitted to Congress a project for calling out volunteers to repel an anticipated invasion from Mexico. In laying this matter before the Legislature, he indulges in some glowing speculations as to the young republic.—Texas proper is now bounded by Rio Grande. "Texas, as defined by the sword," says President BURNET, "may comprehend the Sierra del Madre. Let the sword do its work."

The plan proposed for levying forces (says the New-Orleans Bee) does not, we believe, contemplate a draft upon the agricultural classes or the mechanical industry of the Republic. It is thought that volunteers in abundance could be raised for the service, as no doubt there could be, should the designs of Texas extend even beyond the repulsion of an invading force.

The Texas papers are discussing the war proposition of President BURNET.—The feeling is decidedly warlike, though the question is discussed with moderation.

A courier arrived at Austin on the 22d December, with information that a body of hostile Mexicans had entered the county of San Patricio.

In New Market, N. J., on the 17th inst., ELIZABETH DUNHAM, wife of Jonathan S. Dunham, aged 63.

Mrs. Dunham has been for several years a valuable member of the S. D. B. Church in Piscataway; but she having finished her work, has gone to join the Church triumphant. She has for years enjoyed almost uninterrupted health, until near her departure, when she was suddenly attacked with the palsied Apoplexy, after which she was unable to speak but by signs—gave her friends to understand that she was going home.

Her funeral was attended on the 18th, at the Meeting-house, where her numerous family and friends were addressed from Ps. cxvi 15 "Precious in the sight," &c. COMM.

GILBERT WRIGHT.

De Ruyter, Dec. 21, 1840. 43m2

POETRY.

GOD'S GOODNESS TO ME.

How GLAD AM I!—I was not born
A hindoo or a slave,
To wander in a state forlorn
Down to an early grave.

I might have been an Arab child,
The Koran taught to read,
Or been an Indian, fierce and wild,
In war to fight and bleed.

I might have worshiped at the shrine
Of dreadful Juggernaut—
Been thrown to crocodiles and swine,
On some devoted spot.

But no, my favored lot has been
Cast on New-England's shore,
Where I am taught the plague of sin,
And Jesus to adore.

Here pious parents, every day,
Teach me to live for heaven,
And bid me morn and evening pray
That I may be forgiven.

Here none molest or make afraid
Those who delight in prayer;
And all can seek the Savior's aid,
However poor they are.

And O, what gratitude and love
Should daily fill my breast!
That God should stoop from heaven above
To make me here so blest.

O, I must praise him, and I'll feel
For thousands young as I,
Who never hear his holy will,
And thus degraded die.

DEATH OF MOSES.

BY W. C. BRYANT.

When he who from the scourge of wrong,
Aroused the Hebrew tribes to fly—
Saw the fair region, promised long,
And bowed him on the hills to die;

God made his grave to men unknown,
Where Moab's rocks a vale infold,
And laid the aged seer alone
To slumber while the world grows old.

Thus still, when'er the good and just
Close the dim eye on life and pain,
Heaven watches o'er their sleeping dust,
Till the pure spirit comes again.

Though nameless, trampled, and forgot,
His servant's humble ashes lie,
Yet God has marked and sealed the spot,
To call its inmate to the sky.

TRUTH AND ERROR.

BY R. H. WILDE.

There's a tuneful river
In Erie's Isle,
Where the sunbeams quiver,
In silvery smile;
Where the leaves that fall
'Neath the autumn sky,
Grow gem-like all
And never die;
And such is the stream by Truth enlightened,
That leaves the breast by Wisdom brightened,
Where even the joys that storms dissever,
Are turned to gems that glow forever.

There's a darkening tide
In the Indian clime,
By whose herbless side
There's a sulphury slime—
To the flower that it touches
A scorching wave—
To the bird that approaches
A weltering grave—
And such are the waters of bitterness rising
In the desert bosom of dark disguising;
And the birds of joy and the flowers of feeling,
Must perish wherever that wave is stealing.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DANGER OF THE PRAIRIES.

On my return from the Upper Mississippi, I found myself obliged to cross one of the wide prairies, which in that portion of the United States, vary the appearance of the country. The weather was fine, all around me was fresh and blooming, as if it had just issued from the bosom of nature. My knapsack, my gun, and my dog, were all I had for baggage and company. But, although well moccasined, I had moved slowly along, attracted by the brilliancy of the flowers, and the gambol of the fawns around their dams, to all appearance as thoughtless of danger as myself.

My march was of long duration; I saw the sun sinking beneath the horizon, long before I could perceive any appearance of woodland, and nothing in the shape of man I had met with that day. The track which I followed was only an Indian trace, and as darkness overshaded the prairie, I felt some desire to reach at least a copse, in which I might lie down to rest. The night hawks were skimming around me, attracted by the buzzing wings of the beetels, which form their food, and the distant howling of wolves gave me some hope that I should soon arrive at the skirt of some woodland.

I did so, and almost at the time a firelight glancing my eye, I moved toward it, full of confidence that proceeded from the camp of some wandering Indians. I was mistaken; I discovered by its glare that it was from the hearth of a small log cabin, and that a full figure passed and repassed between it and me, as if busily engaged in the household arrangements.

I reached the spot, and presenting myself at the door, asked the tall figure, which proved to be a woman, if I might take shelter under her roof for the night. Her voice was gruff, and her attire negligently thrown about her. I walked in, took a wooden stool, and quietly seated myself by the fire. The next object that attracted my notice, was a finely formed young Indian, resting his head between his hands, with his elbows on his knees. A long bow rested against the log wall near him, while a quantity of arrows and two or three raccoon skins lay at his feet. He moved not—he apparently breathed not. Accustomed to the habits of the Indians, and knowing that they pay little attention to the approach of civilized strangers, (a circumstance which in some countries, is considered evincing the apathy of their character,) I addressed him in French, a language not unfrequently partially known to the people of that neighborhood. He raised his head, pointed to one of his eyes with his finger, and gave a significant glance with the other. His face was covered with blood. The fact was, that an hour before this, as he was in the act of discharging an arrow at a raccoon in the top of a tree, the arrow had split upon the cord, and sprung with such violence into his right eye, as to destroy it forever.

Feeling hungry, I inquired what sort of fare I might expect. Such a thing as a bed was not to be seen; but many large untanned bear and buffalo hides lay piled in a corner. I drew a fine time-piece from my breast, told the woman it was late and that I was fatigued. She had espied my watch, the richness of which seemed to operate upon her feelings with electric quickness. She told me that there was plenty of venison and jerked buffalo meat, and that on removing the ashes I should find a cake. But my watch had struck her fancy, and her curiosity had to be gratified by an immediate sight of it. I took off the gold chain that secured it, from around my neck, and presented it to her.

She was all ecstacy, spoke of its beauty, asked me its value, and put the chain round her brawny neck, saying how happy the possession of such a watch would make her. Thoughtless, and, as I fancied myself, in so retired a spot, secure, I paid little attention to her movements. I helped my dog to a good supper of venison, and was not long in satisfying the demands of my own appetite.

The Indian rose from his seat as if in extreme suffering. He passed and repassed me several times, and once pinched me in the side so violently, that the pain nearly brought forth an exclamation of anger. I looked at him. His eye met mine, but his look was so forbidding that it struck a chill into the more nervous part of my system. He again seated himself, drew his butcher knife from its scabbard, examined its edge, as I would that of a razor suspected dull, replaced it, and again taking his tomahawk from his back, filled the pipe of it with tobacco, and sent me expressive glances whenever our hostess chanced to have her back toward us.

Never till that moment, had my senses been awakened to the danger which I now supposed to be about me. I returned glance for glance with my companion, and rested well assured that, whatever enemies I might have, he was not of their number.

I asked the woman for my watch, wound it up, and under pretence of wishing to see how the weather might be on the morrow, took up my gun and walked out of the cabin. I slipped a bullet into each barrel, scraped the edges of my flints, renewed the primings, and returned to the hut, giving a favorable account of my observations. I took a few bear skins, made a pallet of them, and calling my faithful dog to my side, lay down with my gun close by my body, and in a few minutes, was, to all appearance, fast asleep.

A short time had elapsed, when some voices were heard, and from the corner of my eyes I saw two athletic youths making their entrance, bearing a dead stag on a pole.

They disposed of their burden, and asking for whiskey, helped themselves freely to it. Observing me and the wounded Indian, they asked who I was, and why the plague that rascal, (meaning the Indian, who they knew understood not a word of English,) was in the house. The mother, for so she proved to be, bade them to speak less loudly, made mention of my watch, and took them to a corner, where a conversation took place, the purport of which required little shrewdness in me to guess. I tapped my dog gently. He moved his tail, and with indescribable pleasure, I saw his fine eyes alternately fixed on me and raised toward the trio in the corner. I felt that he perceived the danger of my situation. The Indian exchanged a last glance with me.

The lads had eaten and drunken themselves into such a condition, that I already looked upon them as hors du combat, and the frequent visits of the whiskey bottle to the ugly mouth of their dam, I hoped would soon reduce her to a like state. Judge of my astonishment, reader, when I saw this incarnate fiend take a large carving knife, and go to the grindstone to whet its edges. I saw her pouring water on the turning machine, and watched her working away with the dangerous instrument, until the cold sweat covered every part of my body, in despite of my determination to defend myself to the last. Her task finished, she walked to her reeling sons, and said, "There that'll soon settle him! Boys, kill you—, and then for the watch."

I turned, cocked my gun locks silently, touched my faithful companion, and lay ready to start up and shoot the first who might attempt my life. The moment was fast approaching, and that might have been my last in this world, had not providence made preparations for my rescue.—All was ready. The fiendish hag was advancing slowly, probably contemplating the best way of despatching me, while her sons should be engaged with the Indian. I was several times on the eve of rising and shooting her on the spot: but she was not to be punished thus. The door was suddenly opened, and there entered two travelers, each with a long rifle on his shoulder. I bounced upon my feet, and making them most heartily welcome, told them how well it was for me that they should have arrived at that moment. The tale was soon told. The drunken sons were secured, and the woman, in spite of her defense and vociferations, shared the same fate. The Indian fairly danced with joy, and gave us to understand, that as he could not sleep for pain, he would watch over us. You may suppose we slept much less than we talked. The two strangers gave me account of their once having been themselves in a similar situation.—Day came, fair and rosy, and with it the punishment of our captives.

They were now quite sobered. Their feet were unbound, but their hands still securely tied. We marched them into the woods off the road, and having used them as regulators were wont to use such delinquents, we set fire to the cabin, gave all the skins and implements to the young Indian warrior, and proceeded, well pleased towards the settlements.

From the Lady's Book.

FRIENDS IN A FUTURE STATE.

"I would sink back from the bright valves in heaven,
Though borne by angels thither, were mine eyes,
In their inquiry through its haze of glory,
To meet but strangers there.

The enjoyment of friends here below is transient. Associations, that are continually forming, last, many of them, only for a day. Unnumbered causes are operating to sunder the ties of acquaintance, and break the chords of friendship. Slander too often lends its influence. Like envy, it

"Withers at another's joy,
And hates that excellence it cannot reach;"

and "out venoming all the worms of Nile," thousands of the fairest buds of amity are often deomed to fade and die beneath its killing touch.

When we cast our eye back through the dim vista of the past, and recall to mind the friends of our soul, we are led to inquire, 'Where are they?' Of all the numerous throng with whom we sported away the laughing hours of infancy; whom we could firmly grasp by the hand, and enjoy our innocent pastimes—how few now meet our wandering eye. Some in their journeyings through the vale of human life, have been called to other climes, to distant lands; some are gone to their final resting place, the tomb; others have fled from us by the repulsive power of their cold feelings of estrangement.

But there are a few choice spirits who still linger around us, irradiating, like stars, the sky of our being, diffusing a halo of delight through it, rendering it brilliant with the light of hope and joyous expectations. These, with a few departed companions of our early years, who fled from the vile regions of the earth ere they were scarcely deformed by the polluting breath of sin, we fondly trust we shall meet again in purer climes, where our souls may commingle together, united in the bonds of holy affection through the long and ceasless ages of eternity. It cannot be that those fair beings whose hearts once beat mutually with ours, whom the angel of death has hid from our gaze, and whose names with the cold and selfish world, who are destined to float for a while on the tide of remembrance, and then pass away into the ocean of forgetfulness, are fated never more to meet our view. No! there is a voice, the language of those that are gone, whispering in our ears the consoling words, 'We shall meet again;' and the endearing thought that thus it shall be, cheers us on in our pilgrimage through the dark wilderness of life secretly admonishing us to beware of temptations—to shun the soul destroying haunts of vice and irreligion, and we shall at last have a meeting more blissful and transporting than all the joys of earth, never to end.

THE DELIGHTFUL DISCOVERY.

In all the restless ardor of youth, a son at the time when his father was in high noon of life, left his home, and went to seek in foreign climes, the happiness which his heated imagination had fondly anticipated. Tossed from one country to another, he was detained far beyond the period he expected. As one of the unforeseen revolutions of this changing world, the father was also driven into foreign parts; and, by an unseen hand, the course of both was so directed, that the parent and son met together, in an obscure village in Italy. They knew not each other. The young man had lost the bloom of youth with which he quitted his father's house, and having ripened into full manhood, discovered the stronger lines of expression, which had been heightened by the influence of the weather, and the vicissitudes of his condition. The father, having in the decline of life, met with unexpected reverses, soon began to wear the deep furrows and the hoary hairs of old age. Thus mutually altered, and separated for many years, which had been crowded with various scenes, there remained but little that could show their relation to each other. Yet when the aged man entered the son's house, he involuntarily arose, and showed more than ordinanry respect to a person in whom he saw so much to venerate; whilst the father felt a new and peculiar pleasure in receiving the attention of so agreeable a stranger. They spoke, and as readily replied, for the sake of hearing again the sound of each other's voice.—The father's heart yearned, the son's heart beat, and their lips could not keep silence. 'Are you a native of Italy?' said the father. 'No sir,' the son replied, 'I perceive that you are also a foreigner.' This led on to further questions, and these produced more interesting information, till at length, hearing his own name mentioned, the son cried out, 'My father!' 'My son!' exclaimed the parent, and fell on his neck and embraced him. What a tender and affecting scene was this! Who that had been present could have refrained from tears.

But, while we are affected with such a relation as this, let us not forget Him who, after all our transgressions and wanderings still recognizes us as his children, is ready to forgive our follies, and receive us into his arms of love. May his compassion bind our hearts yet closer to himself, that we may no more wander from him.—London Teacher's Offering.

INDIAN HOSPITALITY.—The virtue of hospitality in India, as elsewhere, prevails most in the wilder and more unfrequented districts. "I sometimes frequented places," says Forbes, "where the natives had never seen an European, and were ignorant of every thing concerning us; there I beheld manners and customs simple as were those in the patriarchal age; there, in the very style of Rebecca, and the damsels of Mesopotamia, the Hindoo villagers treated me with that artless hospitality so delightful in the poems of Homer, and other ancient records. On a sultry day, near a Jinore village, having rode faster than my attendants, while waiting their arrival under a tamarind tree, a young woman came to the well; I asked for a little water, but neither of us having a drinking vessel, she hastily left me, as I imagined, to bring an earthen cup for the purpose, as I should have polluted a vessel of metal; but as Jael, when Sisera asked for water, gave him milk, and 'brought forth butter in a lordly dish,' so did this village damsel, with more sincerity than Heber's wife, bring me a pot of milk, and a lump of butter, on the delicate leaf of the banana, the lordly dish of the Hindoos. The former I accepted; on my declining the latter, she immediately made it up in two balls, and gave one to each of the oxen that drew my hackney. Butter is a luxury to these animals, and enables them to bear additional fatigue.—Oriental Annual.

EDUCATION.

If a stranger should inquire of me the principle cause and source of the greatness of my country, would I bid him look on the ocean widely loaded with our merchandise, and proudly ranged by our navy; or on the lands where it is girdled by roads, and scored by canals, and burthened with the produce of our industry and ingenuity?—Would I bid him look on these things as the springs of our prosperity? Indeed I would not. Nor would I show him our colleges and literary institutions, for he can see nobler ones elsewhere. I would pass all these by, and would lead him out by some winding highway among the hills and woods, and when the cultivated spots grew small and unfrequent, and the houses became few and scattered, and a state of primitive nature seemed to be immediately before us, I would stop in some sequestered spot, and directed by a steady hum, like that of bees, I would point out to him a lowly building, hardly better than a shed, but full of blooming, happy children, collected from the remote and unseen farm-houses, conning over their various tasks, or reading with a voice of reverential monotony, a portion of the Word of God; and I would bid him note, that even here in the midst of poverty and sterility, was a specimen of the thousand nurseries, in which all our children are taught of the Lord, and formed, some to legislate for the land, and all to understand its constitution and laws, to maintain their unspotted birthright, and contribute to the great aggregate of the intelligence, the morality, the power and peace of this mighty commonwealth.—Greenwood.

"ARGUMENT IN FAVOR OF CHRISTIANITY DEDUCED FROM THE SIZE OF THE BIBLE."

When an uninspired man undertakes to write an important history, entering often into detail of incident, description, and delineation, the work necessarily becomes extended. But when mighty events are recorded; the rise and fall of States; the lives of warriors and kings; the principles that regulated their conduct; the aggression of neighboring potentates—with all the results and changes that arose from conquest or subjugation—the boldest reader is appalled at the accumulation of pages. If the writer also describes his own country and ancestor, under all the impression of personal and national feeling, the temptation to amplify becomes still more imperative; and to what a magnitude might a work be supposed to extend, which was to comprise the labors not only of two or three such writers, but a long succession of them, during many generations? Now the bible is that extraordinary book. It is not only totally dissimilar to all others in its nature and execution, but it is equally contradistinguished by the rarely combined qualities of comprehension and succinctness. The transactions referred to are grand beyond comparison. The writers related occurrences which excited a supreme interest in their minds. They were personally and relatively connected with the circumstances recorded. Many of those narrated their own exploits, with those of anterior ages. The multifarious writers consisted of historians, biographers, moralists, poets, and prophets. The periods described, present a matchless assemblage of important events—the Creation, Fall, and ante-diluvian corruption of man. The deluge; the confusion of tongues; the origin of all the great monarchies of the earth; the lives of the patriarchs, with the minutest statements—their wonderful escape from famine; the call of a particular people, in whom was preserved, amid universal polytheism, the knowledge of the One True and Living God; their wandering bondage and miraculous preservation; their wandering for forty years through the desert; the giving of the moral and ceremonial law; the establishment of the same people in Canaan for fifteen hundred years, while all the great dynasties by which they were surrounded successively crumbled away; the Assyrian, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, the Grecian, the Persian. To these events must be added, the expulsion of numerous idolatrous long-established, and powerful nations of Palestine; the reigns of an extensive succession of monarchs, in two different lines, under whom the grandest and most complex transactions occurred which could pertain to so limited a region, including the destruction of Zion and its magnificent temple; the captivity of the whole people for seventy years; their ultimate redemption, with the rebuilding of their city and the Temple of their Great King. At length, in the fullness of time, the Savior of the world appeared, in whom a thousand predictions centered. His birth and ancestry are narrated, with many incidental occurrences.—To which are subjoined his arraignment at the bar of Pilate; an account of the indignities which he endured; his patient sufferings; his death, and his resurrection. To all those narratives are added, the lives and travels of his Apostles—the establishment of the first Christian churches, with their individual and general persecutions;—twenty-one Apostolical epistles; a voyage abounding with striking incidents; and the whole concluding with a series of the sublimest Revelations; yet that dignified mass of materials is concentrated into a compass which a finger might suspend, and a wayfaring man can read!

All must feel that a few words added to, or subtracted from the precepts or parables of our Redeemer, would have jarred, and brought down the whole, comparatively, to a human level; but now they stand in a sacred investment of language, which if, with the other Scriptures, they were not guarded by "the plagues which are written in this book," none would dare to violate. To furnish an additional example of the brevity contained in Scripture, it may be remarked, what an extent of condensed meaning appears in the explanation which Christ gave of his parable of the end of the world. "He who soweth the good seed is the Son of Man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; the tares are the children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels." In the attenuated thread of ordinary composition, what a large space would have been occupied by that and other brief specimens of Biblical narrative!

Recur to the size of the Bible! With such strong inducements in the respective writers to extirpate, had it not been for an overruling Providence, in restraining their natural dispositions, a hundred folio volumes could scarcely have contained so vast a depository as the sacred canon. In that case, for all practical purposes, it must have been nearly a sealed book; independent of the impossibility which would have existed, during the manuscript ages, of disseminating copies sufficient to guard against the ravages of time, to allow three transcripts for the whole world. That compression must be viewed as one of the most striking of the Scripture miracles.

Jesus Christ, instead of preparing this well-digested statement of his actions, doctrines, and miracles, wrote not one word!—Instead of selecting historians to record his life from among the learned and refined, he chose for his coadjutors and biographers, illiterate fishermen! Instead of providing for the future, and testifying an earnestness, lest succeeding generations should but imperfectly comprehend his designs, arising from the incompetency of the agents who were to transmit the statement of them to posterity—instead of cautioning those of his followers who might project a history of their Master, for distant ages, to be faithful, and to omit no part of those leading points on which the strength of his mission rested, he absolutely gave no directions, made no provision, and discovered no solicitude!—Joseph Cottle.

From Bishop Reynolds on Psalm cx.

THE GLORY OF THE GOSPEL.

The Gospel is a glorious Gospel, because it is the Gospel of the blessed God. There is a glory in all the works of God, because they are his; for it is impossible that so great a workman should ever put his hand to an ignoble work. And therefore the prophet David useth his "glory" and his "handiwork" promiscuously for the same thing; "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," to note that there is an evidence of glory in every thing which he puts his hand unto. And yet the prophet there sheweth that there is more glory in the "law" of his mouth than in the "work" of his hands. The Lord is better known by Zion, and his name is greater in Israel, than all the world besides.

The more God doth communicate himself unto any of his works, the more glorious it is. Now there is nothing wherein God hath so much put himself, wherein he may be so fully known, communicated with, depended upon, and praised, as in the Gospel. This is a glass in which the blessed angels do see and admire those unsearchable riches of his mercy to the church, which they had not by their own observation found out from the immediate view of his glorious presence. In the creatures, we have him a God of power and wisdom, working all things in number, weight and measure. In the law, we have him a God of vengeance and of recompense; in the publication thereof threatening, and in the execution thereof inflicting, wrath upon those that transgress it. But in the Gospel we have him a God of bounty and endless compassion; humbling himself that he might be merciful to his enemies, that he might himself bear the punishment of those injuries which had been done unto himself, that he might beseech his own prisoners to be pardoned and reconciled again. In the creature, he is a God above us; in the law, he is a God against us; only in the Gospel he is Immanuel, a God with us, a God like us, a God for us.

There is nothing doth declare God so much to be God, as his mercy in the Gospel. He is invisible in himself; we cannot see him but in his Son; he is unapproachable in himself; we cannot come unto him but by the Son. Therefore when he made himself known in his glory to Moses, he sendeth him not to Mount Sinai, but putteth him into a rock, (being a resemblance of Christ,) and then maketh a proclamation of the Gospel unto him. Moses' prayer was, "I beseech thee, shew me thy glory." How doth the Lord grant this prayer? "I will make all thy goodness pass before thee," (Exo. xxxiii. 18, 19,) and then revealeth himself almost all by mercy. "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin." (Exo. xxxiv. 6, 7.) To note unto us that the glory of God is in nothing so much revealed as in his goodness, "who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his people?" (Micah xii. 18.)

Besides, though the law be indeed from God, as from the author of it, so that in that respect there may seem to be no difference of excellency, between that and the Gospel, yet though God should not have revealed his law again unto Moses in the mount, much of the law, and by consequence of God himself, might have been discovered by human industry; and we see by notable examples of the philosophers, and grave heathen. But the Gospel is such a mystery as was forever hidden from the reach and very suspicion of nature, and wholly of divine revelation. 'Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the hearts of men, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.' The apostle speaketh of the mystery of the Gospel; noting it is above observation, or learning, or comprehension of nature so much as to suspect it; nay, the natural inquiry of the angels themselves could never have discovered it; even unto them it is made known by the church, (Eph. iii. 9, 10.) that is, if it had not been for the church's sake that God would reveal so glorious a mystery, the angels in heaven must have been forever ignorant of it. So extremely desperate was the fall of man, that it wanted the infinite and unsearchable wisdom of God himself to find out a remedy against it.

We must not, then, look upon God only in Mount Sinai, in his law; but we must acquaint ourselves with him in his Son; we must know him, and whom he hath sent, together; there is no fellowship with the Father, except it be with the Son too. We may have a knowledge of his "hand," that is, of his works, and of his punishments, without Christ; but we cannot have a knowledge of his "bosom," that is, of his counsels, and his compassions, nor the knowledge of his image, that is, of his holiness, grace and righteousness; nor the knowledge of his presence, that is, of his comforts here, and his glory hereafter, but only in and by Christ. We may know God in the world, for in the creation is manifest his "eternal power and Godhead." But this is a barren and fruitless knowledge, which will not keep down unrighteousness; for the wise men of this world, "when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, but became vain in their imaginations," and held that truth of him which was in the creation revealed in unrighteousness." We may know him in his law too; but this a killing knowledge; a knowledge which makes us flee from God, and hide ourselves out of his presence; and therefore it is called "the ministration of death," 2 Cor. iii. 7. But to know the glory of God, "in the face of Jesus Christ," is both a fruitful and a comfortable knowledge; we know the pattern we must walk by, we know the life we must live by, we know the treasure we must be supplied by, we know whom we have believed, we know whom we may be bold with in all the straits and distresses; we know God in Christ full of love, full of compassion, full of ears to hear us, full of eyes to watch over us, full of hands to fight for us, full of tongues to commune with us, full of power to preserve us, full of grace to transform us, full of fidelity to keep covenant with us, full of wisdom to conduct us, full of redemption to save us, full of glory to reward us.

THE CHRISTIAN.

And here permit me to remind you of the import attached in the first ages to that honorable appellation we are called to sustain, and the extent of obligation essentially included in the profession of a Christian. In those days of primitive simplicity and truth, it was identical with all that could elevate and ennoble. It signified no faint convictions, no questionable motives, no equivocal condition. The zeal it spoke of, was an inextinguishable flame. The joys of which it was the symbol were as life from death. No danger could alarm, no opposition quell that spirit of beneficence it was known to indicate. The fury of the persecutor, and the derision of the scorner, were alike powerless before it. He who possessed it, stood composed and dauntless against the combined assaults of violence and slander. As if the shield of the cherubim were stretched above his head,—as if a buckler of triple brass begirt his bosom, he was insensible to weakness, and incapable of fear. He might fall, but he could not fly. He might perish, but he could not yield. His blood might be spilled upon the ground; but his hope could not waver, nor his honor be trampled in the dust. You might crush his limbs with torture, his affections with solitude, his name with infamy, and his freedom with the chain; but he bore within him an imperishable principle, which you could not crush nor impair: it was the energy of living faith. This, like electric fire, acquired force by resistance, and intensity by repression, borrowing increase of splendor from surrounding gloom. The planets might have grown weary in their orbits, the lamps of heaven gone out in utter darkness, but this living flame could never languish—this ethereal spirit never could expire. Here was the fragment of a new creation, the germ and rudiment of a yet unfashioned world. Infolding in itself the embryo of that last form of perfected existence, wherein the great Parent Mind would finally enshrine the relations of his power and glory; it was fitted to survive convulsion, and to forbid decay. It could only waste with the waste of that eternal spring from whence it was derived. Hence it subsisted in perennial fulness, and poured its renewed influences with an unfailing stream. Christianity was then the religion of heroes—of saints, apostles, and martyrs. It belonged to them "of whom the world was not worthy." It transfigured all it touched into its own celestial likeness; enduring its subjects, of whatever age or condition, and an exhaustless ardor, before which the virtues of the patriot or the warrior dwindled into ordinary things. To be a christian, then, was to hold fellowship with uncreated wisdom, to drink of the fountain of eternal purity, and to breathe the soul of a philanthropy as unquenchable as it was unrestrained. It was to tread in the footsteeps of Jesus, and to partake the mind of God. The energy which bore him onward was no other than that which made death vital, and mortal agony the source of endless beatitude, as it lighted the features, and gleamed from the eyes, which were dimmed and shrouded, and closing on the cross.—Dr. McAll.

A SUITABLE TEXT.—Do you like sunshine? Do you love to see the heavens and the earth glittering around you? Do you desire to be defended from danger, and protected from every evil, temporal and spiritual? Are you a sinner, and does your soul yearn for forgiveness and mercy? Is this world dark and dreary, and is the world to come the object of your constant desires? Turn to the Lord, your righteousness and strength, and see what a comforting text he has provided for your especial case. "The Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." Psal. lxxxiv. 11.

Next to virtue, let children be trained to industry; for both poverty and fraud are the effects of sloth.

"REST FROM LABOR."

"That they may rest from their labors." This refers to the kingdom of heaven, where, it is also said, "the weary are at rest." Labor and toil for Christ in this world, is to be rewarded by rest in heaven.

We think it would be well for many disciples to ponder this language well. They form pleasing ideas of the heavenly world, but do not sufficiently consider that its attainment is to be the result of holy, moral character, which character is attained, as one of its chief means, by faithful labors in the service of Christ. He will have the best fitness for it, as well as the best idea of the rest of heaven, who abounds most in arduous labor to promote the spiritual kingdom of God in his own soul and around him. As the hungry have the clearest conceptions of the value of food, so those who toil earnestly in Christ's service, have the clearest conceptions of that blessed repose in glory which shall be their reward.

Rest from labor implies that there has been labor. But are there not many who have but faint, if they have any, idea of what laboring for Christ means, as part of their own history. From one step to another they have been led to a profession of religion, have maintained a character free from gross wrong, but have lived strangers to every thing like personal, energetic, self-denying activity in the cause of Christ. They have not maintained a spirited conflict with their own evil propensities, and been laborers in that sense. Neither have they turned any measure of their strength against surrounding wickedness, and sought to bring the perishing into the kingdom of God.

They rest from their labors! But they have not yet begun to labor. They weary in the Christian conflict! But they have not yet begun to strive. They triumph in the rewards of victory—the repose of heaven! But they have not fought—have never been in the battle. They have scarcely done any thing more towards becoming soldiers, than to put on the external badges.

Rest from their labors! They are resting now. The whole life is resting; is a refraining from zeal and activity in the cause of Christ. They cannot, surely, need the rest of the weary, who have not yet awakened from their morning slumbers.—They cannot be fatigued who have not begun to labor.

Paul found heaven a rest. His wearied spirit gloried in its sweet repose. But he had been a laborer. The sweat of toil was on his brow from the first hour that he thrust the sickle into the harvest till death made him drop it. It was nothing but death that could make him drop it. He was so interested in his labor, and so earnest, and so absorbed in it, that death's voice was the only one that could call him off. Satan had often tried to frighten him from his work, and the wicked pelted him with all sorts of missiles, but they had to give the matter up. Work he would in spite of them all. He did a prodigious amount of labor—was wearied in it, (not of it,) and needed rest, as his mental energies were exhausted. Sweet must be the heavenly rest of such a laborer. And all the faithful servants in the Lord's vineyard, shall share it with him.—Recorder.

THE NOBLE SAVIOR.

History tells us, that Augustus, having twice witnessed the ingratitude of one of his subjects, softened him when a captive rebel, and changed him into a friend by a third time bestowing peculiar favors upon him. Thus the Emperor's treacherous friend was soon won to him; but man is not so soon won to God. The Father has manifested forbearance; has uttered in his word entreaties and invitations; has borne with provocations, ingratitude, and insult; and yet is forgiving. To complete all, he gave his best Beloved, the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person. He sent his Son; and thus, as it were, by one gift, exhausted the treasures of infinite benevolence; for further displaying love how could even God advance!—The strange and matchless love thus manifested, he manifested also in the design he contemplated. He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. He would have manifested love, if he had consigned a world of rebels to non-existence; if when indignation and wrath had been merited, he had committed the sinner to his guilt and his punishments in everlasting nothingness, and rendered death, what infidels would like it to be, an eternal sleep. But such was the Father's love, he would, through the death of his Beloved, give life. And not a life like Adam's lengthened to almost ten centuries, or ten thousand times as long, but eternal life; and delighting in the happiness of the pardoned rebels that become partakers of his salvation, he calls them to his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, and will bless them with eternal freedom from sorrows and from sins. O, wonderful love of God! and wonderful wickedness of infatuated man, that slights and disregards such patient and unbounded love!

ABIDE IN CHRIST.—However men may cleave to Christ—Isaiah xlviii. 2; John xv. 2;—by the outward ties of sacraments, yet if the spirit that dwells in Christ dwells not in them, they are not one with him.—There is a great difference betwixt adhesion and engrafting. The ivy clasps the oak, but it is not one with it. Many professors take hold of Christ—Isaiah iv. 1—and stay themselves upon him, but grow upon their roots. They take him to support their hopes, but their delights are elsewhere.

AN EDITOR'S ARROWS.—A correspondent of the Christian Watchman calls good communications the arrows of an Editor. We think the figure a good one, and would invite our brethren to fill our quiver. We extract from the Watchman, the following excellent rules for the benefit of those who wish to write for the press:—Cross and Journal.

1. Seek to be suitably impressed with the duty of doing good by means of that powerful engine the periodical press.

2. Be in the habit of preserving and of noting down incidents, and striking thoughts, to be afterwards combined and written out.

3. In writing never forget that you address an audience, unequalled in numbers and dignity by any which ever did or ever can listen to the voice of a living speaker.

4. "Write rapidly, but revise with care." Avoid sending the production of an unpractised pen to the press in haste. Write and re-write, lay it by to revise again when the mind is cool, and above all never send a communication to the Editor with faults to be corrected which you can discover and correct yourself.

5. Recollect that you are a writer, not an Editor—that whatever merits your production may possess in your own estimation, he is bound to be the best judge whether they are suitable for his columns. The best writers are always most modest and unobtrusive in this respect. "If acceptable, insert it; if not, burn it."

6. Write legibly, punctuate just as you wish it to be printed, and recollect that in the columns of a weekly paper an article is far more valuable by being suitably divided into paragraphs.

7. Pray earnestly that your communications may be indeed "as arrows in the hands of a mighty man," that they may be "words fitly written as apples of gold in pictures of silver," and look for your reward when "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

THE JEWS WITHOUT THE GOSPEL.

Mr. Frey thus speaks of the condition of his brethren:—

"For several long years, while officiating Rabbi in the synagogue, it was my painful lot to attend the sick and dying; and while I found all of them sensible of their being sinners, exposed to the wrath of Almighty God, I never found one saying, like good old Simeon, "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation!" Oh, how painful the scene of a dying sinner without the hope of salvation! How often did it bring to my mind the following affecting story contained in the Talmud:—

"When Rabbi Jochanen Ben Rezhai was sick, and his disciples saw him weeping, they said, "Thou light of Israel, the right hand pillar, the strong hammer, why dost thou weep?" He answered, "If they were carrying me before a king of flesh and blood, who is here to-day and to-morrow in the grave; who, if he were angry with me, his anger would not last for ever; if he put me in bondage, his bondage would not be everlasting; if he condemned me to death, that death would not be eternal; whom I could soothe with words and bribe with riches; yet even in these circumstances I should weep. But now I am going before the King of kings, the only blessed God, who liveth for ever and ever; if he be angry with me, his anger will last for ever; if he put me in bondage, his bondage will be everlasting; if he condemn me to death, that death will be eternal; whom I cannot soothe with words or bribe with riches.—When, besides, there are before me two ways; the one to hell, the other to Paradise, and I know not to which they are carrying me, should I not weep?"—Talmud Berachoteh, vol. ii. col. 12.

SINFUL IGNORANCE.—Darkness in the minds of men, ignorance of God, his nature, and his will, was the original of all evil unto this world, and so continues.—Hereon did Satan erect his kingdom and throne, obtaining in his design until he bare himself as the God of this world, and was so esteemed by the most of mankind. As prince of darkness, he exalted himself, by virtue of that darkness, into the place of God, as the object of the religious worship of men. For the things which the Gentiles sacrificed unto devils, and not unto God. This is the territory of Satan, the power and sceptre of his kingdom in the minds of the children of disobedience. Hereby he maintains his dominion to this day in many and great nations, and with numberless individuals. This is the spring of all wickedness and confusion among men. Hence arose that deluge of abominations in the old world, which God took away with a flood of desolation. Hence were the sins of Sodom and Gomorrah, which he punished with fire from heaven. All the rage, confusion, cruelty, oppression, and villany, with which the world is filled, and whereby the souls of men are hurried into eternal destruction, have arisen from corrupt ignorance of God.—Owen.

AN ENEMY.—There is no enemy like an offended conscience. It harasses the soul, weakens the moral energies, destroys the peace of the mind, brings into captivity, to sin and death. The only way to avoid such an enemy is to obey God and have a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man.

A SOLEMN THOUGHT.—The trumpet shall sound! Long—long after the millions who now are living upon earth shall have laid their weary heads on the lap of their mother earth—a remembrance of his promise shall come up in the ETERNAL MIND, and the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised.

The husbandman throws his seed into the earth in the late days of autumn, and covers it deep from his sight, yet he expects to see it again in the spring. So we, when we lay the inanimate bodies of our friends in the grave, expect to see them again.

Ye, who have wronged the dead! tremble and turn pale—for ye shall see them again glaring upon you with eyes of fire, and showing you the wounds with which ye have gored their bosoms, and accusing you before the world of hidden injuries and wrongs inflicted with deliberate malice, long years since. It is dreadful to have a human being, an immortal spirit leave the world ill at peace with us. For no bribery can suborn a witness against us who has once passed into eternity.—His tale will ring around the judgment tribunal, and we, unrepenting and unresolved, shall be speechless under the accusations of a wounded spirit. No wonder, in view of this solemn [illegible], the Savior said, Let not the sun go down upon your wrath! Oh, settle with thy fellow man, lest death come in the [illegible] of his slumber, and seal up his eternal testimony against thee! Be at peace with thine enemy whilst thou art in the way with him.

[illegible] PILGRIM.

What, pilgrim! art thou faint and weary in thy way to [illegible]? Is thy burden heavier than thou canst bear? Well then, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee; he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved." Psa. lv. 22

Is the stormy wind and tempest abroad, and seekest thou a place of shelter? God is thy refuge. Does thy vigor fail thee, and dost thou faint for very feebleness?—God is thy strength. His afflictions gird [illegible] and is no friend [illegible] "God is a very present help in trouble." Psa. xlvi. 1.

Be of good courage, and hold thee on thy way. Is the [illegible], the river thou hast to cross, [illegible]? Do thy fiery trials [illegible] tribulation? Cheer up! [illegible] and listen to the voice of thy Lord—"When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. For I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel thy Saviour." [illegible]

NEED OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.—We always need the [illegible] of the Holy Spirit especially in the hour of death. A guilty [illegible], an offended God, and an unknown eternity, oppress the soul by their reality, and overwhelm it by their importance. [illegible] will not support. [illegible] give quiet [illegible] that hour [illegible] and we must feel the need of the grace of Christ when it is gone. We shall then be in the world of spirits, not hearing of eternity, but in it; not thinking of the judgment, but trembling before it; not saying "Is there a God?" but seeing him, and not musing about heaven and hell, but standing within a step—one moment of our everlasting abode. No self-righteous hope can stand in that hour. It may have rooted itself deeply in the mind, and we may have carried it about with us all our life long. It may have stood firm against many seasons and many providences. It may have triumphed over the plainest declarations of the Bible, and even borne unmoved the shock of death. But take it into eternity—bring it among the realities of the unseen world—then where is it? Gone. One moment has changed it into immoveable despair!—Bradley.

"It is a mournful wedding," said the wife of a minister, just after a young man with his bride had left the house. "Why so?" said the minister. "He drinks—and he has drank hard." "I think the prospects of a young lady who marries a drinking young man, are very gloomy." "I think so too," said the minister. "I did not know," he continued, "that the young man made use of intoxicating liquors. It is truly a mournful fact. It casts a dark and mournful cloud over their future destinies. No young lady at the present day, should, on any account, consent to marry a man who swallows inebriating liquors as a beverage."

Young woman! beware of the intoxicating cup in the hand of one who proffers a union with you; it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."—Abolition Standard.

WARNING.—Your day will end. The night of death will call you from this life. The doom at death standeth as long as God liveth,—for ever. How comfortable will the feast of a good conscience be to you, when your eye-strings shall break, your face wax pale, and the breath turn cold, and your soul shall long to have the door open, that the prisoner may be set at liberty. Make sure work of salvation, that it be not to seek, when the sand-glass is run out, and time and eternity shall be conjoined. There is no errand so weighty! O take it to heart!—Rutherford.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, February 5, 1841.

DANIEL S. TRUMAN is requested to act as Agent in West Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y.

PROSPECTUS
OF THE
Seventh-Day Baptist Register.
VOLUME II.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS.

The SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER will be published weekly, at De Ruyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on an Imperial sheet, at $2 per annum, in advance; $2,25, after six months; or $2,50 at the end of the year. To village subscribers, $2,25, in advance; or $2,50, at the end of the year.

It will continue to be the organ of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, and contend for the truths of the Bible, as held by them. In advocating the sentiments of this people, it will not be censorious or illiberal to those of different denominations. It will embrace in its object the whole range of christian doctrines and duties, and advocate with a becoming zeal, the various moral and benevolent en- [illegible] its columns may be found things interesting and profitable to all.

The REGISTER will be what it has been, with such alterations only, as will make it more interesting to its readers. While we are grateful for the indulgence and approbation of our readers, during the first year of our labors, we would respectfully invite their co-operation, assuring them it will be our chief effort to make the REGISTER what it should be, and well worthy of their patronage.

We assure those of all denominations, who patronize us, that it will be our object to furnish them with an evangelical paper, which shall "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." In all of our labors, we shall strive to cultivate the spirit of the Gospel, and labor for the promotion of practical religion, as well as to defend its theory.

We wish our agents to renew their efforts to supply each family in our denomination with a copy of the Register.

A portion of our columns will be devoted to Literature, Science, Agriculture, and General Intelligence. Party Politics will have no place in the REGISTER.

Those who will aid us in procuring new subscribers, and in remitting money, shall receive both our gratitude and a liberal compensation.

CATHOLIC STATISTICS.

Two weeks since, we inserted the Catholic statistics in the U. S. as given in the Catholic Almanac. We did not think, at the time, that it was incredible. We have seen the same in several of our exchanges, that have the best means of knowing their accuracy; and we are not fully sure, now, that the statement is not nearly or quite correct. Our thanks, however, are due to the editor of "an evangelical paper" for very kindly reminding us, that "If a little reason were exercised, there would be no kind of currency given to such gross fabrications of Jesuits, nor would intelligent men resort to panic-making to awaken vigilance," and that "the exaggeration is palpable and preposterous: 800,000 is a most liberal allowance, and beyond their actual due; and no Protestant should help them on with their gull-traps. Away with all panic-making, or giving credit to their artful assumptions, to obtain for themselves consequence." If we are required to believe that the Baptists number, in their congregations and communions, more than three millions of people in the Union, (as the Editor assures us they do,) would it be taxing our credulity too much to believe the statement of the Catholic population? especially, when in that number is included all that are connected with the Catholic church, or are of Catholic education, or descent? We admit that the statement may be exaggerated; yet we had no design of creating a "panic." 'Tis true the Catholic domination is to be feared, and it is the duty of all Protestants to stick "to the law and the testimony," and be sure that they do not give countenance to Catholicism, either by remaining silent, while they are making such rapid progress in numbers, or by cherishing as institutions of the church of Christ, doctrines that were first taught by the Catholic church in its degenerate state.

We should fear to have either Catholics or Protestants exercise both religious and civil authority, while so much pride of opinion and sectarian zeal is manifest.—Catholic domination is not the only power that is to be feared, if the following quotation (which we take from the article above alluded to,) is an index of the views and feelings of the denomination to which it refers, viz: "In the State of New York there are, according to clear and satisfactory statistics, at least 80,000 Baptist communicants, and when to these is added the population connected with them, they present an array of voters capable of controlling any election whatever." But we are unwilling to persuade ourselves that the author of the above remark is disposed to exercise religious intolerance, or wishes to unite church with state.

While we greet all Protestants as brethren beloved, we can but feel pleased when we see Catholics contending with becoming zeal for the promotion of benevolent objects. By reference to a late number of the Temperance Recorder, it will be seen that in the city of Utica, the Catholics were laboring, almost alone, to drive the demon intemperance from the place, while a great majority of Protestants were doing little or nothing for the same object.

"A new commandment I give unto you: that ye love one another, as I have loved you, that ye also love one another."

The love which Christ exercised to his disciples, and all men, was of a right character, being founded upon a right basis, and free from any unhallowed design. Nothing but the well being of those who were the objects of his love, could have inspired such an ennobling emotion in his bosom. He needed not the praise of men to add to the honors of his kingdom, nor their services to add to his essential happiness. His was pure, unaffected, and holy love, without measure, beginning, or end. This is the kind that the disciples are commanded to exercise towards each other. To do this, is the most ennobling act of the christian. He that is a stranger to the grace of God which bringeth salvation, is incapable of the act. But he who partakes of the spirit of Christ, will labor always to exercise it. How happy that people, whose God is the Lord, and whose hearts beat in unison, thrilled by the same holy emotions, and governed by the same pure affections! Pure love has no covert designs, no selfishness to gratify, no advantages to seek; its actions are open, frank, and conciliatory.

"As I have loved you, that ye also love one another." Whose love will bear a comparison with the Savior's? Every degree that it is removed from this standard, its character degenerates, and it becomes subservient at the last, to the unholy purposes of a corrupt heart. O! how is the Savior wounded by his professed friends, when, in the place of those holy emotions they are required to cherish, a selfish, revengeful spirit is exercised? The Christian's heart is sufficiently rent with anguish to see sinners despising God, and religion, without being compelled to witness the strifes, envyings, and evil surmisings of the church militant. If a sinner receive everlasting punishment for neglecting God, What will be the end of those who make Zion bleed at every pore, when, instead of exercising that love to the children of God that he has commanded, unhallowed means are used to accomplish selfish purposes?

COTILLON PARTIES.

The Cotillon discussion is ended. An apology is due to many of our readers for the space it has occupied in our columns. It is presumed that most of our readers know but little of such parties, and are not exposed to their influence; yet it is important to decide principles for future contingencies. From what has been exhibited, our readers cannot fail to see, that while no good arises from them, much evil may.—The friends of Cotillons have had the privilege of showing the advantages of such parties, and all that they have presented us, has been published.

We have rejected several articles that have come to us against them, and now feel it our duty to decline publishing any thing farther on this subject. If we offend any, by this course, we are confident that it will not be as many as we have displeased by admitting the discussion.

If we had mentioned what our own observation has been, we should have spoken decidedly against dancing parties—as having an injurious effect upon the manners, morals, and health of dancers. We have now distinctly in our minds instances of this kind. We, therefore, recommend to young ladies and gentlemen to spend their winter evenings in cultivating their minds with things ennobling, and their hearts with the pure principles of morality and religion.

PRICE OF THE REGISTER.—Our terms for the next volume are the same as for this, with this exception only, that 25 cents will be added at the close of the year. If the Register were three dollars, in advance, it would be as cheap as many of our exchanges. Our object is not to make ourselves rich, or to charge all that we might reasonably, we, therefore, offer the Register for $2, in advance, which is better for us than $2,50 at the close of the year. But for the sake of accommodating many who want the paper, and are not ready to pay in advance, we are willing to wait longer for the pay, though we sacrifice by doing so. Thus, it will be seen that we have no design of taking unlawful interest, (as some have termed it,) by having different prices for those who pay at different times.

ERRATA.—In the article under the caption of "Developement of Talent in the Anti-Slavery cause," published last week, we are under the necessity of correcting the following errors, which escaped our notice in the hurry of proof-reading:—The relative "who" is omitted before the word "stammered." Also, for "technical love," read, "technical lore."

We this week send out our prospectus for the next volume of the Register. We can but express our gratitude to our friends for the prompt manner in which they have come to our help. If the Register has met your wishes, our highest hopes are fully realised. To us, the labor of furnishing you a religious paper, though arduous, has been pleasant; and the idea of doing good to the souls of our fellows by means of the press, is in no wise unpleasant. With your co-operation, we intend to make the Register still more useful, and hope it may be blessed of God, to the instruction, edification, and salvation of many.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We must decline publishing the article of "E. B. C." In doctrinal discussion, hypotheses should always be accompanied with proof; otherwise, there is no data upon which to fix the mind, and nothing but assertion to convince the understanding.

The lines of our "impenitent friend," we have concluded to lay aside. We love Poetry, but "jingling rhyme" we cannot admire.

NEW GENESEE FARMER.—The first number of Vol. II. of this excellent paper has come to our table. It is a monthly periodical, of 16 large pages, devoted to the great interests of Agriculture and Horticulture. The very low price (50 cents,) at which it is offered, together with great value, should induce every farmer to possess it. Farmers ought to be scientific men.—The advantages which might be derived by them from this work, would, doubtless, a great many times pay for it.

COTILLON PARTIES.

Uncle William's Concluding Letter.

DEAR BROTHER MELVILLE:—Though I personally address you, yet you well understand that what I write is intended for all who feel any interest in the discussion, which my reply to Amanda's note of inquiry has elicited.

I do not sit down to write a staid review, nor to employ my pen in the style of a forensic debating school, nor to answer in due form, and under numerical heads, your important inquiries; but taking a general survey of the whole discussion, I find some items suggested to my mind, which I feel inclined to present in that untrammeled mode of address which properly belongs to a family epistle. In this way, I hope to be able to meet your inquiries more fully than I could by any other mode of writing, and I shall feel myself at liberty to notice such matters, 'by the way,' as may seem to me to require a passing allusion.

I present sincere and merited thanks to my endeared circle of relatives, from my venerable brother Perry, to my youthful niece, Amanda—for all that they have written for the purpose of sustaining the positions which I have taken on this topic.

The open reception which the advocates of the parties gave to "Aunt Mary's" explanation of the views of "Uncle William," deserves commendation; as also the frankness, talent, kindness, and pleasantness of feeling which they have manifested in the discussion.

It would not be strange if some good people should inquire—Why do we discuss this subject at all? Especially, Why has the discussion been protracted by listening to what the friends of dancing parties have been pleased to say in their favor? Among those who propose these inquiries, there may be parents whose children living

"Far from the madding [illegible]
Their sober wishes never learn to stray;
Along the cool sequester'd vale of life,
They keep the [illegible]"

But those parents whose sons and daughters are so located that they stand within the circles of the giddy whirlpool of fashion, where it is reiterated in their ears, that to be prepared for the enjoyment of refined society, they must be perfected in the accomplishments of the Cotillon room—such will see the reason why the adherents to those amusements should have fair opportunity to state their own defense, and that it may be kindly and plainly met.

The substance of their defense is—that the youthful mind needs something for relief from a daily routine of toil and care—that the parties in question meet this demand, and also that they assist to acquire gracefulness of address, and in other respects, ease and gentility of manners, thus preparing the youth to pass with personal and communicative delight in all the grades of desirable society.

We must sympathize with youth. I love to look upon the gambols of the lamb, and my heart dilates with joy as I watch him bounding from rock to rock. With similar, though I trust more exalted feelings, I notice the sports of the laughing child; and may He, who I hope controls the emotions of my soul, save me from imbibing sourness of temper, because youth display in my presence vivacity and glee. I expect such exhibitions of youthful ardor from them, as much as I expect to see the lamb gambol, or the child sport. What I ask is, that this buoyant energy of the youthful mind may be rightly directed. My full conviction is, that dancing parties give it a wrong direction.

Do Christian parents inquire, How shall we restrain our children from vain amusements? I reply: Take care that their time is usefully employed. They will be employed to assist you in your domestic cares—to acquire such knowledge as shall fit them for usefulness in society to the end of their days—in addition to the sciences which they will study, they will find many interesting books which they will wish to read, also the periodicals of the day will demand some portion of their time. That the reading of the scriptures, and attendance on public worship, should occupy some portion of youthful probation, no Christian parent can doubt. An interchange of visits with friends will not be forgotten. From these hasty hints, it would appear that your children can find enough to do, without resorting to vain amusements "to kill time." We have made no allowance now for one moment to be spent in bearing pain—nor for an hour's attendance in the sick room of a relative or acquaintance; but we see enough to do to prevent one from "dying with the ennui."

Again; adopt the motto of the Rev. Leigh Richmond—"A good home is the best of schools." Fail not to make home pleasant. Gather all the charms around it which you possibly can. You need not stores of wealth to make home delightful. The day-laborer can make home the happiest place to his children that they can find on earth. Well governed children will not be disposed to break away from the charms of a christian home, to mingle in the giddy dance.—Is it claimed that in the dancing party good manners are taught? Let parents teach these at home. If they need assistance in this branch of the education of their children, let them obtain it from good friends around them. The teachers of the schools to which they send their children, ought to be able to render them aid. Are youth taught at the Cotillon to properly appear in company, to treat their superiors with respect, especially the aged? Are they there taught to conduct themselves with propriety in religious meetings? All this, and whatever else belongs to good manners, can be taught them at home. I add once more: Supreme attachment to Christ, will qualify you to restrain your sons and daughters from vain amusements.

Christ says, "If any man love son or daughter more than me, he is not worthy of me." Love Christ supremely, and then restrain your children from whatever recreations would be adverse to the [illegible] of his kingdom in their hearts. In such a state of heart you will exercise parental restraints from right motives. In a [illegible] manner you will lay these upon your children. You will do it with [illegible] avoiding moroseness of [illegible] tary expressions, and repulsive [illegible] Your children will not break away [illegible] such restraints.

So treat your children as to [illegible] trate to them the truth that,

"Re[illegible]
To make [illegible]"

but is most admirably [illegible] affections [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: BUT KNOW THOU, that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment."

That God may prepare us for the scenes of the approaching Judgment, is the prayer of UNCLE WILLIAM.

Louisiana.—The proportion of slaves to free persons in Louisiana, is as three to one.

Eld. John Leland, of Cheshire, Berkshire Co., Mass., is dead.

The Steam-ship Columbia brought at her last trip about 30,000 letters.

George Smith, of Baltimore, compelled a little slave to carry such loads on her head, that at length it became flattened.

INTELLIGENCE.

[illegible]

[illegible] of Missouri and of the Northwest was already ascertained to exceed the area of the great State of Pennsylvania; and by the more recent explorations of those most talented geologists, Dr. Owen, and Col. Nicollet, this mineral region was believed to exceed the superficies of the two largest States of the Union. It was the most fertile in soil as well as the richest and most extensive mineral region in the world. Among other valuable minerals in this great region, were iron, lead, copper and zinc. In lead, the quantity produced had augmented from 335,000 pounds in 1823, to 31,000,000 pounds in 1839, worth at New-York, $1,500,000. We had thus risen, in less than a quarter of a century from nothing to the third on the list of nations which produced lead; and at the same ratio of augmentation, we should, in twenty years stand at the head of the list, when, it was hoped we might, as we now do, not only supply our own market, but that lead would become a large article of export. As to copper, the importance was still greater.—Our imports of copper in 1839, amounted to within a small fraction of $2,000,000.

Mr. Linn, also remarked that minerals were undoubtedly to be found throughout the entire west. At this time, England is the greatest lead country in the world, producing annually 100,000,000 pounds, while the rest of Europe did not produce more than 50,000 000. In seventeen years the United States had raised from 6,000,000 to 30,000,000. What with such boundless resources, might not be anticipated in seventeen more? He left for those to answer who could form a proper estimate of the region of country.

Pre-emption Bill.—Mr. Calhoun opened the discussion with a truly splendid speech, in reply chiefly to the condensed argument offered by Mr. Webster on Thursday evening, and Mr. Webster who was thus suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to defend his positions, made a most masterly reply, perhaps the most successful effort he ever made on the floor.

Cost of the Army—In the House—Jan. 19th.—Mr. Mallory moved a resolution requesting of the Secretary of war an estimate of the cost of the whole army,

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Barnard continued his argument on this question, he closed by moving a committment of the matter to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to authorize a loan of ten millions on the credit of the government, and to prepare a bill to impose additional revenue on wines, silks, &c.

Mr. Evans continued the debate, and was followed by Mr. Bell.

Seneca Treaty,—Mr. Grinnell presented a memorial of the Society of Friends, composing the yearly meetings of New-York, Ohio, Rhode Island and Maryland, remonstrating against the Seneca Treaty.

Treasury Note Bill.—Jan. 20th, Mr. Bell continued his speech, and was followed by several others.

This debate will last probably, for several weeks—a fortnight at least. Mr. Adams is desirous of speaking and left the Chair of the Committee of the whole for that purpose.

Seneca Treaty.—Mr Peck, moved a resolution requiring of the Secretary of War a statement of the number of treaties made with the Indians of New-York, and what agency the Ogden Land Co. have had in procuring them.

Abolition of Slavery.—Jan. 21st—Mr. Adams presented a memorial from Allegany county, Pennsylvania, praying that no new State whose constitution, tolerates slavery be admitted into the Union; that the inter-State slave trade be abolished, and that slavery in the District of Columbia, and Territories be abolished. Mr. A. moved its reference to the Committee on foreign affairs.

The petition, upon examination, being found contraband, and the House was puzzled what to do with it. First, it was laid on the table. But as that implied reception, the vote was re-considered, and Mr. Black, of Ga., moved that the whole petition be rejected.

The speaker stated and decided that only a part of the petition came within the rules prohibiting the reception of petitions touching slavery; that the part respecting the admission of States was receivable and had been received; and that the motion to reject the whole was not in order. Mr. Black appealed from this decision, and a very warm and rather confused and disorderly discussion followed, which was cut short by the expiration of the morning hour.

Treasury Note Bill,—Mr Thompson, of S. C., spoke in favor of raising the necessary revenue of imposing duties on luxuries, in such a manner as not to violate the Compromise Act, which he considered as binding in law, and binding in honor. He was of opinion that the revenue of 1841 would fall short of the ordinary and necessary expenditures by about ten or fifteen millions. He was followed by Messrs Rhett, and Evans.

Jan. 22d.—The debate on the above mentioned bill was continued by Mr. Rhett, Mr. Nisbet, and Mr. Thompson, of Miss., and on the 23*d*, also by Messrs. Thompson, Lane, and others, to the exclusion of every thing else,—Also a large portion of Jan. 25th.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.

From the Albany Journal

IN SENATE—TUESDAY. Jan. 26, 1841.

The resolution from the Assembly, directing the issue of public documents &c. to literary institutions was called up.

Mr H. A. Livingston moved to amend by striking out the words "not more than ten," thus leaving it discretionary, instead of limiting the number of institutions.

Mr. Root thought the discretion should be made by the Regents of the University, instead of the Secretary. The subject, however, required examination, and had better be delayed.

On motion of Mr. Dixon, the resolutions were referred to the Com. on Literature.

IN ASSEMBLY—TUESDAY, Jan. 26, 1841.

Mr. Swackhamer called for the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by him in relation to the time of holding Election for President and Vice President:

Whereas the public mind has become justly alarmed in consequence of recent developements of frauds having been committed upon the ballot boxes in several of the States. And whereas it is the duty of all who esteem a republican form of government to preserve inviolate the sacred right of franchise, bequeathed to us through the sufferings of our venerable ancestors. And whereas the existing regulations of holding elections on different days for electors of President and Vice President of the United States tends to faciliate the practice of residents of our State voting in other States at the same general election: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) that our Senators be instructed, and Representatives requested to use their influence for the passage of a law by Congress, for holding elections for electors of President and Vice President of the United States on the same day throughout the Union.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward copies of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State in Congress.

Mr. Townsend desired to amend by inserting the words "Members of Congress."

The course recommended by these resolutions would do more to purify elections than all the laws which could be passed by our Legislatures.

Mr. Duer, thought that a subject so important should be referred to the judiciary Committee before being acted upon by the House.

The wording of these resolutions and preamble, were frequently proper subjects of revision. In this very case the preamble stated a proposition which he believed to be altogether untrue. It looks very much like an attempt to get the endorsement of this House upon the charge of the last election having been gained by fraud. The public mind has felt no alarm at "any developements of fraud" for no such discoveries have been made.

Mr. D. moved its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. L. S. Chatfield asserted that fraud in the elections had been discovered, and had created great alarm among the people. He instanced the case of New Jersey and Ohio, and others, where the will of the people had in many cases been defeated. These resolutions were intended to subvert the machinations of those who would smother the voice of the free electors.

Mr. C. moved the reference to the committee of the Whole House, and called for the ayes and nays.

Mr. Swackhamer did not expect the charge of falsehood from any member of this House, and he distinctly repudiated such an accusation. When the proper time arrived, he, (Mr. S.) thought that he would be able to show by proof strong enough to suspend both the gentleman from Oswego and himself by the neck, that there had been fraud, open, glaring fraud.

Mr. Stoddard desired to accommodate his friend from New Jersey; no, not New Jersey now, but recently from there, and would be in favor of the reference to a committee of the Whole House. Just such things and statements were referred to the People of New Jersey, when in committee of the Whole last fall, and possibly the gentleman from New York (Mr. Swackhamer,) might have heard of their report.

Mr. Duer withdrew his reference.

Mr. Grout was surprised to hear the gentleman from Oswego deny that the People had complained of the abuse of the elective franchise. Mr. G. had accidentally discovered in the proceedings of a sister State (Massachusetts) some resolutions which looked as if they were awake. He found there a call for the repeal of "the odious, tyranical, detestable, sunset law, relative to elections"—an appeal for an enactment "to prevent poor men from the corrupt, captious neglect of assessors, as selectmen, in omitting to place their names upon the lists of voters.

And then the question being taken, it was decided to refer to the Committee of the Whole.

IN SENATE—January 27.

CHOICE OF A COMPTROLLER.

The Senators then openly nominated as follows:

For JOHN A. COLLIER—Messrs. Dickinson, Dixon, Hawkins, Hopkins, Hull, Humphrey, Hunt, Lee, H. A. Livingston, Maynard, Moseley, Nicholas, Peck, Platt, Rhoades, Root, Taylor, Verplanck, Works —19.

For ADDISON GARDNER—Messrs. Deniston, Ely, Foster, Hunter, Paige, Scott, Skinner, Strong—8

John A. Collier having received a majority of the votes, was declared duly nominated on the part of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. Moseley,

Resolved, That the Senate now proceed to the Assembly Chamber, for the purpose of comparing nominations for the office of Comptroller.

The Senate then repaired in a body to the Assembly Chamber, and after they had returned, the President announced that upon comparing nominations, they were found to agree in the selection of John A. Collier, who was thereupon declared duly elected to the office of Comptroller.

IN ASSEMBLY—January 27, 1841.

Mr. Worden, from the Select Committee to whom was referred so much of the Governor's Message as relates to the public domain, reports, in part, the following resolutions;

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That the public lands are the common property of the States, and of right should be held and appropriated for their common use and benefit, and that the proceeds thereof should be distributed amongst them, after making such reasonable appropriations, for public purposes, as Congress may deem just, to the several States and Territories in which they are situated.

Resolved, That we protest against the surrender of this common property of all the States to the particular States in which it is situated; and against any sale thereof at a less price than is now established by law.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State are requested to vote against any law containing provisions contrary to the sense of this Legislature, as expressed in these resolutions.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward copies of the foregoing resolutions to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, with a request that the same may be laid before the Senate and House of Representatives; and also to the Governors of the several States in the Union, with a request to lay the same before their respective Legislatures.

Mr. W. stated that the committee had instructed him to bring in these resolutions. It was due to the minority of the committee to state that they had consented to the report, without considering themselvs concluded by the report.

On motion of Mr. Worden the resolutions lie upon the table.

The Montreal Gazette states that Gen. Pearson, who succeeds Sir John Harvey in the administration of the Government of New Brunswick, served in the Canadas during the last war with Great Britain. He commanded the 23d regiment of Fusileers.

The whole universal British nation seem to be in a perfect ferment about Mrs. Vic's baby. Now we'll wager, says the Spirit of the Age, that we can slip out on to any of our Vermont hills, and in two hours pick up a bushel basket full of better looking little fellows, by a long chalk.

The missionaries of the London Missionary Society, at the Navigator's Islands, have about 10,000 people under Christian instruction—20,000 can read, 202 have become church members, and some hundreds more have been baptized. Ten years ago these islanders were cannibals.

The Public Domain.—The amount of unsold land in nine States is 151,000,000 acres, sold 84,000,000, receipts $97,000,000 cost to the nation in the purchase of Louisiana and Florida in extinguishing Indian titles, removing Indians, Indian wars, agencies, offices, &c., $109,000,000. The cost so far has exceeded the receipts $12,000,000.

Passports.—The New Haven Register says: "Perhaps it is not generally known, that any citizen intending to travel in Europe, can procure a passport free of charge, from Washington. He has but to leave the necessary with a Collector or Postmaster, and it is their duty to procure the document." —N. Y. E. Post.

Whaling in the Pacific.—The whale ships alone in the Pacific ocean number 460 sail, amounting to nearly 200,000 tons, and manned by 12,000 seamen. Not less than $12,000,000 of capital has been invested in, and actively employed by, one branch of the whale fishery alone; and in the whole trade is directly involved not less than from 50 to 70 millions of property.

Riot.—There was a serious riot and fight, in which some two or three hundred persons, male and female, took part last night, at a tavern corner of South and Swanson streets. Clubs and brick-bats were freely used, and several individuals badly hurt. —Property in the amount of nearly $200 was destroyed or damaged. Five or six of the rioters were arrested this morning.—Philadelphia Gazette, of Friday.

Intrepidity.—Capt. Fisher in travelling through the Doon valley in a palankin, was advised by his bearers to return, as a gang of robbers had determined to way lay him. He refused to do so; and immediately dismounting, walked up armed, to the band of men who lay in wait for him, as if unconscious of their purpose. This amazing coolness overawed them, and saved him from death at their hands.

Oregon Territory.—Mr. Linn of Mo. has introduced a bill in the U. S. Senate, declaring that the title of the United States to Oregon is undoubted and will not be abandoned. The President is authorized by the bill to have the boundaries of the United States on the Pacific ascertained, and to take such measures as may be necessary for the protection of our citizens trading in that Territory. The bill further grants one thousand acres of land to every white male inhabitant who shall cultivate the same for five consecutive years.—New-Yorker.

Suicide.—A young girl of most respectable connections in Buffalo, who had been seduced, and had eloped with her betrayer, was overtaken by her friends and brought home, where her situation becoming known, she was excluded from society. Her sister gave a party to which she was denied access. The guilty creature determined to be present, and that too in a most horrid manner. She took a strong dose of poison and commenced arraying herself for the party, determined to die in the society she had been excluded from; but her effort was frustrated, for she was seized with paroxysms before she had completed her toilet, and died refusing all aid.—Albany Atlas.

A donation of $100,000 has been made to the Bunker Hill Monument Fund, by Judah Tauro, of Jewish descent, but who is a "Boston Boy." After being trained in the counting house of his uncle, Judah Hays, an eminent merchant of Boston, he went to New Orleans in 1800, where he has made a large fortune. He has never been out of the bounds of that city since, except during the invasion of the British in 1814, on which occasion he took an active part in opposing the enemy, and received a dangerous wound, which confined him to bed and chamber for twelve months, and from the effects of which he has not, to this day, recovered.

The Earthquake.—The noise resembling that of an earthquake, to which we yesterday referred, appears to have been felt at Weehawken, Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Jersey City, and at several places on Long Island. The accounts agree in representing the phenomenon to have occured about the same time yesterday morning—that is at half past five or twenty minutes before six o'clock. The direction of it, as near as we can learn, was from east to west.

The same violent motion of the earth was noticed in different parts of New Jersey. It is thus described in the Newark Daily Advertiser of last evening:

"This city and its vicinity was very severely shaken this morning about half past 5 o'clock, as is generally supposed by an earthquake. We hear from all parts of the city that families were roused from sleep by the shaking, some say rocking, of their dwellings. Several gentlemen rose, expecting to find the walls of their houses opened, or cracked at least, and all concur in speaking of the rumbling noise which is understood to be one of the indications of an earthquake. We hear of the same phenomenon as far west of us as Spring[illegible] and at Belleville on the north [illegible] some ten or twelve miles. The shock appears to have been felt for about twenty seconds. There was a similar phenomenon [illegible] vicinity about forty years ago, which is [illegible] to have been in the same direction."—N. Y. Eve. Post.

Tight Lacing.—The higher mortality of English women by consumption may be ascribed partly to the indoor life which they lead, and partly to the compression preventing the expansion of the chest by costume. In both ways the lungs are deprived of [illegible] free draught of vital air, and [illegible] deposites tuberculous matter with a fatal facility. Thirty one thousand [illegible] English women died in one year (the year ending June [illegible]), of this [illegible] malady. Will not this impressive fact [illegible] persons of rank and influence to set their country women right in the article of dress, and lead them to abandon a practice which disfigures the body, strangles the chest, produces nervous or other disorders, and has an unquestionable tendency to implant an incurable hectic malady in the frame?—Appendix to the Second Annual Report of the Register General of Births, [illegible] and Marriages.—N. Y. Spectator.

The City of Cairo.—The Sangamo [illegible] Journal says:

"A ship is now contracted for, to be built at Cairo, the ensuing summer, designed for a regular trader between that city and Liverpool! Start not reader! This is most certainly true; and ten years will hardly pass before ships from the ocean will unload their cargoes at Cairo city—which city will then be a port of entry, and will take that rank among the cities of the west, to which her unrivalled position—unrivalled in any portion of the world—will entitle her.

"We will add to this article the fact that the embankment, which will enclose 1300 acres, will be completed in June; after which an overflow of the city will no longer be apprehended."

"This embryo city—we believe it already has a charter—is situated at the extreme southern point of Illinois, on the peninsula formed by the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.—N. Y. E. Post.

An Honorable Example.—The following we find in the Maysvile Eagle. It is related of Mr. Craddock, a member of the Kentucky Senate from the counties of Hardin and Meade, who had been making a speech on the Bank question:

"Sir," said Mr. C., "What I have said here to-day has been said in a rough way, and if it has wounded any Senator, I hope he will attribute it to no unkind feelings, but to my want of the polish of education. Sir, your Superintendent of Common Schools has said, that there are many men of family in this commonwealth who can neither read nor write, and it is but too true; my own marriage bond has my mark to it, and my son, who now sits in the other House, was a stout boy when I learned to read."

Mr. C. is not only a respectable Senator, but a good lawyer. What more need be said in his praise?

McLeod.—The Niagara, U. C. Chronicle of the 14th inst. has the following paragraph:—

We undersstand that Mr. McLeod will today give the required bail at Lockport. This step we believe, would not have been taken had there been any probability of his trial taking place when the court sits in February; but as it is almost certain that he would have been almost incarcerated [illegible] many months before his persecutors would [illegible] bring the cause on, it is far better [illegible] should be at liberty in the mean time [illegible] health having already suffered [illegible] from the unjust confinement of which he has been the victim.—*N. LATE AND [illegible] NEWS [illegible]

PEACE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND CHINA.

By the packet ship North America, Capt. Lowber, we have London papers of the evening of the 6th, and Liverpool [illegible] 7th.

The chief news of [illegible] China and India. Great Britain seems to be sweeping all Asia before her arms.

The Chinese question is settled—the War in Cabool is terminated—and Mehemet Ali is thoroughly and effectually subdued.

Our advices are from Bombay to the [illegible] ult., Alexandria to the 24th ult., and Malta to the 28th.

Shortly after the capture of Cushan, Admiral Elliott, in proceeding to the Peiho river, was met by a Mandarin of the third rank of the Chinese Empire, though some account say by the Emperor himself, while others affirm that Admiral Elliott had arrived at Pekin, and had an audience of the Emperor.

The Emperor had agreed to pay £3,000,000 for the expenses incurred by the British in making war; other authorities state £2,000,000 sterling, as indemnity for the opium seized, and £1,000,000 for the expenses of the war.

The Emperor, either himself or through his officers, has expressed pacific intentions to the Admiral, and he disavows the actions of his Commissioner Lin. This latter indeed, has fallen into disgrace, and the Emperor offers to surrender him into the hands of the English, to be dealt with as they think proper.

Chusan is not to be given up until the treaty is signed.

THE MISSIONARIES' GRAVE.

"And many a grave neglected lies
  Where sleep the soldiers of the Lord,
Who perished 'neath the sultry skies
  Where first they preached the sacred word."
L. E. L.

It is a very lonely spot,
  No other grave is nigh,
And with a low and mournful tone
  The idle wind sweeps by,
The night dews as by pity move,
  With heavy tear-drops lave
That loveliest of lonely spots—
  The missionary's grave.

There is a very shady place,
  In a fair burying ground,
Where many of his name and race
  A resting place have found—
With fragrant gifts from native bowers
  His kindred's graves are strown—
Why lies he on a foreign strand,
  So utterly alone!

And lonely was his childhood's home,
  And music breathed among
The vine leaves, that around the walls
  A grateful shadow flung—
A mother's love blessed all the day,
  And breathed the nightly prayer,
Beside the couch where balmy sleep
  Stole o'er the young and fair.

And rolling years increased the strength
  Of sweetest ties of earth—
Why were they severed—why was left
  The country of his birth?
Why did he break the threefold cord,
  And tempt the rolling wave,
To find so soon, so very soon,
  A missionary's grave!

The sun shines very bright and fair
  O'er lands beyond the seas,
And flowers with richest odors load
  The gently whispering breeze—
The lime and orange blossoms blend
  Their fragrant breath at even—
All incense on the air is borne,
  Save breath of praise to heaven.

Sweet birdsong breaks the solitude
  Haunting each wooded dell,
But on that Sabbath hush ne'er floats
  The peal of Sabbath bell—
The exiled one did sadly pine
  For one familiar tone,
And felt amidst earth's loveliness
  Most desolate and lone.

And when he marked the temples reared
  Amid the forest shade,
Where horrid vows, with darkest rites,
  To senseless things were paid—
How died his heart, when there he strove
  A better creed to teach,
And marked the listener's air that told
  His was unheeded speech.

Ah! this was the heart breaking grief!
  To teach a purer faith
He had left all, and suffered pangs
  Worse than of mortal death—
To tell of Jesus—but that name
  No tender chord awoke,
And at the story of His love
  No heart with sorrow broke.

He sunk beneath the heavy weight
  Of a grief-burdened heart,
And heathen marked the holy man,
  Touched by pale death, depart—
But not in vain he early died,
  In vain did hardships brave,
He reared a silent plea for truth,
  A missionary's grave.

A plea that in the after time
  May touch the heathen's heart,
While at the vivid rays of truth
  Dark error may depart—
And tears of penitence and love
  That lowly sod may lave—
And prayer to that One God ascend
  Beside that stranger's grave.

MISCELLANEOUS.

IMPRESSIVE FACTS.

There is nothing in history that is so improving to the reader as those accounts which we meet with, of the deaths of eminent persons, and of their behavior in that solemn season.—A few examples are subjoined.

Philip the Third, King of Spain, seriously reflecting upon the life which he had led, cried out when laid upon his death bed, "Ah how happy should I have been, had I spent in retirement those twenty three years during which I have held my kingdom! "My concern is not for my body but my soul."

Cardinal Wolsey, one of the greatest Ministers of State, poured forth his soul in these sad words. "Had I been as diligent in serving my God as I have been my king, he would not have forsaken me now in my grey hairs."

Cardinal Richelieu, after he had given law to Europe for many years, confessed to M. DuMoulin, that having been forced upon many irregularities in his life time, by what are called "reasons of state," he could not tell how to satisfy his conscience upon several accounts; and being asked one day by a friend why he was so sad, he answered, "the soul is a serious thing. It must be sad here for a moment, or be sad for ever."

Cardinal Mazarin, having made religion wholly subservient to worldly interest, discoursing one day with a Doctor of the Sorbonne, concerning the immortallity of the soul, and a future state, said, weeping, "O my poor soul, whither wilt thou go!" Afterwards seeing the Queen Mother, he said to her, "Madam, your favors undid me; were I to live my time again, I would be a Capuchin Friar, rather than a courtier."

Sir John Mason, Privy Councilor to King Henry the Eighth, upon his death-bed addressed himself to the people around him to the following effect. "I have seen the most remarkble things in foreign parts, and been present at most state transactions for thirty years together; and have learned this, after so many years experience, that seriousness is the greatest wisdom; temperance the best physic; and a good conscience the best estate and were I to live again, I would change the court for a cloister; my Privy Councilor's bustles for a hermit's retirement, and the whole life I have lived in the palace, for one hour's enjoyment of God in the chapel. All things forsake me but God, my duty and my prayers.

Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, a few months before he died, sent for his friend, the Bishop of Winchester and Worcester, entreating them to draw for him out of the Word of God, the plainest and exactest way of making his peace with him; adding, "It is a great pity that men know not to what end they are born into till they are nearly to go out of it."

Sir Philip Sydney left this as his last farewell to his friends: "Govern your will and affections by the will and word of your Creator. In me behold the end of the world, and all its vanities."

Dr. Donne, a man of great parts and learning, being upon his death bed, and taking a solemn leave of his friends, said "I repent of all my life, but that part of it which I spent in communion with God and in doing good."

Only a year before his death, to a person who asked, "what is the shortest way to obtain true knowledge of the Christian religion in the full and just extent of it?" John Locke returned this significant answer; "Study the Holy Scriptures especially the New Testament. Therein are contained the words of eternal life. It has God for its author; salvation for its end; truth, without any mixture or error, for its matter."

"At my death," says Sir Thomas Brown, "I mean to take a total adieu of the world, not carrying for a moment, for history, or epitaph: not so much as the memory of my own name to be found any where, but in the universal register of God."

LET EVERY MAN BE TRUE TO HIS OWN NATURE.

If ever there was a time when men were called upon to have minds of their own and energies of their own, it is now. Each man is called upon to do justice to his own efforts, to his own individual faculties—to form opinions and pursue a line of conduct for himself and not hide himself among the multitude, and be borne along with the crowd, as a feather on the tide. Bold and independent minds are needed, who can stand against the shock of multitudes, and be deaf to the voice of party. Such spirits are needed, for, now-a-days, both in polotics, philantrhopy and religion, measures are carried forward too much by crowdings and huzzas. "Things go too much by noise and hurra," says a strong-minded man, who has always thought and acted for himself: "the shout is raised, up with it, and up it goes: down with it, down with it, and down it goes."

Let each man be true to his own nature—let him feel that God has given to him peculiar faculties, and has placed him among peculiar circumstances and opportunites; let him rise with his own God-given energy, and draw forth these powers, and be worthy of his opportunities; let him do this, and he will be an independent man—his mind its own master. Although his powers may be humble and his opportunities few, he will have a more respectable, character than many of those highly gifted minds who suffer themselves to be borne along the current of popular opinion, or enslaved by the tyrrany of party, or sect, or association. Every human being is an original from the hand of God. Let him not by negligence or ignorance or slavish imitation, mar the divine beauty of the original proportions.

THE TRUE USE OF THE VINE.

The following excellent observations on the true use of the vine occur in the account giving by Rev. Dr. Duff, of his journey through France, while lately passing through that country to India, by way of Alexandria:—

"In these countries, mantled with vineyards, one can not help learning the true intent and use of the vine in the scheme of Providence. In our own land, wine has become so exclusively a mere luxury, or what is worse, by a species of manufacture, an intoxicating beverage, that many have wondered how the Bible speaks of wine, in conjunction with corn, and other such staple supports of animal life. Now, in passing through the region of vineyards, in the east of France, one must at once perceive that the vine greatly flourishes on slopes and heights, where the soil is too poor and gravelly to maintain either corn for food, or pasturage for cattle. But what is the providential design in rendering this soil—favored by a genial atmosphere—so productive of the vines if its fruit become solely either an article of luxury or an instrument of vice? The answer is, that Providence had no design. Look at the peasant and his meals, in vine bearing districts. Instead of milk, he has a basin of pure unadulterated "blood of the grape." In this its native, original state, it is a plain, simple, and wholesome liquid; which at every repast, becomes to the husbandman what milk is to the shepherd—not a luxury, but a necessary—not an intoxicating but a nutritive beverage. Hence, to the vine-dressing peasant of Auxerre, for example, an abundant vintage, as connected with his own immediate sustenance, is as important as an overflowing dairy to the pastoral peasant of Ayrshire. And hence, by such a view of the subject, are the language and the sense of Scripture vindicated from the very appearance of favoring what is merely luxurious or positively noxious, when it so constantly magnifies a well replenished wine press, in a rocky mountainous country like that of Palestine, as one of the richest bounties of a generous Providence."—Missionary Record.

From the Portsmouth (N. H.) Gazette.

WILLIAM H. RINDGE—"THE NOBLE SAILOR."

During the great and memorable fire in the city of New York, on the 17th Dec., 1835, a mother was seen in the streets, frantically seeking for her babe, which had been left in the upper story of a building enveloped in flames. A young sailor, on learning the fact rushed through the devouring element, and in a few moments restored the child to its mother in safety.

"But ere the throng could learn his name
  That noble tar had fled."

Considerable inquiry was made for the individual at the time, and we believe the grateful parents went so far as to make a public call for information respecting him, though without effect. We are happy, however, to be able now to communicate the name of William H. Rindge, late of this town, as the sailor who did this noble deed, though he is now beyond the "praise of man," and, we trust, is receiving his reward in heaven. William H. Rindge was the son of Capt. John Rindge of this town. His school-mates speak of him as of a noble, generous, daring disposition; one who would be likely to do such an act, as he did at the great fire in New York. On that occasion, he contracted a cold, which threw him into a consumption and finally caused his death, on the 23d of June last. The secret of his rescuing the infant alluded to was revealed to his friends shortly before his death, and in anticipation of that event. We hope an enduring monument will be raised to his memory, and that, with a plain account of his conduct, on the said memorable occasion, the following lines, by Mrs. Sigourney, written some time since, and published in one of the periodicals of the day, will be inscribed thereon:

"THE NOBLE SAILOR."

It was a fearful night,
  The strong flame spread
From street to street, from spire to spire
  And on their treasure tread.

Hark! 'Tis a mother's cry,
  High o'er the tumult wild,
As rushing toward her flame-wrapt home
  She shriek'd—My child! my child!

A wanderer from the sea,
  A stranger marked her wo
And in his bosom woke
  The sympathetic glow.

Swift up the burning stairs
  With daring feet he flew,
While sable clouds of stifling smoke,
  Concealed him from the view.

Fast fell the burning beams
  Across his dangerous road,
Till the far chamber where he groped,
  Like fiery oven glowed.

But what a pealing shout!
  When from the wreck he came,
And in his arms a smiling babe
  Still toying with the flame.

The mother's raptured tears
  Forth like a torrent sped,
But ere the throng could learn his name.
  That noble tar had fled.

Not for the praise of man,
  Did he this deed of love—
But on the bright unfading page

EFFECTS OF TEMPERANCE IN IRELAND.

In Mrs. Hall's book on Ireland, occurs the following beautiful passage, which a person will hardly be able to read without emotion:

"We entered one day a cottage in a suburb of Cork; a woman was knitting stockings at the door. It was as neat and comfortable as any in the most prosperous district of England. We tell her brief story in her own words, as nearly as we can recall them.

"My husband is a wheelwright, and always earned his guinea a week; he was a good workman, and neither a bad man nor a husband, but the love for the drink was strong in him, and it wasn't often he brought me more than five shillings out of his one pound on a Saturday night; and it broke my heart to see the poor children too ragged to send to school, to say nothing of the starved look they had out of the little I could give them. Well, God be praised, he took the pledge; and the next Saturday he laid twenty-one shillings upon the chair you sit upon. O! didn't I give thanks on my bended knees that night? Still, I was fearful it wouldn't last, and I spent no more than the five shillings I was used to, saying to myself, may be the money will be more wanted than it is now. Well, the next week he brought me the same, and the next, and the next, until eight weeks passed; and, glory be to God! there was no change for the bad in my husband; and all the while he never asked me why there was nothing better for him out of his hard earnings; so I felt there was no fear for him; and the ninth week when he came home to me, I had this table bought and these six chairs, one for myself, four for the children, and one for himself. And I was dressed in a new gown, and the children all had new clothes, and shoes and stockings, and upon his own chair I put a bran-new suit; and upon his plate I put the bill and resate for them all—just the eight sixteen shillings they cost that I'd saved out of his wages, not knowing what might happen, and that always before went for drink. And he cried, good lady and good gentleman, he cried like a baby—but 'twas with thanks to God; and now where's the healthier man than my husband in the county of Cork, or a happier wife than myself, or decenter or better fed children than our four?"

It is most unlikely that such a family will again sink into poverty and wretchedness.

WHY DON'T HE DO IT?

When the Farmer knows that a gate is better, and as a time and labor saving fixture cheaper, than a set of bars and posts, and without calling on a carpenter he can himself make one, Why don't he do it?

When he has no other fastenings to his gate, and barn doors than a rock rolled against them, and in a single evening after supper is able to make a better, Why don't he do it?

And when he knows it's better and more profitable to have good fences than poor, Why don't he do it?

Or if he thinks it will not quit cost to make good fences, and only thinks so, and this mere guess work, and by calling on Mr. Townsend of East Haven can ascertain the facts in relation to it, Why don't he do it?

Or if he wishes to see some of the most approved fixtures appertaining to farm buildings and the keeping and feeding of stock, &c. &c., and can do so by calling on the above named gentleman, Why don't he do it?

Or when he sees the boards dropping from his barns and out buildings, and like heaps of rubbish lying in piles about his premises, and need only nailing on again, Why don't he do it?

Or if he is afraid of the expense of nails and is always crying up the maxim of Doct. Franklin, to "save the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves," and he knows that the same Dr. Franklin also said that "many men are penny wise and pound foolish," and he is not careful to think of the precept contained in the latter, Why don't he do it?

If it is a saving of nearly half the manure of a farmer's stock, by keeping them shut up in yards, instead of running at large through most of the winter, Why don't he do it?

If he knows that many of his fields would be greatly improved by ditching, and by the removal of large stumps and stones, Why don't he do it?

And when he knows that his pastures would yield nearly double the feed, and of a better quality, if the bushes were all cut and subdued, Why don't he do it?

And if he can add fifty per cent. to the product of his clover fields, and even his pastures, by the use of Gypsum, Why don't he do it?

If a farmer of fifty acres has (as he should have) use for a good corn sheller and one of the many improved fanning mill, and he has not already obtained both, Why don't he do it?

And if it is cheaper, actually cheaper, to burn dry wood than green, and to use a stove instead of an open fireplace, Why don't he do it?

And finally, if every farmer is not a subscriber to an agricultural paper, Why don't he do it?—Farmer's Gazette. L——.

NEWSPAPERS, &c.—Dr Franklin said, "When I see a house well furnished with books and newspapers, there I see intelligent children; but if there are no books or papers, the children are ignorant if not profligate."

Just so. The doctor was a sensible man. A newspaper in every family—a Bible in the hands of every individual, and a school in every district—all valued and used as they deserve to be, are the principal supports of sound and civil liberty.

NEW YEAR'S DAY.—There was an unusual amount of intoxication visible in the streets, among men not of genteel appearance. Among the best class of society, though the ladies, many of them offered wine, there was so far as we saw, very little excess. The whiskey and gin drinkers need the labors of the good men who are so hard at work upon the wine question.—Jour. Com.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser, and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC IN CHURCHES.

I do not recollect having seen any desertation, of a public character, on the propriety or impropriety of instrumental music in religious worship; yet I deem it a subject important, and would be interesting if conducted with a view to promote the happiness of man, and the glory of God. Stepping into the vacancy, I propose through the organ of the Register, some remarks for the presentation of this subject. I can not but regret that it stands so far in the rear, since (under existing circumstances,) it is fraught with weighty consequences that must result in weal or wo, according as it is used.

Serious objections from a very respectable source, have at times been urged against its use, any way, by the professed follower of the humble Jesus, and its practice has even been regarded as irreligious. The objections to which we refer, are of the following character:—we are told to "sing with the spirit and understanding." Admitted. But, says the objector, "instrumental music is destitute of either." Again; the objector urges, "we should shun every appearance of evil" Granted. But this would be an opiate to indulgence in, a connivance at, and imitating of its profane use in places of unhallowed resort. It would promote convivial revelry in opposition to, and at the expense of serious and religious impressions. It would give offense to a large class of very respectable and particularly aged christians; it would decoy the youth from better employment—it would tempt from the simplicity of the Gospel.

Having presented the above objections, I now will offer some of the reasons I have in justification of the practice heading this article, that it is right, necessary, and scriptural.

1. It is right, we assume, because indicated by a faculty in man, constituted by nature's God, and by him, adapted to improve in music for valuable reasons, no doubt. Let us see: it is right, because necassary to exhibit the wisdom of its original author in creating the art of music, and bestowing it upon his creatures. It is necessary to give right occupancy to the ever acting intellect, that is so peculiarly adapted to its use, and to direct the action in its own and proper element; otherwise, this faculty will play the truant, and so render the before named objections available. It would accelerate the progress of the gospel, by influencing the irreligious, profane, and admiring multitude to attend religious worship, and thus be brought within hearing of the gospel, who, otherwise would stay away. It would facilitate their acceptance of the same, (when awakened,) by contributing to remove their misapprehension of religious melancholy. It would serve to elevate the devout mind in heavenly contemplation, and excite holy and blissful admiration of the beatific visions of paradise. It would check its profane use, by putting upon it, its original stamp of sacredness. It would promote harmony in sacred music. It would give an air of cheerfulness, consonant with the cheering truths of the gospel. It is a representation of final happiness. Let us see: it is scriptural, because practised by ancient prophets and holy men, and not a syllable said against it, from Genesis to Revelation; so far from it, that the revelator makes use of it in imagery to convey a just idea of the rapturous songs of the redeemed in heaven. Rev. xiv. 2. Ancient prophets celebrated the praises of God upon artificial instruments of music. David, the righteous king of Israel, exhorted all men to sound the high praises of God upon the harp, psaltery, timbrel, organ, and the instrument of ten strings. Psalm, 148, 149, 150.

Having taken the foregoing position, I proceed to remark: I see no substantial difference between elevating the voice through a trumpet, when circumstances call for it, in order to articulate louder, and that of elevating sound by the use of an organ, when the object of music can be obtained the better. Again, why should not the christian press into his service the genius of mind, in sacred music as in science, as each is right when sacred, and neither when not so? The holy injunction is, "whatsoever ye do, do it to the glory of God." Less objection is made against instrumental music, than against its being used sacredly. I leave it with the unprejudiced, to judge whether the objector stands in his own light. I well recollect, in years gone by, when the writer of this article entertained the same idea with the objector; when afterwards listening to the pealing notes and solemn strains of the high sounding organ in the house of God, nature compelled him to admire, while conscientious reflection surveyed the subject in the light of a blessing from God, not to be profaned with impunity. Nature still triumphs, being true to her first principles, while art stealthily extends her conquest amidst her votaries in music, both rural and instrumental. By this, we should take advice as to the importance of giving it its sacred stamp of divine original; otherwise, its inevitable existence, its serene sounds will still be a source of regret. Therefore, let the christian community make good its claims by wresting from unhallowed desecration, its use, and employing it to more holy purposes. Let the christian mind be divested of prejudice, and he will see at once that simple sound, (abstractly considered,) is equally unintelligible, whether of nature or art; (and surely, sound is what we want in music, or why sing at all?) and that to sing with the spirit and understanding, is simply to have the understanding appropriately and spiritually exercised in melody. Thus the mind will be edified, and God glorified.—Did not David sing with the spirit and the understanding, when sounding the praises of God upon the stringed instruments, and that for the perpetuity of his kingdom through Christ his Son? Thus, holy prophets gave instruction and example, and if christians repudiate the doctrine now, let it be remembered that heaven finally will restore the boon.

Again, because instrumental music is profaned, is no more reason against its use, than the profanation of vocal music, or that we should not pray, because some pray profanely. Christians, in the legitimate exercise of their rights, are not responsible for the conduct of the wicked; but for yielding their privilege to wicked claimants, they are culpable; and he who would indulge in, connive at, or imitate the profane practice of wicked men for the sake of their affinity, forms but one of their unhallowed compact.

In regard to giving offense to christians, permit me to say that the force of habit will recede, (for such it is no doubt,) as the subject unfolds its intrinsic advantages. Finally, "whatever we do, let us do it to the glory of God."

Would not an expression of public sentiment, both pro and con, to the introducing of instrumental music in christian worship, be both interesting and useful?

BEECHER'S LECTURES.

NO. III.

Having explained the requisitions of the Moral Law, we commence in this lecture a strict examination of the logical relivancy of the several arguments relied on to prove the actual existence of the perfect conformity of believers to this law in the present life. And as nearly as all the theories on this subject which have at any time bewildered the mind, seem to enjoy at present a co-temporaneous resurrection, I shall bestow a passing notice on the logical bearing of the argument for each particular theory, before we commence the examination of that which is the object of our particular discussion.

The following is an outline of the general argument for perfection—

1. The soul is an emination from the Deity, and therefore must be immaculate.
2. Christ so dwells in believers, that all their volitions and actions are his, and therefore perfect, whatever they may be.
3. The righteousness of Christ is so transferred to believers, as to become their own righteousness; therefore they are perfect.
4. The moral law as a rule of duty is abrogated, as being too strict for feeble, sinful man—and a new law interposed, adapted to his reduced capabilities, which all may and some do perfectly obey.
5. The free agency of man renders perfect obedience practicable and obligatory; and with such ability and such motives to be perfect, it is wholly incredible that none should obey.

The following is a summary of the arguments chiefly relied on to support the doctrine of perfection, to which we propose especially to attend—

1. Ample provision is made for the actual perfection of believers, from which it follows that some become perfect.
2. What was commanded under the old dispensation, is promised to believers under the new, (i. e.) the very language of requisition contained in the moral law is employed in the promise, as descriptive of the character which God will bestow.
3. The commands of perfection under the new dispensation imply its certain existence on the part of some.
4. The manner in which perfection is required, implies the expectation on the part of God that it will be rendered.
5. The indwelling of Christ and the Holy Ghost is evidence that believers are perfect.
6. The prayer of our Savior for the perfection of some in the present life, renders that event certain.
7. Inspired men have prayed for perfection, which, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, is not to be supposed, if it were never to be realized.
8. The promises of Scripture, conditioned on perfection imply its certain existence.
9. Some have actually attained to perfection in the present life.
10. There is no malady of sin for which a remedy is not provided in the gospel.
11. No line is drawn in the Scriptures beyond which it is impracticable for the believer to go.
12. The contrast between the language of inspiration, and the language of the church on the subject of perfection, shows that imperfectionism must be unscriptural.
13. The convictions of the church as expressed in her covenants, imply the attainableness of perfection in this life.
14. The comparative good tendency of the doctrine of perfection implies its truth.
15. The absurdity of the contrary doctrine of sanctification at, or just before death, is evidence of its unscripturalness.

In respect to the theory of sinless perfection in any of its forms I would observe,—

1. That if it is revealed in the Bible, and exemplified in the experience and life of believers, it is capable of proof by just exposition and logical argument, and in my judgment, it may be known and professed by the happy subjects of it. There is, I believe, no uncertainty in heaven among the spirits of the just, whether they are perfect. It is a part of the theme of thanksgiving that they were washed from all their sins. I think Jesus Christ was acquainted with his own perfection by his knowledge and consciousness as a man—and that no man can be perfect in this life and not possess and afford to others evidence of this fact. I observe,

2. That it is a question of fact in respect to directly opposite positions, but one of which can be true, and of course there can be no strict logical argument on but one side.

God has so constituted the reality of things, that correct logical argumentation can never be found on the side of a false system. There never was, is not, and never will be any evidence in support of the astronomical system of Tycho-Brahe, and therefore as soon as the light of science shone, all false astronomical theories passed away, and therefore it is, that no heresy ever was or will be sustained by logical argument, and that Satan is the father of lies, because, being on the wrong side he can bring to its support nothing else. Had God permitted truth and error to be commended to our confidence by precisely the same indications of evidence on both sides—it must have rendered evidence unavailing, and terminated in universal scepticism.

Hence, for the detection of error, vigilance and discrimination only is requisite, for no false system can be sustained by logical argument. Therefore in the course of my professional lectures for the two past years, I have prayerfully applied this test, and now in this third examination of the argument for sinless perfection in this life, and I am constrained to say, that I cannot perceive that the doctrine is sustained either by correct biblical exposition or logical reasoning. While, clearly to my apprehension, the whole argument for perfection, rests either on promises assumed without evidence, or conclusions which logically do not follow from the premises, or from passages of Scripture erroneously interpreted.

I ascribe this to no imbecility of intellect, or known obliquity of heart, and say it not invidiously, but in simplicity and godly sincerity, as the sober conviction of my judgment, the truth of which in the ensuing discussion I shall endeavor to sustain.

The position that the soul is an emanation from the Divine nature, however ancient and oft repeated it has been, is but the accumulation of assertion without evidence.

It is not an intuitive truth, it is not proveable from the light of nature, it is not revealed in the Bible.

How does it appear that God made the soul from the substance of his own mind? Who stood by and saw him do it? Or who beheld his movements in light full of glory, and saw souls sparkle out around his path, and has under oath and cross-questioning made affidavit of it? And how many and who are the witnesses? Has God said that he created mind from the substance of his own nature? It is the dream of Pagan philosophy, borrowed and dreamed over by Infidels, and borrowed again and added to the hallucinations of unevangelized mystical transcendental christians, and is worthy of its original, and line of descent, and present prosperity.

2. What proof is there that Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost, dwells in believers? and in respect to the indwelling of Christ in believers, what is meant by it? The indwelling of his body? No. The human soul? No. His Divine nature as it dwells in the man Christ Jesus? And what is the evidence that the Divine nature of Jesus Christ dwells in the bodies of the saints as he dwells in his own. Simply the repetition of "Christ that dwelleth in me."—"Christ in me the hope of glory," &c., assuming this to be the meaning, without evidence. It might as well be inferred from the declared omnipresence of God, that he dwells incarnate not in saints only, but in all men. The indwelling of Christ and the Holy Spirit in believers, has reference to their promised conservatory influence to guide, sustain, and comfort them. In the language of the Bible, though God fills immensity, he is said to be near or in places where there are special manifestations, or evidences of his presence: and by a figure he is said to dwell where his works indicate his constant love and agency. A simple personification of the influence of the Savior and his Spirit in the preservation and sanctification of his people—accomplished by the truth and not by literal indwelling. Truly, if it is not the believer who exerts his own free agency, but Christ, in him, who executes the agency, the christian has not only no sin, but no holiness—and his own soul, if he has any, sleeps or waits deliverance from suspended action—till Christ shall abdicate his throne and restore the agent to personal action.

But why attempt to restore, by argument, the aberrations of a disordered intellect, or to teach mystics to reason by definitions and arguments.

We might as well think to reason away the illuminated mists of a May morning—as the dreamy pleasures of swimming in an ocean of bright, enrapturing, glorious nothing.

The greatest possible recommendation of a subject, to some minds, is its total exemption from metes, and bounds, and definitions, and arguments, and full of the opium hallucination of pleasant feeling, without thought or effort.

Alike mysterious is the supposed transfer of Christ's personal righteousness, so that it becomes our own personal righteousness.

On this subject there is no way but as in respect to the personal presence of the whole body and blood of Christ in the consecrated wafer, eaten cotemporaneously the whole earth over, "to believe as the church believes," asking no questions, and attempting no explanation. That the meritorious righteousness of Christ should avail for our justification through faith, may be understood. But ask the question, does his righteousness cease to be his own on becoming ours, or how, if it be really ours, can we still need pardon—and there can be no retreat—but into mystery, or to "believe as the church believe"?

Talk not of absurdities, it is a glorious mystery—speak not of impossibilities—is not God Almighty? We need only to say that metaphor is intended to illustrate and give intensity to literal truth—and Satan himself, when he opened wide the gates of pandemonium, did not let in a broader stream of mischief than the vicious habit of turning literal revelation into metaphor, and metaphor into literal revelation.

As to the abrogation of the moral law, there was no occasion for it, for if man by the fall lost his free-agency, the law lost its subjects, and needed no repeal or modification.

If his powers of agency were reduced or circumscribed, still leaving him a free-agent, there was needed no change in accommodation to his condition, for it required only with all, the soul, heart, mind and strength—and if the soul were of diminished capacity it was still right and just, that what remained should be under the influence of perfect benevolence—be perfectly consecrated to God in love, worship and obedience. It would then be as acceptable as if the capacity equalled that of archangels—as that the child should be bound to love and obey with all his heart, as really as the man of experience and age of ten times the amount of capacity.

Besides, it is not in the nature of obedience to annihilate the constitutional powers of agency. Refusing to love God and loving the creature in his stead, does not annihilate the soul, nor one of those powers which constitute capacity and obligation to love him, more than telling lies annihilates the capacity of speaking truth, or swindling the power of being honest—or indolence the capacity of physical industry. Sinning may increase the power of temptation and the difficulty of obedience to such a degree, as may render us hopeless of self-reformation in point of fact, but never can remove just obligation and exposure to punishment for non-obedience. If incorrigible rebellion could remove obligation, God would sit upon a precarious throne, and moral government would be impossible.

But the moral law has not been given up, it was because the free-agency of man survived its transgression, and a government law violated could neither reclaim or pardon, that God sent his son to be the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, that the law in the hand of the Mediator vindicated and made honorable, might abide though heaven and earth might pass, and might convince of sin, and be a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, and remain the exemplification of perfectness, and the standard of approximation and means of sanctification.

Indeed, while God and the intelligent universe remain, the difference between happiness and misery, and benevolence and selfishness, and holiness and sin cannot be annihilated—it might as well be asserted, that the fall changed the nature of circles and triangles. Nor can the relations between a benevolent Creator and his accountable subjects be willed away. While God exists and manifests his excellence—the obligation to love him is universal, and infinite, and eternal. The moral law enforces duties which cannot be annihilated, and is a bond of perfectness, without which the intelligent universe would be abandoned to anarchy and ruin.—To withdraw from mind the guidance and conservatory power of law, would result in anarchy and constitute a hell. The wise and good being who created mind, cannot, will not abdicate his throne—or substitute a less perfect for his most perfect law.

It would be an anomoly in legislation, to give up law in favor of insubordination.

A world has violated and set its Maker at defiance, and to appease and save the rebels, the lawgiver gives up the law and substitutes one more accommodated to their character and taste. But how much has God most mercifully conceded to the impotency of criminals to obey the violated law?

How much less than with all the heart, does the new law allow his subjects to love their God; and how much of the love which belongs to God are they permitted to bestow upon the creature?

How much selfishness towards our neighbor is tolerated, by abandoning in the sight of heaven the perfect law in favor of the demands of insurrection?

The moral law is not given up—heaven and earth shall sooner pass away; nay the entire intellect of peopled worlds be sooner blotted out, and a new universe of minds and worlds be created in its stead In that case the character of God would remain to be the confidence and joy of the new creation.

Still it places God on the throne, as the glorious centre of light and attraction, and motion, he shines dispelling mists and darkness from mountain top and valley, and shedding joyful daylight upon loyal minds.

How much pride and worldliness may be most mercifully allowed in favor of human frailty? How much may each of the ten commandments be transgressed? How much idolatry? How much profanation of the name of God and of the Sabbath?—How much may children disobey their parents, and subjects violate human laws.—How much impunity in thought and deed does the milder law allow? And how much anger, and revenge, and murder, and slander, and falsehood, and perjury, and coveting of that which is our neighbors'?

The moral law is not given up—God sustains the happiness of the universe by sustaining their confidence in himself. But would he sustain their confidence in his veracity by falsehood? Antinomianism puts out the orb of moral day, and fills the earth with mists, and darkness, and stagnation, and miasma, and insects, and creeping things, and satyrs, and owls, and every unclean and hateful bird.

From the New York Evangelist

THE LIFE OF FAITH

Extract of a Sermon by Rev Mr. Whittaker.

The great work of religion, is a work or life of faith on the Lord Jesus Christ—a simply clinging to him as the anchor of the soul—a constant looking unto him for guidance and instruction—a continual coming to him for grace and strength—an entire consecration of our bodies and spirits to his service, and a practical knowledge of him, not only as our priest to atone for us; but as our prophet and king to rule in us, and reign over us; and when this is our happy experience, we obtain that blessed assurance of our interest in him as a special Savior—we receive the end of our faith, even the salvation of the soul, and rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Whenever this faith exists, it is an active principle, it works by love and purifies the heart—it is the primum mobile, the grand spring which sets the whole machinery of the mind in motion, and excites to energy good word and work.

As a lifeless body can never perform the functions of a living man, so neither can the soul while destitute of gospel faith, perform any acceptable service in the sight of God, "for whatsoever is not of faith is sin, so then, they that are in the flesh cannot please God."

Faith is the foundation of all true religion, and "the victory that overcometh the world," for it endures as seeing him who is invisible, and enables its possessor to cleanse himself from all filthiness of the flesh and the spirit.

Faith, whenever it is genuine, produces good works; this is a natural and unavoidable consequence whenever it has taken deep root in the heart.

It brings forth faith unto holiness, and the end is everlasting life.

The influence and effects of this vital principle, were remarkably exemplified in the character and conduct of the primitive Christians.

Take, for example, the case of Zaccheus, who became rich by oppressing the poor. As soon as he was brought to bow at the foot of the cross, and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, the first thing he thought of, was to make restitution for the injuries he had done; he said unto Christ, "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold."

So also when the apostle Paul was converted, he said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" he conferred not with flesh and blood; but became a faithful and powerful preacher of that faith which he once destroyed, and was instrumental in bringing many "out of darkness into the marvelous light of the gospel."

The word of divine truth which he delivered, was accompanied with the energy of the Holy Spirit, to the hearts of those who heard him, so that "fear fell on them all." And many that believed, came and confessed and showed their deeds.

Many of them, also, which used curious arts, brought their books together, and burned them before all men; and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed."

Such were the effects of faith in the earliest periods of Christianity; it "wrought righteousness" in the hearts and views of those who were the subjects of it, and turned them from Satan unto the living God.

My brethren, suffer me to ask you this important question, have you this faith?

If so, you will give evidence of it by a holy life and conversation, you will adorn the doctrine of God, your Savior in all things, and "show your faith by your works."

In all ages, the best of Christians have had cause to complain of the weakness of their faith, and at times been in a similar situation to the man in the gospel, who said, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief."

"O ye of little faith," said the Savior to his disciples, "wherefore should ye doubt;" and the same reproof is applicable to ourselves.

"Weaker than a bruised reed,
Help we every moment need."

Let the prayer of our hearts continually be, "Lord increase our faith."

"Real faith is like the sun's fair flower,
Which 'midst the clouds that shroud it, and the winds,
That wave it to and fro, and all the changes
Of air, and earth, and sky, doth rear its head,
And looketh up still steadfast to its God."

But then there are some before me who have not this faith, who do not live in the spirit, and who are not crucified with Christ.

Ye may have a speculative faith—a faith which does not influence the practice; but, says the apostle, "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man says he hath faith, and have not works? Wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith, without works is dead?"

The devils believe and tremble; but their faith does not save them, neither will yours, unless it be accompanied with the substantial practical fruits of holiness which are to the praise and glory of God.

HINTS FOR FAMILY WORSHIP.

Family religion is of unspeakable importance. Its effect will greatly depend on the sincerity of the head of the family, and on his mode of conducting the worship of his household. If his children and servants do not see his prayers exemplified in his temper and manners, they will be disgusted with religion. Tediousness will weary them. Fine language will shoot above them. Formality, or connexion, or composition in prayer, they will not comprehend. Gloominess, or austerity of religion, will make them dread religion as a hard service. Let them be met with smiles. Let them be met as for the most delightful service in which they can be engaged. Let them find it short, savory, simple, plain, tender, heavenly. Worship, thus conducted, may be used as an engine of vast power in a family. It diffuses a sympathy through the members. It calls off the mind from the deadening effects of worldly affairs. It arrests every member, with a morning and evening sermon, in the midst of all the hurried cares of life. It says, 'There is a God!' 'There is a spiritual world!' 'There is a life to come!' It fixes the idea of responsibility in the mind. It furnishes a tender and judicious father or master with an opportunity of gently glancing at faults, where a direct admonition might be inexpedient. It enables him to relieve the weight with which subordination or service often sits on the minds of inferiors. Religion should be prudently brought before a family. The old dissenters wearied their families. Jacob reasoned well with Esau about the tenderness of his children, and his flocks, and herds. Something gentle, quiet, moderate, should be our aim. There should be no scolding, it should be mild and pleasant.

I avoid absolute uniformity, the mind revolts at it: though I would shun eccentricity, for that is still worse. At one time I would say something on what is read, but at another time nothing. I make it as natural as possible: 'I am a religious man; you are my children and my servants; it is natural that we should do so and so'—Cecil

MINISTRY OF ANGELS.—The doctrine of the ministry of angels is clearly taught in the Scripture of truth, and especially in the Revelation; nevertheless, little attention is paid to that doctrine by many professing christians. Angels appeared to Patriarchs, to Moses, to the Prophets, to our Lord, and to his Apostles. Sometimes, though ministering, they were invisible, as when the Prophet saw encompassing him, "chariots and horses of fire." At other times, they came in disguise, as unto Abraham, and Lot, and Israel. At other periods they appeared in their proper persons, as at the tomb of Jesus; for then their countenances were as the lightning, and their garments white as snow. Thus too it was with Lazarus, when they carried him from earth to Abraham's bosom.—Jones.

When you hear any one making a noise about himself, his merits and his good qualities, remember that the poorest wheel of a wagon always creeks the loudest.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, February 18, 1841.

> "'Twas great to speak a world from nought—
> But greater to redeem!"

The sentiment contained in the above may be correct, or it may not. Of this we have no means of judging, both being beyond human comprehension. Between incomprehensible objects, we have no means by which to judge of their relative comparison, unless by revelation. Of the relative greatness of creation and redemption, we are left ignorant, since both are the acts of God, and he has not seen fit to reveal the greatness of either. We might suppose at the first view, that it would be an easy matter, judging from effect to cause, to discriminate between the two. So far as evidence is presented to our minds we can, but who can comprehend the one or the other, or tell what was the design of God in either?—The mind is at once bewildered in contemplating and endeavoring to scan either. It is not within the compass of the human mind to compare the two, and say with certainty which is the greatest. We can do nought but see, and wonder, and adore, when such incomprehensible and glorious subjects are presented to the mind.

But the argument deduced from the above hypothesis must fall with the hypothesis, since it is not capable of proof, viz. That inasmuch as the seventh day was ordained a Sabbath in commemoration of the creation; the first day is also set apart as a Sabbath to commemorate the greater work of redemption. Allowing that this hypothesis be true, viz. that the work of redemption is greater than the work of creation, the same arguments cannot apply to the first day as to the seventh. The argument for the first day of the week is inferential and destitute of proof for its support, but for the seventh there is an express command. Again, why should the first day supercede the seventh? If the seventh day was ordained to commemorate the work of the creation, then it must remain a Sabbath, as long as the work of that creation it commemorates endures. Hence, the first cannot supercede the seventh, but two Sabbaths must be observed if the hypothesis be true.

Two weekly Sabbaths are not required, either for rest or worship. The nature of the human constitution is such, that it requires as much as one day in seven to recruit its wasted energies. The relation which men sustain to God, teaches that some time should be devoted to the worship of God. And God has designated the seventh day in regular recurrence, as the portion of time which should be devoted to his worship, and be kept holy. Therefore, the seventh, and not the first, is the Sabbath. Hypothetical reasoning is not safe, because it is not an infallible mode of reasoning. Almost every dogma that has been introduced into the church, may be established by hypothetical reasoning to be of divine original. Errorists of every kind, may, by this circular mode of reasoning, prove that all their errors are truths. And there is, perhaps, not a single rite of the Catholic church but may thus be fully established. Any doctrine that can not be established upon a better foundation than this, should be abandoned, as having its origin with men and not God. "To the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to these, it is because there is no light in them."

> "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death."

The world is a lazar-house—life a dream, and all its enjoyment empty bubbles. We live—we flutter like the mote in the air, and are swept into the tomb. The shadowy pleasures we grasp, leave us in a trice, and flee away like a shadow. The tender ties of nature are dissolved, every delightful association is broken up, and all earthly sources of pleasure, profit, or happiness are stayed. Time is constantly pouring myriads of our race into the vast ocean of eternity! To-day they live—to-morrow they die and are forgotten, and oblivion covers their memories.

'Tis not for life we live. Its cares but vex our minds. Its ceaseless vicissitudes but weary us of being, and make us aspire with double ardor after immortality. When tempest-tost with angry cares and ceaseless disappointments, the weary soul exclaims,

> "O! who would live alway away from his God,
> Away from yon heaven that blissful abode."

The soul is of too high origin to grovel on the earth; it is too capacious to be satisfied with trifles. It came from God, and seeks to burst its clayey prison, and soar away unconfined by mortal things. Its vast desires can be filled only by dwelling with God in uncreated light, beholding the glories of his throne, and joining in the exalted and immortal songs which angels sing. He is wise who lives consistently with the high design of his being, and is continually laboring for holiness here, and aspiring after immortal glories hereafter. And most of all is he to be pitied, who limits his desires to sensual and sinful indulgences, or to earthly profits or pleasures. Most cruel slavery is fixed upon the immortal soul, when it is debased with sin by the flesh that clogs it, and is thus compelled to suffer woes incalculable. As well may a man undertake to change the order of nature's works—reverse the motion of the planetary worlds, and blow out the sun, as to satisfy the immortal spirit with earthly things. Then let its native aspirations be cherished—let it expand itself in contemplating God, and in preparing to enjoy his presence in the eternal world, from which it is separated only by a span of time, and an inch of space. The soul's immortal destiny presses close upon the vigor of life.—How few, alas, reach the meridian of life! How few descend the vale of years! The first motions of life are almost insceperable from the struggles of death.

"THE FUTURE."

The first number of a weekly paper, bearing the above name, hails us from New York. It is published for the proprietors, by H. Greeley, & Co., No. 30, Ann Street, and is devoted to "Association and re-organization of society." The object it proposes to accomplish, is new and difficult. It teaches no new system of ethics, neither does it advocate Owenism or Infidelity. It proposes to bring all upon an equality, without injustice to any. Any effort that is calculated to meliorate the condition of society, or individuals, we most cordially approve. We, however, feel assured that nothing less than the religion of the cross, can make men moral and lovers of virtue. If the restraints of religion are removed, every unholy passion will possess the heart.

MONTHLY SERMONS.

Our readers will doubtless be pleased with the fact, that we have made arrangements with "A Village Pastor," to furnish a Monthly Sermon for the Register. The sermons will be both doctrinal, and practical, and of such a character, we trust, as will be acceptable to our readers. The sermon for the present number, we consider excellent, with the exception of the 3d division of the subject, that being a point, of the correctness of which, most of our readers, doubtless, in connection with ourself, exercise doubts. We ask for them a candid reading, and a faithful reception and practice of the evangelical principles inculcated.

AMERICAN TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

The last Tuesday of July is designated by the Executive Committee of the American Temperance Union, as a time for holding a National Temperance Convention, at Saratoga, N. Y. All State, County, and local Societies, are requested to appoint delegates to attend the convention. Five years have elapsed since such a convention has been held, and it is thought that the interests of the cause now require this movement. We confidently expect that a new impulse will be given to the righteous cause at that time. The good already accomplished, should stimulate to greater zeal. The effort must not be stayed till complete triumph attends it.

There are multitudes of drunkards yet to be reclaimed, or fail of entering the kingdom of heaven. Thousands of young men are forming habits which will eventually lead to drunkenness unless abandoned. The wives and children of besotted wretches, demand our sympathy and relief.

Remember the simultaneous meetings on the last Tuesday inst.

"EXTRAS."—To all who inquire of us about "Extra Registers," we say we have no anticipation of publishing any. Neither have we at any time, nor do we now consider the Register identified with the "Extras."

For the Register.

JAMES G. BIRNEY.

On the evening of the 5th inst., I had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Birney at Cazenovia. His chief object was to prove that at the North we have no small share of responsibility respecting the continuance of slavery.

Mr. Birney's manner of speaking is calm, dignified, and impressive. He utters his sentiments in the most natural and unaffected manner. He sometimes pauses to qualify what he has said, but the qualification always gives a keener edge to the truth. He proclaims his views with such serene confidence as to illustrate the scripture averment—"He that believeth doth not make haste."

Mr. Birney returns to New York this week. There is some prospect that he may visit this village in March. J. R. J.

MONTHLY SERMONS,

BY

A VILLAGE PASTOR:

(FEBRUARY, 1841.)

NO. II.—THE CHIEF CORNER STONE.

Eph. ii. 20.—Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone.

In the verses which immediately precede the text, the apostle in addressing the saints at Ephesus, says, "Now therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." He suddenly changes the figure, and represents the church as an edifice;—"And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone: In whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord: In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit." By the expression—"the foundation of the apostles and prophets," he intends that basis which was laid by the truths which they propagated; and by mentioning them conjointly, "apostles and prophets," he strengthened the argument which he had continued from the 11th verse, proving that believing Jews and believing Gentiles compose one church, or in accordance with the illustrations, one household, one building.

In attempting to fix your thoughts on JESUS CHRIST as the CHIEF CORNER STONE of the CHURCH,—we will

I. Refer to some of those passages of scripture which concur with the text in directly teaching this sentiment.

Isaiah writes: "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation."

The apostle Peter, writing to those who had learned by experience that the Lord is gracious, uses the following language: "To whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house. Wherefore, also, it is contained in the scripture, Behold, I lay in Zion, a chief corner stone, elect, precious, and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded. Unto you therefore which believe he is precious; but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner." In this passage, besides quoting Isaiah, Peter also refers to the prediction which is recorded in the 118 Psalm; "The stone which the builders refused has become the head stone of the corner." It will assist us in our view of Jesus Christ as the chief corner stone, to consider,

II. That by his death on the cross he made the atonement which laid the foundation for the erection of the church.

The church of God existed long before the incarnation of Christ; but we must not forget that he was the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." To his death on the cross the jewish sacrifices significantly pointed. Without shedding of blood there was no remission. This great fundamental truth in the government of God was clearly and continually held up to the view of God's covenant people, in the jewish ritual. "Moses having spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool and hyssup, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, saying, this is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined on you. Almost all things were by the law purged with blood." In Heb. 9th, St. Paul demonstrates that all this was designed to teach, that without the shedding of Christ's blood there could be no hope for the sinner.—Strike out of the arrangement of God, the atonement of Christ, and no church, no peculiar people of God, gathered from among the descendants of Adam, would ever have existed. The whole of the 53d chapter of Isaiah may be adduced to sustain this position. The atonement of Christ is the foundation of the faith of each individual of the church, and consequently, is the foundation on which the church rests in its collective capacity. As the inspired penman wrote the text, his eye was on the atonement of Christ as the foundation of all our hopes. In the first chapter of his epistle to the Ephesians, he says, "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." In the second chapter, "But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometime were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ."

That Christ by his death on the cross laid the foundation for the erection of the church, is a prominent truth in the writings and preaching of the apostles.

Its prominency is noticeable, not so much from the number of passages that specifically state it, as from its being implied in the whole course of their labors and instructions, and naturally interwoven in many of their arguments, and often most familiarly mentioned as a known and established truth, for the purpose of elucidating other truths. The whole may be summed up in that wonderful expression of Paul in his charge to the elders at Ephesus—"Feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood."

Our view of Christ as the chief corner stone, will be greatly deficient, unless we consider,

III. That all who were to compose any part of this building, were given to him by the Father, from Eternity.

This truth is taught in the commencement of the epistle to the Ephesians:—"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Chirst; According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself according to the good pleasure of his will." Christ himself said; "All that the Father hath given me, shall come to me." Such compose this building, this spiritual temple which is fitly framed together in Christ, according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.

Had there been no purpose of God to render the atonement effectual in the salvation of a definite number of this fallen race, no provision would have been made for the offer of mercy to the human family. But a seed that should serve him being promised to Christ, he "died for our sins, and not for our sins only, but also for the sins of the whole world"; while he made an atonement for the whole human family, so as to prepare the way for a consistent offer of mercy to all—he in a special sense laid down his life for the sheep, knowing that his death should in its ultimate consequences, secure the salvation of all who were given to him.

The interesting truth, that Jesus Christ is the chief corner stone of the church, may be illustrated,

IV. From the union of Jews and Gentiles in Him—thus constituting one building.

In the context the apostle says, after speaking of the strangers who were made nigh by the blood of Christ—"For he is our peace who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby; And came and preached peace to you which were far off, and to them which were nigh; For through him we both (Jew and Gentile) have access by one Spirit unto the Father." To more fully illustrate this union of Jews and Gentiles in Jesus, he introduces the figure of a household, and just glancing at this as he passes, he fixes on that of a building—a temple, as especially adapted to his purpose, and one which would be duly appreciated by the architecture—loving people to whom he was writing—and who had before their eyes, their own magnificent temple—the glory of the city of Ephesus. The language will well bear repetition; "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; In whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord: In whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit.

In once more attempting to elucidate the sentiment of the text, we mention,

V. Jesus Christ is the supreme object of affection, of service, and of worship, in the church militant, and in the church triumphant.

He is loved supremely by all his people. Their language to him, is—"Whom have I in heaven but thee! And there is none on earth I desire beside thee." Individually they can appeal to him saying, "Lord thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." They have pledged themselves to serve him now, and forever. They pay him divine worship in the closet, in the family, and in the presence of all the people. This love, service, and worship of Christ, are but commenced on earth. In heaven the redeemed will love him with undivided affection, and will serve him continually, and without a fault, and they will join with all the angels of God in worshipping him. They will sing to him a song of praise which angels cannot sing, even this; "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people." In thus loving, serving, and adoring the Lord Jesus Christ, the saints do not feel rebuked by this, or like passages of scripture,—"Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve": for in Jesus they behold "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." They see that 'in Him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.' They know that he is the Word which was in the beginning, which was with God, and which was God." Behold God's building—the church! Jesus Christ himself is the chief corner stone. This truth the Bible often expressly declares; it is declared in the atonement which Christ made for sin—in the election of grace—in the union of Jew and Gentile in Jesus—and in his own supreme Divinity, securing to itself the love, service, and worship of all his people, in time, and in eternity.

REFLECTIONS.

1. This subject presents the true basis of Christian Union. If we would enjoy christian fellowship with each other, we must be fitly framed together in Christ. Hence,—To extend the hand of christian fellowship to those who deny the Deity of Christ, or his atonement, is a scheme of anti-christian union of the most absurd and dangerous character.

2. We see that our main object as ministers ought to be, to preach Jesus Christ and him crucified. We must dwell much on the character and atonement of Christ. All the truths which we preach, must be so preached as to exhibit their relation to this all-absorbing theme—"Christ and his cross." A distinct view of Christ as the chief corner stone of the church, should control us in all our measures for the promotion of the moral enterprises of the age.

3. This subject affords peculiar and ample encouragement to ministers of the gospel.

The encouragement is needful—without it we should sink; for in our work we have so much of care, toil, and anxiety, and so many enemies to encounter, that we must have firm consolation, or our spirits will faint. Our subject presents it: it is precisely the kind which we need, and it is ample. We are engaged in the erection of God's spiritual building, the church. Our labor cannot be in vain in the Lord. We build on a foundation which cannot be shaken, and are enlisted in a work which must be completed. "Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." If we build on this foundation, and take heed how we build thereon, we shall have joy in the work.

4. Here is comfort for the church of God when passing through tribulation.

Brethren! ye are God's building. You see what the foundation is. You know that God will not suffer this building to be demolished. It cannot be moved. The corner stone must fall, ere harm can be done to the building. Nothing shall be suffered to injure it; but it shall rise in [illegible] glory and grandeur when this earth shall be dissolved, and the sun and stars shall shine no more.

5. We infer the safety of each member of the church. We speak not of all its nominal members, but of all its true members. Jesus Christ is the support of each one. In him all the building is fitly framed together. No particle of the frame can be destroyed. Its every part is as safe as the whole—as safe as the corner stone itself.

6. I call upon each one of you to put this question to himself, viz.—Does my faith rest on the Lord Jesus Christ? If it rests upon him at all, you receive him in his true character. He is to you the chief corner stone. In beholding the excellences of his character, you exclaim, "My Lord and my God"!

But let us examine our hearts. We may deceive ourselves. We may think that we are a part of God's building when we are not. What disappointment will be ours if we find at the close of our probation, that we have built upon the sand! Build your hopes of everlasting life on this sure foundation, and you shall not be confounded. Delay not. The storm is coming, and you will need a firm basis. Had you been a passenger in the Lexington, about to meet death in the burning flame, or in the chilling waters, what would you not have given for the full assurance, that you constituted a part of God's building that resteth on Jesus Christ, "the Chief Corner Stone"?—Adopt as your own resolve, the language of the godly Watts,—

> "Is He designed a CORNER STONE,
> For men to build their heaven upon!
> I'll make him my foundation too,
> Nor fear the plots of hell below."

THE VILLAGE LECTURES.—I am gratified to witness the interest manifested in sustaining these Lectures. Mr. H. A. Nelson, who gave a Lecture some two weeks since on the "Proper Object of Education," exhibited both the talent of a Scholar and an Orator, and evinced to all who heard him a mind well stored with literary lore.

INTELLIGENCE.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

[illegible]—Mr. Preston presented [illegible] from the governor of S. C. concerning certain proceedings of the Legislature of that state, the nature of which did not transpire, it being laid on the table. Mr. Clay also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Ky. on the subject of the land distribution, which, he remarked, had passed one House unanimously, and the other with only four dissenting [illegible], he believed met the wishes of at least nine tenths of the people.

Bankrupt Law.—Mr. Clay presented a memorial from the Louisville [illegible] committee, remonstrating against a bankrupt law, which is not compulsory [illegible] prospective operation. Mr. Wright also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New-York, remonstrating against the law, and another asking that banks and corporations might be subjected to the compulsory process of any bankrupt law. Several others of the same nature were presented, and many praying the passage of such a law.

Recognition of Hayti.—Jan. [illegible]—Mr. Smith presented two petitions from [illegible] Co. [illegible] on the subject of the recognition of Hayti, and also in relation to an amendment of the constitution, so that free men may be the sole basis of representation.

Tobacco Growers.—Mr. Merrick presented the memorial of the Tobacco Planters of Prince George's County, Maryland, asking the aid of the government to relieve their staple from the burdens imposed upon it abroad, by retaliatory duties. This memorial went into a long argument to set forth the [illegible] of such a step on the part of the general government.

[illegible]

Bankrupt Law.—A vigorous effort will be made to get up the bankrupt bill after the pre-emption bill is disposed of, which, though it may possibly pass the Senate, must fall in the House for want of time.

Pre-emption Bill Passed.—Feb 2d.—This bill, so long and so widely discussed, after the rejection of the two principal amendments, that of ceding the lands to the several States in which they lie, and that of distributing the receipts among the States, passed by a vote of 31 to 19. The bankrupt bill was immediately called up, and will now engage the attention of the Senate.

Steam-boat Boilers.—In the House.—Jan. 26th.—Mr. Cushing presented a memorial of Charles T. Jarvis, of Newburyport, Ms. containing valuable information on the subject of steam-engines and boilers.

U. S. Mint.—A communication from the President, states that there have been coined at the mint at Philadelphia, during the year 1840, in gold, $1,207,137; in silver, $1,298,603; in copper, $2,627—total $2,260,667, and composed of 7,053,074 pieces. At New-Orleans, the coinage amounts to $915,090; at Charlotte, $127,055; at Dahlonega, $12,310.

Treasury Note Bill.—Mr. Duncan, of Ohio, concluded his speech on the Treasury Note bill and was followed by Mr. Davis, who spoke at length in reprobation of the financial policy of the present administration.

Duty on Pins.—Jan, 26th.—Mr. Tillinghast reported a bill making pins subject to a duty of 20 per cent.

Treasury Note Bill.—The discussion of this bill was prolonged by Messrs Duncan, Campbell, W. C. Johnston, and others, taking a personal aspect.

Jan. 27th.—The discussion continued, or rather explanations by Messrs. Duncan and Johnston.

Slaves in Connecticut.—Mr. Boardman introduced a resolution, requesting of the Secretary of State, whether the Amistad captives were included among the number of slaves in the state of Connecticut.

Wabash and Erie Canal.—Mr. Proffit urged action on the bill which provides a grant of land for the construction of the Wabash and Erie canal.

Sub-Treasury Bill.—Mr. Morris asked leave to introduce his bill, of which he had given previous notice, to repeal the Sub-Treasury law. The motion to suspend the rules in order to enable him to introduce said bill, was lost by a vote of 79 to 87.

British Seizures.—Mr. Pickens made an ineffectual attempt to introduce a resolution requesting the President to communicate all the information he may have in relation to the seizure by the British, of vessels alleged to be engaged in the slave-trade.

Treasury Note Bill.—Feb. 1st.—Mr. Wise spoke on this bill, in which he took grounds against an extra session, and for greater economy. His speech produced a great sensation.

THE INFANT SLAVER.

We published on Friday an extract from a letter, stating the capture of a slaver off the Island of St. Croix. The following extract from a letter from an esteemed friend, written at Havana on the 17th ult., announcing her arrival there, and gives interesting particulars of her condition:

"On Sunday morning last information was given that a slaver, captured by a British sloop of war, (the Ringdove,) had arrived during the night, and I determined to visit her. An officer reported the small pox on board, and directed the Negroes to be removed to the Romney, a British receiving ship in this harbor. Not fearing the small pox I went on board the Romney on Thursday. Her commander is Lieut. Hawkins, who was in the battle of Trafalgar, and who received me kindly. On his deck, transferred from the slaver, were 340 children, boys and girls, from 7 to 13 years of age, all naked. Four are females of about 20, and one of these had an infant in her arms. They were busy washing and feeding them. Some appeared to be very ill, and many were much chafed and sore from the motion of the vessel; a great number of them seemed to straighten themselves and stand up with difficulty, from their long confinement, and bent position in the hold of the slaver.

She was lying alongside—a Spanish built vessel, named the "Jesu Maria," of not more than 35 or 40 tons—about one half the size of a common river sloop, and in all respects like a lime or manure boat from a Jersey or Long Island inlet.

The water casks and ship stores were stowed in the hold, leaving above them and under the deck, a space of from 2 to 3 feet, into which these children had been crowded. The cargo originally consisted of 280; 30 had died before and 10 after the capture.

I expressed to the honest old lieutenant a desire to learn the story of these children and of their captivity, if it were possible, and he called up a black man who had been sent on board, and professed to speak their language. He stated that he had conversed with them, and that they had told him they had all been sold to traders in Africa by their parents. I asked him to point out one with whom he could speak—he hesitated—the lieutenant then ordered the woman with the child to be brought before him and directed certain questions to be put to her. It was soon apparent to the lieutenant, to myself and to a gentleman of Boston who had accompanied me on board, that the black man was an impostor, and that he and the woman did not understand a word of what passed between them.

The slave trade is much encouraged here by public feeling. When a Guinea vessel arrives, it is immediately proclaimed by every body, if the slaves are men, that they were captives taken in war and shipped to save their lives; if children that they were sold by their parents. The commerce is thus reputed to be philanthropic, and curses are loud and open against British interference. The city has several barracones, or public slave-markets in its vicinity. If slaves can once be got into any inlet, before capture, they are behond the reach of British authority

FLORIDA.

The following information, communicated in a letter from an officer of the army serving in Florida to a friend in this city, may be relied on as correct:

FORT FANNING, Jan. 12, 1841.

Major Belknap has, through the aid of one of Captain Page's delegation, succeeded in bringing in fifteen hostilities, among them the chief of the Tallahassees and his family. He expects to bring in some twenty or thirty more, and has his runners out now negotiating with them. Detachments from our command have been constantly out, scouting and escorting, but have met with none of the enemy yet in the field. We have here a report that Gen. Read, with a large detachment of volunteers, surprised a party near Deadman's Bay, taking six warriors and two Negroes. The General is now on his way with six prisoners to Fort Macomb. The express also brings intelligence of forty Indians having come in at Fort King.

From the Savannah Republican, of 23d inst.

We are happy to lay before our readers the following letter from a correspondent. We concur fully in opinion with the writer that an army of 50,000 men will be required to aid Florida of the enemy. Unless indeed they have already surrendered voluntarily. The theatre of war embraces a territory of 47,000 square miles. Three or four thousand men is a mere handful for such a service.

TRADER'S HILL, Ga., Jan. 19, 1841.

On or about the 12th inst. while Capt. Jermain of the Georgia troops, with a small detachment of his company, was scouting between Forts Moniac and Taylor, ten or fifteen miles south of the Okefanoke, they discovered a small Indian camp fire on the border of the swamp, which appeared to have been very recently left by the Indians. On farther examination their trail was found leading into the swamp. Capt. J. leaving the horses in charge of a few men, entered with from six to ten men on the trail.

The party traveled through mud and water from two to three feet deep a great portion of the distance; until they had penetrated three or four miles, when suddenly an Indian warrior sprang up within a few paces of the captain and leading men and levelled his rifle at one of the foremost—happily his rifle missed fire. Not so with the more fortunate volunteer, the crack of whose rifle a moment after told the tale of this Indian. At this juncture a large mascular savage showed himself in hostile attitude near at hand, when he and Capt. Jernigan levelled their rifles at each other.

Here again the dexterity of the white man was destined to prevail against the savage. Jernigan fired and the Indian fell mortally wounded, but still attempting to rise; the captain mounted him with his knife and soon ended the struggle. Still a third Indian (believed to be the last of the party) was now seen, fired on, wounded, but effected his escape.

The two scalps with two rifles and pouches, a few dollars in silver (found in one of the pouches,) and a handome bowie knife, were brought in as trophies.

They were armed also with bows and arrows and were well supplied with ammunition. It is here thought that they were spies, sent up to ascertain what openings existed for another Indian adventure.

FROM FLORIDA.

From an officer of the Pay Department, dated,

"FORT BROKE, Jan. 5, 1841.

"An express has just arrived from Taracota, sixty miles South of this place, advising the commanding general that eleven warriors had come into that place.

"A warrior has just come in here with a white flag, who says that 'Tiger-tail,' with a large band of his people and relations will be in to-morrow.

"Accounts from Onathliga hammock say that twelve or fifteen Indians have recently come in, and a number have also recently given themselves up at Major Belknap's post No 4."

The following extract from the Savannah Republican of the 18th inst. confirms the above and contain additional news:

The news from Florida continues cheering. Appearances now decidedly justify the expectation that the enemy will ere long surrender.

Our last information is from Pilinka, dated January 14th. Our correspondent says that the news from the West continues to be gratifying. A letter had been received there from Col. Loomis, dated at Fort Clinch, stating that thirty-five Indians had come in at that post.

Tiger-tail had also come in and was going to Tampa. It is thought that in all about six hundred Indians have presented themselves at various posts along the coast on on the Gulf side.

A party of the enemy lately attacked Fort Walker, killing two or three negroes and wounding one white woman. Fort Walker is between Micanopee and Newmansville.

The Varioloid.—The Varioloid disease prevails to a considerable extent in this city. Persons are attacked by it without having to their knowledge been exposed to the contagion. We have heard of several cases in which it has been fatal, and the remark has been made, with what truth we cannot say, that it appears to be more violent than usual.

It will be the part of prudence in all persons who have been already vaccinated, to submit to a second vaccination. We know of several persons who are supposed to have had the vaccine disease some years since, yet in whom, upon revaccination, the distemper went through its regular course, producing a perfect pustule, with every other symptom of genuineness. This is supposed to indicate a state of the constitutian which would inevitaby have caused the patient to take the varioloid if exposed.

A dark colored cab, drawn by two horses, with a bottom of a peculiar form, has been employed to convey patients ill of the small-pox and the varioloid from this city to the Hospital on Staten Island. A gentleman who happened to be on board of the steamboat in which the cab was making one of its trips to the island, inquired of the driver whether, when he was in the city with his vehicle, he ever received passengers to carry from place to place. He answered in the affirmative. If this be the fact, there is no wonder that people are attacked with this distemper without knowing why. In the mean time it will be well for people to avoid the cab that conveys patients to the Hospital on Staten Island.

Abolition Mob.—Our city was thrown into the greatest confusion on yesterday morning, in consequence of the murder of an individual named M'Creary, and the stabbing and otherwise injuring four or five other, by the negroes on the night previous. As will be seen by an article in another column, an attempt was made on Saturday night last, to get up an abolition meeting in the court house. Having failed in the attempt, an appointment was made in several of the churches, on Sunday last, that an abolition meeting would be held on Monday evening, at the house of one of our citizens, Dr. Jewett. Early in the day on Monday, indications of hostility to the holding such meeting, were manifested throughout the city. But in consequence of the presence of the Mayor and other officers, at the time and place of meeting, comparative quiet was maintained until after its close. But immediately upon the break up of the meeting and the consequent absence of the police, the windows, &c., of Dr. Jewett's house were broken, and other acts of violence committed.

But the business did not stop here. Having heard that a white woman was residing with some negroes, in the outskirts of the city, a number of individuals repaired to the place and demanded of the inmates whether such was the fact. Upon being answered in the negative, they then inquired whether abolitionists were within. Whereupon a general fight commenced, in which M'Creary was killed upon the spot, and four or five others, badly wounded! In the morning an inquest was held upon the body of the deceased, and a verdict returned in accordance with these facts. The greatest excitement prevails among us. While we write, our streets are promenaded by men in whose countenances are depicted sorrow, consternation, horror, and vengence.

P. S. Three of the blacks engaged in the riot and murder have been taken, and the officers are in pursuit of the remainder.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

February 4th, 1841.

At a special meeting of the Board of Directors of the Bank of the United States, held at the Banking House, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, the Bank of the United States, in compliance with its pledge to the public, has made a fair and bona fide effort to resume and maintain specie payments, having since the fifteenth of January last, paid out an amount, little, if at all, short of six millions of dollars in coin or specie funds, and whereas the effort to maintain specie payments by this bank has been rendered abortive by the intentional accumulation and extraordinary enforcement of its instant liabilities:—therefore

Resolved, That this Bank is under the necessity, for the present, of suspending specie payments.

Resolved, That every exertion will be made by the Directors, to collect the Debts, and convert into cash the Assets of the Bank, for the purpose of resuming payments in specie at the earliest practical moment.

Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolutions be published.

Extract from the minutes.

RESOLUTION OF THE CITY BANKS.

At a meeting of delegates from the banks of the city and county of Philadelphia, held Feb. 4th, 1841, convened upon official notice of the suspension of specie payments by the U. S. Bank, present, delegates from the following Banks:—Pennsylvania, Girard, Philadelphia, North America, Farmers' and Mechanics', Commercial, Mechanics' Western, Penn Township, Southwark, Kensington, Manufacturers' and Mechanics', Moyamensing and Northern Liberties—

John White, Esq., was called to the chair, and F. A. Raybold appointed Secretary.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That the Banks represented in this meeting will continue the payment of specie for all their liabilities.

JOHN WHITE, Ch'n.

F. A. RAYBOLD, Secretary.

Mania a Potu.—The New Orleans Picayune, after some thrilling remarks on the awful misery to which men subject themselves by [illegible] from care, in the article [illegible] of spirituous liquors, details the [illegible] description of a person [illegible] editor had seen rendered demented [illegible] intoxication.

By [illegible] yesterday stood, with chilled veins [illegible] starting eyes, witnessing a spectacle of this kind. We were in company with the physician at a moment when he was called upon to administer relief to the victim. In a corner of the room we found the tortured wretch, crouching and peeping through the rungs of the chair, at a swarm of flying snakes, which he said were darting through the room in all directions. Bloated terror was in his countenance. He sprang from the corner and flew from one position to another, in agonizing alarm. Devils were pursuing him—behind, before, above and below, and all around him objects of terror and danger appeared, and instruments of death menaced him on every hand. His eyes seemed starting from their sockets. His exclamations were so full of misery that the heart ached to hear them. Then again his fits assumed another form, and he ran about the room, jumping over chairs, and calling to us to see him walk upon the ceiling. Then he raved for liquor, screamed aloud, cursed the world, and his own existence, demanded brandy with wild and furious gesticulation, and again sunk into grief and tears, complaining that all the world was leagued against him, and even devils were employed to persecute him. Suddenly he fell into a sort of waking trance. He was lifted on the bed, and there he lay, gasping at the air, with such horrible contortions of countenance, as made our flesh creep upon our bones. The unfortunate wretch has recovered, as our friend, the physician, declared danger to be past when we left him, but who may form a conception of his anguish endured during that horrid paroxysm?—Years of the severest trials and misfortunes should be considered luxurious ease in comparison with one hour of such frightful torment of soul and body. If the condition of eternally condemned spirits may be revealed to moral comprehension, surely the miserable victims of this malady experience some foretaste of the sinner's doom.

Slave Trade in Virginia.—The slave population of Virginia in 1830, was 469,724. The natural increase of these, as indicated by a comparison of the whole slave population of the country in 1820 and 1830, would be about 117,500 or 25 per cent.—The number now in the State, however, as appears by the census of 1840, is but 447,207, showing a diminution since 1830, of 22,517. Therefore, the whole increase of the ten years, with this diminution in the original number, making, in the aggregate, 140,000, must have been exported from the State, and sold in the slave market. It may be said that emancipations have taken place. This may be true to a very limited extent, but not sufficient to counterbalance the slaves which have been introduced into the State from Delaware, Maryland, and other sources. The rearing of slaves for the market, then, is a portion of the business of the State, and no unimportant one either, so far as the amount of the proceeds is concerned. Of its profits we know nothing except from report.

The average price of slaves, exported from the State, is, probably, not less than $300 each. Taking this as a fair estimate, it will be seen, by computation, that the whole number exported in the last ten years, say 140,000, will amount to forty-two millions of dollars, an amount probably greater than is realized from the exportation of either of the two great agricultural staples of the State, flour and tobbacco.—Mass. Spy.

Shocking Calamity.—The Kalamazoo Gazette says, on Tuesday evening last, while Elder Mack and his wife of Prairie Ronde, were from home, their house with five persons in it was entirely consumed by fire.—Buff. Com. Adv.

New-York House of Refuge.—The whole number of children admitted into this institution, since its opening in 1825, is 25,631. There were admitted within the last year 190, and there are at present in the institution 238. Three-fourths of the youths apprenticed from the establishment are indentured to farmers.

There is not, we are informed in the gallant State of Delaware a single distillery to be found. The lovers of antiquity can be gratified with a view of an old one on the banks of the Brandywine.

Gov. Davis, of Mass., has sent a message to the Legislature, expressing fears that there is no disposition on the part of Great Britain to settle the long disputed question of the North East Boundary.

Export of Manufactured Goods to the United States.—The export of manufactured goods to the various ports of the United States, the revival of which we noticed some weeks ago, is now extremely brisk. The packet ships to New-York, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore have all had full cargoes, and the transient vessels now on the berth are likely to obtain fair freights. The New-York packet ship Virginia, now wind bound, is not only crammed full, but had to refuse nearly two hundred packages. Her freight reaches £1700, the largest, we believe, made by any New-York ship since 1838. The packet ship North America, which will sail on Thursday, will also, it is expected, obtain a full cargo. The year opens well for trade; let us hope, therefore, that the export of goods will not only continue, but increase.—Liverpool Albion.

The Exploring Expedition.—The ship Nantucket, (of Nantucket,) Captain Edwards arrived at Tarpulin Cove yesterday, reports having spoken July 23d, off the Fegee Islands, the U. S. brig Purpois, Captain Reynolds, all well, bound to Mallolo to rejoin the commander in the expedition in the schooner Flying Fish. The Vincennes and Peacock were at Sandal Novo Bay. The expedition were engaged in a survey of the Fegee Islands and Shoals, which was nearly completed, and the squadron would sail for the Sandwich Islands in ten days.

Captain Edwards informs us that it was reported at Tonga Bay that an American ship was wrecked at Fegee Islands, supposed to be the Shylock of Sippean; crew saved and landed at Hapace Island.—New Bedford Mercury, Feb. 3.

Life Preserving Trunk.—An ingenious mechanic at Lancaster, Pa., named Getz, has invented a life-preserving trunk which must prove extremely useful in more ways than one. It is so designed that every article, whether of clothing, papers, or money secured in it can never be damaged by water, should it be emerged for a month in the deepest depths of the ocean: besides this, the one which has been exhibited possesses the wonderful facility of preserving the life of any one who attaches himself to it, as it is so buoyant that 250 pounds dead weight will not sink it.

Vessel Sunk with probably all on board.—Captain Hanna, of the brig Anne, arrived yesterday states that while at anchor off the lower end of Kent Island on Monday with the wind ahead, he observed a schooner of about fifty or sixty tons lying near, also at anchor, but with her main sail up.—About three o'clock a squall came up from the E. N. E. and blew quite fresh for a short time. When it cleared away, he saw that the schooner was sunk, and something floating on the water. He sent his boat and found that the mainmast was broken in two, and the upper part with the sail attached floating on the surface. The main gaff was taken off and brought up. Captain H. supposed that all on board were drowned.—Baltimore American of yesterday.

Splendid Bequests.—On the death of our fellow citizen Nicholas Girod, his large estate was administered upon as vacant succession, as he died without heirs in the State and was supposed to have left no will. Within a few days past, however, discoveries were made in rummaging the contents of an old desk sold as part of the estate which may lead to a very different disposition of the property from what was anticipated. The desk alluded to was purchased at public auction by a gentleman of this city, and on examination was found to contain in a certain drawer, due bills signed by the deceased, giving to certain individuals [illegible] and public institutions, [illegible] We have heard the following [illegible]

THOUGHTS OCCASIONED BY ATTENDING THE FUNERAL OF AN INFANT.

Why sleeps the lovely babe in death?
'Tis not its sin that stops its breath;
No 'tis to change, to raise, refine,
And make it, like an angel, shine.

The gasp of death, its groans, its sighs,
Is but to waft it to the skies;
To free it from the pains of earth,
And introduce a heavenly birth.

'Tis but to bear it safe above—
Up to God's throne of endless love;
To bear it to the Savior's breast,
Where it eternally will rest.

[illegible] happy infant, who would say—
'Twas [illegible] here on earth to stay?
[illegible] but call'd from earth's vain cares,
Which would increase with days and years

'Tis true thy friends may now bemoan
And weep for their lov'd little one—
They gather round thy Coffin—Grave,—
As life for thee they still would crave.

But [illegible] life that will not end,—
[illegible] Jesus is thy living friend;
With him your life will still remain
[illegible] rise again

[illegible] with the [illegible] heav'nly choir,
[illegible] shall tune the lyre,—
[illegible] sing the songs that angels raise—
[illegible] with saints the Savior's praise

[illegible] Heaven will refine,—
[illegible] that will ever shine;
[illegible] living lines

Transplanted to a soil more fair,
[illegible] compare,
A flower of Heaven's unfading fields,
[illegible]

[illegible] thou art not dead,
[illegible] footsteps tread,
[illegible] to clay
[illegible] to endless day. R. T.

THE LORD OUR HELPER.

In the hour of pain and sorrow,
When the world brings no relief,
And the eye is dim and heavy,
And the heart oppressed with grief—
While blessings flee,
Saviour, Lord, we trust in thee!

When the snares of earth surround us,
Pride, ambition, love of ease—
Mammon with her false allurements,
Words that flatter, smiles that please;
Then ere we yield,
Saviour, Lord, be thou our shield!

When forsaken in distress,
Poor, despised, and tempest tost,
With no anchor here to stay us,
Drifting sail and rudder lost:
Then save us thou
Who trod the earth with weary brow!

Thou! the hated and forsaken,
Thou! the bearer of the cross,
Crowned of thorns, and mocked and smitten,
Counting earthly gain but loss.
When scorned are we,
We joy to be the more like thee.

Thou, the Father's best beloved,
Now the throned and sceptred king,
Who but thee should we adoring,
All our prayers and praises bring?
Thrice-blest are we,
Saviour, Lord, in loving thee.

WHY SHOULD YOU WEEP AT A THOUGHTLESS WORLD.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

When, like a fairy scene in youth,
The untried world is spread before us,
When fancy wears the garb of truth,
And sunny skies are smiling o'er us,
When never by one thought of woe
Our hearts' deep tenderness is stirred,
How little then our spirits know
The evils of a "thoughtless word."

When, one by one, our joys depart,
When hope no more each moment measures,
When, like a Niobe, the heart
Sits lonely 'mid its perished treasures,
When far from human aid we turn,
The voice of comfort rarely heard,
Oh then how bitterly we learn
The anguish of a "thoughtless word."

MISCELLANEOUS.

A SKETCH.

The delirium tremens is one of the most frightful consequences of intemperance. When the wretched victim of unbridled appetite has indulged to a certain extent in his accustomed stimulant, his reeling brain conjures up a multitude of fancies far more horrible than ever tantalized the wildest maniac. The concluding scene with such an individual is indescribably fearful. Death in all its Protean variety, has never affected me with such sensations as I have experienced when standing by the wretched inebriate, suffering with this terrible disorder. One case to which my mind reverts, was marked with circumstances of painful interest. It happened upon a stormy night, near the last of January, during a winter of uncommon severity. The snow was pattering in regular gusts against the windows, while a neighboring watch dog howled a dismal accompaniment to the raging northwester. My family, after discussing a dish of fine apples around a fire of seasoned beach, rendered doubly cheerful from the gloom, without, had one after another retired to rest, leaving the schoolmaster and myself, leaning upon the mantle, each with a light in one hand and his upper garments in the other, toasting our slippers over the buried, but still glowing embers and debating an unsettled point in theology with dogmatic perseverance. A startling rap with the huge brass knocker upon the front door brought our dispute to an abrupt conclusion. "The Squire is crazy!" said an agitated voice, as the door opened and a sudden gust of wind extinguished both lights. "Hurry over! quick! the family is afraid he wont live till morning?" and without farther explanation the messenger turned his horse and rode off at full gallop through the collecting drifts. To re-adjust my apparel was the work of a moment, and not without a smile at the rueful expression of the schoolmaster's countenance, as he relighted his candle and said in an expostulatory tone, "must you go out in such a storm?" I was soon urging my faithful but jaded grey to his utmost speed, in the face of the beating tempest for the residence of the honorable Jonathan Lang. Esquire Lang was a wealthy gentleman farmer, of extensive repute.—He was a worthy member of the state legislature, an excellent neighbor, and, in days when a periodical revel was rarely accounted an evil, a man of irreproachable moral character. For even in his own domestic circle, referred the bloated corpulency of his naturally large system, and the fiery flush of his full face to the legitimate cause. His was one of those sponge like systems of inebriation, and as he was never seen drunk except upon public occasions, he passed for a strictly temperate man. Indeed an incident occurred which caused him to lay aside even his practice.

Some five years previous to the date of events embodied in the subsequent narrative, his eldest son was carried home from a Fourth of July dinner in a "glorious" state of "jolification." "Oh John! John!" exclaimed his alarmed mother.—"Don't say a word, mother," hiccuped John, "father's ten times drunker than I!" Esquire Lang never set the example of public inebriety afterward. His daily drams of Cogniac and his regularly retiring to bed every day after dinner were the only practices which the most scrupulous whispered to his discredit. But abused appetite forces us sooner or later to pay the forfeit. Mr. Lang was arrested in his intemperate course by a fit of strong appoplexy. He had been partially recovered by the energetic application of the usual restorants and all stimulating food and drinks strongly interdicted as certain hindrances to entire convalescence. His brain now tortured with emotions as it had before been with plethora, was giving birth to all the wild and horrible imaginings of delirium tremens. I tied my horse under one of his ample sheds and entered without ample ceremony. He sat bolt upright in his bed and his countenance was the image of despair. His eyes were alternatively fitfully glancing, or fearfully rolling in their strained sockets, as if in pursuit of ever changing objects, now advancing, now retreating, and now flitting with electric rapidity over the field of vision. Startled at my entrance, he looked up and vehemently exclaimed "Would you rob me!" Again, recoiling from my preferred hand, he shrieked "you would murder me!" and sprang from the opposite side of his couch with superhuman energy. The injudicious opposition of his friends to his whims had phrenzied him to an alarming degree. He utterly and obstinately refused anodynes, and was only restrained by force from leaping from the windows of his apartment to escape these visionary yet to him real tormentors.—Grasping the clothes convusively as we replaced him to bed, he buried himself beneath half a dozen blankets. "Ha! there yet!" he muttered in stifled tones, and flung the covering from himself to the floor with startling suddenness. Soothing words calmed him occasionally, but he seldom lost sight of a moment of the phantoms dancing attendance upon his unthroned imagination. Now, terror beamed from every lineament. "Friends!" he exclaimed shrinking backward and elevating his hand for defence. Again his face exhibited every mark of strong loathing and disgust. "Snakes!" said he, "see them crawl!"—"See! they are on my bed!" "Keep them off!" raising his voice with each successive exclamation. Now his eyes traversed the circumference of a circle which he was the centre and the diameter of which was rapidly lessening. "See! they are on me!" he exclaimed when his person was embraced within the narrowing limits.—"Why don't you keep them off?" The expression of his features, his intense agitation, his motions were all those of one upon whom ten thousand reptiles were trailing their scaly bodies. Again, fixing his eyes upon a retired corner of the room, he shook with an unearthly shudder, as if some new horror had greeted his vision.

"What do you see there?" inquired his anxious and distressing wife. "Two!" he whispered. "Two what!" said I. "Two horrid, horrid fellows!" He shuddered convulsively. "Keep them away!" said he faintly after another half hour of anxious silence. Our hopeless task of beating the air was resumed with usual success. "Take them away!" he groaned, "they are coming! they are coming!" I threw myself into a posture of defence.—He grew calm for a few moments. Then suddenly starting up he clenched his fists, raised them to his right shoulder in boxing attitude, glared fear and fury from his bloodshot eyes, howled in agony, "they come! they come! struck three several times with appalling energy at the approaching phantoms, and fell back upon his couch—a ghastly corpse!" E. ORIGIN OF THE WALDENSES.

The history of this people, whom Milton denominates "the most ancient stock of religion," is a subject of deep and general interest. For ages they stood as the "meek confessors" of truth, and formed a "noble army of martyrs," who suffered for the truth's sake. On our last page, we have copied an extract of a letter to a member of the Church of Scotland, from the Canada Christian Examiner, giving a brief account of their form of ecclesiastical government and disipline. From a statement in that article, the reader might infer that the Waldenses had their origin in the ninth, or tenth century: Others have supposed that they first existed distinct and seperate from the Church of Rome, about the year 1170.—Both of these suppositions, we think, are mistakes. It appears from diligent researches made respecting their rise, that they have existed under various names as a distinct class or Protestants against the innovations of the established churches of Greece and Rome, ever since the time of Constantine. Crantz says that these ancient Christians who were at length denominated Waldenses, from one of their most eminent teachers, Peter Waldus, date their origin from the begining of the fourth century, when Leo, in the great revolution in religion under "Constantine the Great," opposed the innovations of Sylvester, Bishop of Rome. In the year 325, their churches had been flourishing in the Roman empire for more than seventy years. Their religious character in its grand outlines had been remarkably uniform. They have been distinguished for their determined adherence to the doctrines, disipline, worship and principles of the word of God in their simplicity, in opposition to the traditions, the ritual and forms of worship, and secular policy and spritual tyranny of the church of Rome; whose relics are to be seen in some of the Protestant churches of the present day.

Their history has been marked with blood.—They have been persecuted from age to age, for twelve or fourteen centuries. Their progress may be traced from Asia Minor, through Macedonia, Epirus, Bulgaria, Sclavonia, Sicily, Lombardy and Milan, and thence to France, where they settled about the beginning of the eleventh century. Persecuted in one country, they have retired from the desolating storm to another; and as they propagated their principles with new boldness and success, they were styled a new sect, though they were evidently the same people that had long appeared on the pages of history. At Orleans in France, in 1017, a congregation of them having been collected, a Roman Catholic Council was convened, and sanguinary measures adopted to destroy them. Their ministers and their converts, among them were many respectable citizens, were burnt alive. It was for the religious liberties of this people that Oliver Cromwell, (a man grossly misrepresented by the many who have so written as to secure the favor of royalty and its admirers,) made an earnest appeal to Europe in the seventeenth century, when the Pope and his emissaries were butchering them, and desolating their dwellings with fire and sword in the mountain fastnesses to which they had fled as a place of refuge.

We may have occasion to speak of their history and doctrines, in a future number. Their sufferings for conscience's sake, are not yet at an end. They are now under the government of the King of Sardinia, and the two Sicilies. The administration of Charles Albert., the reigning monarch, though he is not a persecutor, is influenced in its every movement by a bigotted priesthood, and of course, it will confer as few privileges as possible on the poor Protestants of Vaudois. Notwithstanding the privation under which they suffer, they have erected a College at La Tour, the only place in the Vallies where they are allowed the benefit of classical education. This institution, which has the obstacle of poverty to contend with, is now looking with eagerness to Protestant countries for help.—Christian Observer.

HOW TO RESIST THE DEVIL.

Satan is the Christian's unwearied foe, he is the enemy of all righteousness, and aims at our destruction. He is especially the enemy of our faith—comfort—prosperity—and usefulness. He is our enemy before God, and he gets success to our hearts; he excites to sin, accuses of sin, and terrifies for sin. We are called upon to resist him, steadfastly believing God's Word—faithfulness—and love. Steadfastly believing what Christ is to us, as Satan's grand opponent. Is Satan a deadly serpent? Jesus is the brazen serpent which heals; is Satan a roaring lion? Jesus is the lion of the roaring tribe of Judah, who prevails; is Satan a destroyer? Jesus is a Saviour; is Satan an adversary? Jesus is a friend; is Satan a wolf! Jesus is the good Shepherd; is Satan a tempter? Jesus is a Deliverer; is Satan a deceiver and a liar? Jesus is the truth; is Satan an accuser? Jesus is an Advocate; is Satan the prince of darkness? Jesus is the light of life; is Satan a murderer? Jesus is the resurrection; is Satan god of this world? Jesus is God of all. Resist the devil in the faith of this.—Paotor's Morning Visit.

PREACHING OF FLOWERS.

Your voiceless lips, O flowers, are living preachers,
Each cup a pulpit—every leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers,
From loneliest nook.

'Neath cloistered boughs each floral bell that swingeth,
And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
Makes Sabbath in the fields, and ever ringeth
A call to prayer.

Not to the domes where crumbling arch and column
Attest the feebleness of mortal hand,
But to that fane most catholic and solomn
Which God hath planned;

To that cathedral, boundless as our wonder,
Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply,
Its choir, the winds and waves—its organ thunder,
Its dome, the sky.

There, amid solitude and shade, I wander
Through the green isles, and stretched upon the sod,
Awed by the silence, reverently ponder
The ways of God.

THE JEWS.

The following extracts are taken from Der Orient, a German newspaper. They seem to betoken a movement among the continental Jews in relation to the late crisis in Syria:

"We have a country, the inheritance of our fathers, finer, more fruitful, better situate for commerce, than many of the most celebrated portions of the globe. Environed by the deep-delled Taurus, the lively shores of the Euphrates, the lofty steppes of Arabia, and of rocky Sinai, our country extends along the shores of the Mediterranean, crowded by the towering cedars of Lebanon, the source of a hundred rivulets and brooks, which spread fruitfulness over the shady dales, and confer wealth on the contented inhabitants. A glorious land, situate at the further extremity of the sea which connects three quarters of the globe, over which the Phœnicians, our brethren, sent their numerous fleets to the shores of Albion, and the rich coasts of Lithuania, near to both the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf; the perpetual courses of the traffic of the world, on the way from Persia and India to the Caspian and Black sea; the central country of the commerce between the East and West.

"Every country has its peculiarity; every people their own nature. Syria, with its extensive surrounding plains unfavorable to regular cultivation is a land of transit, of communication, of caravans. No people of the earth have lived so true to their calling from the first as we have done. We are a trading people, born for the country where little food is necessary, and this is furnished by nature almost spontaneously to the temperate inhabitants, but not for the heavy soils of the ruder north.

"In no country of the earth are our brethren so numerous as in Syria; in none do they live in as dense masses, so independent of the surrounding inhabitants; in none do they persevere so steadily in their faith in the promise of the fathers, as on the beautiful shores of the Orontes. In Damascus alone live near 60,000.

"The Arab has maintained his language and his original country on the Nile, in the deserts, far as Sinai, and beyond Jordan, he feeds his flocks. In his elevated plains of Asia Minor the Turkoman has conquered for himself a second country, the birth-place of the Osman; but Syria and Palestine are depopulated.

* * * * * *

"The power of our enemies is gone, the angel of discord has long since mown down their mighty hosts, and yet ye do not bestir yourselves, people of Jehovah! What hinders? Nothing but your own supineness.

"Think you, that Mehemet Ali or the Sultan in Stamboul will not be convinced that it would be better for him to be the protector of a peaceful and wealthy people, than with infinite less of men and money to contend against the ever repeated, mutually provoked insurrections of the Turks and Arabs, of whom neither the one nor the other are able to give prosperity to the country?

"Our probation was long, in all countries, from the North Pole to the South! There is no trade, no art, which we have not practised, no since in which we cannot show splendid examples. Where will you find better proclaimers of civilization to the wild tribes of the East?

"People of Jehovah, raise yourselves from your thousand year's slumber! Really round leaders; have really the will, a Moses will not be wanting. The rights of nations will never grow old; take possession of the land of your fathers; build a third time the temple on Zion, greater and more magnificent than ever. Trust in the Lord, who has led you safely through the vale of misery thousands of years, He also will not forsake you in your last conflict."

JUST SENTIMENTS.

The Amistad Africans.—We care not who the individual is who is fighting for liberty—nor what the color of his skin,—we involuntarily bid him God-speed while breaking off his shackles. With these feelings, we have not been indifferent observers of the events connected with the fate of these helpless fellow beings. Apparently the final scene in this singular tragedy is soon to close, and we see it intimated in the New-York and Albany papers "with the greatest surprise and regret," that an impression is said to prevail at Washington very strongly, that they will be given up by the Supreme Court to the Spanish minister. The Commercial Advertiser uses the following emphatic and correct language; "Surely they who entertain this belief can have no knowedge of the case, or of the facts on which it ought to be decided. We have mastered it in all its details, and a more outrageous violation of right and humanity surely never has been perpetrated than would be in the surrender of these men to death—as to death it will be, if they are sent back to Cuba. For the sake of justice and human rights—for the honor of our country—we trust that better counsels will prevail, and that the victims of the Amistad will be restored, unharmed, to that liberty of which they ought never to have been deprived."—Rochester Daily Dem.

A WORM AT THE CORE.—There lived a rich man at the court of a great King. He was lord chamberlain and clothed himself in rich apparel, and lived every day in magnificence and joy. There came to him, from a distant country, a friend of his youth, whom he had not seen for many years; and, to honour him the chamberlain made a great feast, and invited all his friends. There stood on the table a variety of excellent viands, in gold and silver dishes, and costly vessels with ointment together with some of every kind. And the rich man sat at the head of the table, and was hospitable to all: and his friend, who had come from a distant country, was at his right hand; and they ate and drank, and were satisfied.

Then the stranger addressed the chamberlain of the King: "Such splendour and magnificence as your house contains is not to be found in my country far and wide?" And he spoke highly of his magnificence, and pronounced him the happiest of men.

But the rich man, the king's chamberlain, selected an apple from a golden dish. The apple was large and beautiful, and its colour was red, approaching to purple. He took the apple in his hand, and said, "This apple has rested on gold, and its form is very beautiful!" and he handed it to the stranger, the friend of his youth. The friend cut the apple in two, and behold! in its middle was a worm! The stranger cast his eyes on the chamberlain; and the chamberlain looked upon the ground, and sighing, exclaimed, "So may a corroding heart be consealed under a brilliant exterior."—Fables and moral Maxims, selected by Anne Parker.

Chinese War.—The first important step taken by the English in the conduct of this unrighteous war, is abundantly marked with their usual fact. An inspection of the map of China shows the position of the island of Tehusan or Tehoosan, called Chusan in the papers, to be one of the greatest importance for their operations. It is the key to the entrance of the Yellow Sea, and corresponds in the advantages of its situation with Gibraltar, Ceylon, Singapore, Cape of Good Hope, Halifax and various other points upon which this ambitious nation has heretofore seized with singular forecast. We venture to predict that, war or peace with China, Tehusen will be hereafter numbered among British possessions.

The island is about fifty miles in length by twenty in breadth, highly cultivated, with several canals, and fine harbors. There are a great number of small islands in the group under the general name of the Tehusan Group, among which is the celebrated Pootoo, the island of Monks and temples, having, it is said, about three thousand of the former and four hundred of the latter. The channels between the islands are filled with vessels, the position being the natural entrepot of the commerce of those seas, Ning-po, which is blockaded, is on the main land opposite the island of Tehusan, and an important commercial port.

The policy at the English, evinced by their releasing the junks to the natives is, evidently to engage their good will by representing the war against the government only.—Phil. North Amer.

PETREL.—A sea-bird, which has the faculty of spouting pure oil from its bill. It is a sure prognostic of a storm at sea, when it hovers about a ship. The petrel is about the size of a swallow; Its legs are long and slender, and its color is black. It is seen in all parts of the ocean, busily engaged in searching for food. It braves the utmost fury of the storm—skimming along the waves, sometimes above their tops, and sometimes screening itself from the blast, by sinking down into the billows between them. It does not sit upon the water, but often places its feet upon it, and sustains itself by the aid of its expanded wings, while it picks up some pieces of food.—Flocks of these birds follow vessels for whole days, and eat such things as are thrown overboard. Those birds are known among the sailors, under the name of Mother Cary's Chickens.

THE PULPIT AND THE PRESS.—I feel no scruple in asserting, as my own opinion, at least, that had all the pulpits and presses in Europe been occupied by honest men and delivered nothing but the truth, during the last hundred years, there would have been no wars for at last ninety years back! And I believe, moreover, that were they even now to make truth their refuge, and abide by principles at the risk of interest, they would soon effect an universal peace. Solomon says, "Life and death are in the power of the tongue." How much more, then, are peace and war in the power of the press and the pulpit, which may be called the two great tongues of the world!—Rev. E. Beaumont.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Medicines! Medicines!!

TO FAMILIES.

S. D. DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public; for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

G. A. BARTHOLICK & Co's
MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser, and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an infinite amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given away to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

RELIGIOUS.

IN WHAT MAY A PREACHER SINK HIS AUDIENCE?

The following anecdote, which the writer of this article had from the lips of the concerned individual, may aid your readers, Mr. Editor, in coming to the proper answer. It may even benefit the venerated incumbents of the highest office in the sublunary gift of God; it may prove salutary to many, as it has to some of the commissioned ambassadors of Jesus Christ. To them the question is practical, and every man shall kiss his lips that "giveth a right answer."

I was once designated, said the narrator, to preach the annual election sermon, in the metropolis of my native state, (Hartford Ct.) and before its Governor, its Legislature, and other professional dignitaries. The weather was fine, the concourse numerous, and composed of the intellectual nobility, civil and ecclesiastical, of the whole commonwealth, including strangers of distinction, and constituting an audience of the highest respectability. I, of course tarried with the pastor of the place, the late Rev. Dr. Strong. As the bell began its monitory tolling, I left the study and descended to the parlor. There I was ushered into a circle of clergymen, few of whom I knew, and none of whom, at that moment, I rejoiced to see. The conversation turned upon my feelings in view of the speciality of the service. Some sympathized, others prophesied, others encouraged, and others counselled—how many prayed for me I know not. At last one said, "fear nothing; be bold and independent; just imagine them to be a patch of cabbages, and treat them as such, and my word for it, you will succeed." O, thought I, "if I could sink them upon this principle, and bring my feelings just there, it would do!—but—At this instant Dr. Strong entered the room, and informed those present that it was time to proceed to the church. As the preacher and pastor are ever partners in the procession, according to our good habits, I had the privilege of walking with the doctor. He soon inquired the state of my feelings, having learned their pertubation, and wishing to assuage them, thus accosted me:—"Well my brother, can you not sink them? You have not forgotten the advice of Mr. ——, which I overheard just before I summoned you to move?" No, I replied, but they are such a select assembly, and will expect so much, and criticise so sternly! and what if I should fail? The doctor rejoined; "I am not surprised that you find it difficult to adopt that counsel and preach under the inspiration of a lie. It is folly, falsehood, and stupidity! and to which of these ingredients the poisonous composition is most indebted, it were hard to resolve. They are not cabbages, nor cannibals, but a collection of cultivated men and immortal souls; and to you pertains the responsibility of addressing them as such, and propounding to them their duty, under the sanction of their Creator's will. You must face them and "speak boldly as you ought to speak." And you need not fear their faces. Take my counsel; when the sun rides at his meridian, the stars are lost in the glory of his beams; and when God is exalted, his creatures are forgotten.—Fill your thoughts with a sense of his presence, and your obligations; think of his goodness and promises; let God fill your whole field of vision, and man will appear in his proper diminutiveness. This is truth and grace; this will sink your audience without injuring them, or inflating you;—and in truth, I know of no other mode of sinking an audience legitimately, than that I have suggested. He paused; and I was relieved. His counsel pervaded my willing soul. I was enabled to magnify my office and my Master, and I have since retained, it, and practice upon it with the happiest and most durable satisfaction.

Believing, as I do, Mr. Editor, that every audience must be sunk, and God alone exalted, where the preacher is free and fearless, and the preaching effectual; and that the above counsel of an illustrious preacher may benefit his successors and juniors in office—perhaps private Christians, and even editors—I have sent it, with my respects, as a contribution to your valuable miscellany.—Religious Chronicle for 1840.

From the New York Observer.

THE MARTYR SPIRIT.

This is the only spirit in which a man can be saved. Christ has taught us:—"Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life shall find it." The principle thus enunciated includes the whole of our conduct. In general terms it stands thus: "He that will make self-interest his ruling or ultimate aim, shall finally come short of all the blessedness to which the name life applies; while he that in heart, and as far as called upon by the providence of God, in practice, relinquishes present good for Christ's sake, shall attain everlasting felicity."

Here we find a sure test of our spiritual condition. Are our eyes set upon the advancement of our own interests, or do they regard with more earnestness the glory of God and the salvation of our fellow men? Some there are, I know, who deem it absurd to suppose that we can act from any other motive than self-love, who consider it a fundamental law of our being, that even in those acts which seem most disinterested, we should still have principal respect to our own happiness. But this not only contradicts the Bible; it is inconsistent with the common apprehensions of mankind. Acts are performed every day, which no one unless prejudiced by his theory, would think of attributing to selfishness.—For example: a man falls overboard from a steamboat. Of the many standing around the greater number, perhaps, could afford no aid by plunging into the water after him; and of course, almost any one would escape censure, should he refrain from this act. Add to the supposition, that the drowning man is a stranger to all present, and there will be no excitement from the hope of reward. But one of the spectators throws himself into the water, and his fellow man is saved. Can we think of this as certainly an interested act, as one that in truth cannot be otherwise? Undoubtedly it may be such, but this is not the question? Do we assume that it must be so, on the ground that human nature forbids it to be any thing else?

The theorist may indeed pretend, that although the deliverer of the drowning man might expect to escape censure from those around, should he withhold his aid, and think of no reward in this world for giving it, he would still be impelled by the apprehension of remorse in the one case, and stimulated by the hope of future reward in the other;—this, I allow, may be said;—but who is conscious of such motives in transactions of this kind? They who are, have the advantage of arguments that others cannot make their own.

But we are not compelled to use reasonings of this sort. The Bible, especially the New Testament, contemplates the practice of disinterested beneficence as essential to the Christian life. Witness expressions like these: "For none of these liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord," &c. Rom. xiv. 7, 8. "And he died for all, that they which live, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again." 2 Cor. v. 15. What can be intended by such language, if not that Christians have aims quite other than selfish—that they fix their eyes directly upon the good of others, and the glory of God, as objects which they are concerned to promote, whatever may be the result to themselves? They know indeed that while engaged in the service of God and their fellow men, their well-being is perfectly secure: but this is not the stimulus of their activity—it is not mainly for this that they struggle. They feel, that as redeemed by the blood of Christ, they are no longer their own—that since he has given himself for them, they can do no less than yield up their entire being for his sake.

As we hope to be saved then, we must cherish and cultivate the martyr-spirit, by all those truths and acts which seem fit for this purpose We must never lose sight of the example set by our Savior in this, and so closely followed by the apostle Paul: for they walked in the only path that leads to heaven. Our daily acts must be like theirs, or our end cannot be with them. It is the stern teaching of a merciful Savior: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple." To bear a cross is a reality, the opposite of self-gratification: to come after Christ is to love what he loved, to hate what he hated, to give up life, if need be, in the service of God; and if life itself is not required at once, it is to be yielded up in daily acts of self-mortification, performed for Christ's and the kingdom of heaven's sake.

C. S. A.

Upper Merion, Pa., Dec. 16.

DOES THE CHRISTIAN REMEMBER HIS CLOSET?—The questions have been often asked of late, Why does the cause of Christ so languish? What is the cause of this deadly stupor which has taken possession of every heart? Why are church and social prayer-meetings so poorly attended, and why so little interest manifested by those that do attend? These inquiries do not refer to any particular church or denomination. But they refer to every denomination, and to almost every Christian church throughout our land. It is a lamentable fact, but too true to admit of a doubt. The thinly attended church and prayer-meetings prove it. And the Sabbath-schools—although it is with regret I say it—which have been so highly favored of God, prove it by the few conversions that have taken place of late, and the little interest that is manifested at the present time by those connected with them. But why is it thus? Is the immortal soul less precious than in days gone by? Is God less willing now to hear the fervent and effectual prayer of the righteous? Is life more certain and death more uncertain? Or does the Christian feel that he has done so much for his Divine Master that he is released for a certain time from laboring in his vineyard? Or is he so much taken up with things of this world that he has no time to devote to God? There must be some reason why all of our churches are in this luke warm state at the present time.

Would that every professed follower of Christ, instead of asking the question, why are Christians around so little interested in the salvation of souls, might examine himself, and ascertain the true state of his own heart. And it is to be feared that in most cases he would find himself like Peter, following Christ afar off.

Time was when Satan showed our Savior all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. Oh! Christian! if ever the world appear to thee temptingly glorious, suspect it for one of Satan's discoveries.—Arrowsmith.

MEN HAVE LOVED DARKNESS RATHER THAN LIGHT.

An amiable lawyer, after pushing his toilsome but successful course for many years, at last won a seat in Congress. On his way to the meeting of that assembly, he was taken with a disease which at first did not seem alarming. A physician, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, went to see him. This physician was one who thought the soul of great value. He believed the disease one of those which flatter but destroy. He felt impelled to tell his friend so, and to ask after his preparation for crossing the river of death. The lawyer answered him that he could not believe in Christianity. The doctor asked if he had ever investigated the matter. He replied that he had read such and such books on the subject, (naming over some five or six infidel authors,) and that he deemed this a sufficient research. Being asked if he had ever read any thing on the other side, he confessed he never had. His friend told him that he deemed this a strange investigation, but would wish to hear the argument of his strongest confidence, that on which his soul leaned with the most quiet security. His answer was substantially as follows; "I can never believe in the darkness said to prevail over the land at the crucifixion of Christ. The strange silence of all writers except the evangelists, disproves the statement; particularly the elder Pliny, who devoted a whole chapter to the enumeration of eclipses and strange things, would surely have told us of this occurrence had it been true."

His friend, the physician, answered him with the following facts: "My dear friend, permit me to tell you where you obtained that statement concerning the silence of contemporary authors, on the chapter of Pliny devoted to eclipses. You read it in the second volume of Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. There would be some degree of force in the statement, were it not for one individual circumstance; that is, it is not true! A tree painted on paper may resemble an oak, but it is not an oak. There is not one word of truth in Gibbon's account, although the falsehood is polished. That which he calls a distinct chapter of Pliny, devoted to eclipses, seems to have taken your full credence. Pliny has no such chapter! It is only a sentence, an incidental remark as it were. It consists of eighteen words. I will repeat them to you, if you wish to hear them.—The import of the remark is, that 'eclipses are sometimes very long, like that after Cæsar's death, when the sun was pale almost a year.' A man hears of many things which he does not write. Pliny does not mention the darkness, but Celsus does, and so does Thallus, and Phlegon, Origen, Eusebius, Tertullian, and others, some of them Christians, and some of them Pagans. (The reader can see Horne's Introduction, vol. i. chapter ii.) "I am sorry you took the word of that author, splendid as were his talents, for he sometimes penned falsehood without scruple, if religion was his topic.

The sick man was silent—fell into a long, deep reverie,—after a few days he said to a relative, "If what I read in youth gave my mind a wrong bias, I suppose I must abide the consequences, for I cannot investigate now." He fell into convulsions and died.

Reflections.—Poor man! The truths of the gospel and the history of the Testament were presented to him, and he turned away. He read a statement against the Bible, made by a modern historian who hated Christianity, and he received it at once without asking further! He took hold on a falsehood without one moment's delay or hesitation, relied upon it, and continued to believe it for twenty years, never asking further testimony! Surely men love darkness rather than light. Ten thousand truthful facts were before him, and around him, on the page of history,—they favored Christianity, and he did not observe or remember them. The first historic lie he met, satisfied him. It seemed opposed to revelation.—Cause and Cure of Infidelity.

From the Morning Star.

CHRIST UPPERMOST.

Said Paul; "I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." 1 Cor. ii. 2. Again; "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Gal. vi. 14. Many such expressions are found in the sacred writings, and they breathe a spirit which every believer should possess. Christ must be uppermost in our minds and hearts, in our plans and pursuits, in our temporal and spiritual concerns. We have no right to cherish any interest separate from that of his cause: and if we do, that interest will prove to us a curse, rather than a blessing. Such was the doctrine of our Lord. "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." Luke xiv. 26. This might appear a hard saying, but as explained by Matt. x. 37, it is just and reasonable. All things should be esteemed less than Christ, so that if his claims ever conflict with them, they must yield, whatever be the sacrifice. Possessions, friends, and life itself must be relinquished, if duty to him require it. Nor is this a fanatical or visionary doctrine; the pouring out of treasures like water by the benevolent—separation from the most endeared attachments by missionaries, the flames that have curled around the martyr's head, and devoured his tortured limbs, are all tests of its practicability.

Most christians are willing to acknowledge in theory the justness of this requirement, but few are ready to exemplify it practically. One has this cherished interest to support, and another that, and so the claims of Christ have to be postponed. Let us institute a faithful self-examination:—Does any object dethrone Christ from my heart? Do I make his glory supreme, and all things subordinate thereto? If Christ is uppermost, and all other interests are made subservient to him, all is well; but let this order be reversed, and all is wrong. Take the most benevolent cause; for example, one which properly employed, would promote the glory of God and the welfare of men, and make it the supreme object of regard, and such proceedure would be exceedingly pernicious and offensive in his sight. None can be too well guarded. True, there is so much sordidness and selfishness in the human heart, that caution may seem unnecessary in respect to being too much devoted to benevolent objects.—And so it is, provided Christ is kept uppermost, and all done with an eye single to his glory. But the heart is so treacherous and deceitful, that the most benevolent and disinterested need the constant aid of divine light and grace, to sanctify all their efforts for usefulness, lest while pursuing some course even the most laudable, they should measurably lose sight of the great end.—"Little children, (said the beloved disciple,) keep yourselves from idols." All our objects, plans, and pursuits are of trifling consideration, except as they promote the honor of Christ, and make him all in all. And it is our highest duty and privilege to be assured, that all we are, all we have, and all we do, are consecrated to him forever.

EXTRACT.

We have perused with much pleasure, and we trust with some profit, a sermon entitled "A Plea for Sabbath Schools,' delivered at the Methodist Chapel, in Binghamton, N. Y., Oct. 6, by Rev. J. R. Cross.—We append the following beautiful extract on the importance of christian instruction.—N. Y. Luminary.

"Thus christian instruction manifestly possesses a power, such as is furnished by no other means, to waken the slumbering energies of man, and raise him to a nobler capacity for mental exertions. Through its mighty instrumentality, we have seen whole nations, in the course of a single generation, shake themselves from the pollutions and degradations of idolatry; emerging, as by the power of enchantment, from the greatest ignorance, and the most debasing customs, to the dignity of civilization and self-government, and a lofty degree of intelligence and virtue. And even in enlightened communities, it has acted on the public mind like a lever, lifting it from a state of depression, in which seas of superstition had rolled over it for centuries, to a mental and moral elevation truly sublime, and blooming with the beauties of wisdom and piety. Our Sunday School method of instruction, especially, has this invaluable advantage; it accommodates itself to the mind in that period when it is most susceptible of impression. As the roots of the oak strike deeper with age, and every fibre becomes firmer and more inflexible, so continuance in ignorance and vice, darkens more fully the intellect, and increasingly hardens the heart; and there is consequently produced in the soul, a sterner inveteracy of evil, which will be subdued with proportionably greater difficulty, at each successive period of life. It is, therefore, of vast consequence, to plant in the mind, as early as possible, the seeds of truth, the elements of virtue, and the principles of pure religion. These alone can overturn and effectually destroy the dominion of error. And hence you see the importance and utility of the excellent institution for which we plead, as affording a favorable opportunity for the early development and cultivation of mind, and exerting a salutary influence on the intellectual improvement of its pupils. Sunday school instruction is, pre-eminently, religious instruction; and numerous instances might be adduced, in which children, with this alone, have advanced much more rapidly, in all the departments of useful knowledge, than others, who, with an equal share of native intellect, have enjoyed the advantages of a daily school. In a word, the influence of Sabbath schools, in expanding and strengthening the mental apparatus of the young, and refining and elevating every faculty of their souls, has been extensively realized on both sides of the Atlantic; and facts have fully demonstrated that the real greatness and permanent prosperity of a nation, depend far less upon the excellence of her civil code, (abstractly considered,) and the amount of literature laid up in her libraries, and mouldering in her museums, than on the number of minds brought under the purifying and ennobling influence of divine revelation.

DANGER OF LIVING IN LOW PLACES.

In many houses, especially in Scotland, there live several families in a single dwelling. Some of them live high, and others low. Now I do not like to see persons who are living in the church of God living in its lower regions. I like to see them aspire to the higher stories, so that they may not be too near the low, damp soil of this world. I long to see them climbing in heavenly-mindedness and in righteousness, becoming more dead to earth, that they may have the enjoyment of knowing what it is to "sit in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." Ministers, too, should be getting higher, and not preach in a low, cold manner. If the gospel comes with power to your hearts, it will be felt, and have an influence both on preacher and hearers. Many a time have I come down from the pulpit, grieved that when I had so glorious a region to ascend into, I could not mount higher, and bring your thoughts up with me heavenward to Christ Jesus. It is a great matter to live in high places, and to prove that we are of the number of spiritual and good. I recollect the other day hearing the reason of the late improvement in certain wines. It was said to be because they had a better mode of training the vines. At one time they let them grow too low, too near the ground, but now they let them run up higher, and the juice of the grapes is less earthly in its flavor. Beloved, may your heart be thus trained: climb upwards, and get nearer the clear air of heaven and the bright shining of the Son of righteousness. The greatests of all blessings is to be spiritually-minded, and heavenly minded.—Rowland Hill.

THE VISIBLE CHURCH.—She is the pillar and ground of the truth. She is the mother of saints when they are born again of water and of the Holy Ghost in baptism. She is the nurse of the saints, by whose hand and ministration the bread of life, and the water of life, the wine, and milk, and honey of evangelical privilege, in the person and office of Christ, her glorified head, are dispensed. She is none other than the house of God and gate of heaven. She is the chosen seat of Christ's dominion, governed by the sceptre of his eternal love, enlightened by the manifestations of his presence, washed from his sin in the precious laver of his blood, sanctified by his grace, taught by his word, restored in wandering by his Spirit, called to witness into his glory; the habitation of his presence, and the place of his chosen rest. Her privileges are vast; her immunities, such as in their extent and fullness cannot be contemplated by the clearest eye of faith: while yet the believer sees only through a glass darkly. Their grandeur, their length, and breadth, and depth, and height, will be measured only by the spirits of just men made perfect, when the glorified soul, and glorified body shall be fitted with all the fulness of God.—Rev. R. P. Buddicom.

The foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing, is a vice so mean and low, that every person of sense and character, detests and despises it.—Geo. Washington.

LITERATURE.

ATHENS.

My first visit in Athens was to the Areophagus, where Paul preached. This is a narrow, naked ridge of limestone rock, rising gradually from the northern end, and terminating abruptly on the south, over against the west end of the Acropolis, from which it bears about north; being separated from it by an elevated valley. This southern end is fifty or sixty feet above the said valley; though yet much lower than the Acropolis. On its top are still to be seen the seats of the judges and parties, hewn in the rock; and towards the south-west, is a descent by a flight of steps, also cut in the rock, into the valley below. On the west of the ridge, in the valley between it and the Pnyx, was the ancient market; and on the south-east side, the later or new market. In which of these it was, that Paul "disputed daily," it is of course impossible to tell; but from either, it was only a short distance to the foot of "Mars Hill," up which Paul was probably conducted by the flight of steps just mentioned. Standing on this elevated platform, surrounded by the learned and the wise of Athens, the multitude perhaps, being on the steps and in the valley below, Paul had directly before him the far-famed Acropolis with its wonders of Grecian art; and beneath him, on his left, the majestic Theseium, the earliest and still most perfect of the Athenium structures; while all around, other temples and altars filled the whole city. Yet here, amid all these objects of which the Athenians were so proud, Paul hesitated not to exclaim: "God, who made the world and all things that are within,—He being Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands!" On the Acropolis, too, were the three celebrated statues of Minerva; one of olive-wood; another of gold and ivory in the Parthenon, the master-piece of Phidias; and the colossal statue in the open air, the point of whose spear was seen over the Parthenon by those sailing along the gulf. To these Paul probably referred and pointed, when he went on to affirm, that "the Godhead is not like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." Indeed it is impossible to conceive of any thing more adapted to the circumstances of time and place, than is the whole of this masterly address; but the full force and energy and boldness of the Apostle's language, can be duly felt, only when one has stood upon the spot. The course of the argument too, is masterly,—so entirely adapted to the acute and susceptible minds of his Athenian audience.

Directly over against the Areopagus, and in full view of the place thus consecrated by the labors of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, is another spot still more distinctly marked, and hardly less interesting, as being the undoubted scene of the patriotic exertions of the great Athenian orator. On the eastern slope of the long hill, which runs parallel to the Areopagus in the west, lies the Pnyx, the place where the assemblies of the Athenian people were held in the open air. It is a semi-circular area;—the rock on the upper part being cut away to the depth of eight or ten feet; and the lower part being in some places built up in a straight line, with cyclopean walls. At the highest point, in the middle of the arc, a square mass of the rock is left projecting into the area, with steps to ascend it on the sides. Here was the spot, the very Bema, on which Demosthenes stood, when he addressed the Athenian people in those strains of fervid eloquence, which > "Shook th' arsenal, and fulmin'd over Greece,

> To Macedon, and Artaxerxes' throne".

The exactness of this locality cannot well be drawn in question. It is true, that the Bema stood originally on the summit of the ridge, some yards above the present spot, whence the orator could see the Piræus and its fleets; but its position had been changed long before the days of Demosthenes.

One afternoon, we rode with Mr. Hill to the supposed sight of the Academy, where Plato taught his 'words of wisdom.' There is nothing to mark the site definitely. It lies north-east of the city, in the plain, beyond the Cephisus, which is here a brawling brook, much used for irrigating the adjacent fields and gardens. The whole tract is covered with olive-groves. We returned by the hill of Kolonos, the scene of the Oedipus Coloneus of Sophocles; where once stood a temple of Neptune. This hill affords a noble view of Athens and its environs. It was a splendid afternoon; and the atmosphere had all that perfect clearness and transparency for which the climate of Attaca is remarkable; far surpassing in this respect the sky of Italy, or of any other country known to me. Remote objects were seen with the utmost distinctness; the island of Hydra seemed to be hardly ten miles off; though its real distance is more than forty English miles. The sun went down while we were yet upon the hill, pouring a flood of transparent glory over the landscape; and as the reflection of his last beams lingered upon the Parthenon and slowly ascended the dark sides of Mount Hymettus beyond, they were followed by hues of brilliant purple, which also climbed the heights of Hymettus, and spread themselves abroad upon the sky.—Robinson's and Smith's Travels.

CALCUTTA CATHEDRAL.

The Court of Directors have granted a lakh and a half of rupees, (about £15,000,) towards the fund for building a Cathedral at Calcutta. They have also promised to maintain two additional chaplains for the performance of the service. In writing on this subject to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, (July 7, 1840,) Bishop Wilson says,—

"By the concurrent aid flowing in from so many quarters, there is now every reason to hope that the arduous undertaking of erecting a Protestant Cathedral, to be the Metropolitan Church of British India, will proceed on to its completion.

"The increased accommodation will eminently conduce to the advancement of true religion in the rapidly increasing capital of India. The beauty and chaste simplicity of the edifice, rearing its front in the panorama of the city of palaces, will also not be without its influence. Whilst the direct usefulness of every part (for I have no side aisles—all will constitute one magnificent room, 144 feet by 63, and at the transepts by 128 feet, spanned by an iron roof 47 feet high,) the coolness at every season of our burning year, (for there will be no colonades nor galleries,) and the convenience of its situation for the great body of our multiplying gentry, (two miles and more nearer to their chief residences,) will contribute, I humbly trust, to the instruction and salvation of the thousands who now rarely attend public worship of Almighty God amongst us.

"The grand design, again, with which all these benefits are associated,—the beginnings of a Native Ministry; the seed-plot of benefices for spiritual persons; a centre of missionary exertion; a Protestant foundation of learned, devout and laborious lecturers and preachers to the heathen; a school of the prophets; a link between Bishop's College and its students on the one hand, and the head seminary of the Church Missionary Society, and the Mission Schools of that and the Venerable Incorporated Society on the other; these and similar benefits open in the distant prospect, and render the whole design one of the grandest and most opportune for the conversion of India that has, perhaps, ever been presented to our Church in any one of our distant dioceses, God only vouchsafing his grace to it.

"It will be for my successors to complete what I have begun; my own life and capacity for exertion are rapidly flowing out; but God our Father, Redeemer and Sanctifier will aid those of the succeeding generations, as He has the past and the present.

"I am writing to the Society on the anniversary of the lamented deaths of Bishop Middleton in 1822, and Bishop Turner in 1831. They have entered into rest. We must soon follow. But Christ our Lord ever liveth; and I humbly believe that both at home and in India, the glory of our pure apostolical Anglican Church will break out more and more in consequence of their and others' faithful labors."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, February 19, 1841.

"WHAT MANNER OF CHILD SHALL THIS BE?"

DEAR CHILDREN.—This question was asked respecting an extraordinary child.—His parents were very old, and having had no family, they were not expecting to be blest with such a son as John the Baptist, who was what is called the forerunner of the Messiah. The angel of the Lord appeared to Zachariah, who was the father of this child, and foretold his birth; but as Zachariah did not believe it possible, he was made dumb till the prediction of the angel was fulfilled. As soon as he was able to speak, which was not until the child was eight days old, he praised God for the fulfilment of his promises to Israel, in providing a Savior for them, and addressing the infant, said—"And thou child shalt be called the Prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his way; To give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of sins." Among the kindred of the parents of John, (the tribe of Levi,) and their neighbors, (the tribe of Judah,) there was great rejoicing; and considering all the circumstances connected with this extraordinary affair, and as though they knew not how to fix any limits to the greatness of this, their relative, they say, "What manner of child shall this be?" The future history of this child is familiar to most of the Juvenile readers of the Register. He became a very good man and a successful preacher—directed the attention of his nation to Christ—baptized the Great Redeemer in Jordan—and finally, was beheaded for a faithful performance of his duty in reproving the wicked. But his reward was great in Heaven. Our object in these remarks, is to show that the parents and friends of children feel a deep and lively interest in respect to their character, and the influence they may exert in the world. It is true, that all children are not destined to be as conspicuous as John the Baptist, and some other children mentioned in the scriptures, whose birth, life, and actions were made the subjects of prophecy, and who have filled most important stations in life; yet all children, possessed of common abilities, are the subjects of the attention, and hopes of their parents and friends; and it is very natural for them to inquire, "What manner of children shall these be?" We observe that all children who can reasonably be expected to become useful, respectable, and happy, are

1. Dutiful to their parents.

When this principle is wanting in children, there is not only the strongest proofs of depravity, but it may be safely concluded that such children will not be respected and loved by any of their acquaintances. Those who do not honor their parents, dishonor God, and displease Him too. Anciently, the child who dishonored parents was punished with death; and though this punishment is not inflicted now, it is none the less sinful in the sight of God to dishonor parents now, than formerly. Those who are undutiful when children, are unfit to govern when children are committed to their charge. This virtue was strikingly illustrated in that pattern of all excellence, Jesus Christ, who, when a child, was "subject to his parents."

To honor parents is a divine command which has a promise annexed to it, and those who neglect this, can neither be the subjects of God's favor, nor respectable in society; and what sorrows must an undutiful child experience on a death-bed, while a remembrance of having slighted the counsels of those who loved him most, and who labored to sustain him in a season when he was entirely dependent—harrows up his soul and inflicts a worse than scorpion sting within him! And what child can now think of a final separation from pious parents at the Judgment day? Those children who give promise of usefulness and respectability,

2. Cultivate a taste for reading the Bible.

This is not natural to children. Most of them love play and toys more than this, best of all books and richest of all treasures. A taste for studying the sacred pages is, however, easily acquired. It contains the most interesting stories, as well as to show the way to Heaven. It was to a deep acquaintance with the scriptures, that the truly great and renowned in all ages owed their eminence. The principles which they drew from the Bible made them great and useful. Samuel, and David, and Solomon, and Paul, and Timothy, and others which might be named, are proof of what a knowledge of these inspired books can do, to elevate the minds of those children who read them attentively. What, but the consolation of the divine spirit, with the knowledge obtained from revelation, could have made children die so happily as many have died within a few years past? such as Nathan Dickerman, and all those of whom the Sabbath School Library gives an account? and when you die, (for children, as well as others, must die,) Would you not wish to die in the Lord? and be happy with the just? If you would die well, you must live well.—And you can not live well if you neglect the Bible. It contains a commandment which is "exceeding broad," embracing all that you ought to do, and forbidding all that is wrong. The child that knows the scriptures and lives according to the rules they contain, will, when grown to manhood, be useful in leading others to a knowledge of the truth. Their hosannas, and their prayers shall be acceptable, and shall come up before God as sweet incense—their lives shall be His care, and their death precious in His sight. Those children who would be useful and wise, must

3. Attend the Sabbath School seasonably and punctually.

It is an advantage that children possess at present, over those who are now old, that they can attend the Sabbath School and gain much valuable information, at the same time that they are forming pious habits and learning the fear of the Lord. It is likewise indispensably necessary that the behavior of children in the house of God should be orderly and becoming, and that the holy Sabbath should be spent entirely in religious pursuits and duties. It is proper also to observe,

4. That children should be kind and amiable in their feelings and deportment towards their schoolmates and others.

A child who would abuse his little associates in words or otherwise, can not be loved by good people, nor by his Heavenly Father, as though he possessed a kind heart and treated his little mates tenderly. What is more degrading than for children to cherish such base passions, and descend to the level of brutes in their treatment of each other? We will here observe,

5. That no children can be respectable who do not reverence the aged.

It was a law of universal obligation in Old Testament times, "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man." For the breach of this law, more than forty children were destroyed at a time, who insulted a holy man. And what can be more offensive to God, or disgusting to respectable society, than to see the aged treated with disrespect by the young? It should be remembered that aside from the above considerations, the aged were once as young as you are now, and if life continues, you will one day be as old as they are now. The respect, therefore, which would be agreeable to you if you were in their circumstances, should be paid to them at all times. Another very important idea which we wish to suggest is,

6. That children should never trifle with religion, or the religious feelings of others.

Of religion we may justly say, that it is not only necessary to render its possessor happy, but also to give efficiency and ornament to the character of the young. Religion is admitted by all to be necessary in a dying hour; therefore, the young should embrace it to-day, since they may die to-morrow. Above all things, the young should avoid trifling with the religious feelings of those who are seriously disposed. If they are mistaken, they should be pitied, not ridiculed. If they are right, it is dangerous as well as unwise to oppose or ridicule them, since God is their avenger. Remember what is said by the Savior in reference to giving offense to those who believe in him. Leigh Richmond forbid his daughter associating with any company where any contempt was thrown on religion, or religious people. And whatever estimation such people may be held in by others, young persons should not associate with them on any account, more than may be absolutely necessary.

"O my soul come not into their secret, into their assembly, mine honor be not thou united"! To conclude our remarks on this point, we suggest,

7. That children should be kind and respectful in their manners and treatment to all persons.

By attending to this direction, children will not only secure the esteem and good will of their acquaintance, but will gain the advantage over the evil passions of our nature, and enjoy the happiness arising from a consciousness of having done well; and if, on any occasion, young persons should receive ill treatment from others, they should carefully abstain from doing wrong themselves. It is not for them to punish others for injuries they may receive. To return evil for evil, is to join in transgression and put yourselves on a level with persons of the most unworthy class.—"See" (saith the scriptures,) "that none render evil for evil, or railing for railing, but contrari-wise blessing."

Having been thus particular in defining the principles and duties which children should cherish and perform, we wish now to illustrate that

8. Children who are early trained to the principles and practice of virtue, afford promise not only of true greatness and excellence, but of much usefulness in the world.

There is no true greatness without goodness. Though a man might posses talents capable of acquiring a fortune, or commanding armies—of analyzing all substances, and explaining all the mysteries of nature—and though he might receive the applause of multitudes of his fellow men—without goodness, he could not be truly great in the estimation of God, or of good men. All the apparent dignity or excellence he might evince, and all the imaginary virtues which might be ascribed to him, would be more than counteracted by his self-seeking, and ambitious disposition, and his aversion to goodness and virtue. If he has amassed wealth, perhaps this is hoarded up, and is useless; or if given with profusion, its tendency is to corrupt the receiver. If he has conquered kingdoms and waded to thrones in the blood of thousands, he may have been destitute of patriotism; and having sacrificed at the shrine of ambition, his "memory shall rot."

NORTHERN ADVOCATE.—A large religious paper with the above title, published by Rev. J. E. Robie, and edited by Rev. F. G. Hibbard, hails us from Auburn, N. Y. It is devoted to Theology, Science, General Literature, Religious enterprise, Agriculture, and News, and will probably advocate the sentiments of the Methodist Episcopal Church, its Editor and Publisher both being ministers of that sect. It is edited with much spirit and ability, and its mechanical execution is beautiful.

REVIVAL RECORD.

For the Register.

REVIVAL IN PHARSALIA.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I received in a letter from Elder Levi Peck, of Preston, the intelligence of a revival of religion in Pharsalia, Chenango, Co., the result of a protracted meeting held in that place, by Elders Bush and Peck, November last. Forty were baptized. May God be praised for his mercy and great power in the salvation of sinners.

Yours, in christian affection,

S. M. BURDICK.

REVIVAL IN LINCKLAEN.

A meeting was commenced at the Presbyterian church a few weeks since, about two miles south of the S. D. B. Church, in which Christians of different denominations felt a deep interest for the salvation of sinners. God in his mercy heard the prayers of his children, and brought salvation to souls who were hardened in sin, some of whom were inclined to Infidelity. The meeting was conducted by the Methodist denomination; the preaching was done principally by brother Adams, with the assistance of others, among whom, I enjoyed the inestimable privilege of contributing my testimony in favor of the gospel of Christ, which is the "power of God unto salvation" to the believer only. We cannot give the definite number hopefully converted, but we believe more than thirty, besides many prodigals who were reclaimed. The revival extended into our church, and we have great reason to be thankful. I baptized three, a week ago, and expect a number more will follow the example of Christ next Sabbath. A great number have united with the Methodist church. O may God revive vital holiness in all the churches! Yours, &c. S. M. BURDICK.

REVIVAL IN INDEPENDENCE.

I will give you a brief account of what the Lord is doing for the people here. The church for a season past has been rather below the common standard, and some had become quite indifferent, others were looking forward with anxious expectations to the time when our meeting house should be finished and dedicated, hoping and praying that then the work of grace would be revived among us. The time arrived—ministering brethren from sister churches come over to help us—the house was filled to overflowing—meeting continued until first day evening, when there was evident tokens that the time to favor Zion had come. Meetings were then continued evenings through the week, Sabbath day, and first day, and evenings since, and will continue through this week, and perhaps longer.—The church is now alive, backsliders are returning, and stout hearted sinners are bowing before God. The first day friends are coming in for a share. The work appears to be spreading, and prospects good. Eight have been baptized and joined the church, more are waiting for an opportunity, and many anxious souls are inquiring. Brother Scott is here yet; he and Elder Coon are laboring with their might. Pray for us, dear brother, and help us praise the Lord for his goodness and his wonderful works to the children of men.

Yours, truly, J. P. LIVERMORE.

INTELLIGENCE.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

IN THE SENATE.—Feb. 3rd.—But little besides private business acted on.

Post-Office Reform.—There was quite an animated talk on a proposition to print some extra copies of a report made by a man by the name of Plitt, a traveling agent of the Post Office department.

Inquiry was made under what law, and upon what authority this man was sent to get behind the scenes, and lift the curtains of the Post Offices of foreign countries, to learn their mysteries.

Mr. Buchanan said that the traveling agent of the Post Office departmet had been sent to obtain a knowledge of what might be transferred with advantage to the department at home; that he had been received with the utmost courtesy wherever he had travelled, and every facility afforded him.

Pension to General McNeil.—A bill which occasioned debate, was that to grant a pension to General McNeil, whose gallantry in the field has been the theme of many an official despatch. This gentleman is the present surveyor of the port of Boston and although desperately wounded, is the only officer so situated that did not receive a pension. Mr. Prentiss and Mr. Huntington interested themselves deeply in the fate of the bill. It was ordered to be engrossed.

Steamboat Dangers.—Feb. 4th.—Mr. Ruggles reported an important bill which he was refused by the Senate to make a subject of immediate attention.

General Bankrupt Bill.—This subject coming up, Mr. Crittenden said that there were 500,000 persons who needed the benefits of the bill. The condition of this large class of persons was painted feelingly and truly, and the conclusion drawn that the community would be benefited by its passage. The power having been given to restore unfortunate to the community, to recreate them as it were, to restore them to society, it belonged to Congress to do so. It had been said that "the world was not the poor man's friend, nor the world's law." He wished to make it so if he could, and if Congress was to err at all, it was best to err upon the side of humanity.

Mr. Benton proposed an amendment, to the effect that corporations should be included, and that no bankrupt should be discharged until he had received the consent of two-thirds of his creditors. The debate was prolonged by Messrs. Huntington, Hubbard, Norvell, and Wright. Mr. Benton's amendment were voted on, and lost by 29 to 18.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.—Feb. 5th.—The bill to cede the stock of this canal owned by the U. S. to the State of Maryland, was passed.

Treasury Note Bill.—In the House.—Feb. 2.—The debate was continued on this question by Mr. Triplett, Mr. Coles, Mr. Black, and others.

Mr. Triplett warmly espoused the tobacco growing interests, and of course, was in favor of duties on French silks and wines. He said he had no doubt three-fourths of the people of the United States were in favor of duties on these articles and other luxuries.

Mr. Black spoke on the other side. In the course of his remarks he alluded to the project of the World's Convention assembled at London, last year, in which there were American delegates. The object of that Convention was to effect abolition, by means of undermining the value of slave property. Cotton plantations had, to that end, been fostered in India, and, for every bale of cotton made there a bale of our cotton would be disposed with. We could not be blind to the movements every where made, to destroy the value of slaves. The proposed taxation and French commodities was a part of the plan, for, in the proportion in which we depressed the trade with France, we should increase that with England.

Feb 3.—The Treasury Note Bill still occupied exclusive attention. It was to come out of Committee, at three o'clock to-day, under Mr. Fillmore's resolution.—But Mr. Wise wished to make an effort to amend the bill.

His amendment amounts to this; that the new Administration should have five millions in Treasury notes, over and above all debts due and payable on the fourth of March.

Feb. 4.—The Treasury Note Bill, with all its incidentals engrosses the attention of the House; but the debates have no reference whatever to Treasury Notes. They relate, in general, to personal and party interests, and to the policy of the income administration as regards them.

Mr. Garland made a very earnest speech, to-day, in which he went against all the Whig measures (so called) except the repeal of the Sub-Treasury.

Duelling, Slavery, and Nullification.—Mr. J. Q. Adams next took the floor, and made a most extraordinary speech, in which he was listened to with great interest, and which will, perhaps bring upon himself the censure of many political friends.

It is thus described by the correspondent of the J. Com.:

His object was to give his reasons why he should not support Mr. H. A. Wise, as a leader of the House of Represntatives under General Harrison's administration.

In the first place, as I am told, he protested against the discussion of this and that question here. Tariff Bank, &c., in advance of the recommendations of the President.

In the course of Mr. A's. remarks he adverted to some prominent principles advanced, in the House, by Mr. Wise, and expressed his dissent from them. One was duelling; the other was slave overseering, and the third nullification.

Mr. Adams sent to the Chair, a newspaper with the remarks of Mr. Wise on the controversy between Cols. Johnson and Duncan, wherein Mr. Wise says, "there will be no fight." Mr. Adams commented on this, and presented Mr. Wise as lamenting that the duel law had been passed, and that there would be no fighting.

Mr. Wise and Mr. Johnson both interrupted Mr. Adams and called him to order. Mr. Adams was sustained by the chair, and went on. With the leave, he said, in the most scornful manner, of the House and the professed duelists, he would proceed with his remarks. He did proceed, and in a manner that defies description. The outpourings of sarcasm on the individuals whom he wished to reach, was as copious as it was bitter. The manner of the speaker, as well as his venemous and stinging words, told through every sentence as he went along.

He was resolved, to bring to the notice of the committee and of the country, the subject of duelling at all hazards, and he would not be put down nor dictated to by the duellists. He insisted that some Southern men were in the habit of brow-beating the Northern men, because they, the Southern men were supported by their constituents in the practice of duelling, while the Northern men were not. He said this was a matter for the House, and for the country to look at—it concerned the independence of no Northern members, and the freedom of speech on that floor. If the Southern men were permitted to menace us with the pistol, whenever we dissent from them, there was an end to free deliberation on this Hall. It must be decreed by public sentiment, as well as by law, that duelling here should not be tolerated. He said he hoped to see no more duel murders in this nation. I cannot said he, shoot a man through the heart, and then shed tears over his fate. The constituents of the gentleman applauded his duelling, and required it of him, as the gent. had stated in a letter. But his constituents would not justify him in fighting a duel.

Mr. Wise several times explained, in the course of this attack, and with great force. As to the last idea, he explained that his constituents were opposed to duelling, and that they had often begged him to avoid it. When he fought, it was against their wish, and he might add, his own.

Mr. Adams also attacked Mr. Wise as to his course on Abolition petitions, and dwelt with great emphasis on it. His remarks were stronger on this point—the suppression of petitions—than I ever heard from him.

Finally, he came to what he considered as Mr. Wise's nullification, and exulted in the fact that he had sustained the Administration in its course on that subject.

Mr. Adams declared that he would not support such principles. Mr. Wise, he said, had raised a tri-colored standard and called on the House to follow him; one color was black, the emblem of slavery; another was red the color of murder; and the third was of a pale, sickly, and death-like hue, representing nullification.—This standard, he (Mr. A.) would not follow.

When Mr. Adams had done, Mr. Wise rose and made a reply, remarkable for its moderation and dignity.

Treasury Note Bill.—Feb. 5th.—This long debated bill passed, with Mr. Wise's amendment; the effect of which is, to authorize the coming Administration to issue five millions of Dollars between the 3rd of March and the close of the year, without regard to the amount that may have been previously issued by the present Administration.

The Tariff.—In the debate on the Treasury Note Bill, Mr. Johnson made some remarks, which gave rise to a conversation of some interest on the Tariff question.

This led to explanations on the part of Messrs. Alford, Cushing, and others.

SUMMARY.

"Old Times."—In 1641 the good people of Massachusetts enacted the following law, determining the mode of electing their officers and imposing a penalty of illegal voting:

"It is ordered by this court, and the authority thereof, that for the yearly choosing of Assistants, the Freemen shall use Indian Corn and Beans.—The Indian Corn to manifest election, the Beans contrary. And if any man shall put in more than one Indian Corn or Bean for the choice or refusal of any public officer, he shall forfeit, for every such offence, ten pounds."—Concord Freeman.

Antiquity.—Among the petitions for compensation before the Massachusets Legislature, is that of Elizabeth Warner, for a horse impressed into the service of the State during Shay's rebellion.

New-York State Lunatic Asylum.—By the annual Reprt of the Commissioners transmitted to the Legislature, it appears that the sum of money at the command of the Commissioners, for the past year was $95,000. This sum has been expended, except $3,186 mostly on the main front building, which has been nearly completed. The sum proposed to be expended on the Asylum during the present year is $75,000—and the first direction of it will be to complete one of the buildings for the reception of inmates.

"In this country," says an English editor, "it is considered the height of folly for a man to get drunk and lie across a rail road with the idea of obtaining repose." The same opinion obtains to a considerable extent in America.

MCLEOD INDICTED.

Correspondence of the Buffalo Com. Advertiser.

LOCKPORT, Feb. 6, 1841.

The Grand Jury of the county came into court this forenoon with a bill of indictment against Alexander McLeod for the murder of Amos Durfee, at the time of the burning of the steamboat Caoline. The case had engaged the attention of the jury since Wednesday morning: and the testimony of a large number of citizens was given in. Of the twenty jurers present, nineteen it is understood, were for the indictment of murder.

The prisoner was brought before the court this afternoon, and after being apprized by the District Attorney of the finding of the jury, he was remanded to jail by an order of the court, until the next term of the Oyer and Terminer, which commences on the fourth Monday of March next, when his trial, in all probability, will take place.

BRIDGE OVER THE HUDSON AT ALBANY.

The citizens of Albany seem to have aroused themselves at length to the importance of bridging the Hudson River opposite that city. The project has been long in agitation, but for some reasons, which we do not pretend to understand, has been defeated or rather delayed until the presnt time.

Those who are at all acquainted with the routes of communication from Albany with the South and East during the spring and autumn, and frequently through the winter, when the formation or breaking up of the ice prevents the crossing of the River at the ferries, will readily perceive the inconveniences under which Albany labors from the want of a bridge to the opposite shore. Nor have the inhabitants of Albany alone suffered from the frequent interruptions and delays of travel thus occasioned. A large portion of the population of the State west of Albany have felt the evils arising from the same cause, in the transmission of intelligence by the mails, in detentions in travel to New-York and Boston, and in the forwarding of goods to and from those places.

It has been a frequent theme of censure and surprise among western men, that Albany, enjoying as it does the exclusive advantages of the capital of the Empire State, and being also the central focus of the commerce and travel of so large a region should slumber as it has hitherto done on a measure so essential as this to the enterprise and character of its inhabitants. Surely there can be but one opinion as to the expediency and justice of erecting a Bridge at Albany, situated as it is within a few miles of the head of tide water and the northern limits of navigation on the Hudson River.

The rivalry of the enterprising city of Troy, six miles above can furnish no serious obstacle to the project of a Bridge could be easily constructed in such a manner as not to shut out to any material extent the River trade of the latter city.

A petition to the Legislature in favor of a Bridge at Albany, we understand is in circulation in this vicinity. It is a subject, as we have before said, in which our citizens are deeply interested, and we hope the petition is generally signed by the inhabitants of this country.

FROM THE OREGON.

We have interesting intelligence from this far country, but the state of our columns to-day precludes its insertion in detail. The mission under the care of the Methodist Episcopal Church was in a very prosperous condition, and since our last advices about one thousand of the natives have become converts of Christianity. We regret to learn that the physician to the mission family, Dr. White, had died; we believe his death was caused by a compound fracture of the thigh. It is worthy of note that when the ship Lausanne entered Columbia River with the reinforcement, and the charge of the Rev. Jason Lee, Mr. Daniel Lee is his nephew, was addressing a congregation of natives on the bank of that noble stream. The meeting of the Messrs. Lee, after so long a separation, was one of high interest.

The Hudson Bay Company's ship Forager, arrived at the Sandwich Islands on the 10th of August, after a passage of six months from London. She remained at the Islands until the 31st, and then proceeded for the Columbia River. She had on board a cargo of dry goods for the Oregon Territory.

The English barque Harlequin, sailed from the Sandwich Islands on the 3rd of August, for Kamschatka.

The Mission packet-ship Lausanne, was to leave the Sandwich Islands on the 15th of October for New-York.

The corner-stone of a new Roman Catholic Chapel was laid on the 6th of August, at the Sandwich Islands, His Majesty, Gov. Kekuanasa and the officers of the French frigate La Danaide being present.

STEAMBOAT KOSCIUSKO, CAPTAIN HAYWOOD.—Extract of a letter to the Editor, from a passenger on board the Kosciusko, dated 4th instant:—

"We picked up three men near Tarrytown, who had been out the whole night in a small boat, were wedged in the ice. One old man, near 70, was almost exhausted when we took him in. The captain very humanely detained the boat half an hour to save these poor fellows and gave them every comfort after they got on board. His name is Haywood, and he deserves the thanks of the humane."—Cour. & Enquirer.

FATAL ATTACK OF A SERPENT.—A letter from Martinique, in the Journal of Guadaloupe, states that M. De Pickery, merchant, was met while on a hunting excursion by an enormous serpent which attacked him, and inflicted several severe wounds in his lungs. He defended himself with great courage; but although timely succor was administered to him, he died four hours after. The serpent was nearly seven feet in length, and when opened, there were found in its belly one hundred and sixty-two little ones.

ATTEMPT TO BAIL McLEOD.

Lockport, Jan 28.

McLeod was yesterday admitted to bail by one of our judges, before whom his last examination was held, and by whom he was committed. Some excitement among our citizens was the consequence.—A meeting was held at the court house last evening, which was adjourned over until this evening. Two of our citizens had become McLeod's sureties, after having been indemnified to the amount of the bail, $5000. A very large majority of those who composed the meeting to-day, disapproved of the proceedings of admitting him to bail, and a disposition was manifested to strongly censure those who had suffered their names to be used for that purpose.

One of the bondsmen came before the meeting upon invitation conveyed to him by a committee of the meeting, and made a frank and satisfactory statement of the motives which had actuated him, at the same time expressing his willingness to withdraw from the position he had assumed, after the demonstration of popular feeling upon the subject. It is due to this gentleman to add, that in this step he was evidently not intimidated by any apprehension of personal consequences, but it rather seemed on his part, a concession of what he considered due to public sentiment. McLeod was yet in custody, legal process not having been served upon the sheriff. The proceeding of admitting to bail, so far as it had gone, was rescinded.

While the meeting was in session, a process was put into the hands of the sheriff against McLeod, requiring bail to the amo't of $7000. It is the commencement of a suit brought by Mr. Wells, the owner of the Caroline, for private damages. So that the amount of bail now required to give him his liberty, would be $12,000.

The district attorney has subpœnæd witnesses to appear before the grand jury at the sessions to be held the second week of next month. If an indictment is procured, he will probably be tried at the circuit in March.

I have been thus particular in advising you of what has transpired here, as exaggerated or erroneous accounts will undoubtedly go out upon a subject with which the public mind is much absorbed. It is not to be denied that considerable public excitement exists with us, heightened by the position assumed by the British minister in relation to the destruction of the Caroline —yet not so much as to preclude a fair trial of M'Leod if he should be indicted.—The attempt to bail him, so near the period of his trial, has created a strong impression in the public mind that the object is to allow him to escape—and that the British authorities have a hand in the matter, was made apparent by the fact that a colonial bond or post note, bearing official signatures, was first offered to the amount of the required bail.

CASE OF McLEOD.

We learn from the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser of Friday, that a large number of witnesses were in attendance at Lockport, before the grand jury, which was empanneled on Monday. In his charge to the grand jury Judge Bowen urged the propriety of committing all the testimony to writing, which of course retarded the investigation.

We copy from the Lockport Courier an address from the counsel of McLeod—not that it adds any thing of importance to our knowledge of the case, or of recent proceedings therein, but as an act of justice to the prisoner.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Lockport, Feb. 1, 1841.

The undersigned, the counsel of Alexander McLeod, now a prisoner in this county, on a charge of murder—in view of the very exaggerated and erroneous statements concerning the objects of the attempt to procure his discharge upon bail—and actuated by a belief that these statements tend, though they may not be designed, to prejudice the cause of their client before the people, from whom a jury, in case he is indicted, must be obtained, feel called upon to submit to the public an unvarnished history of the transaction.

Mr. McLeod was committed to the jail of this county about the 18th of November last. But the mittimus being void on its face, we procured the allowance of a habeus corpus, with a view to his discharge. At the hearing before Judge Bowen, the district attorney conceded the nullity of the process, but suggested, nevertheless, that the Judge had jurisdiction to hear proofs anew, and to re-commit, if probable cause should be shown. To this Mr. McLeod did not object, but desired such an examination as would satisfy all of his innocence, and save him from a harrassing repetition of arrests—he having several weeks before been arrested for the same charge, committed to bail, and finally discharged on habeas corpus. In accordance with this desire, it was suggested that he give bail to appear at the next court competent to try him, and, if indicted, to have the matter passed upon by a jury of the country. To this Mr. McLeod readily assented, and the Judge, of his own motion, fixed the bail at five thousand dollars; an amount which the undersigned then believed, and now believe, amply sufficient to ensure his appearance at trial.

The prisoner then returned into custody, there to remain until his friends in Canada should give an indemnification to some persons residing here to become his bail. Not being able to effect this, however, as soon as he expected, he determined to be again brought before the Judge, and there underwent another examination. That officer, for reasons doubtless satisfactory to himself, saw fit to remand him, unless he gave the bail before required.

He was accordingly remanded. Being closely imprisoned, he did not succeed in providing indemnification for his bail until the 27th ult., when two gentleman, residing in or near Chippoway, U. C., gave William Buel and P. C. H. Brotherson, of this county, their bond to save them harmless, and the latter entered into the necessary recognizances, and an order was made by Judge Bowen, discharging Mr. McLeod from imprisonment.

This order was not obtained until near nightfall, and owing to a rumor that there were persons about this county prepared to commit upon Mr. McLeod personal violence, in case he should be discharged on bail, and owing to an appearance of agitation among some persons here, it was deemed prudent that he should remain in the jail until the next morning, and then make his appearance in the day-time, publicly among our citizens.

Soon after, there were appearances of a state of high excitement. Bodies of men were seen moving towards the Court House. Drums beat, bugles sounded. About 9 o'clock a body of men, armed with muskets and bayonets, took possession of the hall communicating with the jail. At midnight or later, a cannon, a twelve pounder, having been placed directly opposite McLeod's cell, was repeatedly discharged, demolishing at every peal a portion of glass in the Court House windows.

While these proceedings were going on below, a meeting of several hundred men was organized in the Court room above.—About 12 o'clock at midnight, committees were appointed to wait upon the Judge, who had granted the order, and upon the gentlemen who had become McLeod's bail, and to request their immediate appearance. The Judge, we understand, deemed it most prudent for him to get out of his bed, and obey the summons. The bail did not appear. One of them being told that it had been stated by some of those among the crowd, that if he did not come, they would bring him at the point of the bayonet, and believing that this indicated a state of feeling, which might endanger his personal safety, he declined going that night, but sent word to the assembly, that if they would adjourn until the next morning, he would appear before them.

The assembly finally, at about half past one o'clock, adjourned until nine in the morning, leaving, however, a body of armed men in an about the jail the remainder of the night. In the morning accordingly, was presented the novel spectacle of an armed guard, marching with measured tread in front of the Court House door, and this too, in a time of peace, and a government of law, and with no other assignable motive, than to deprive an individual of rights, which that law through its own proper officer, had conferred.

In the meantime, an express had been dispatched to Buffalo, to advise a Mr. Wells that McLeod was about to be discharged, and to procure a writ, whereon he might again be arrested in an action for the damages arising from his alleged agency in the destruction of the Caroline. At the re-opening of the meeting in the morning, the messenger, having returned, announced that he had accomplished the object of his mission. Whereupon he exhibited to the assembly a capias, at the suit of Mr. Wells, with a Judge's order to hold McLeod to bail in the sum of seven thousand dollars. This process, after being examined by several individuals, and pronounced to be in due form, was put into the hand's of one of the sheriff's deputies, and soon afterwards served.

After the captain of the watch had formerly reported the occurrences subsequent to the adjournment, a great variety of motions and propositions were made and discussed. Among them was one, whether the suit commenced by the capias might not be settled by the plaintiff and defendant. An affirmative answer being given, it was followed by a motion, that "the bail surrender McLeod immediately." But it being suggested, and given the assembly to understand, that one of the bail had exhibited satisfactory evidences of his willingness to do so, that motion was withdrawn.—Whereupon another, "that the meeting do not adjourn until the surrender have been completed," was adopted without a dissenting voice. Various legal questions, involving the power of the Judge to recommit, of the bail to surrender, the effect of an unexecuted order for a prisoner's discharge, and the requisite formalities to make a surrender effectual, were mooted, and after the Judge and district attorney, (who had been brought up again by a fresh committee,) as well as other individuals had been heard, were satisfactorily to the meeting disposed of.

One of the bail has a large amount of property and materials, provided for the construction of the canal locks at this place, and particularly exposed to serious injury with hardly a possibility of detection. During these agitations he was repeatedly warned that his property would be injured or destroyed, unless he surrendered Mr. McLeod into custody. Feeling the force which the unparalleled state of things gave to these admonitions, he at length concluded to follow the advice of the meeting.—At about half past one o'clock in the afternoon, by a singular coincidence, the same Judge, who had been the cause of this great commotion by letting Mr. McLeod to bail, announced that a surrender in the due form of law had been made.—Whereupon the assembly formally resolved that its object was accomplished, and then adjourned.

In submitting the above detail of facts, our purpose is not to cast censure on any one. For whatever may be our opinion of these transactions, this is not the time or place to express them. Our sole object is to protect the interests of our client. We are advised that an effort is already in progress to persuade the public that the object of bailing Mr. McLeod was to avoid a trial. Knowing that no such design existed for a moment, we feel called upon to repel the charge at once, that the conviction of its truth may not settle upon the public, and operate to his prejudice on trial.

For ourselves we not only believe, but have no doubt of, Mr. McLeod's entire innocence of the charge. And it is painful to us to witness the effort now making to procure universal condemnation of him by the public press, and through that by the whole body of the people, without having heard one particle of the evidence on either side. Not content with fanning, to his prejudice, the excitement already existing on the subject of the Caroline, a portion of the press has recently been gleaning on the other side of the river for materials, (whether true or false is alike unimportant,) for farther attacks upon this defenceless individual, and that too, upon subjects having no connection whatever with the matter with which he is charged. Attacks, the only possible effect of which must be to render it more difficult than it has already become, to find among those who are to be his triers, that strict impartiality which the law guaranties to every one, no matter how slight may be the offense for which he may be arraigned.

In these circumstances, it seems to us that it is not only our right, but our duty, to appeal not to the sympathies, but to the sense of justice of our fellow citizens, and ask them, untill they shall have heard his cause, to suspend their judgment as to the guilt or innocence of this man, a foreigner, in prison, and beset so recently by a power which places itself above the law, and arraigns before it those very officers by whom that law has declared its own decree shall be pronounced. In making this appeal to American citizens,—whose pride it is to administer to all evenhanded justice, we are confident we shall not appeal in vain.

H. GARDNER,
A. C. BRADLEY.

Our Relations with England are becoming every day more complicated. The Maine Boundary question is not adjusted, and no body can tell when it will be. The arrest and imprisonment of M'Leod, on a charge of having been concerned in the destruction of the Caroline, has created a strong sensation in Canada, and has been earnestly remonstrated against by the British Minister at Washington. The recent demonstration at Lockport, on the occasion of an attempt to bail M'Leod, will increase the excitement. The search and capture of several American vessels on the coast of Africa,—some of them, it would seem, with sufficient reason, [?] has awakened a suspicion in some minds that old England is not unwilling to chafe the old sore, which, as much as any thing else, occasioned the last war. The Oregon territory is another bone of contention, which may help to make up the materials of discord to the required amount.

We confess we cannot look upon these various causes of ill-feeling, without some concern. Part of them are of long standing: and the public mind in both countries is a little out of patience concerning them. England is flushed with victory; she has fleets and armies in readiness; and knowing the unpreparedness in which we have too confidently rested, she may very possibly be disposed to settle all differences by an appeal to arms. There are weighty considerations, however, to restrain her from this course,—some of them moral perhaps, others political or pecuniary,—and here is our greatest reliance for the preservation of peace, so far as it depends upon her.—Notwithstanding some equivocal and rather irritating acts, we do not believe that she wants war, or intends to provoke it. We have also the firmest conviction that nine-tenths of the American people,—all in fact except a few thousands or tens of thousands, along the frontier, desire the continuance of peace, and deprecate an unnecessary war as above all things to be deplored. Here then is our ground of hope: neither nation wishes the friendly relations which have so long existed between them, to be exchanged for blood and carnage. But in spite of this honorable disposition on the part of the two nations as such, and the great majority of the people, it is possible for the war faction in either country, to render the preservation of peace extremely difficult. By demeaning themselves, not as good citizens ought to do, but as incendiaries and ruffians,—by holding indignation meetings, as has been done in Buffalo, and is to be attempted in other places, —and by other arts which men's evil passions know too well how to invent and employ,—they may be able to fan the flames of war to such an extent that it will require the utmost efforts of all peaceable citizens, and of the government, to prevent a fatal issue. We cannot suppose that the mass of the Buffalonians concur in the resolutions adopted by the recent meeting there; but without some countervailing effort, the resolutions of such meetings will be taken abroad as the voice of the communities in which they are put forth. We would therefore suggest the expediency of responding to every such meeting by a counter meeting in the same place. We think it will be found, even on the frontier, that the party who are in favor of peace, and the things that make for peace, so long as it can be maintained with honor, is numerous and powerful. In the country at large it is overwhelming.—Journal of Commerce.

Singular Accident and Death.—A woman named Nancy McDerrit, aged 70, residing at 49 Main street, came to her death yesterday afternoon, in the following manner:—she was engaged in hanging clothes upon a line in the back yard, when she, it is supposed, slipped and fell head first into a hogshead, which had been sunk in the ground, and dislocated her neck. The hogshead was nearly empty at the time of the accident. Mr. Oakes, the Coroner, held an inquest over the body, and the jury returned a verdict in according with the above facts.—Brooklyn News.

Maine Timber Lands—During the year embraced in the last anual report of the agent, the whole amount of sales of the undivided timber lands, was 63,294 acres, inclusive of reservations for public use, for the sum of $73,685 50. Of this sum Maine has received for her proportion, $7,489,32 in cash, and $29,353 40 in notes. Of the land lotted for settlement 15,683 acres have been sold, for $12,158 83, nearly three-fourths of which is payable in labor on the roads.

The License Question in Connecticut.—In Norwich, after a long and full investigation of the subject, the freemen at their adjourned meeting on the 27th ult., passed the following resolution by, a vote of 204 to 101:

"Whereas nearly all the pauperism in the town of Norwich are occasioned by the use of intoxicating liquors, therefore

"Resolved, That no license for their sale shall be granted during the year 1841."

In east Winsor, Manchester, Lyme, Bradford, Danbury, Monroe, Colchester and Wilmington, the sale is prohibited.

In Simsbury, a resolution was passed allowing all the privilege to sell by paying into the town treasury the sum of five dollars.

In East Hartford, Marlborough, Hebron, Durham, Bridgeport, Watertown, and Sharon, the sale is allowed.

In New Canaan, the privilege is to be confined to agents of the town, and the profits on the business put into the treasury.

In Litchfield, at the second meeting, the vote passed the previous week, imposing a duty of $10 on retailers, was rescinded by a vote of 160 to 150; and the meeting then passed a vote, 172 to 137, giving liberty to all electors to retail.

In Mansfield, the privilege of retailing can be obtained by the payment of five dollars.

In Coventry no person is permitted to sell unless he first pays into the town treasury twenty-five dollars.

In New London, at the second meeting, immediately after the organization, a motion was made, to adjourn which was carried 178 to 175. So the vote at the first meeting allowing all to sell, remains in force.—Hartford Courant.

Caughnawaga Indians.—Those Indians who describe themselves as "the Seven Nations of Caughnawaga," and who receive from the State a small annuity, have petitioned the Legislature for the payment of the principle of the annuity, amounting at 6 per cent. to $8,888. The treaty, upon which the annuity has been granted them, was made in this city, in 1796, by the agents of the State and the Indians, and lands, on condition of receiving a specified sum of money, and a small annuity forever thereafter. The annuity has been regularly paid them at Fort Covington, in Franklin County. The Comptroller, in his report to the Legislature, Jan. 18, recommends the granting of the request of the petitioners. These Indians are in a measure, mingled with the St. Regis tribes, and reside in the northern part of the State and in Lower Canada.—J. of Com.

PENNSYLVANIA.—In the house of Representatives of Pennsylvania, there are farmers 37, merchants 12, attorneys 15, gentlemen 4, carpenters 5, physicians 3, printers 2, iron masters 2, tanners 3, mechanics 2, millers 2, cabinet-maker 1, bricklayer 1, mill-wright 1, stag proprietor 1, hatter 1, shipmaster 1, coach-maker 1, founder 1, wheel-wright 1, copper-smith 1, lumber-merchant 1, brewer 1.

On Thursday of last week, Dr. John F. Baddle, charged with robbing the U. S. mail, was discharged from the Pittsburgh jail by the Hon. Judge Irwin, on bail; Dr. B. becoming bound in the sum of $70.000, and 22 of his neighbors from Uniontown in the same amount, for his appearance at Court.

The Brooklyn Daily News, says that some workmen engaged in digging away the embankment in Jackson street, near the Navy Yard dug up a quantity of human bones. Among the rest were the remains of a skeleton with iron manacles still on the wrists. It is highly probable that the mouldering bones are the remains of some of the victims of hate and oppression which, we regret to say, marked the conduct of the British during the revolutionary war.

In 1641 there existed in Massachusetts a provision 'That if any person shall wilfully and unreasonably deny any child a timely or convent marriage, or shall exercise any unnatural severity towards them, such child or children shall have liberty to complain to the authority for redress.'

A Convention is to be held in Rhode Island on the first Monday in November next, for the purpose of forming a State Constitution. Thus far she has managed to "get on" under her colonial charter.

Death in a Crowd.—The Philadelphia Chronicle states that on Friday afternoon a small boy, while drawing specie for a note at the Philadelphia Bank, was jammed against the counter by the pressing of the mass of human beings who were pouring in at every moment, and so seriously injured about the chest and abdomen that he died during the night.

At Bombay, more than 2000 of the natives have united in petitioning the government to oppose the measures of the Christian missionaries. They are alarmed for the safety of Mahommedanism and Paganism.

Abolition of Death.—A bill for reducing the number of cases in which death is inflicted as a punishment for crimes is now before the Legislature of Massachusetts, and, the Boston Journal says, will probably pass. It provides the following substitutes.

1. For treason against the state, solitary imprisonment for life.

2. Rape, the same.

3. Setting fire to a dwelling house, either by applying the fire to the house itself, or to the adjacent building—solitary for life; but if the defendant can prove that there was no person lawfully within such house thus burnt, imprisonment for life, without the solitary.

4. If death ensues to some person lawfully in the dwelling-house, the party convicted shall suffer the punishment of death.

5. The person sentenced to solitary imprisonment for life shall be considered civilly dead; the judge of probate shall have power to grant administration of his estate, in same manner as if we were dead; his property, effects, and credits, &c. shall be disposed of, in all respects, as in the case of persons dying intestate; the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the defendant, shall be divorced, ipso facto, by the sentence, without any farther act or ceremony in the law whatsoever.

6, No pardon granted to any person sentenced to solitary imprisonment for life, &c. shall restore such person to his or her conjugal rights, nor shall it restore to, or revert in such person any right to any property or estate &c. which he or she had at the time of the pronouncing of such sentence.

UNITED STATES SENATE.

The reading of the journal of the Senate was dispensed with this morning, and a message received from the House at 12 o'clock, announcing the readiness of the House to receive the Senate for the purpose of counting the official vote for President and Vice President of the United States. The Senate at once complied with the order of the House, and conducted by the Vice President, proceeded to the hall of Representatives, where seats were assigned them.

The members of the House received the Senators standing. The Vice President was conducted to the Speaker's Chair, and the Tellers,—Mr. Preston of S. C., on the part of the Senate, and Mr. Cushing of Mass., and Mr. J. W. Jones, of Va., on the part of the House—were seated at the Clerk's desk.

The Vice President briefly announced the object of the meeting, which was to count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States. The Vice President gave notice that he should avail himself of Tellers, and the work of reading the proceedings of the several Electors, commenced with the State of Maine.

Correspondence of the Albany Evening Journal.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11th, 1841.

DEAR SIR—I have only time to say to you that the Cabinet is finally arranged, as follows:—

Mr. WEBSTER, Secretary of State.
Mr. EWING, Secretary of the Treasury.
Mr. BELL, Secretary of War.
Mr. CRITTENDEN, Attorney General.
Mr. GRANGER, Post Master General.
GEORGE E. BADGER, of North Carolina; Secretary Navy.

PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The House, on motion of Mr. Holley, resumed the consideration of the resolutions offered by the select committee, in reference to the Public Lands, and of the amendment offered by Mr. L. S. Chatfield.

Mr. Holley at length and with great ability and clearness demonstrated the duty of New-York to insist upon the distribution of the proceeds of the Public Lands.

Mr. L. S. Chatfield followed on the other side.

Mr. Strong said that no one would accuse him of having occupied the time of the house for the last week. There had been a good deal of blowing off of steam, and it was probable that by this time there was a tolerable cooling off; and as it was desirable that we should get at the regular business of the Legislature he would move the previous question.

The House refused to sustain the call for the previous question. Ayes 39 Nays 41.

Mr. Culver then took the floor and addressed the House in favor of the resolutions of the Committee.

Mr. Townsend moved that the House do adjourn. Negatived—ayes 34, noes 65.

Mr. Townsend commenced to speak in opposition to the Report of the Committee, but after proceeding a few moments, gave way to

Mr. Wisner, on whose motion the House adjourned.

MARRIED,

In Rodman, Jefferson Co., on the 31st ultimo, by Eld. Wm. Greene, Mr. SILAS MAXSON, of Hounsfield, and Miss MARGARET, youngest daughter of Maj. Edward Whitford, of the former place.

DIED,

In Stoecreek, Cumberland Co., N. J., Nov 7, 1840, of Pulmonary Consumption, JUDAH H HERITAGE, in the 33d year of his age.

He made a profession of religion while in youth, and united with the Seventh Day Baptist Church, in Salem county, of which he was a member, until removed from the church militant, we trust, to that triumphant. He has left a widow, (with an orphan child,) together with a large circle of relatives and friends to "mourn their loss." COMM

Suddenly, near Shiloh, Sept ——, 1840, Miss HANNAH BONHAM, in the 62d year of her age.

She embraced religion some years before her death, and manifested her faith in Christ by obedience to the precepts of the gospel. She was a member of the church at Shiloh. COMM

PROSPECTUS

OF THE

Seventh-Day Baptist Register,

VOLUME II.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS.

The SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER will be published weekly, at De Ruyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on an Imperial sheet, at $2 per annum, in advance; $2,25, after six months; or $2,50 at the end of the year. To village subscribers, $2,25, in advance; or $2,50, at the end of the year.

It will continue to be the organ of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, and contend for the truths of the Bible, as held by them. In advocating the sentiments of this people, it will not be censorious or illiberal to those of different denominations. It will embrace in its object the whole range of christian doctrines and duties, and advocate with a becoming zeal, the various moral and benevolent enterpizes of the day. In its columns may be found things interesting and profitable to all.

The REGISTER will be what it has been, with such alterations only, as will make it more interesting to its readers. While we are grateful for the indulgence and approbation of our readers, during the first year of our labors, we would respectfully invite their co-operation, assuring them it will be our chief effort to make the REGISTER what it should be, and well worthy of their patronage.

We assure those of all denominations, who patronize us, that it will be our object to furnish them with an evangelical paper, which shall "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." In all of our labors, we shall strive to cultivate the spirit of the Gospel, and labor for the promotion of practical religion, as well as to defend its theory.

We wish our agents to renew their efforts to supply each family in our denomination with a copy of the Register.

A portion of our columns will be devoted to Literature, Science, Agriculture, and General Intelligence. Party Politics will have no place in the REGISTER.

Those who will aid us in procuring new subscribers, and in remitting money, shall receive both our gratitude and a liberal compensation

POETRY.

WATCHING AND PRAYER.

"Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation."

O watch and pray—thou canst not tell
How near thine hour may be;
Thou canst not know how soon the bell
May toll its notes for thee;
Death's thousand snares beset thy way,
Frail child of dust—O watch and pray!

Fond Youth—as yet untouch'd by care,
Does thy young pulse beat high!
Do hope's bright visions, bright and fair,
Dilate before thine eye?
Know these must change, must pass away,
Fond trusting youth—O watch and pray!

Thou Aged Man—life's wintry storm
Hath seared thy vernal bloom,
With trembling step and bending form
Thou art tottering to the tomb:
And can vain hopes lead thee astray!
Watch, weary pilgrim, watch and pray!

Ambition—stops thy panting breath:
Pride—sink thy lifted eye;
Behold the yawning gates of death
Before thee open lie.
O, hear the counsel and obey—
Pride and ambition—watch and pray!

O watch and pray the paths we tread
Lead onward to the grave;
Go to the tombs, and ask the dead,
Ye on life's stormy wave—
And they shall tell you—even they,
From their dark chambers—watch and pray.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

"And being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly; and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood, falling down to the ground.—Luke xxii. 44.

Thou "Man of Sorrow"—and for whom,
Didst thou such grief endure?
Not for thyself—thou hadst no sin—
Thou holy, just and pure.

Was it for friends? Oh no—ye heavens,
In wonder mute, give ear;
An earth, be thou astonished too,
While ye the mystery hear.

'Twas for his bitter enemies—
A guilty, fallen race;
Transgressors, doomed to endless wo,
Despisers of his grace—

That Jesus Christ, the Son of God,
Left his high throne above,
To execute the mighty plan
Of wisdom and of love.

By his obedience we are freed
From justice' heavy claims;
All the condition God requires,
Is faith in Jesus' name.

I do believe—thou Lamb of God,
Take all my sins away;
And let me never, never more,
From thee, my Savior, stray.

Make me more fervent, Lord, in prayer,
Let thine example be
Ever before me, urging me
To pray "more earnestly."

Manhasset, L. I., Dec. 12, 1840. I*.

MISCELLANEOUS.

IDEALS OF EVERY-DAY LIFE.

From 'The Dial.'

Is it yet settled what life is? Has experience long since tried and made the most of it? Shall the son plod on in the footsteps of the father? Shall the first child's blunders be fastened upon his children's children, and the experiment of the ignorant first comer be law to all them that come after? Is there no room for improvement? May not life in all its forms be lifted up, and hackneyed drudgery be inspired with an idea, an energy, a heartiness, which shall make it drudgery no longer? Must man forever continue the slave of habit, doing things for no more convincing reason than custom, and positively making life a dull thing, lest he should be guilty of finding it in his experience not quite so dull as represented (for it would be a shame to differ from all the world in such a comforting conclusion)?

Let us see then. There are certain things which fall to the lot of all humanity; certain things which man must do and bear. In what spirit does he do them and bear them? In what spirit does he work, walk abroad, talk with his neighbor, bury his dead, store himself with knowledge, betake himself to the house of worship? According to the spirit with which he does these things, will the field or shop, the school or study, the walk, the fireside circle, the church, the scene of suffering be to him dull, discouraging and degrading, or beautiful and full of ever increasing interest and hope. The Christian finds his heaven in each of these; and each of them may be enumerated among the pleasures of religion.

First, then, behold the religious man at work. The first question asked about every one is; What does he do? What is his business? And this very justly; for, until a man have something to do, he has no right to be thought of in any other relation.

It is the law of Nature that man must work. An outward necessity, if not an inward one, compels him to it. Two causes keep us always active. A restlessness of our own, an inward natural tendency to do things, or what is called an active impulse, keeps us busy always, with one or more of our faculties, creating or destroying; keeps us working for the pleasure of it, whether profitable or not. But should this inward impulse fail. Want, our stern taskmaster, threatening to cut off our supplies, still warns us from without that we must either work or die. All men work, then, somehow, either because they love to do so, or because they must. Labor affords the only means of keeping ourselves alive; and when life is secured, labor still becomes the first condition of enjoying it. Yet labor is full of hardship.—It is oftentimes degrading, narrowing and enslaving to the mind. It is so precisely as it is the labor of necessity, rather than of choice. Man's daily occupation may be a dull routine, to which he dooms himself, although a weariness; or it may be a cheerful, entertaining, instructive, and improving exercise. Most men only support themselves by labor. A wise man both supports and educates and amuses himself by it. To one it is all drudgery, to another a delight. One man by the labor of his hands is rendered coarse and ignorant, the slave of habit, slow to detect opportunities of improvement, unaware of his own resources and capabilities, blind to the beauties there are around him, uninteresting for lack of thought, with nothing to say for himself when he meets his friends, a weariness to himself and others a mere hand on the field, a mere eater and sleeper at home, to whom life is an old story altogether, slightly varied from day to day, but always growing duller, want and vexations of all sorts continually pressing upon him without, balanced by little mental faculty or cheerful occupation of the mind within. The slave of circumstances he, spending all his life in these dull arts of keeping himself alive. Another man from the same labor gains strength and dignity and intelligence, and becomes more and more a man, with every task to which he stoops. His labor is occupation not only to his hands, but also to his mind. His observation grows more active, his judgment more sound, his heart warmer and stouter; he learns to rely upon himself, he finds what resources he has within himself to draw from, he sees the significance of common sights and sounds. Nature becomes full of meaning to him, the beauty of the world increases upon him, God is manifest to him in every shifting cloud or opening flower; in the mysterious process of growth he traces analogies and correspondences with his own mental and moral growth, his soul fills with wisdom, his heart with hope and confidence, and to him life becomes more new and beautiful and interesting, the longer he lives.

So different a thing may the same work be to two men working side by side. It is the end that dignifies the means. The meanest occupation, through which shines a lofty purpose, becomes glorious. No work is low or degrading in itself. The coarsest handicraft is as honorable as the most respectable profession, when the laborer respects himself, and is working for a noble end, namely, the perfection of his own nature, or the happiness of those he loves. Let a man propose to himself the higher object for which to live, and all he does partake of the dignity of his life-plan, of his being's end and aim. Then the toil which looks immediately to bread and subsistence, looks farther too, and becomes in a higher sense part of the eternal culture of the soul; and the fruits of one's labor are not only bread to eat, but bread of life.

The religious man lives for one great object;—to perfect himself, to unite himself by purity with God, to fit himself for Heaven by cherishing within him a heavenly disposition. He has discovered that he has a soul; that his soul is himself; that it changes not with the changing things of life, but receives its discipline from them; that man does not live by bread alone, but that the most real of all things, inasmuch as they are the most enduring, are the things which are not seen; that faith and love and virtue are the sources of his life, and that he realizes nothing, except he lay fast hold upon them. For these, then, he lives. And, whatever may be his trade, to whatever work, impelled by physical necessity, or the habits of his neighborhood, he turns his hand, this purpose of his life appears in it. He extracts a moral lesson, a lesson of endurance or of perseverance, for himself, or a new evidence of God and of his own immortal destiny, from every day's hard task. He builds up not only his fortune, but himself by it; he stores not only his garners, but his mind. As he drops the seeds into the earth, all-instructive Nature having caught his eye, drops other seeds, that bear fruit more than once, into the soul. As he clears the ground of weeds, with unseen hand the while he pulls away the weeds of prejudice and wrong desire that are growing up to choke the plants of Paradise within the garden of the heart. The sunshine on his fertile fields looks doubly clear to him, because of the sunshine of conscience in his breast. And, as he reaps his golden hopes and golden approbation in the field which he is tilling for his God.

Drudgery is one thing. True labor is another. No man has any right to be a drudge; no man was ever made for that. If true to himself, he cannot but be something more. The seeds of something more are in him. In his very nature there wait faculties to be unfolded, which he has no right whatever to neglect, facultiees religious, moral, intellectual, in exercising which he lifts himself above the sense of want, above the power of fear, of fortune, or of death, feels his immortality, become himself, what God intended him to be.—In any kind of business or labor he can find a sphere for the exercise of these, his greatest faculties; if he cannot, he is bound to labor somewhere else. No one has a right to live, merely to "get a living." And this is what is meant by drudgery. Drudgery is not confined to the labor of the hands, not to any one class of occupations. There are intellectual and fashionable drudges. And there are hard-working, humble laborers, more free, more dignified and manly, in all they do, or look, or think, than any who look down upon them. Some soil their hands with the earth; others soil their minds indelibly by the pride and vanity which keeps their hands so delicate. The true man 'stoops to conquer.' The vain man wears his head aloft, while the rock is wasting from under his feet, and the glow of disinterested activity, the beauty on which he prides himself, fades from his face.

The Christian makes his business of whatever sort, contribute equally to his acquisition of knowledge, to his amusement, to the trial of his faith, the growth of his affections, no less than to his health and his support. Into all his work he carries thought. He makes it a science; and so saves time for other things, while he makes his labor interesting, not the same old story every day, but full of new and valuable suggestions to his mind. To his curious mind the work of his hands becomes a practical illustration of principles; and so the thorough-going doer becomes the healthy thinker. He thinks for whom and what he labors, and his faith and affections are increased. Haply, too, his imagination, his sense of beauty, become quickened. Daily conversant with Nature, the glorious scene of his labors, a quiet enthusiam kindles in the heart of the farmer, and a new source of happiness is unlocked to him. An intelligent farmer is certainly the happiest of men. His daily toil is reconcilable with every kind of higher culture. He may make himself in every sense a man. He need not be a mere hand. He may trace out the laws of Nature, and let the sight of principles inspire him. He may be a philosopher on the field. He may cultivate a sympathy for all men, while every thing around him may fill him with sweet gratitude to God. The all-surrounding beauty may take possession of his soul, till in his heart unconsciously he becomes a poet. To ensure this, it only needs a religious spirit, a spirit of constant self-improvement. For religion unlocks all the fountains of the soul, and puts a man gradualy in possession of all his powers. He first finds out what he is and what is in him, when he devotes himself to God. If he is truly religious, he will grow intelligent, free and happy; and life to him will never lose its interest; rest will not be idleness; toil will not be drudgery. But while he bends to his work, he will be seeking truth, loving his neighbor, and communing with his God.

In labor, too, the Christian feels a sweet remuneration, when he makes himself independent of his comforts; and so is he both happy in himself without them, enjoying the triumph of his own spirit; and he turns to them with keener zest. We know not the sweetness of any pleasure, until we can forego it; we appreciate none of our advantages until we cease to depend upon them. All things become more beautiful to us, when we find we can do without them. There can be no rest where there has been no labor. There is no sabbath to him, who has not had his week of work. D.

BROTHER JONATHAN'S WIFE'S ADVICE TO HER DAUGHTER.

ON THE DAY OF HER MARRIGGE.

Now, Polly, as you are about to leave us, a few words seem appropriate to the occasion. Although I regret the separation, yet I am pleased that your prospects are good. You must not think that all before you are Elysian fields. Toil care and trouble, are the companions of frail human nature. Old connexions will be dissolved by distance, time and death. New ones are formed. Every thing pertainig to this life is on the change.

A well cultivated mind united with a pleasant, easy disposition, is the greatest accomplishment in a lady. I have endeavored from the first to the present time to bring you up in such a manner as to form you for future usefulness in society. Woman was never made merely to see and be seen; but to fill an important space in the great chain in nature, planned and formed by the Almighty Parent of the Universe. You have been educated in habits of industry, frugality, economy and neatness, and in these you have not disappointed me.

It is for the man to provide, and for the wife to care and see that every thing within her circle of movement, is done in order and season; therefore let method and order be considered important. A place for every thing and every thing in time, are good family mottos.

A thorough knowledge of every kind of business appropriate to the kitchen, is indispensable, for without such knowledge a lady is incapable of the management of her own business, and is liable to imposition by her servants every day.—But in those things you have been instructed.

You will be mistress of your house, and observe the rules in which you have been educated. You will endeavor above all things to make your fireside the most agreeable place for the man of your choice. Pleasantry and a happy disposition will ever be considered necessary to this important end—but a foolish fondness is disgusting to all. Let reason and common sense ever guide—these, aided by a pleasant, friendly disposition render life happy; and without these it is not desirable. Remember your cousin Eliza. She married with the highest prospects; but, from a petulant, peevish, complaining disposition and negligence, every thing went wrong and her home became a place of disquietude to her husband. To avoid this, he sought a place to pass away vacant time, where, associated with those more wicked than himself, he contracted the habit of intemperance, and all was lost—and poor Eliza was thrown on the charity of her friends.

Be pleasant and obliging to your neighbors—ready to grant assistance when necessary. Be careful of their characters, and do not readily believe an ill report. Throw the mantle of charity over their failings, knowing that we are human, and liable to err. Abhor a tatler, and give no place to the reports of such. However strong a provocation may be, never contend for the last word.

Let your Bible show that it is used. Give no place to novels in your library. Let history, biography and travels, be read, when time and opportunity admit—without interfering with the important duties of the family. Be not ignorant of the events of the time being, therefore read some journal of the day.

As to friends who may call on you—never be confused or in a hurry; treat them with hospitality and politeness, and endeavor to make them happy in their own way. Never tease them to do this or that which they do not prefer. True politeness consists in an easy and pleasant deportment, and making our friends easy, and permitting them to enjoy themselves in that way which is most pleasing to them.

Speak with deliberation. The other sex tell us that "the female tongue is never tired;" be it so: let it be regulated by reason.

At the close of the week, if possible, let all your work, for the time be done; so that on Sunday you may improve your time in such a manner as will be appropriate to the day, and never, extraordinaries excepted, let your seat be vacant at church.

As to dress; decency is becoming to all; but extravagance opens a door to want; follow the fashion of the day as far as decency and good sense will approve but avoid singularity. Be not troubled for what you have not; be thankful for, and take care of what you have. A Leghorn hat loaded with flowers, will not cure the head-ache, nor a gold watch prevent the consumption.—American Farmer.

THE FRUITS OF OWENISM.

I can tell you where it has been tried; and I can tell you the effects it has produced. In the year 1791, the French having become enlightened, as they thought, with the new light of philosophy, set to work to reform the existing order of things. Their principles were exactly similar to those of the English socialists; for there is nothing new in these notions, nor is there any thing easier to these philosophic cooks than to set out the old dish with a new name; the socialists here call it 'community,' the French philosophers called it 'equality;' and for people to have all things 'common' and all things 'equal' and very kindred notions. Like the modern socialists, they set out with a great deal of fair-sounding oratory about universal philanthropy, benevolence, brotherly love, and hatred of tyranny; and a great deal of learned talk about following 'nature,' obeying 'philosophy,' and preserving the 'rights of man;' insomuch that at first they deceived even some of the shrewdest and most acute statesmen of that day, who felt disposed to treat the 'new light' as something which should throw every thing else into the shade. Well, they obtained sufficient power actually to do what the English socialists thus far have only been able to talk about; for their plans were precisely the same; they overturned the existing laws and government; they abolished Christianity, and set aside the worship of the Christian's God, and denied his existence, just as the modern socialist designs; they abolished also the law of marriage, and all the rights of private property, and all the different ranks and distinctions of society; and by all these different arts, being precisely those which the socialists now propose, we see plainly, that these principles and those of the present socialists are exactly alike. Here, then, there was a fair trial of their principles; they had it all their own way, they modelled the whole country to their own mind; there was nothing else to influence or obstruct their system. And what was its effect? Did their 'equality' produce 'an earthly paradise,' 'the only salvation for men,' as we are told the 'community' will prove? They, first of all, murdered such numbers of persons, who had formerly been men of rank and fortune, that they were forced to bring into use a beheading machine, called the guillotine, which draws up and falls down like a sash window, because the old method of despatching their victims was not quick enough for them; they then murdered their king and queen; and after this they fell to quarreling among themselves, and butchering each other to such an incredible extent, that their streets absolutely flowed with blood, and they were obliged to make a new and additional drain to carry off its torrents! one party gained the upper hand one day and were thrust down by another on the morrow, and each, as they were in power, revenged themselves by shedding the blood of their enemies like water. So dreadful was their state that it was called "THE REGION OF TERROR," and is known by that name in history. The victims were dragged to execution by scores; in some cities they destroyed them by hundreds, men, women, and children, by vollies of grape-shot; in others, they were in equal numbers enclosed in the hulls of ships and scattered and sunk in the rivers. A writer of the history of that period, to express the state to which their principles of 'philosophy' and 'reason' had brought them says, 'We have said enough to show that men's blood seems to have been converted into poison, and their hearts into stone by the practices in which they were daily engaged.' And at last wearied out with slaughter and confusion, they threw themselves under the power of a military tyrant, Buonaparte, who ruled them with a rod of iron, drained off the best and finest of their young men to supply his armies, and by his continued wars destroyed such thousands of his fellow-creatures, and so perpetually disturbed the peace of the world, that at length the countries of Europe rose up as one man, and hunted and crushed him, as men destroy noxious reptiles or wild beasts out of their neighborhood, and restored something like peace and order again, after unexampled sufferings and bloodshed of more than twenty years' continuance.

SYMPATHY IN RELIGION.

There are no sympathies so deep on any other subject of religion. The sympathies of the human heart are never met and satisfied, till they are met by religion. The hopes, the fears, the joys of man never find a corresponding object till he looks away from time and is filled with the hope of heaven. That aged man once full of hope in the cheerful visions of early life, now sits down and weeps, that in all life's ambition, its honors, and its joys, he has never realized what he anticipated. The big tear rolls down his cheek, worn with age and care, when he remembers how the world has flattered and betrayed him! and there he sits at the close of life on the borders of a boundless ocean, waiting to be borne to some land of bliss which he has never yet found. He has had sympathies, hopes, fears, and anticipations, which have never been satisfied by this world, which nothing now can satisfy, until the eye is fixed on immortality, and he can look to a heaven of boundless glory as his home. That family so tender, so amiable, so lovely, so united in sorrows and in joys, has sympathetic emotions which can never be met but by the united hope of heaven. Never will they know the richness of pure attachment to each other until they are united in the service of God, and can look forward to the same heaven as their home. Never will their sorrows produce, or their joys be followed with the blessings which they should convey, until all the sympathies are sanctified by the gospel of peace, and parents and children alike hope to strike together the harp of praise in heaven. So society every where is full of anticipations, sympathies, and hopes, that are never fully met until a tide of religious feeling flows over the community, uniting many hearts simultaneously in the hope of heaven.—National Preacher.

JEWS IN SYRIA.—The Jews in Syria are numerous, the great majority of them are poor; but in some of the larger towns they are the most opulent of the inhabitants. This is the case at Damascus and Aleppo, where many of the consuls belong to the Hebrew nation, living in considerable splendor, and exercising very great influence. I visited some of the Jewish families, and found the females adorned with a profusion of diamonds, and surrounded by the delicacies and luxuries of the highest orders of society. The wealthiest among them are bankers and money-lenders, and the very high rate of interest which is paid soon augments the capital employed, and as expenditure is seldom on a large scale, the accumulation of property becomes rapid.—Bowring.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Medicines! Medicines!!

TO FAMILIES.

S. D. DELLAY, would call the attention of families to some of the most speedy and effectual remedies which have ever before been offered to the public; for the sale of which he has lately been appointed sole agent of this place—among which may be found

G. A. BARTHOLICK & Co's
MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser; and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever [illegible] may guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an infinite amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given away to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.

THE THREEFOLD CORD.

BY A MISSIONARY IN BURMAH.

"A threefold cord is not quickly broken." Eccles. iv. 12.

DEAR BROTHER,—You hope that you have repented of sin, and put your trust in the Lord Jesus Christ. You desire, above all things, to grow in grace, and attain the perfect love and enjoyment of God. But you find yourself perplexed about the way, amidst the various directions of various classes of the Christian world; and you ask for advice, plain to the understanding, and convincing to the heart. I present you therefore, with the threefold cord. Lay hold of it with the hand of faith, and be assured, that with the blessing of the divine Spirit, it will draw thy soul to God and heaven.

The first is the cord of Secret Prayer.—Without this, the others have no strength. Secret prayer is commonly considered a duty, which must be performed every morning and evening, in order to keep a conscience void of offense. But do not entertain an opinion so defective. Consider secret prayer as one of the great works of thy life. Arrange thy affairs so that thou canst leisurely devote some time every day, not merely to devotional exercises, but to the very act of secret prayer and communion with God. Withdraw from business and company, and lift up thy soul in private retirement. Begin the day, by rising after midnight, and devoting some time, amid silence, and darkness, to this sacred work. Be resolute in this course. Make all practicable sacrifices to maintain it. Consider that thy time is short, and that business and company must not be allowed to rob thee of thy God At least, remember morning, noon, and evening seasons, and especially the season after midnight, which, believe me, thou wilt find the most precious and profitable of all, not only refreshing to thy soul at the time, but extending a salutary influence to all the other seasons of prayer, and even rendering thy body more active and efficient through the day.

Dost thou ask how to pray? There is One, who is able and willing to teach thee. Whenever thou intendeth to pray, draw towards Calvary; kneel at the foot of the mount; lift up thine eyes tremblingly and in tears, to thine incarnate God and Savior dying on the cross; confess that thou art the guilty cause; implore his forgiveness, and believe that the Holy Spirit will quickly come and teach thee how to pray.

The second is the cord of Self-denial,—rough, indeed, to the hand of sense, and so abused in the Papal Church, that Protestants have become afraid of it, and thrown it away. But lay hold with the hand of faith. It is one of the three; and without it, the other two, although they may do some service, will not have firmness and consistency.

Every faculty of the mind and body is strengthened and improved by use,—weakened and impaired by disuse. It is needless to produce proofs or illustrations; they are to be met with in every day's experience. Self-love, or the desire of self-gratification, in the enjoyment of the riches, the honors, and the pleasures of this world, is the ruling principle, though mortally wounded, still lives. And the more it is indulged, the stronger it becomes. But,

"The love of God flows just as much,
As that of ebbing self subsides;
Our hearts, their scantiness is such,
Cannot sustain two rival tides.
Both cannot govern in one soul;
Then let self-love be dispossess'd;
The love of God deserves the whole,
Nor will she dwell with such a guest."

And the way to dispossess self-love is to cease indulging it; to regard and treat self as an enemy, a vicious animal, whose propensities are to be thwarted, indulgences curtailed, as far as can be done, consistent with his utmost serviceableness; or, in the language of Scripture, deny thyself, and take up the cross daily; keep under thy body, and bring it into subjection; mortify thy members, which are upon the earth; cease from loving the world and the things of the world.

Alas for those, whose days are spent in pampering their bodies, under the idea of preserving their life and health; who toil to lay up treasures upon earth, under the idea of providing for their children; who conform to the world, under the idea of avoiding pernicious singularity; who use every means to maintain their character, and extend their reputation, under the idea of gaining more influence, and thereby capacity for serving the cause? How can such enter the kingdom of heaven? "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth unto life; and few there be that find it." Wouldst thou, my brother, belong to the happy few? Wouldst thou subdue that inordinate self-love, which has hitherto shut out the spirit of God from thy heart, & impeded thy progress in the heavenly way? Adopt a course of daily, habitual self-denial; be content with plain diet; keep thy body under. Adorn thy person in modest apparel; discard all finery; retain the garb and costume of thy country, and respect those national usages, which are common to the high and low, the rich and the poor, unless there be some special reason for a change. Cut off the supplies of vanity and pride; suffer inconveniences, yea, prefer them even to slothful ease and carnal indulgence. Turn away thine eyes from the pleasant sights, and thine eyes from the pleasant sounds of this vain world. Engage in no conversation, read no book, that interrupts thy communion with God. Give to the poor, especially those who are in spiritual poverty. As to character, that last idol and most deadly tyrant of poor fallen man, follow the advice of Leighton: "Choose always to the best of thy skill, what is most to God's honor, and most like unto Christ and his example, and most profitable to thy neighbor." "Be content to be unknown, or being known to be contemned and despised of all men, yet without thy faults and deservings."

Finally, renounce all terms with this world, which lieth in the wicked one; avoid as much as possible, the contaminating touch of sinful things; and by shutting the avenues of thy soul against the solicitations of the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, endeavor to awaken that deadly and tremendous influence, which the world has gained over thee, and of which thou art scarcely suspicious. And when thou hast done all thou canst, remember that on account of the hesitation, with which thou didst admit the light, the reluctance with which thou didst enter on thy duty; the carnal reasonings which at every step thou hast indulged; the readiness which thou hast sometimes felt to give up the effort; and the unfaithfulness, which has marred—the sin which has polluted—thy best performances, thou deservest nothing but hell.

Art thou ready, on reading these pages, to say in despair, Alas, for me! bound by a thousand chains, and loaded with a thousand burdens, how can I ever live a life of self-denial? Remember that there is one able and willing to help thee. It is commonly the case with young converts, that the Holy Spirit draws them towards the path of self-denial. We can all, perhaps, remember the time, when we had such a sense of our unworthiness, that we were desirous of denying ourselves of every indulgence; when we had such a sense of the danger of temptation, and the dreadful power of sin, that we were willing to renounce all things, in order to live a holy life. But we were frightened by the phantoms of Romish austerities, self-inflicted mortifications, over-much righteousness, and religious enthusiasm; we shut our eyes to the dawning light, turned away our ears from the heavenly call, and we have been swept away with the tide.

Return, O mistaken soul, to thy first love. God is waiting to be gracious. Dost thou not feel a latent impulse, as thou readest these lines? a secret conviction that this is the truth? a desire to comply? Yield thyself to the heavenly influence. Make an immediate beginning. Wait not, till thou seest the whole path clearly illuminated; expect not meridian brightness, while thy sun is yet struggling with the dark, malignant vapors, which rest on thy earthly horizon, the confines of a still darker world.—The path of self-denial is, to carnal eyes, a veiled path, a mystery of the divine kingdom. While thou hesitates at the first sacrifice required, expect no further admonition, no further light. But if thou wilt do what thy hands find to do this hour; if thou wilt, in childlike simplicity and humble obedience, take the first step, thou shalt see the second, which now thou seest not; and as thou advancest, thou shalt find the path open most wonderfully and delightfully before thee; thou shalt find it easy to follow thy dear Lord and Savior, bearing the cross; and shalt soon be enabled to say,

"Sweet is the cross above all sweets,
To souls enamor'd with thy smiles."

The third is the cord of Doing Good.—This imparts beauty and utility to the rest. It is written of the Lord Jesus, that he went about doing good. Art thou his disciple? Imitate his example. DO GOOD. Let this be thy motto. Do all the good in thy power—of every sort—and to every person.—Regard every human being as thine own brother; look with love on every one thou meetest, and hope that he will be thy loving and beloved companion, in the bright world above. Rejoice in every opportunity of doing him any good, either of a temporal or spiritual kind. Comfort him in trouble; relieve his wants, instruct his ignorance; enlighten his darkness; warn him of his danger; show him the way of salvation: persuade and constrain him to become thy fellow-traveller, in that blessed way. Follow him in all offices of kindness and love, even as thou wouldst be pleased to have another do to thee. Bear with all his infirmities. Be not weary in well-doing. Remember that thy Savior bore long and is still bearing with thee, beyond all conception, and covering thy pollution with his own blood that the wrath of God may not strike thee. And when he forgives thine immense debt, canst thou not bear with thy fellow debtor?

Do good to the Lord, thy Savior. Is he far beyond thy reach? True, he reigns on high; but still he lives in all his members. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." As thou hast, therefore, opportunity, do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith. As a true follower of Christ, seek not thine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved. Since Christ has suffered, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life; extend thy good wishes to earth's remotest bounds; and wherever a human being exists, let thy prayers and thine efforts combine to bring down eternal blessings on his soul. Let the members of the household of faith, whatever be their language, country or denomination, share in thy warmest love. Regard each one as a part of thine own dear Savior; and be as happy to serve him as to serve thy Lord himself. Remember that, notwithstanding present imperfections, ye are hastening to be united to one another and to God, in a manner most ineffable, that the bosom of infinite love is even now opening to receive you all, and that ye will bathe together, for endless ages, in the "sea of life and love unknown, without a bottom or a shore."

By practising self-denial thou weakenest the debasing principle of inordinate self-love; and by doing good thou cherishest and strengthenest the heavenly principle of benevolence. Let these exercises, then, quickened and sanctified by secret prayer, be the regular work of each day of your life.

Thus I present thee, my brother, with the three-fold cord,—the three grand means of growing in grace—of gaining the victory over the world, the flesh, and the devil—of drawing thy soul from earth to heaven.—Means, I say, for I speak not now of faith, the living operative principle within,—the hand with which thou must lay hold of the three-fold cord. Wilt thou accept my present? Art thou inclined to lay hold? Cherish the heaven-born inclination. It is worth more to thee than all the treasures of the earth. Go into thy place of prayer, stretch out the hand of faith, and implore the Holy Spirit, who is even now hovering over thee to lay hold for life. Dost thou hesitate? O, my brother, do not, I beseech thee. O do not grieve the Holy Spirit.—Renounce the world, renounce thyself, and flee into the Savior's arms, which are open to receive and embrace thee. Angels will rejoice over thy second conversion, as they did over thy first. Thou wilt soon find such sweetness as thou hast never yet conceived. Thou wilt begin to live in a new world, to breathe a new atmosphere, and to behold the light of heaven shining around thee; and thou wilt begin to love the Lord thy God in a new manner, when he is "pacified towards thee, for all that thou hast done."

POSTSCRIPT.

My brother, in taking leave of thee, the thought occurs, that notwithstanding thy prevailing hope, thou may yet have fearful doubts about thy spiritual state, and mayest think, that thou hast not yet the hand of faith, with which to lay hold of what I send thee. And I fancy I hear thee cry, What shall I do? Art thou sensible of thy maimed state? Then there is some hope. Do what thou canst: stretch out what thou hast, however maimed or bewildered, and try to lay hold. Try to pray in faith, to practice self-denial, and to do good. And be assured that thou wilt quickly find the hand of faith where thou thoughtest it was not. There is one near thee. He who gave sight to blind Bartimeus, and said to the deaf, Be opened; He, who heareth the young ravens when they cry, and much more, the cry of man, the dearest of all his creatures; he who is ever moved with the yearnings of a tender parent, when he sees, at a distance, his prodigal son, returning famished and forlorn, from the far country.

RELIGIOUS SINCERITY.

The greatest, the indispensable proof of sincerity, that before which all others fade and shrink away, and without which, indeed, not one can be an admissible evidence, is the conformity of our lives to our principles. Other evidences may deceive us—but this never can; others may be misinterpreted—but this bears a superscription legible to men and angels: yea, current in the treasury of Heaven itself. The eloquence of an angel, and the zeal of an apostle, if he reasoned with the force of Paul, and felt with the energy of John, could not bring such conviction of the sincerity of our religion, as a life corresponding to its dictates. If this exists, no other can be wanting—if this be defective, no other can be substituted for it. To this the Scriptures refer—to this the apostles call us—this Christ himself erects, as at once the standard and the test of all sincerity. "Not they who say unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven," but those that do the will of his Father.—To this test let us bring our lives and our consciences, and the former will be purified, and the latter enlightened. By studious and conscientious perusal of the scriptures, by the effectual prayer of faith, by a solemn vigilance, a godly jealousy over ourselves, in effecting a conformity between truths we profess, and the practice we exhibit, shall we be enabled to discover our sincerity; and God grant that the trial may justify our hopes, and establish our security! We cannot be mistaken either in the means or the end of our inquiries, if they are pursued with zeal, with seriousness; ay, if we are but earnest in the pursuit.—Oh! then, wake—wake to the inquiry—the destination of an immortal soul, the interests of eternity hang on it—and do ye yet pause, and do ye yet delay? Delay it no longer; press on your souls the tremendous question; urge it in silence and retirement; "commune with your heart, and in your chamber"—press it on yourselves with that solemnity which becomes beings whose salvation waits on the answer, whose immortal destination trembles between the words yes or no. Oh! seek not to deceive yourselves; it is only yourselves that can be deceived; God cannot, nor even your fellow creatures: a death-bed may unmask the vain professor—eternity must. Seek not to deceive yourselves; you alone will be the sufferers by the deception, and none will be enriched but the enemy of souls. Miserable deception! when we strain all the powers of a sophisticated mind to defraud us of everlasting happiness. I do not speak of wilful deliberate hypocrisy—the sin, I believe, of few—I speak of habitual self-deception—the sin, I fear, of millions—millions, who rise up and lie down under the dreadful illusion that they are sincere in the profession of the gospel; while their actions, their habits, their tempers, and their language, are every hour setting its precepts and its spirit at defiance. Oh! let them err no longer: let them open their Bible; and, when they read one page of it, let them read one page of their own lives, and pronounce where is the conformity, where is the consistency? Where, then, is the sincerity? In that book, written by the finger of God, they will read, "if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." And have we, then, that spirit? Its fruits are easily known—are they visible in our lives? In that book they will read, that they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts thereof. Have we done so? Let me not be misunderstood: perfection is the dream of the enthusiast, sincerity is the test of the Christian. The fanatic may think he has subdued all the evils of nature: the Christian will feel that he is aiming at the conquest—that he is, if not always a conqueror, at least always contending, and that he shall at last be triumphant, not in his own strength, but in that which is promised him from above, and which shall be given him. Oh! one such question, solemnly put, is sufficient to tear off the mask, which we varnish with such miserable art, and show us in the same moment, what we are and what we must be. How shall we abide this examination?—We must undergo it either in time or eternity, we must "judge ourselves," or we must be "judged of the Lord." If, on the trial, our "hearts condemn us not, we have confidence towards God;" if they do—still there is hope—hope for the penitent—hope for him who humbles himself before God: and who, henceforth taking the word of everlasting life for his own guide, and the conscientious examination of his own acts for the proof of his sincerity, shall humbly and faithfully endeavor to produce that conformity between them which is the only test that will be admitted here or hereafter. If our pretensions are hollow, even here men will deride us—and the Son of God will deny us hereafter; if you are sincere, if the "root of the matter is in you"—the hope and the promise are yours. Oh, soldier and servant of Jesus Christ! the contest may be sharp, but the victory is certain.—Rev. Dr. Maturin.

HOW FAR IS IT TO CANAAN?

"How far is it to Canaan?" asks the doubting Christian, "for I am sadly afraid I shall never get there. My sins are a heavy burden to me, and I long to be rid of them, if, indeed there is hope for such a one as I."

Go on poor doubting Christien, take fresh courage and quicken thy step. Canaan is not so far off but thou shalt reach it at last, and if thou couldst know how willing the Savior of sinners is to receive thee, it would shed a sunbeam on thy dejected countenance. I have a word of comfort for thee, a cordial for thy heart.

"I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins."

"How far is it to Canaan?" asks the triumphant Christian, "for I long to be at home. I know my Redeemer liveth, and 'because he lives, I shall live also.' My soul has me like the chariots of Aminadab,' and I am impatient to behold him face to face!"

Go forward, triumphant Christian, with the glorious ring of assurance upon thy finger! Cast not away thy confidence, which hath 'great recompense of reward;' but stay; I have a word for thee, also, which may be useful. Ponder it in thy heart:

"Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

"How far is it to Canaan?" inquires the afflicted Christian, "for I have lain a long while upon the bed of suffering. 'Wearisome nights are appointed me.' I am full of tossing to and fro unto the dawning day 'Oh that I had wings like a dove; for then I would fly away, and be at rest.'"

Be of good cheer, afflicted Christian!—The heavier the cross, the more pleasant will be the crown. If we suffer with Christ, we shall be glorified with Christ.—I have a word to refresh the fainting soul and will now give it thee."

"The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."

"How far is it to Canaan?" asks the persecuted Christian; "for I am an outcast from my family, a stranger upon earth; like my Lord, 'I am despised and rejected of men. 'Many are they that rise up against me, and they that hate me with cruel hatred.'"

Hold on thy way, persecuted Christian; it is a safe one, and a blessed one, yea, the one thy Redeemer trod before thee. Dost thou want a word of consolation? I will give it thee, lay it up in thy bosom:

"Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil for the Son of man's sake. Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy; for behold, your reward is great in heaven."

"How far is it to Canaan?" sighs the bereaved Christian, "for I am a lonely and desolate pilgrim. All that were dear to me upon earth are taken away. My tears have been my meat day and night, and my soul yearns for the land where there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying."

Pass on, bereaved Christian, the more lonely thy pilgrimage, the sweeter thy reception at the end. The Lord whom thou seekest, hath a special care and pity for his desolate ones. Take these words with thee, and they may refresh thy spirit. For even though they may be desolate—

"The redeemed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion;—and everlasting joy shall be upon their head; they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away."

"How far is it to Canaan?" asks the dying Christian, "'for the swellings of Jordan are risen about my soul.' Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, 'and the terrors of death are fallen upon.' Alas! I sink in deep waters, 'I shall not see the land that flows with milk and honey.'"

Look up, poor dying christian; for yonder is the bright and morning star; thy night is far spent, and the day is at hand. Is thine arm too feeble to be put forth for the Book of God, then I must even hold it up before thine eyes. Look on these words, and let neither flood nor flame affright thee; be of good courage, for they are the words of him who has promised when flesh and heart fail, to be the strength of thy heart, and thy portion forever.

"When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.—For I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel thy Savior."—S. S. Journal.

From the New York Evangelist.

"MY FATHER DOES NOT PRAY."

Parents who are ignorant of the power of godliness, and are living in the neglect of prayer, must be exerting a baneful influence upon the souls of their children.—Such parents, if they are moral, and show some respect for religion, flatter themselves often, that they are training up their offspring in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. It is a great mistake. They are infusing into these young minds, the poison of unbelief and enmity to God.

I knew a godly mother, who had taught her children to pray. Every evening when they retired to rest, and every morning when they arose, they were accustomed, according to the mother's instructions, to bow their knees in prayer. One night, as James, a boy about five year's old, was making preparations to retire, he came to his mother, and said, "Mother, I don't want to pray any more." The mother was surprised and grieved. She had fondly hoped her children had learned something of the value of prayer. She had so often, so feelingly, and so devoutly represented to them the benefit of private devotion, and the guilt and danger of neglecting it, that she flattered herself they loved to pray.—She burst into tears as little James uttered this language. "My dear child," said she, "I am sorry to hear you say so. I have said a great deal to you about praying, and I thought you was a good boy, and loved to mind your parents, and loved to pray.—Now you tell me, you 'don't want to pray any more.' What does this mean, James? why do you wish to leave off prayer?"—"My mother," said he, with all the simplicity and artlessness of a child, "my father does not pray."

Such is the influence upon the young and tender mind, of ungodly prayerless parents. While they are living without God, their children are watching them, and imitating their example. It is not strange. It would be remarkable, if it were otherwise. Reader! are you the head of a family, and yet have you no family altar? Reflect, I entreat you, upon the certain results of your ungodly course. God has entrusted to you immortal minds, and bid you train them up for himself and for heaven. On you the responsibility must rest. You cannot throw it off. Will you train them up for God and heaven? Oh, then, go to Christ and learn of him. You will never be qualified to guide your children heavenward, till you have yourselves learned the way. And remember, that while you delay, the eyes of your children are upon you—They have confidence in you, and (solemn and awful the thought!) you may be guiding them in the way that leads down to the chambers of death! Your neglect of prayer is noticed by them, and they will not be slow in arriving at the conclusion, that if you do not value prayer, it has no value. Then, as you desire the everlasting well-being of your children, go broken-hearted and penitent to the Savior, and learn of him.

A REFLECTION.—"When I look upon the tombs of the great," said Addison, "every emotion of envy dies in me. When I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out. When I meet with grief of the parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion.—When I see the tomb of the parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow.—When I see kings lying by those who deposed them; when I see rival wits placed side by side; or holy men, that divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions, factions, and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates of the tombs, of some that died as yesterday, and some of six hundred years ago, I consider that great day when we shall all of us be contemporaries, and make our appearance together.

EVIDENCE OF GRACE.—The going forth of the soul by faith unto Christ as the anointed of the Lord, sent and sealed by the Father to undertake the great work of man's redemption, is a sure evidence of regeneration.—Cote.

LITERATURE.

PATIENT APPLICATION NECESSARY TO INTELLECTUAL ATTAINMENTS.

The heights of science are steep, and to ascend them we must, like the mountaineer, be strong and sturdy. Without a habit of patient application, no mind has ever attained decided greatness in any walk.—Such has been the progress of knowledge, that no genius, however vigorous, can at once leap to the advance. Every new step onward (for I speak not of eccentricities to the right or left, which astonish the vulgar, and by none but them are mistaken for originality,) is more difficult than the last. We may easily become notorious by starting errors, but to excel in the one path of truth, which has been, and is trodden by so many master spirits, nay, to follow them, even at a long interval, requires not any boldness, but endurance. That endurance cannot come except from a habit of labor early acquired and steadily maintained.—Posse tollere taurum qui vitulum sustulerit. It was by beginning when a boy, to carry a suckling heifer, that the shoulders of Milo, the Crotonian, became strong enough to carry an ox. The Olympic Athlete was crowned, not for that day's victory, but for seven long years of determined, constant training, which enabled him to win it.—Thus must the mind be disciplined.

It has passed into a proverb, that precocious youth rarely makes an able manhood; and some physiologists will say, that it is because the brain is early overwrought; but, generally, the true reason may be found in the want of this habit of labor. Facility of memory and quickness of perception render the lad's tasks easy, and allow him much hurtful leisure for relaxing indulgences; while the growth of indolence is less marked from the readiness with which he excels his slower companions; nay, often his over-anxious Mamma rather dissuades her prodigy from study, lest like the self-burning tree of Guinea he should be consumed by the fire of his own genius, and the world lose the advantage of his mature greatness by such a melancholy instance of spontaneous combustion. Naturally the idol of friends and teachers, he becomes presumptuous upon his powers, and contemns the necessity of steady exertion, until the severer trials of active life come upon him, and then it is too late to remedy the fatal neglect. The very dunce of his class, if industrious and persevering, will leave him far behind in respectable usefulness. It is in this way, that early talent, given by God as a blessing, is not unfrequently made a curse. There have been few great men who did not give promise of greatness in childhood. Melancthon at twenty-one was in Greek, the master of Luther, then a Doctor of Divinity. Luther himself was noted for his youthful learning; and yet we do not find that either Melancthon, or Luther, or Erasmus (most precocious of the three,) was made an idiot by an overwrought brain. It were most unkind to smile at the fears of fond parents; but they may rest assured, that there is less danger to their young Gracchi, to be apprehended from laborious reading, than from surfeits upon sweetmeats and compliments, or a dandyism in premature long coats and Chesnut Street exhibitions.

Besides, without labor, we cannot acquire the power of abstraction, so necessary to withdraw the inquirer from the temptation of present pleasures, the bias of prejudice, the corruption of selfish interest, and the many distracting impertinences of the surrounding world. To know truth aright, we must be alone and candid with it as the Christian with his God. We must understand the subject in all its bearings, yet stript of all delusive circumstances. We must collect our scattered thoughts, and condense them as through a lens upon it. But to do this, we must first have obtained an habitual mastery over our senses, passions, and faculties, which was never yet obtained without many a conflict. You know not, and God grant that you may never know, the inward anguish and shame which a mind, not unconscious of natural force, but idle from habit, and unfurnished from idleness, feels, when seeing open opportunities for honorable enterprise, it is compelled to forego the advantage, because unequal to an effort which others may make with ease. Years of idle pleasure are dearly bought by one pang of such self-reproach.

Shrink not then, my young friends, from labor. Wrestle mostly with the strong, and you yourselves shall be strong. It was a significant fable which made the founder of Rome the son of a god, but suckled him at no tender breast. His was a rough nurse, but a faithful one, and such is difficulty.—God knows our frame, and, though he hath given us faculties to aspire, he hath made excellence the reward and attainment of educated strength, which grows by exertion.—Bethune's Address.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, February 26, 1841.

RETROSPECTIVE.

This number closes the first volume of the SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST REGISTER, and with it, we give our hearty thanks to our patrons and friends who have come to our aid. A retrospect of the year furnishes us with a variety of interesting reflections. The value of a weekly periodical, as a medium of communication in our churches, has long been appreciated. During the year of our editorial labors, it has been our happiness to chronicle the good news of salvation, and the goodness of God in many of our churches. From the East and the West, the North and the South, we have occasionally been cheered by the news that sinners have been converted from the errors of their ways. Such news, instead of satisfying us, has but raised our anxiety for the universal extension of the gospel of the kingdom. There remains very much land to be possessed. There are multitudes of souls for whom Christ died, yet in their sins. A mighty tide of error, and sin, is sweeping over the heritage of God, overwhelming its myriads of souls in the deep waters of destruction. To stay this tide, and rescue souls from its power, is the primary object for which our press was established, and for which we have labored, as a co-worker with the servants of God. The forbearance of God should be to all a matter of joy. He has waited another year, and is still gracious. Another year has been witness to the rebellion and stubbornness of sinners, and to the lukewarmness and death of the professed followers of the Lamb. Another year has been witness to the strivings of the Holy Spirit with sinners, and the efforts of the servants of God to reclaim them from the ways of death. A few have been brought to the light; but alas! multitudes more have fallen to rise no more, or are filling the measure of their iniquity in rebellion against God.

Deep-felt emotions possess our hearts, when we turn to the events which the "Register" has chronicled. When we commenced our labors, many were in the bloom of health, and were acting faithfully their parts in the church militant, who are now singing the song of redemption in the church triumphant. The common soldiers have fallen on every side, and in almost every church; and in their fall, have shouted victory over all their enemies. Their memories will be held sacred while their bodies rest in hope. The tear of affection starts afresh at the recollection, that

"Some in whom we once delighted
We shall meet no more below."

Death has scaled the ramparts, and taken watchmen from the walls of our Zion. Our beloved WATSON, strong in mental vigor—deeply skilled in Biblical knowledge, and true in heart, has fallen from his post. We need but mention his name, to bring to recollection his superior excellencies, and to awaken the deep-toned emotions which the news of his fall made in thousands of hearts. But how shall we mention him who was our compeer, when our "Register" first spread out its pages to the churches? With us, our brother CAMPBELL joined hands and labored at our side, till pale disease enfeebled his nerves, and brought him down to death. His work is done, and his triumphant release from the field of his labors, assures us that his labor was not in vain in the Lord. May the mantle of these tried ones fall upon those who shall be their successors; and a double portion of the same spirit which led them to buckle on and wear the armor of righteousness, possess their hearts.

It has been our object to inculcate the evangelical truths of the Bible, and urge them upon the consideration of our readers. The peculiar sentiments of the S. D. Baptists have had their place in our columns, with those held in common with other evangelical churches. In presenting our sentiments, whether held in common with other christians, or peculiar to ourselves, we have endeavored to do it in love, and are not conscious of having been censorious or illiberal. Indeed, the truths of the Gospel, and every thing that pertains to the well being of immortal spirits, are so momentous that we dare not trifle with them. If our zeal has not been commensurate with the important responsibilities which we sustain, and the influence we exert as conductors of a religious paper, in deciding the destinies of immortal spirits, we can only regret it, feeling that it has been our wish to do good to such. Our work must be referred to the judgment, whether it has been good, or bad. If we have been of service to any in directing them in the way of righteousness, we shall rejoice, but with trembling, lest some have neglected the truth to their own detriment. We are somewhat gladdened with the testimonials which we have received of the usefulness of the Register. This shall influence us to greater earnestness in our labors. In presenting the productions of our pen, and in selecting from others, we have been guided by a desire to be of the greatest possible service to our readers.

To those who have contributed to the columns of the Register, we present our thanks, assuring them that it has been grateful to ourselves, and interesting to our readers. And for the encouragement of any that wish to be serviceable to their fellows by means of the press, we would say, that whatever is published in the Register comes within the reach of several thousand. And if communications are dictated by the spirit of love, it is probable that some, if not many, will be benefitted thereby.

Those of the corps editorial, who have noticed our sheet, or copied from it, are entitled to our gratitude. With about fifty, with whom we exchange, we are happy to be associated in the great work of enlightening and giving a proper direction to immortal minds.

We publish to-day the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in Congress, on the burning of the Caroline, and Mc'Leod's case. It is barely a majority report. At its presentation, considerable debate was called out from Mr. Pickens, of S. C., the author of the report, and Mr. Granger, who is also a member of the committee, Mr. Adams, Everett, &c. Mr. Granger considered it in effect a declaration of war, which England was at liberty to take up, while Mr. Fillmore contended that the reverse would be the fact, and that it was an act of justice to those living on the frontiers, who have felt that their interests were neglected by Congress. An ineffectual attempt was made to re-commit the bill to the committee with instructions to report, in effect, that Congress was not prepared to act upon the subject. Whatever the effect of Congressional action may have, it is true that the prospects of peace are not so flattering as is desirable. We can not, however, persuade ourselves from what has, as yet, taken place, that an appeal to arms will be made. Neither England or America desire it, or can be benefitted by it. It would be a calamity to both that many years could not wipe away. There are some restless spirits that desire this, but we trust their number is comparatively small. To counteract these, and for the continuance of peace, let the friends of the Redeemer be ardent in their prayers before God, knowing that the King's heart is in the hand of the Lord, and he turneth it wheresoever he will. Let them be earnest in their prayers for our rulers, that under them we may live peaceable and quiet lives, in all godliness and honesty.

We have encouraging news from Br. Bethuel Church, of Tallmadge, Michigan, relative to the observance of the Sabbath. Br. Church thinks that the present circumstances are flattering, and is encouraged relative to the future. We are happy to learn of a religious reform in any place.—The church has greatly degenerated from its pristine holiness, and purity, and must be thoroughly purged from all sin, before the glorious millenial day shall be ushered in. Let all the members of Christ's household labor and pray for this, and the time will not be far delayed, when all divisions in the mount of God shall cease.

With this number, (it being the last of the volume,) we send our bills to those who are indebted for the Register. We give this notice, that if by accident a bill should be sent to any that have paid, the matter may be set right.

THE BAPTIST ADVOCATE.—The Editor of this paper has lately proposed to publish several articles to supply the absence of the same matter in the Baptist paper, published at the time of the discussion between Messrs. Maxson and Parkinson, to which we made allusion some weeks since by way of correcting a mistake of his. A discussion of the subject of the Sabbath, would have been preferred by us since we were not concerned in that discussion, and since no tolerable idea of the merits of the question at issue at that time could be formed by presenting that part of the argument to which he alludes, separate from the rest. We will, however, gladly avail ourselves of an opportunity to present our views on that subject generally if it will be admissible, taking care to keep within the limits proposed us by the Editor of the Advocate. The publication of this in the Advocate will be considered a compliance with our proposition and the articles will be furnished as soon as convenient.

The writer of the articles in this paper on the subject of the Sabbath, has been absent a number of weeks, or the proposition of the Advocate would have been noticed sooner.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—In the 50th number of the Register, I find an article over the signature, "A Friend to Music," on the subject of "Instrumental music in Churches." The writer, after having expressed his views, invites the attention of the public to the subject, and calls for an expression, "both pro and con," expressing, at the same time, his conviction of the usefulness of that course.

It is not my purpose to reply in detail to the remarks of your correspondent, but holding views quite different from his, will express them in short.

I. The worship of God in no age of the church required it.

II. Hence, it does not appear that GOD at any time required it as a part of the same. In this place, however, your correspondent may call upon me to explain.

1. The fact that in 2 Chronicles, xxix. 25, we are told that worship with instruments was the requirement of the Lord, as doubtless this text was so understood by him; and

2. It was practised by David and the ancients.

To the first, I would say that it does not appear that a correct understanding of the text requires that sense, but simply, this.—It was by the hand, or commandment of the Lord, and his prophets, that the Levites should praise the Lord. Not that the Lord required the use of the instruments, but the worship, and David the instruments; and for this, he was solemnly reproved by the prophet Amos, chapter vi. verse 5, where a woe is pronounced upon those who "invent to themselves instruments of music," verse 1—6.

If the above is correct, then there is no force, whatever, in the plea that the prophets used instrumental music in the worship of God. But if it were shown that under the shadowy dispensation, such mode of worship were required, it by no means follows that it is required under the gospel; nay, I conceive that the very nature of it forbids it. That is, the nature of the gospel forbids the use of all show and parade; and whatever there be of this, in so much does it detract from the glory of the Spirit. Let the worship of God be restored to its ancient purity and simplicity—let gospel holiness reign in the heart and life of the christian; and, my word for it, there is more power and attraction in it than all the organs, and cymbals, &c. &c., that were ever used in the house of God in England and America, or the whole world. Let your correspondent consider, that instrumental music was introduced into the church after her glory had departed. and she being confident of it, seemed to desire to make a fair show; and, therefore, introduced "Instrumental Music," and then ask himself, if he wishes to plead for the covering of her deformities? Let him ask himself, if the amount expended in this way were given to the poor, and used for sending the gospel to the destitute, would it not have more influence in softening the asperities of man's heart, and in bringing him back to God, and glory? As to the philosophy of your correspondent, it may seem specious to him, but to me it looks worldly; and I fear it is not after Christ. N. V. H.

ECCLESIASTICAL ACTION ON TEMPERANCE.

The Cortland Presbytery during its session in Marathon, Feb. 9th and 10th, unanimously passed the following resolutions:—

1. "Resolved: That this presbytery regard the practice of total abstinence from the use and traffic of all intoxicating drinks as a beverage, as the only safe and consistent christian example."

2. "Resolved: That the churches be advised, as soon as practicable to make arrangement for the supply of their communion tables with wine that is free from alcohol."

Mark the example of the WATERVILLE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. I like the mode which this church has adopted for supplying the Lord's table with the "fruit of the vine"—free from alcohol. (See the letter of the Rev. John Frost in the N. Y. Evangelist, of Feb. 20th.) I will thank the Editors of the Register, (if agreeable to them,) to insert that letter as soon as convenient. I am fully convinced that the use of alcohol at the Lord's table, is among the most formidable obstacles that now impede the Temperance Reform. All the friends of Temperance ought to thank God and take courage in view of what has been accomplished at Waterville. J. R. J.

MUTUAL AID OF PASTORS.

Contiguous pastors may do much to aid each other in promoting revivals of religion. If they and their churches unite together for religious conference, for prayer, and for the preaching of the word, they may expect that God will bless such use of his own appointed means of grace. In this mode of labor pastors will become more attached to each other, their respective churches also will become intimately acquainted, and the instructions of the permanent ministry will be appreciated by the community; thus the foundation will be laid for the most desirable religious influences to be extended and perpetuated, through such mediums, and by such methods of operation, as will impart a healthful tone to the whole system of christian effort. INTELLIGENCE.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

In Senate, Feb. 11.—Recognition of Hayti.—Mr. Tappan presented a petition from citizens of Ohio, asking a recognition of the independence of Hayti.

Removal of the Seat of Government.—Mr. Tappan also presented another, for the removal of the seat of government from Washington to Cincinnatti. These petitions were laid on the table.

The President Elect.—Mr. Preston, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on General Harrison, and inform him of his election to the Presidency, reported that the committee had discharged that duty; and that the President elect, in acknowledging the courtesy of the committee, avowed his determination to devote himself to the promotion of the union and welfare of the republic.

Treasury Note Bill.—Mr. Wright reported the bill from the House, to authorize, without amendment, the issue of Treasury Notes.

The Bankrupt Bill.—This bill was discussed at considerable length; but without taking any question, the Senate went into an Executive Session.

In the House, Feb. 11.—Pension Appropriation Bill.—This bill passed in an amended form, so as to include $100,0000 for the removal of some of the Seminole Indians.

A discussion was had on the General, Civil, and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, and some progress made in it, when the House adjourned.

In Senate, Feb. 12.—The Treasury Note Bill.—On motion of Mr. Wright, the bill to authorize the issue of Treasury Notes, was ordered to be taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading, Mr. Benton said he was willing to borrow money for the use of the government, but not to authorize it to make paper money: and he would therefore call for the ayes and noes, which were accordingly ordered.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and was decided in the affirmative—ayes 29, nays 9.

Mr. Hubbard then moved that the bill be put upon its passage, and no objection being made, it was so ordered; and the yeas and nays being ordered, and the question about taken, Mr. Clay of Kentucky assigned his reasons for voting against the bill, and was replied to by Mr. Wright, and a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Preston, Dixon, Hubbard, Knight, Henderson, White, and Smith of Indiana, participated, when the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 29, nays 8.

Correspondence respecting the Amistad.—A message was submitted by the Vice President, from the President, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 5th inst., requesting him to communicate any correspondence between the State Department and the representatives of any foreign government, relative to the negroes taken on board the Amistad, which has occurred since that transmitted in his message of the 21st of March, 1840. Ordered to be printed.

Government Losses by Banks.—A report was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the losses sustained by Government, from the use of bank paper; 20,000 extra copies were ordered to be printed.

Value of Foreign Coin.—The Secretary of the Treasury also submitted a report relative to the value of foreign coins; which was ordered to be printed.

In the House.—The President Elect.—The report of the committee appointed to wait upon the President elect, to inform him of his election, was presented by Mr. Cushing; the same as presented to the Senate on the 11th inst.

Bill to Prevent Frauds upon the Revenue.—A motion to make this bill the special order of the day, for the 20th inst. was lost; and it is very doubtful whether the bill will pass the present session.

The Appropriation Bill.—An ineffectual attempt was made by Mr. Jones to get the House into a committee of the whole on this bill; and the day was spent in considering private claims.

Feb. 13.—No business was transacted in the Senate to-day, as it did not sit.

In the House.—Report on Foreign Relations.—Mr. Pickens, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made a lengthy report, upon the correspondence in relation to McLeod, and the steamboat Caroline.—The presentation of this report, produced an uncommon sensation. In the language of Mr. Adams, it "fell on the House like a clap of thunder, in a summer's day." A very animated debate followed on the motion to print.

Mr. Granger of New York, took a prominent and the leading part. He denounced it as a "Declaration of War."

Mr. Pickens, in his reply, contended that the report has a tendency to the preservation of peace. It stated facts boldly and plainly. He was for peace. He represented a State whose interests were peculiarly pacific. He only looked to a war of defense, when it might be necessary. The object in making the report, was to call the attention of Congress and the American people to the necessity of preparations for the national defense. He had made no new issue—he had brought in subjects of complaint and irritation by way of incidental illustration.

Mr. Adams participated in the debate, and charged the report with assuming a party character. What would be its effect, (said Mr. A.) on the American people?—on the world? Would it not be thought that it was the malice of a defeated enemy, setting fire to a tenement that he was forced to abandon? He enjoined upon the country the necessity of union on any war that we should undertake. It would not do to go into a war with a "bare majority."

After further debate, the report was ordered to be printed, and was then laid on the table.

Mr. Everett moved to print the documents connected with all the subjects of controversy with great Britain, but the motion was lost.

BURNING OF THE STEAMBOAT CAROLINE.

REPORT ON McLEOD'S CASE

Mr. Pickens, from the committee on foreign affairs made the following report which was ordered to be printed:

The committee on foreign affairs to whom was referred the message of the President, transmitting a correspondence with the British Minister in relation to the burning of the steamboat Caroline, and the demand made for the liberation of Mr. Alexander McLeod, respectfully report:

It appears that the steamboat "Caroline" was seized and destroyed in the month of December, 1837. The committee are induced to believe that the facts of the case are as follows: The boat was owned by, and in possion of, a citizen of New York. She was cleared from the city of Buffalo, and, on the morning of the 29th of December, 1837, she left the port of Buffalo, bound for Schlosser, upon the American side of the Niagara river, and within the territory of the United States. The original intention seemed to run the boat between Buffalo and Schlosser, or, perhaps, from Black Rock dam to Schlosser, and, should it seem profitable, it was intended to run her also to Navy Island, and touch at Grand Island and Tonawanda. Her owner was Mr. Wells, said to be a respectable citizen of Buffalo, and it is obvious, his intention in putting up the boat was one of speculation and profit entirely. The excitement upon that portion of the frontier, at this period, had collected a great many in the neighborhood—some from curiosity—some from idleness—and others from taking an interest in the unusual and extraordinary collection of adventurous men gathered together at that time on Navy Island. Navy Island was "nominally" in the British "territory."

The owner of the Caroline took advantage of these circumstances to make some money with his boat, by running her, as a ferry boat, over to Navy Island. All these facts appear from testimony regularly taken (see H. R. Doc. No. 302, page 13 and 39 2d Session, 25th Congress,) and the committee know of no legal evidence to contradict them. There is no proof that any arms or munitions of war were carried in the boat, except, perhaps, one small six pounder field-piece belonging to a passenger. The principal object was to run the boat from Schlosser, on the American side, to Navy Island, on the British side. It is believed that even in war, a neutral power has the right to trade in contraband articles, subject of course, to seizure and confiscation, if taken within the jurisdiction of either of the contending parties. What is contraband of war is not always certain. Treaty stipulations frequently include some articles, exclude others recognized in the law of nations. Trading in contraband articles, is no excuse for invading the territory and soil of a neutral and independent power, whose private citizens may choose to run the hazards of such a trade.

In this instance there were no two foreign powers engaged in war, but all concerned in the outbreak, or excitement within the British jurisdiction, claimed to be British subjects, in resistance to the authorities of Canada, a province of the British empire. Even admitting, then, that the Caroline was engaged in contraband trade, yet it was with citizens who claimed to be subjects of the same empire with those who were styled the legitimate officers of the province. Abstractly speaking, how was a private citizen to decide who were right and who wrong in these local disputes?—And which portion of citizens of the same province must our citizens refuse to have any communication with? But the boat was merely used for one day as ferry boat; and on the night of the day she commenced running, she was seized, while moored at the wharf in Schlosser, and burned. Several men were assassinated—certainly one, who fell dead upon the dock.

Now the insinuation of the British Minister, that Schlosser is "nominally" within the territory of the United States, may well be retorted, as we can with equal truth say that Navy Island was "nominally" within the "territory" of the British Government, for at the period to which we allude, the people collected there had as effectually defied Canada authorities as any portion of our people had disregarded ours. Yet British authority thought proper to pass by Navy Island, then its "nominal" territory, and, in the plenitude of its power, to cast the ægis of British jurisdiction over American soil. This was truly extending over us that kind guardianship which they had not the ability at that time to extend to a portion of their own territory, and which recommends itself to us full as much from its assumption, as from its love of right or law.

The British Minister is pleased also to call the Caroline a "piratical steamboat." The loose epithets of any one, no matter how high in place, cannot make that piracy which the law of nations does not recognize as such. Pirates are freebooters, enemies of the human race; and eminent jurists describe them as ravaging every sea and coast, with no flag, and no home. Piracy comes under the concurrent jurisdiction of all nations. Even in the worst point of view that it can be considered, those connected with the steamboat Caroline were but the aiders and abettors of others engaged in rebellion. And the committee are totally at a loss to know upon what authority rebellion is recognized as piracy. Such confounding of terms is resting the case upon epithets, instead of sound law or facts. But even supposing it to be a "piratical boat," as the Minister asserts it to be; yet the moment it touched our soil, it fell under our sovereignty, and no power on earth could rightfully invade it.

There is no doctrine more consecrated in English history, than that every human being who touches the soil of Great Britain, is immediately covered by British law. Suppose one of her vessels were cut from the banks of the Thames, and burnt by Frenchmen, and British citizens were assassinated at night, and the French Minister were to avow that they acted under the orders of his Government, and that the vessel was "piratical," and the citizens murdered were outlaws—then there is not an Englishman whose heart would not beat high to avenge the wrong, and vindicate the rights of his country. The law there is the law here.

And there is is no international law consistent with the separate independence of nations, that sanctions the pursuit of even pirates to murder and arson over the soil and jurisdiction of one of the States of this confederacy. No greater wrong can be done to a country than invasion of soil. If it can be done with impunity at one point, and on one occasion, it can be done at another; and the nation that submits to it, finally sinks down into drivelling imbecility. If a representation of the state of things at Schlosser, and the conduct of those who had control of the Caroline, had first been made to the proper authorities of New York, or of the United States, then there would have been some show, at least, of respect for our sovereignty and independence, and a disposition to treat us as an equal. But in this case, as if to treat our authorities with contempt, there was no preliminary demand or representation made.

It was hoped that the outrage was perpetrated by a party in a sudden heat of excitement, upon their own responsibility.—But the British Minister now avows, that "it was the public act of persons obeying the constituted authorities of her Majesty's province," and again affirms, that "it was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities."

If this had been the first and only point of collission with Great Britain, it might not have excited interest; but there is an assumption in most of our intercourse with that great power, revolting to the pride and spirit of independence in a free people. If it be her desire to preserve peace, her true policy would be to do justice, and show that courtesy to equals, which she has always demanded from others. The committee do not desire to press views on this part of the subject, particularly as a demand has been made by our government upon the government of Great Britain for explanations as to the outrage committed, the answer to which it is hoped will prove satisfactory.

As to the other points presented in the demand made by the British Minister for the "liberation" of Alexander McLeod, the committee believe the facts of the case to be, that the steamboat was seized and burnt as stated before, and that a citizen or citizens of New-York were murdered in the affray, and there were reasons to induce a belief that McLeod was particeps criminis. He was at first arrested, and upon various testimony being taken, was then discharged. He was afterwards arrested a second time. Upon the evidence then presented, he was imprisoned to await his trial. There was no invasion of British territory to seize or take him. But upon his being voluntarily within our territory, he was arrested, as any citizen of the United States, charged with a similar offence, might have been. We know of no law of nations that would exempt a man from and imprisonment for offences charged to be committed against the "peace and dignity" of a State, because he is a subject of Great Britain, or because he committed the crime at the instigation or under the authority of British provincial officers; much less do we know of any law that would justify the President to deliver him up without trial, at the demand and upon the assertion as to facts of any agent of the British government.

If we had been at open war with Great Britain, and McLeod had committed the offences charged, then he might have fallen under the rules and regulations of war, and been treated as a prisoner of the United States Government, and would have been subject to the laws of nations in war. But as the alleged criminal acts, in which McLeod is charged to be implicated, were committed in profound peace, it is a crime, as far as he may be concerned, solely against the "peace and dignity" of the State of New-York, and her criminal jurisdiction is complete and exclusive. If the crimes committed be such as to make a man hostis humani generis—an outlaw—a pirate in the legal acceptation of the term, then, under the law of nations, the United States courts and tribunals would have jurisdiction. But the offence charged in this case, committed as it was in time of peace, as far as this individual was concerned, was one purely against the lex loci, and coming exclusively within the criminal jurisdiction of the tribunals of New-York.

The Minister, in his letter of the 13th December, 1840, says; "It is quite notorious that McLeod was not one of the party engaged in the destruction of the steamboat Caroline; and that the pretended charge upon which he has been imprisoned rests only upon the perjured testimony of certain Canadians, outlaws and their abettors," &c. This may perchance all be so, but it would be asking a great deal to require an American court to yield jurisdiction and surrender up a prisoner charged with offences against the law, upon the mere ipse dixit of any man, no matter how high in authority. Whether McLeod be guilty or not guilty, is the very point upon which an American jury alone have a right to decide. Jurisdiction in State tribunals over criminal cases, and trial by jury of the venue, are essential points in American jurisprudence. And it is a total misapprehension as to the nature of our system to suppose that there is any thing right in the Federal Executive to arrest the verdict of the one, or thwart the jurisdiction of the other. If such a power existed, and were exercised, it would effectually overthrow, and upon a vital point the separate sovereignty and independence of these States.

The Federal Executive might be clothed with power to deliver up fugitives from justice for offences committed against a foreign State, but even then it might not be obligatory to do so, unless it were made matter of treaty stipulation. This duty and right in an Executive, has generally been considered as dormant, until made binding by treaty arrangement. But when the matter is reversed, and demand is made, not of fugitives from justice for offences against a foreign power, but for the liberation of a man charged with offences against the peace and dignity of one of our own states, then it is that the demand becomes preposterous in the extreme. The fact that the offences were committed under the sanction of provincial authorities, does not alter the case, unless we were in a state of war. In such cases as the present, the power to deliver up could not be conferred upon the Federal Executive by treaty stipulation. It could only be conferred in those cases over which jurisdiction is clearly delegated by the Federal Constitution. Such, for instance, as treason, which is an offence against the conjoined sovereignty of the States, as defined in the Constitution Over all cases except those defined in the Constitution, and those coming clearly under the laws of nations, the States have exclusive jurisdiction, and the trial and punishment for offences against them, are incident to their separate sovereignty. It is not pretended in this case that there is any treaty stipulation under which the demand is made; and the Federal Executive, under our system, has no power but what is conferred by the Constitution, or by special law of Congress. In the former it is declared that "the Executive power is vested in a President of the United States," and that power is then to be pointed out and defied by special laws passed from to time, imposing such duties as are thought proper and expedient by Congress.

Your committee deem it dangerous for the Executive to exercise any power over a subject-matter not conferred by treaty or by law; and to exercise it in any case in conflict with State jurisdiction, would be worse than dangerous; it would be usurpation.

But your committee forbear to press these points farther at present, and they would not have said as much on such clear questions of internal law, but that in this case, the demand for liberation has been made by the accredited agent of a great power, and under circumstances of peculiar aggravation and excitement.

We have other points of difference with Great Britain, which add interest to every question that arises between us at present. Neither our Northeastern or Northwestern boundaries are yet settled with her and the subject is not entirely free from difficulty. She has recently seized our vessels and exercised a power involving the right of search, under the pretext of suppresing the foreign slave trade, which, if persevered in, will sweep our commerce from the coast of Africa, and which is incompatible with our rights as a maritime power. She has recently, in her intercourse, with us refused indemnity and denied our rights to property; on subject-matter vital to near half the States of this Confederacy, and which, considering her military position at Bermuda and her growing power in the West Indies, is of the last importance to our national independence.

All these subjects make every question between us, at this particular juncture, of the deepest interest.

Besides this, we are both permanently destined to have, perhaps, the most extensive commerce of modern nations. Our flags float side by side, over every sea and bay and inlet of the known globe.

She moves steadily upon her objects with an ambition that knows no bounds. And wherever she has had a conflict of interest, she has rarely yielded to any power.

At this moment she presents to the civilized world the spectacle of the greatest military and commercial power in combination ever known.

From her vast possessions in every quarter of the globe, and her peculiar commercial system, she has been made the reservoir of the wealth of nations.

Her internal resources, skill, labor and machinery, with her capital, are beyond calculation. Her natural position, being about midway the coast of Europe gives her great control over the outlets and currents of commerce.

Her military occupation of Gibraltar, Malta, the Ionian Islands, and recently of St. Jean d'Acre, give her ascendancy on the Mediterranean and the Levant, while St. Helana and the Cape of Good Hope give her possession over the currents of trade along those extensive coasts. Then Bombay, Calcutta, and her immense possessions in the East Indies, together with her recent movements in the China Seas and Islands, enable her to extend her power over those vast regions that have slumbered for ages in solitary and enervated magnificence. She possessed Falkland Island but to control the commerce that passes around Cape Horn—while Trinidad gives her all she desires in the Caribbean Sea. Halifax at one point, and Bermuda at another, stand out in great force over our own coast from one extremity to the other.

Her positions all over the world are at this moment, in a military point of view, equal to a million of men under arms. Her continual conflicts in the mighty regions of the East, only enable her officers to become skillful and improve in the art of war, while her great armies and extensive fleets draw their support from the immense countries seized and occupied. In the present juncture of affairs, no statesman can overlook these things. Steam power has recently brought us so near together, that in the event of any future conflict, war, with its effects will be precipitated upon us with much more rapidity than formerly.

Avarice and ambition are the ruling passions of modern times, and it is vain to shut our eyes to the state of things around us. It remains to be seen what effect steam power is to have in changing and modifying the whole art of defence and war. It may be a great engine for again levelling mankind and reducing every thing to a contest of mere physical force. In that event it might be difficult to conjecture what system of national defence will stand the test of time and experience.

We have a deep stake in peace, and fondly hope the repose of the world will not be disturbed. We have certainly not the least desire for any rupture. Firmness, and a wise preparation, will long preserve us from such a catastrophe. But while no temptation should ever prompt us to do injustice on the one hand, so no consideration, on the other hand, should ever induce us to submit to permanent wrong from any power on earth, no matter what the consequences may be.

Your Committe would conclude by expressing a firm belief that all other points of difficulty may be honorably and amicably adjusted, and that harmony may long be preserved by both governments, pursuing a liberal and generous policy, congenial to the interests and feelings of both people, and compatible with the spirit and genius of an enlightened age.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.

From the Albany Journal

In Senate.—The following are the resolutions introduced yesterday by Mr. Root, from the Select committe on so much of the Governor's message as relates to the National Domain.

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of New-York, That the National Domain or public lands, which have been ceded by the several States in which they were situated, "for the common benefit of the United States," are and of right ought to be, the common property of all the United States alike, and never can be rightly disposed of but for the equal benefit of all.

Resolved, That the original ordinance and the several acts of Congress, made in pursuance of the Constitution, for the disposing of and making all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States, were equal and just, and in their execution did not derogate from the true spirit of the cessions made by the several States as aforesaid.

Resolved, That this State having been the first to cede a large portion of said lands expressly and upon this condition that they "shall be and enure for the benefit of such of the United States, as shall become members of the federal alliance of the said States and for no other use or purpose whatsoever," does hereby solemnly protest against any right of Congress to dispose of the said lands in any manner but for the purpose aforesaid.—And the Representatives of the people of this State in Senate and Assembly convened, do hereby and in their name and behalf, charge and instruct its Senators, and advise their Representatives in Congress, to oppose and vote against every proposition to reduce the minimum price of any portion of said lands, or to grant the same to any individual State, or to any object other than for the purpose of carrying into effect the true intent and meaning of the original cession made by this State in pursuance of the act of the 19th February, 1780, authorizing the same.

Resolved, That all pre-emption laws, especially those of a prospective character, are in derogation of the cessions aforesaid, and the laws constitutionally enacted for the disposition of the same, inasmuch as they destroy all chance of obtaining over the minimum price for the choicest lands and most eligible occasions.

Resolved, That the lands of the United States situated west of the Mississippi and south of the 31st degree of latitude, were purchased with the money belonging to all, and ought not to be disposed of but for the benefit of all the United States.

Resolved, That the nett proceeds of the sales of all the public lands, ought to be distributed among the several States, in the same proportion that the Constitution requires the imposition of direct taxes.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward copies of the preceding resolutions to the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States, requesting them to lay the same before their respective Houses.

In Senate, Feb. 20.—Mr. Root reported in favor of the resolution from the Assembly, authorizing the Secretary of State to distribute copies of the Journals, Documents, &c. of the Legislature, to different Literary Institutions in the State, with an amendment, confining the operation of the resolution to the New York Lyceum, whose directors had alone petitioned for such a distribution.

Mr. Taylor moved to lay the report of the committee on the table. Carried.

Public Domain.—The Senate, in Committee of the whole, Mr. Ely in the Chair, again resumed the consideration of the resolutions from the Assembly, relative to the National Domain.

Mr. Root proceeded to address the Committee at great length, in favor of the doctrine of instruction, and in a general view of the rights of this State to their portion of this immense treasure.

Mr. R.'s remarks were of a highly interesting nature, and we hope to find room for them in extenso, at a future day.

Mr. Foster followed in the debate, but without concluding, gave way to a motion to rise and report, which prevailed.

The Assembly sent for concurrence a bill relative to the Lunatic Asylum.

On motion of Mr. Verplanck, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, after which it adjourned till Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock.

In Assembly, Feb. 20.—Petitions presented and referred.—By Mr. Townsend, memorial of the Society of Friends in the State of New York, asking to be released from penalties on account of not bearing arms. On motion of Mr. T. the memorial was ordered read.

After the reading had proceeded some time,

Mr. Duer moved that the further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. Townsend called for the Ayes and Nays, and the question being taken, resulted against the motion of Mr. Duer—Ayes 34, Nays 49.

So the reading was resumed, and having proceeded some time,

Mr. L. S. Chatfield again moved that the further reading be dispensed with, and it was carried—Ayes 51, Nays 23.

Mr. L. Hubbell, said he had been in a situation to abjudicate the question presented by this memorial. He had seen nothing to change his opinion, which was adverse to the prayer of the petitioners, and he would, therefore, rather not have the petition referred to the Committee on Militia and the Public Defense of which he was a chairman, but should prefer that it should go to the Committee on Grievances.

Mr. Townsend read so much of the Governor's Message as refers to the subject of the scruples of the Society of Friends in bearing arms.

Mr. Beckwith hoped the memorial might be referred to the committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. Simmons examined the subject of the grievances of which these petitioners complained, at some length.

Mr. Swackhamer moved the reference to a select committee.

Mr. Townsend suggested to add the words "on so much of the Governor's Message, as relates to this subject."

Mr. L. S. Chatfield moved its reference to the committee on Militia and Public Defense, which was adopted—Ayes 50, Nays 16.

SUMMARY.

Colored People excluded from Public Vehicles.—William W. Skirving, agent, and Lucius Delober, driver, of Rail Road car No. 7, were tried for an assault and battery on Thomas Downing, colored man, and a celebrated oyster vender, No. 5 Broad street on the 30th December last. Mr. Downing rode up to 14th street inside the car, without opposition; and on returning got on the car near 14th street, went inside, and sat down, only two persons (white females) being there. Downing was ordered out—refused to go; was ordered out again, and again refused—when the agent said, then they would tear him out, and the agent seizing him by the collar, the driver struck him under the ear, and with two others beat and kicked him, broke his hat, and forced him violently out of the car. The cartilage of one ear divided for half an inch, and both ears cut, and the skin torn down under one of them. His leg was badly bruised and swollen, until it was 3 1-2 inches larger than the other, as Dr. Bliss deposed. It was proved that there was general regulation, that no colored persons were to ride inside of the car, but on the top, in accordance with the tone of public opinion, though some rode inside almost every day. The agent and driver were discharged for their violence. No violence was ever allowed by the company to be used to any person, Downing deposed that he was not aware of any rule to exclude colored persons from an inside seat.

Judge Lynch charged the Jury, in order to make out the justification of the accused, it must appear that a reasonable and proper regulation had been made by the Company to exclude colored people from their cars. This Company was a corporation which had been created for the public convenience as well as their own private benefit, and their regulations must therefore be proper and consistent with the convenience for travellers. In order to be so, as regarded the present case, it must be shown that such due notice had been given of the regulation, that those interested in it could have known, and might conform to it. And it must also appear that the defendants had used no greater force than was necessary to carry the regulation into effect. As to the regulation being proper in the abstract, counsel on both sides had conceded that it was so, and therefore the court felt it unnecessary to make any remarks on that part of the subject. It appeared that such a notice had been publicly given by the Company, and continued to be given for so considerable a time, as they thought sufficient to apprize the public. The Jury were at liberty to draw inferences, whether their notice was known to the complainant, from the fact of those regulations having been last spring enforced against part of Mr. Downings family, at which time his son told his mother of the occurrence, but did not tell it to his father. From this circumstance the Jury were at liberty to infer, whether or not it was probable that it reached the complainant. The Jury should also take into consideration the fact of the complainant having gone up on the car without being questioned or refused, and that it was when returning, the difficulty occurred; and consider whether that circumstance might not have thrown him off his guard. But it must also be borne in mind, that he was called on to leave the car by the agent who, it did not appear, had any knowledge of his having gone up in the car. The jury would therefore determine whether the complaint had due notice of the regulation to exclude colored people, and whether a greater degree of violence was used towards him than was necessary to put him out, and give a verdict accordingly. Verdict, not guilty;—which caused loud applause from the audience, but which was immediately suppressed by order of the Court,—J. of Com.

An Impostor.—An impostor has appeared in Switzerland, who proclaims himself the Messiah of the Jews. He wears a long white tunic, gilt belt and hat on which is inscribed the word Jehovah. This man was formerly a merchant and politician, and probably finding these trades fail, he is now attempting to extract a revenue from human credulity. His experiment is not likely to prove lucrative, as the police have put their arrest upon him.—Jour. of Com.

Deaths of Clergymen.—The American Quarterly Register contains the names of 29 clergymen who died during the three months preceding the 1st of January. Of these there were Congregational 3; Presbyterian 6; Episcopalian 5; Baptist 3; Methodist 8; Dutch Reformed 1; German Reformed 1; Unitarian 1; not specified 1. Between the ages of 20 and 30 4; 30 40, 6; 40 and 50 4; 50 and 60, 2; 60 and 70, 2; 70 and 80, 4; 80 and 90, 1; not specified, 6. Sum of all the ages specified, 1133. Average age of the 23, 49 1-2. The largest number of deaths was in New-Jersey, viz. 4. Eleven died in October, and ten in November.

A Lady Agriculturist.—The successful competitor for premiums offered for the best crops of wheat and Indian corn, by the Agricultural Society of Kennebec Co. Me. was Mrs. Content W. Haines, of Winthrop. Her wheat crop was 29 bushels to the acre, of Tea wheat.—Her corn crop consisted of 132 bushels of ears to the acre.—Salem Obs.

The population of Chicago, is 5450. Of these, the number of males is 3632, of females 1815—less than one half.

In Baltimore, on Thursday of last week, Owen Goodwinn, and Tilden Goodwin, were arrested and held to bail, charged with kidnapping and selling a colored girl, named Amanda, the property of Mrs. Dorsey, who keeps a boarding house in that city. The accused are brothers of Mrs. Dorsey, and boarded with her. They sold the girl for $250, and divided the spoil.

The President elect arrived at Washington on the 9th inst.—his birthday, and was received with great cordiality by the citizens.

The petitions which have been transmitted to the Legislature during the present session, in behalf of the Thompsonian physicians, contain about 40,000 names. The number of these physicians in the State amounts to 200.

Lewis Tappan, Esq. has acknowledged, in addition to the monies already bestowed, the receipt of $759,79, contributed to the Amistad fund.

A petition presented to the Pennsylvania Legislature, praying that all laws relative to blasphemy, labor on the Sabbath, and other things of like character be repealed, was indefinitely postponed on Monday.

One farthing damages was awarded in the court of common pleas, in Boston, lately in a cause of the hygeist Morrison, against a rival medicine, [illegible], who had counterfeited his wrappers.

The Hudson's Bay Company's Forager arrived at the Sandwich Islands on the 14th of Aug. 180 days from London, and sailed on the 31st of Aug. for Columbia river, with a cargo of English dry goods for the Oregon Territory.

A woman and her own husband, in Boston, have at their own request been committed to prison for the purpose of conquering a habit of opium eating.

The Shakers at Shirley, N. H. having got possession of two poor children, have refused repeated and earnest application of the parents for their release in consequence of which a great excitement is said to exist.

It is stated, that of the grand jury by whom McLeod was indicted for the murder of Durfee, 19 out of 20 were in favor of the indictment.

Shipwreck.—On Friday the 5th inst. in the morning about four o'clock, the pilot boat United States, of Baltimore, Capt. Smith, went ashore about three miles to the southward and westward of Smith's Island, in a snow storm, and was totally lost. All hands, seven in number, immediately taking to the small boat, and after much difficulty and danger succeeded in landing safely on Cape Charles, saving nothing but what they stood in.—Norfolk Beacon.

We learn that the Amistad case is further postponed to Saturday, the 20th instant, owing to an important case being before the Supreme Court, the argument on which is not closed.

Mrs. General Harrison.—As this lady is soon expected to occupy "the white house" at Washington any thing relating to her history will be gratifying to the public.

After the severe and desperate battle of the Miami, in 1794, General Wayne went to the Atlantic States, leaving Captain Harrison in command of Fort Washington, now Cincinnatti. The next year Captain Harrison married the daughter of Judge John Cleve Symmes.—who was born at Riverhead, Long Island, and removed in early life to New Jersey, where he married the daughter of Governor William Livingston, and was soon after one of the Association Judges of the Supreme Court of that state. In 1787 he became the proprietor of "the Miami purchase," of near a million of acres, and removed to that country.

Mrs. Harrison was educated at East Hampton, Long Island, and when young was esteemed a lady of great personal and mental accomplishments. A writer for the National Portrait Gallery for 1836, thus speaks of her: "She is distinguished for her benevolence and piety; and all who know her, view her with esteem and affection. Her whole course through life, in all its relations, has been characterized by those qualifications that complete the character of an accomplished matron.—Jour. of Com.

Number of Inhabitants to the Square Mile. The United States furnishes a population of 14 to every square mile for the inhabited portions of the country, and 7 to a square mile for the whole territory embraced within the limits of the federal jurisdiction. Contrast this present occupation of the soil with the population of the most thickly peopled portions of Europe, and it will be seen that there is ample room for us to increase our municipal strength, and not be crowded either. Belgium has 28 to the square mile, Holland 254, Great Britain and Irelan 1266. Russia has but 28 to the square mile, and Sweden and Norway only 13. France has 158; Italy 172; Germany 147; Austria 127, and Switzerland 133.

The Easton (Me.) Whig states that Samuel Innes, editor of the Easton Whig, committed suicide on Wednesday last, by cutting his throat. This unfortunate act is another warning to the living to beware of the intoxicating draught.

The U. S. Steam Frigate Mississippi.—This magnificent vessel is constructed principally of live oak from Attakapas, in this state, and her entire cost is $590,000. In her rig she will resemble a handsome bark, and her builder has constructed the hull so admirably as to render as a sailing vessel A No. 1 of the U. S. Navy. She will sail the greater part of the time, as her bunkers only carry about 800 tons of coal, or sufficient for 16 days steaming. Her engines, particularly the [illegible] are as heavy as those of a first class ship; and she is so constructed as to be able to ship and unship her paddle wheels with the greatest facility. She is pierced for 26 guns but will carry but [illegible] aft the wheel house, and 3 forward of it on each side.—She is to carry two 10 inch guns forward, which are to traverse the greater part of a circle on a swivel; these two guns will be able to carry shot nearly 100 pounds weight, as 8 inch guns carry 64 lb shot.—The other 16 guns are to be 8 inch bores.—On account of the result of various trials, the whole of her ordnance is to consist of Paixhan guns. She will be ready for sea in July next.—New Orleans Picayune.

Sudden Death.—An inquest was yesterday held at the corner of Hester and Centre streets, on the body of Peter R[illegible], a native of Scotland, aged 35 years. The deceased went home on Wednesday night, and some quarrel arising between him and his wife, he left her, went below into his store, and [illegible] to pass the night. [illegible] time after deceased left, some one of the family went below and found him lying on the couch in a state of [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] was sent for, but [illegible] deceased was quite dead. Verdict, death from congestion of the [illegible].

Accident.—The steamboat Pocahontas, which left here yesterday afternoon at 16 o'clock for Norfolk, returned at 7 P. M. in consequence of the engineer being killed. How it occurred is not known, but it is presumed his foot slipped and he fell among the machinery, as none of the firemen heard a noise, and on going to the spot from whence the sound issued, he found the engineer dead, lying with his head on the bonnet of the condenser—one ear being torn off and the side of his face terribly lacerated.—Balt. Amer.

A Seizure and an Arrest.—A genteel rowdy went into one of our banks on Saturday, and while the teller's back was turned, contrived to fork on a $500 bundle of bills, and absquatulated. He had previously engaged a horse and sulkey, in which he immediately put off. After a jaunt to Palmyra, he ventured back on Sunday, with great assurance, and was fortunately nabbed. The money was all found in his boots, except $8. He is in limbo, another instance of the old adage—"The fool and his money soon parted."—Rochester Democrat.

Small Pox.—That the public may see what little reason there is for the alarm which exists on the subject of this disease, we have extracted the following from the report of Dr. H. G. Dunnel, the city inspector:—

In 1805 the deaths by small pox were 62
In 1811 " " 117
In 1816 " " 179
In 1824 " " 394
In 1834 " " 221
In 1835 " " 351
Last year (1840) " " 233

The population of this city in 1824, when the deaths by small pox were 394, was 160,000—about half the present number of inhabitants.—Courier.

A Foreign Call.—The Churchman states that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Doane has been invited to preach the consecration sermon at the opening of the Rev. Dr. Hook's church, in Leeds, Eng., and that he will sail hence for that purpose in July.

Bequests.—The late William Bartlett, of Newburport, left property to the amount of about half a million of dollars. He was bequeathed $50,000 to the Theological Seminary at Andover, making more than $200,000 as the total amount of the donations to that institution.

More Outrages at Dayton.—The rowdies of Dayton are earning for themselves no very enviable character. The Journal of that place says in a late number—"About 2 o'clock yesterday morning, the houses of several blacks in the outskirts of the town were fired, and burnt to the ground with all their contents. The houses were three in number, and were the property of the occupiers.

It is stated that those who were engaged in it, actually refused to permit one poor fellow to return to his burning dwelling for a pair of shoes to put on! Others who had money, were prevented from getting it. They were only allowed clothing sufficient to cover their nakedness, although the night was extremely cold."

We learn from the Charlottesville Advocate that the trial of young Semmes before the Examining Court on the charge of murdering Professor Davis, was brought to a close late on Wednesday evening last, after a two days investigation. It was decided that the prisoner should be sent on for further trial, to be had before the Circuit Superior Court in May next. The case was ably and elaborately argued on both sides.

MARRIED,

In Verona, on 22d inst., by Rev. A. Campbell, Mr. JOSEPH L. PERRY, and Miss AMANDA M. WILLIAMS, both of Verona.

DIED,

In Hopkinton, on the 22d inst., with the inflammation on the lungs, FRANKLIN, son of Luke P. and Lydia Babcock, aged eleven months.

At Cincinnatus, Dec. 23d, Miss HELEN OSGOOD, daughter of John Osgood, aged 24.

Miss Osgood died in the triumphs of that faith which she so well exemplified in her life. Miss O. was the subject of disease for nearly two years which, though lingering, was painful, and terminated in the disease of the brain.

If there was any particular cause more than another for her disease and death, it was from her continued efforts in rendering herself useful around the sick bed. She had naturally a good constitution. She was the picture of health. The writer of this article well remembers the healthy appearance of the deceased, as she appeared in the congregation on the Sabbath, and weekly prayer meeting. These were the places where Miss O. was always to be found while her health admitted. In her, the pastor of the Congregational Church in Cincinnatus, had an efficient aid by her prayers. Hers was the piety that shown in those little offices of kindness, which time consecrative to the cause of Christ, so well fits the heart to exhibit in the family circle, and the neighborhood. It asks nothing but the silent approbation of conscience, and God.

Miss O. was always cheerful, but dignified and grave. Her influence among her associates was marked. She took great interest in [illegible] music, and when in health, added much to this department of worship. There seemed to be a settled conviction of mind with the deceased, that she should live for a higher object than self.

The writer well remembers on one occasion, while visiting her sick room, of hearing her express her great anxiety in behalf of the youth of this place, whose "[illegible] amusements" in a neighboring ball-room, had disturbed her in her sick chamber.

But in conclusion, we would say, Miss O. had those manners, savored with piety, that made her a welcome guest among her young companions—a comforter to those in sickness—a kind and tender sister—a dutiful child—a true dignity and gentility of manners. But all this, she had learned from her bible and the judicious counsel of parents, without the assistance of the ball-room and cotillion party, to which she was never a visitant.

May all youth who read this, copy her example that they may die as she died.

E. T. B.

Having the opportunity to see the obituary notice of Miss Helen Osgood, in manuscript, it affords me pleasure to add my testimony respecting her christian virtues. While I was her pastor, I noticed that the more she advanced in piety, the deeper was her sense of her own unworthiness, and sinfulness in the sight of God. The clearer her views became respecting the claims of God's law, the more clearly she saw her own imperfections—and the more firmly she gloried in the Cross of Christ. May her relatives, and her youthful associates trust in the same Almighty Savior.

POETRY.

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

Awake! the morning breaketh! the third morn,
Since He, our Lord, the crucified, was slain:
Remember how to comfort us forlorn,
"After three days, and I shall rise again,"
Our Surety said. Come, bid despair begone;
See, on the dappled margin of the sky,
Far in the misty East, young Day is born,
Away our fears and tears, and cease to sigh;
This, this the token that he leaves the grave,
The Mighty One! the exalted! strong to save!

"Hail Immanuel! risen Saviour, Hail!
All glory be to thee!"—let Zion sing!
"Thy power to save the ransomed shall not fail,
Till the last foe shall yield, victorious King!
But why thy garments red with purple life!
Why thine apparel thus bedewed with blood?
These are the trophies of the field of strife;
Thy heart the fountain of so rich a flood,
To thee, oh Christ, we'll raise our pæans high,
Pilgrims on earth, and victors in the sky.

Lift up, ye gates! ye everlasting doors
Be lifted up! Lo, our returning Lord,
Triumphant over death and hell, restores
Our hope. He, on sepulchral shades, has poured
Immortal light—has mocked our direst foe—
Passed, like a conqueror, through his dark domains
And now returns: joy to the earth below!
Triumphant shout, our risen Leader reigns:
Where now thy sting, oh death! thy victory, grave
Our Saviour-king lives evermore to save.

NARRATIVE OF THE BATTLE OF FORT GRISWOLD.

The following Narrative of the Battle on Groton Heights, on the 6th of September, 1781, was communicated to the Missouri Republican, in 1826, by Mr. Stephen Hempstead, formerly of New-London, who was in the Fort at the time, and afterwards removed to that State.

The author of the following narrative of events which took place at the battle of Fort Griswold, on Groton Heights, entered the service of his country in 1775, and arrived in Boston on the day of the battle of Bunker Hill. He was at Dorchester Point—was on Long Island at the time of the retreat of the American Army—and was also a volunteer in the first ships that were sent to destroy the Asia, 84 gun ship, and a frigate lying above Fort Washington. In this attempt they were unsuccessful, although grappled to the enemy's vessel 20 minutes. For the bravery displayed by them, they received the particular thanks of the commanding officer, in person, and in general orders, and forty dollars were ordered to be paid, to each person engaged. He was afterwards wounded by a grape-shot while defending the lines at Harlem Heights, which broke two of his ribs. He continued in the service, and was again wounded on the 6th September, 1781. Mr. H. removed to this country in 1811, and is now 72 years of age. He was present at the reception of Gen. La Fayette, in this city. Mr. H. is one of the few surviving patriots of the Revolution, who have been permitted to view the exampled rapidity which our country has increased in wealth, power and population; the blessings which their exertions contributed to bestow upon us, and the happiness by which all classes are surrounded

MR. CHARLES:—I have thought, since last fall, that I would send you an account of the battle of Fort Griswold, on Groton Heights, on the 6th of September 1781. The celebration of that event in September last, caused several notices of it to appear in different newspapers, none of which, I think, are sufficiently particular or wholly correct. As I was a participator in that catastrophe, and had an opportunity of knowing most of their circumstances, and reasons for remembering them, besides some notes taken subsequently, I am enabled I think, to give a clearer account of it (particularly in detail) than any I have seen; and if you believe the following worthy of publication, you are at liberty to do so.

STEPHEN HEMSTEAD.

On the morning of the 6th of September, 1781, twenty-four sail of the enemy's shipping appeared to the west-ward of New-London harbor. The enemy landed in two divisions, of about 800 men each, commanded by that infamous traitor to his country, Benedict Arnold, who headed the division that landed on the New-London side, near Brown's farms; the other division commanded by Col. Eyre, landed on Groton Point, nearly opposite. I was first sergeant of Capt. Adam Shapley's company of State troops, and was stationed with him at the time, with about 23 men, at Fort Trumbull, (on the New-London side. This was a mere breastwork or water battery, open from behind, and the enemy coming on us from that quarter, we spiked our cannon, and commenced a retreat across the river to Griswold in three boats. The enemy were so near that they overshot us with their muskets, and succeeded in capturing one boat with six men commanded by Josiah Smith, a private. They afterwards proceeded to New-London and burnt the town. We were received by the garrison with enthusiasm, being considered experienced artillerists, whom they much needed; and we were immediately assigned to our stations. The Fort was an oblong square, with bastions at opposite angles, its longest side fronting the river in a N. W. and S. E. direction. Its walls were of stone, and were 10 or 12 feet high on the lower side and surrounded by a ditch. On the wall were pickets, projecting over 12 feet; above this was a parapet with embrasures, and within a platform for the cannon, and a step to mount upon to shoot over the parapet with small arms. In the S. W. bastion was a flag-staff, and in the side near the opposite angle, was the gate, in front of which was a triangular breastwork to protect the gate; and to the right of this was a redoubt, with a three pounder in it which was about 120 yards from the gate. Between the Fort and the river was another battery, with a covered way, but which could not be used in this attack, as the enemy appeared in a different quarter. The garrison with the volunteers, consisted of about 160 men. Soon after our arrival, the enemy appeared in force in some woods about half a mile S. E. of the Fort, from whence they sent a flag of truce, which was met by Capt. Shapley, demanding an unconditional surrender, threatening at the same time, to storm the Fort instantly if the terms were not accepted. A council of war was held, and it was the unanimous voice, that the garrison were unable to defend themselves against so superior a force. But a militia Colonel who was then in the fort, and had a body of men in the immediate vicinity, said he would reinforce them with 2 or 300 men in fifteen minutes, if, they would hold out Col. Ledyard agreed to send back a defiance, upon the most solemn assurance of immediate succour. For this purpose, Col. ——— started, his men being then in sight; but he was no more seen, nor did he even attempt a division in our favor. When the answer to our demand had been returned by Capt. Shapley, the enemy were soon in motion, and marched with great rapidity, in a solid column, to within short distance of the fort, where dividing the column, they rushed furiously and simultaneously to the assault of the S. W. bastion and the opposite sides. They were however repulsed with great slaughter, their commander mortally wounded, and Major Montgomery, next in rank, killed, having been thrust through the body, whilst in the act of scaling the walls of the S. W. bastion, by Capt. Shapley. The command then devolved on Col. Beckwith a refugee from New-Jersey, who commanded a corps of that description. The enemy rallied and returned to the attack with great vigor, but were received and repulsed with equal firmness. During the attack a shot cut the halyards of the flag, and it fell to the ground, but was instantly remunerated on a pike pole. This accident proved fatal to us as the enemy, supposing it had been struck by its defenders, rallied again, and rushing with redoubled impetuosity, carried the S. W. bastion by storm. Until this moment, our loss was trifling in number, being 6 or 7 killed, and 18 or 20 wounded. Never was a post more bravely defended, nor a garrison more barbarously butchered. We fought with all kinds of weapons, and at all places, with a courage that deserved a better fate. Many of the enemy were killed under the walls by throwing simple shot over on them, and never would we have relinquished our arms, had we had the least idea that such a catastrophe would have followed. To describe this scene I must be permitted to go back a little in my narrative. I commanded an 18 pounder on the south side of the gate, and while in the act of sighting my gun, a ball passed through the embrasure, struck me a little above the right ear, grazing the skull, and cutting off the veins which bled profusely. A handkerchief was tied around it and I continued at my duty. Discovering some little time after, that a British soldier had broken a picket at the bastion on my left, and was forcing himself through a hole, whilst the men stationed there were gazing at the battle which raged opposite to them, and observing no officer in that direction, I jumped from the platform and ran to them, crying my brave fellows the enemy are breaking in behind you, and raised my pike to despatch the intruder, when a ball struck my left arm at the elbow, and my pike fell to the ground. Nevertheless I grasped it with my right hand, and with the men, who turned and fought manfully cleared the branch. The enemy, however, soon after forced the S. W. bastion, where Capt. Shapley, Peter Richards, Lieut. Richard Chapman, and several other men of distinction, and volunteers, had fought with conquerable courage, and were all either killed or mortally wounded, and which had sustained the brunt of every attack. Col. Ledyard, seeing the enemy within the fort, gave orders to cease firing, and to throw down our arms as the fort had surrendered. We did so, but they continued firing upon us crossed the fort and opened the gate, when they marched in, firing in platoons upon those who were retreating to the magazine and barrack rooms for safety. At this moment the renegado Colonel commanding cried out, who commands this garrison? Col. Ledyard, who was standing near me, answered, "I did sir, but you do now," at the same time stepping forward, handing him his sword with the point towards himself. At this instant I perceived a soldier in the act of bayoneting me from behind. I turned suddenly round and grasped his bayonet, endeavoring to unship it, and knock off the thrust—but in vain. Having but one hand, he succeeding in forcing it into my right hip, above the joint, and just below the abdomen, and crushed me to the ground. The first person I saw afterwards, was my brave commander, a corpse by my side, having been run through the body with his own sword, by the savage renagado. Never was a scene of more brutal wanton carnage witnessed, than now took place. The enemy were still firing upon us in platoons, and in the barrack rooms which were continued for some minutes, when they discovered they were in danger of being blown up, by communicating fire to the powder scattered at the mouth of the magazine, while delivering out cartridges; nor did it then cease in the rooms for some minutes longer. All this time the bayonet was "freely used," even on those who were helplessly wounded, and in the agonies of death. I recollect Capt. William Seymour a volunteer from Hartford, had 13 bayonet wounds, although his knee had previously been shattered by a ball; so much so, that it was obliged to be amputated the next day. But I need not mention particular cases. I have already said that we had 6 killed and 18 wounded previous to their storming our lines; 85 were killed in all, 35 mortally and dangerously wounded, and 40 taken prisoners to New-York, most of them slightly hurt.

After the massacre, they plundered us of every thing we had, and left us literally naked. When they commenced gathering us up together with their own wounded, they put their's under the shade of the platform, and exposed us to the sun, in front of the barracks, where we remained over an hour. Those that could stand were then paraded, and ordered to the landing, while those that could not, (of which number I was one) were put in our ammunition wagons, and taken to the brow of the hill (which was very steep, and at least 100 rods in descent,) from whence it was permitted to run down by itself, but was arrested in its course, near the river by an apple tree. The pain and anguish we all endured in this rapid descent, as the wagon jumped and jostled over rocks and holes, is inconceivable; and the jar in its arrest was like bursting the cords of life assunder, and caused us to shriek with almost supernatural force. Our cries were distinctly heard and noticed on the opposite side of the river, (which is a mile wide) amidst all the confusion which raged in burning and sacking the town. We remained in the wagon more than an hour, before our humane conquerers hunted us up, when we were again paraded and laid on the beach, preparatory to embarkation. But by the interposition of Ebenezer Ledyard (brother of Col. L.) who humanely represented our deplorable situation, and the impossibility of our being able to reach New-York, 35 of us were parole in the usual form. Being near the house of Ebenezer Avery, who was also one of our number, we were taken into it. Here we had not long remained before a marauding party set fire to every room, evidently intending to burn us up with the house. The party soon left it, when it was extinguished and we were thus saved from the flames. Ebenezer Ledyard again interfered and obtained a sentinel to remain and guard us until the last of the enemy embarked, about 11 o'clock at night. None of our own people came to us till near daylight the next morning, not knowing previous to that time, that the enemy had departed.

Such a night of distress and anguish was scarcely ever passed by mortal. Thirty-five of us were lying on the bare floor—stiff, mangled, and wounded in every manner, exhausted with pain, fatigue and loss of blood, without clothes or any thing to cover us, trembling with cold and spasms of extreme anguish, without fire or light, parched with excruciating thirst, not a wound dressed nor a soul to administer to one of our wants, nor an assisting hand to turn us during these long tedious hours of the night; nothing but groans and unavailing sighs were heard, and two of our number did not live to see the light of the morning, which brought with it some ministering angels to our relief. The first was in the person of Miss Fanny Ledyard of Southold, L. I. (then on a visit to her uncle, our murdered commander) who held to my lips a cup of warm chocolate, and soon after returned with wine and other refreshmennts, which revived us a little. For these kindnesses, she has never ceased to receive my most grateful thanks, and fervent prayers for her felicity.

The cruelty of our enemy cannot be conceived, and our renegado countrymen surpassed in this respect, if possible, our British foes. We were at least an hour after the battle, within a few steps of a pump in the garrison, well supplied with water, and, although we were suffering with thirst, they would not permit us to take one drop of it, nor give us any themselves. Some of our number, who were not disabled from going to the pump, were repulsed with the bayonet, and not one drop did I taste after the action commenced, although begging for it after I was wounded, of all who came near me, until relieved by Miss Ledyard. We were a horrible sight at this time. Our own friends did not know us—even my own wife came in the room in search of me, and did not recognize me, and as I did not see her, she left the room to seek for me among the slain, who had been collected under a large Elm tree near the house. It was with utmost difficulty that many of them could be identified, and we were frequently called upon to assist their friends in distinguishing them, by remembering particular wounds, &c. Being myself taken out by two men for this purpose, I met my wife and brother, who, after my wounds were dressed by Dr. Downer, from Preston, took me—not too my own home, for that was in ashes, as also every particle of my property, furniture and clothing—but to my brother's where I lay eleven months as helpless as a child, and to this day feel the effects of it severely.

Such was the battle of Groton Heights; and such, as far as my imperfect manner and language can describe, a part of the sufferings which we endured. Never, for a moment, have I regretted the share I had in it; I would for an equal degree of honor, and the prosperity which has resulted to my country from the Revolution, be willing, if possible, to suffer it again. I regret, very much, my not being able to be with my compatriots and co-veterans at the late celebration.

LAST HOURS OF THE COUNTESS OF HUNTINGTON.

When the blood-vessel broke which was the commencement of her illness in November, she said to Lady Ann Erskine, on being asked how she did, 'I am well; all is well—well for ever. I see, wherever I turn my eyes, whether I live or die, nothing but victory.'

Towards the close, she with great emphasis, repeated often, 'The coming of the Lord draweth nigh!' Adding, 'The thought fills my soul with joy unspeakable, whether I shall see his glory more abundantly appear, or whether it be an intimation of my own departure to him.'

At another time, 'all the little ruffles, and difficulties which surround me and all the plans I am exercied with in this poor body, through mercy affect not the settled peace and joy of my soul.'

A day or two before her last illness, just as she had come from her room to her elbow-chair, she broke out in the memorable words, 'The Lord hath been present with my spirit this morning in a remarkable manner: what he means to convey to my mind I know not; my soul is filled with glory; I am as in the element of heaven itself.'

About an hour only before her death, she said to Lady Ann Erskine, who watched her with assiduous attention and for many nights and days never quitted her room, 'Is Charles's* letter come?' (She had sent for him to supply her chapel in Spafields, when Mr. Jones of Langan returned home.) On being answered, 'It is;' she said, 'It must be opened, to see if he comes.' When Lady Ann said, 'I will go and open it,' she added, 'To know if he comes, that's the point.' So anxiously were the cares of her work impressed upon her dying heart; and often she had added, when speaking of her people in her Connection, as her children, 'I feel for their souls.'

During the whole of her illness, her pains never made her impatient, but she seemed more concerned about those who attended her than about herself. She said, tenderly, to Lady Ann Erskine and Miss Scott, whose long, faithful, and tender attachment to her is well known, 'I fear I shall be the death of you both, (alluding to their constant watching with her;) it will be but a few days more.'

She appeared during the tedious nights and days of pain and sickness, engaged in prayer, and animated with thankfulness for the unutterable mercies which she had experienced; saying, 'I am encircled in the arms of love and mercy;' and at another time, 'I long to be at home; O! I long to be at home!' A little before she died, she said repeatedly, 'I shall go to my Father this night!' and shortly after, 'Can he forget to be gracious? Is there any end of his loving-kindness?'

Dr. Lettsome had visited her between four and five. Shortly after her strength failed, and she appeared departing. Alarmed, they summoned up a friend, who was waiting anxiously below; he took her hand—it was bedewed with sweat; he applied his fingers to the pulse—it had ceased to beat; and the instant she breathed her last sigh, as he leaned over her, and fell asleep in Jesus.

Almost her last words were, 'My work is done; I have nothing to do but to go to my Father.' Thus the vital spark quitted its 'mortal frame,' to join those 'who have come out of great tribulation, having washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.' Her Ladyship died at her house in Spafields, London, next door to her chapel, June 17, 1791, in the eighty-fourth year of her age, and was interred in the family vault at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Lincolnshire. How delightful to hear this venerable woman at the close of such a long Christian course, express her unshaken confidence in God her Saviour, and thus triumphantly enter into eternal rest!

"Come, but with hallowed feet approach and view
This Christian woman's death! Her end is peace!
Ah! with what silent eloquence it pleads
The cause of Truth, flashing conviction's glare
E'en on the haughtiest, boldest Infidel!
What tranquil pleasures sit upon her brow,
Where slowly trickles the cold sweat of death!
What sacred raptures—what immortal joys
Burst from her lips, and sparkle in her eyes!"

Thus fell asleep in Jesus one who might well be termed a "Mother in Israel," who had devoted her all for nearly fifty years to the service of the Redeemer. Her's was the exalted honor of being instrumental in "turning many to righteousness," and we doubt not that in fulfilment of the Scripture declaration, she "shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

RETURN OF THE JEWS.

A writer in the London record throws out the following interesting reflections on the feasibility of restoring the Jews to their long lost homes.

Let the four allied Powers now publish to the four quarters of the world their determination to restore the Jews from all nations to the Holy Land, and to assist them in rebuilding the walls of the Temple of Jerusalem; and, assuredly, the multitudinous descendants of Abraham, already restless with the anxiety of desire, and excited by the anticipated fulfilment of this regeneration, would arise to the summons as one man. The extremest time fixed by their rabbies for the coming of Christ is passed—the close of last month quenched their expectations of the advent, and they are in consequence, just now unusually shaken. Let I repeat, the Quadruple Alliance take advantage of this conjecture, and issue a manifesto for the restoration and independence of the Hebrew tribes,, and by next spring the banks of the Euphrates would be once more thronged, and the long line of European and African coasts be crowded by the gathering hosts of Israel. From the different parts on these shores they could be readily shipped, and conveyed by the fleets that now cruise in the Mediterranean, be triumphantly landed on the strand of their long-lost Palestine—a more befitting this, than the waging of a petty war to the bazard of all Europe's peace.

Into the more practical working of the project, to provide for the Jews' subsistence, the taking and holding of the land, and other matters essential to their return to and possession of it, I forbear now to enter; only remarking, that we have the means in our hands, with the union of four great nations, from and through whose friendly territories the mass of returning Jews would pass, and the actual assemblage of their fleets in a sea that washes the shores of Europe, Asia, and Africa. That a country may be thus suddenly and efficiently provided with inhabitants & rulers history declares; that if such a call were made, the Jews would joyfully and enthusiastically flock from the ends of the earth in answer; that, gathered to the Mediterranean ports, they might be rapidly and safely transported to Syria; that once put into possession of a country, for which the hearts of their generations since the banishment, for near 1800 years, have yearned, and where the most powerful of ties moral, social, and religious, would bind them, they would keep possession against all opponents, who can doubt?

MAN HUNG FOR OBEYING HIS MOTHER.

One of the subjects of discussion, during a day's pleasant ride in a stage coach, was that of a filial obedience.

Among other things, we mentioned several cases in which those who have suffered upon the gallows have left it as their dying testimony, that their disobedience to parents laid the foundation of their dreadful end. As we mentioned these facts, an old gentleman more than fourscore, who had taken no part in the discussion, aroused himself from his half slumbers, and said, "The first man that was ever executed in Boston, was hung about 60 years ago, in consequence of obeying his mother!" This was a case so unlike those that had just been given, that we wished to know the circumstances.

"Yes," said the old gentleman, "he told his mother on the scaffold, that she had the mortification of seeing her son executed on the gallows, in consequence of her advice to him when he was a boy.

"One day as he was strolling about his neighbors' premises, he found a hen's nest with three eggs. He took the eggs and carried them home. His mother asked him where he found them. He told her. 'That's a good boy,' said she, 'look round and see if you can't find some more!'

This was the commencement of a course of crime; and obedience to this advice of his mother led him on to ruin. She, like Athaliah of old, "counselled him to do wickedly," and she received her reward, in being called to witness,—a scene to a mother's heart, the most unutterably awful—the ignominious death of that son on the gallows!

And yet, prompt and cheerful obedience to every parental command, except when contrary to the laws of God or the land, is the only path of safety.—Sabbath School [illegible]

MOTHER'S RELIEF.

It is now little more than eight years since we discovered from the aborigines of our country, the medicinal herb from which the Mother's Relief is made; since that time, we have contented ourselves in letting it be its own advertiser; and we would still adhere to this resolution first formed, if we were not compelled to believe that there are persons so unprincipled, and so reckless of the health and lives of the unsuspecting and confiding, as to endeavor to palm off under its name, useless, if not baneful compounds, and thus not only disappointing the just expectations of those who use it, but we fear, doing in many cases, much injury.

As we are informed that there are such compounds now offered at various places, and by different persons, we would caution all who are interested, to be particular to inquire for "BARTHOLICK'S MOTHER'S RELIEF," and purchase of no person except they can show a certificate of agency, signed by G. A. BARTHOLICK & CO.

As the subject cannot, with propriety, be enlarged upon in the form of a newspaper advertisement, permit us to say, that all who have the genuine article for sale, are also furnished with a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution, wherein the subject is more fully discussed, in which its "modus operandi" is demonstrated to be upon true physiological data, operating upon the system only by restoring the deranged functions to their natural condition; allaying the febrile and irritable symptoms, thus aiding and assisting nature in her effort to prepare the system for the important change about to take place. This pamphlet will be given to all who desire it.

As we are thus obliged to come before the public to prevent a wicked and reckless imposition, we will take the occasion to say, that if the increase of the call for the Mother's Relief, wherever known, be any guide to a correct opinion to be formed of the estimation in which it is held, we have the satisfaction of believing that it has been the means of alleviating an infinite amount of suffering and of saving many valuable lives. Wherever it has been used during the above period, deep rooted prejudices have given away to candid and thankful expressions of gratitude, and a wish to extend, on their parts, as far as possible its benefits. Medical men of high standing, have had the candor to acknowledge, for once, that their prejudices must be abandoned, and have been advocates for its use.

All those who wish, are invited to call at some of our Agents and procure a pamphlet, without charge.
